THE HOLY COURT

Cæca Cupido ruit.
Cæcusq; Cupido
Via Regia.
THE HOLY COVRT
dixi Dij estis et filij excelsi omnes
Sancta
Μέλετη θ πσεν perfectum Vsq; perduxit Reg. 3.

THE HOLY COURT

IN

FIVE TOMES:

The First, Treating of

MOTIVES,

Which should excite men of Quality to Christian Perfection,

The Second, Of the

PRELATE, SOULDIER, STATES-MAN, and LADY.

The Third, Of

MAXIMS of CHRISTIANITY.

AGAINST

PROPHANESSE,

Divided into Three Parts, Viz.

DIVINITY, GOVERNMENT OF THIS LIFE, & STATE OF THE OTHER WORLD.

The Fourth, Containing the Command of Reason over the Passions.

The Fifth, Containing the LIVES of the most Famous and Illustrious COURTIERS; taken both out of the Old and New Testament, and other Modern Authours.

Written in French by Nicholas Caussin, S. J. Translated into English by Sr. T. H. and others.

The third Edition.

LONDON,

Printed for John Williams, at the Crown in St. Pauls Church-yard. clɔ Iɔc LXIII.

HOLY COURT

IN

FIVE TOMES:

CONTAINING,

Which Should excite to Consideration, Perfection,

Prelacy, Soul-Piety, Sanctity, and Purity.

MAXIMS OF CHRISTIANITY.

PROPRIETY, BLESSEDNESS,

Community, Government, Justice, Estate,

Commands of Religion, Professions,

Laws, Contracts, &c.

Treasures, and other Medicinal Fruits.

Printed for John Williams, at the Crown in St. Paul's

TO THE

MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY

OF

HENRIETTA-MARIA

QUEEN-MOTHER

OF

GREAT BRITAIN.

A COURT adorned with virtue, and ſanctified with piety, is here, moſt EXCELLENT QUEEN, to Your view preſented; which having once already in pure and Native colours received light and life from the bright eye of Your Royal BROTHER, would gladly at this time, in a harſher language and ruder garment, adventure Your gracious acceptance.

The ſubject is ſerious, the diſcourſe uſefull, and proper for thoſe, who in Court ſo ſerve Princes, that they neglect not an humble acknowledgment to a more tranſcendent Greatneſs.

To the Queen of Great Britain.

It hath pleased GOD, as a singular favour to this Kingdom, to afford us in Your MAJESTY a pious Queen, who exemplarly maketh good, what diffusedly is here handled. Let then lesser lights borrow beams of radiance, from Your greater Orbs; and persist You, Glorious Example of Virtue, to illuminate and heat our Northern Clime with celestial ardours. Add to earthly Crowns, heavenly Diadems of Piety.

Here shall a HOLY COURT be found fairly delineated; nor can I see how it will be in the power of persons of best eminence, to plead ignorance, and pretend inability, they having such a Book to direct them, and such a Queen to follow.

Lead then with alacrity, most Sacred MAJESTY, and may propitious Heaven so prosper Your Holy Desires, that the Greatest may have matter to imitate, and the whole Nation to admire.

TO

TO THE KING OF FRANCE.

SIR,

THIS Treatise of the Holiness of Courts, before it be published, comes forth to behold the great and divine lights, wherewith God hath environed your Majesty, whom he hath chosen out to sanctifie the COURT, by means of two reflections, which are, the Example of your virtues, and the Authority of your Laws. As for example, You supply as much as in a Prince may be desired, who hath brought Innocency into the Throne of Majesty, as an earnest-penny of Royalty, and whitened the very Flower-de-luces, by the purity of your heart and hands. This argument, in my opinion, should powerfully operate in the hearts of French-men: For it would be a disorder in Nature, to see bad Subjects under a good Prince, to plant Vice in the Kingdom of Virtue, and to have a body of morter, and feet of clay, affixed to an head of Gold. It is fit impudence should be extremely shameless, not to blush, when the sparkling lustre of a Crown casteth into the eyes the glimmering flashes of so great a Piety.

Where example cannot reach, Kings have Laws, which are given them from Heaven, as hands of gold and iron, to recompence merits, and chastise crimes. And as your Majesty, SIR, from your most tender years, hath shewed a singular propension to the detestation of Impiety and maintenance of Justice, that causeth me to say, Your Majesty hath great means to make the COURT essentially holy, which the disability of my pen cannot express but on paper. It is a work worthy of a Christian King, who standeth in the midst of Kings, and Nations, as heretofore the statue of the Sun in the midst of publick passages.

Royal hands cannot be better employed, then to erect the Tropheys of Sanctity. That is it which all the first have done; CONSTANTINE in the Roman Empire, CLODOVÆUS in France, RICAREDUS in Spain, ETHELBERT in England, CANUTUS in Denmark, WENCESLAUS in Poland.

All those, who have taken that way, have been glorious in the memory of men: whilst others, that have prepared Altars, and Tables to Fortune (as saith the Prophet Isaiah) erecting Monarchy on humane Maxims, have built on the quick-sands of imaginary greatness, which hath served them to no other purpose, but to measure their fall. Vice and voluptuousness cannot immortalize men; since they have nothing lasting in them, but the sorrow of their infancy, and the infamy of their name. All the greatness and happiness of a Prince, is to make in his virtues a visible image of invisibe Divinity; then to imprint the same on his subjects, as the Sun doth his brightness on the Rain-bowe.

SIR, Your Majesty knoweth it by proper experience; God hath made you to read the decrees of good success, written as it were, with the rayes of your piety. By how much the more you are affected to the service of the great Master, so much the more the good success of affairs hath followed your desires. You have seen your battels end in bays, and the thorns of your travels to grow all up into Crowns. And as we are ever in this world to merit, so we ought to hope, that so many worthy acts will also with time take their just increase; and that you shall sow new virtues on earth, to reap felicities in Heaven: Lastly, that he, who hath given you the entrance of Solomon into the Kingdom, will grant you the exit of David. This is the vow which offereth to God,

SIR, Of Your MAJESTY,

The most humble, most faithfull, and obedient Subject, a 2 N. CAUSSIN.

TO THE NOBILITY OF FRANCE.

SIRS,

THIS Work, as it is compoſed for your ſakes, offereth it ſelf to your hands, without bearing any other ornament on the brow, but the reflection of Truth, any other recommendation, then the worth of the ſubject. It is not the abundant ſtore of ſanctity in the Courts of our Age, which maketh this ſtiled the HOLY COURT; but this Frontiſ-piece onely carrieth the name, becauſe this Book beareth the model, which verily with more eaſe is moulded on paper, then printed on the manners of men. Yet we may affirm, that God, who draweth the Sons of Abraham from the midſt of Flints and Rocks, doth in all places reſerve Saints for himſelf: and he that will conſider it well, ſhall finde that in all times the Courts of zealous Princes have had their Martyrs, their Confeſſors, their Virgins and Hermits.

I have a purpoſe, when my leiſure will permit, to divulge the Lives of Kings, Princes, Lords, Men of State, and likewiſe alſo of Queens, Princeſſes, and Ladies, who, in the courſe of the World, have flouriſhed in much Sanctity, beginning from the Court of David, and then concluding in our Age; to the end the multitude of examples may place the Sun in full ſplendour before their eyes, who take the greatneſs of their condition for pretext of their remiſneſs.

For the preſent, becauſe Reaſon ſhould carry the Torch before Hiſtory, I will ſatisfie my ſelf with publiſhing this Chriſtian Inſtitution, which treateth of the MOTIVES and OBSTACLES men of Quality have to Perfection, with the practiſe of virtues, moſt ſuitable to their condition; the whole attended by two Books of Hiſtories, that very amply contain the good and evil of Courts. I conſecrate this ſmall labour, at the feet of the Church, among ſo many worthy Writers, which make her wholly radiant in gold, not unlike that Bird, which, as the Kings of Aſia contributed great Treaſure to the building of a Temple, ſhe having no other wealth, went thither to preſent her Feathers.

It remaineth, SIRS, that you make the COURT holy, and you ſhall ſanctifie the World: your examples may do much therein; when you ſhall advance the Standard of Piety, a plentifull Train will follow. Behold how all thoſe, that have framed their fortune upon vice, have built on Abyſſes; they have ſowed Winde (as ſaith the Prophet) to reap Tempeſts; their hopes are crackt, as clouds ſwoln with the vapours of the earth; and their felicity like a golden Statue hanged in the Air on a rotten Cable, hath melted upon their head. Never any man hath had good fortune in impiety. He that loſeth his Conſcience, hath nothing elſe to gain nor loſe: Nothing to gain, for that nothing remaineth for him, but unhappineſs; and nothing to loſe, becauſe he hath loſt himſelf. So many crimes and impieties daily float on the face of this Age, that you muſt ſtretch out your Arms againſt Iniquity. If you have your hearts fixed where God planted them, you ſhall place the confidence of well-doing, in the life of the moſt timorous; and ſhame of ill-doing upon the brow of the moſt impudent. Your hands ſhall alwayes be in a readineſs to overthrow vice, and your feet ſhall not walk, but on Palms of Victory.

The Church extendeth her hands out to you, and imploreth the aid of your authority, and good examples. You are in the Houſe of God, as Joſeph in that of the Lord of Egypt. The Maſter hath put all into your hands, defile not the honour of his bed, ſince with his finger he hath imprinted the luſtre of his glory on your fronts. If you be among men, as Mountains over Valleys, be Mountains of perfume, of which Solomon ſpeaketh in the Canticles; and not thoſe Hills of the Prophet Oſee, which have nothing but ſnares, and gins, to ſerve for ſtumbling blocks to thoſe, whom they ſhould enlighten. If you be elevated in the World, as cliffs above the Sea, be Watch-Towers, not Rocks. If you be Stars, be Suns, to be the Chariots of light and life, and not Comets, to pour malignity on the four quarters of the World. Be ye aſſured, that how much the more you are united to God, ſo much the greater ſhall you be; the more conformable you are to the will of the Sovereign Maſter, ſo much ſhall you behold the earth in contempt under your feet, and Heaven in Crowns over your heads.

The

The DESIGN and ORDER of the Book.

TO speak properly, we have but two great Books, the Heaven and the Bible, which never periſh; The others have an Air, and a certain continuance amongſt men, and at the laſt arrive unto their period: But the moſt part of thoſe, who at this day do write, do come into the World, as drops of rain into the Sea, of which the Ocean takes no notice, neither of their coming in, or their going out. In ſo great a croud of Writers, I have put forth my firſt Tome of the HOLY COURT, as under that conſideration, eſteeming that I brought but a little dew, into a great River, and having ſpoken ſome Truths by the way, I ſhould bury my ſelf, from my birth, in the Tomb of ſo many Books, which is excuſable by the law of neceſſity, and honourable by the multitude, and the qualities of thoſe that write.

Howſoever I ſee that GOD, who governeth our lives and our pens, hath been pleaſed that this Work ſhould be had in ſome reſpect, and having exceeded the merit of the Authour, it ſhould alſo exceed his hope, producing ſome fruit, and withall ſome comfort to my travels, which I cannot now judge to be ill employed.

This hath again put my pen into my hand, to follow the continuation of it, to which ſo many perſonages of Honour have brought ſo many reaſons to induce me, that having but little leiſure to undertake this ſecond Work, I have had the leſſe boldneſs to refuſe it.

Thoſe who complain, that my pen hath not ſwiftly enough followed their deſires, are to remember, that though Slowneſs be a mother a little to be blamed, yet her Children are not deformed: The bringing forth of good Books ought not to reſemble that of Birds, concerning which an Ancient writeth, that they come out of the Belly of their mother before they are born; we ought to give them form, and a long time to foſter them in the minde, before they appear in publick; For in precipitation it is a poor attempt to be able onely to hope for nothing, but to erre haſtily, to repent at leiſure. I do more fear the reproaches of precipitation, then deliberation, for in this mortal condition wherein we live, our moſt perfect Actions are but heavy aſſays, and the moſt groſs proofs of perfection.

This may be ſaid without any diminution to the merit of ſome celeſtial Spirits, who make promptitude and goodneſs to march together with an equal pace, it being not expedient, that thoſe who cannot follow them, ſhould glory in the infirmities contrary to ſo great abilities. For me, I content my ſelf with the approvement and admiration of other mens works, reſerving nothing but induſtry for my own. And though for all my pains I cannot of my ſelf finde in my own work ſatisfaction to content the Readers, whom I acknowledge ſo favourable to me, yet ſo it is, that I finde I have brought ſomething which bears ſome correſpondence with their deſires.

This I can aſſure them, that the contraction of the precepts which I have drawn into ſo few words, being able to ſtretch them into Volumes, are not without their profit, and that Hiſtories are made moſt choice of in that nature, where (beſides their majeſty which layes forth the moſt ſpecious affairs of the Eſtate of Empires, ſince the beginning of their Chriſtianiſm) they have a certain ſweetneſs with them, which ſound ſpirits will finde to be ſo much advanced above all Fables and Romances, as the pleaſures of Truth do ſurpaſs all illuſions of Sorcerers.

You ſhall here perpetually obſerve a great Theatre of the Divine Providence, where (God knows) I have no other Deſign, then to advance Virtue, and to beat down Vice, without reflecting on any of the Perſonages of theſe times, no more then if I wrote under the Reign of Charlemaigne, or S. Lewis: I muſt entreat theſe ſpirits of Application, which know not how to behold a work, without making it ſubject to their own fancies, imagining every letter to be the Ecchoes of their own thoughts, that if they have any Commentary to produce, they would rather make a gloſs upon their own Dreams, then on my Books. We live not yet (God be thanked) in an age ſo miſerable, that we dare not ſacrifice to Truth without a diſguiſe, ſeeing it is the glory of our Grandees, that we may openly make war againſt Vice, as againſt an enemy, and not of our party.

For, to ſpeak ſincerely, having laid my firſt Tome at the feet of the ſacred perſon of our great King, I conſidered what great and gliſtering lights there were in all their Orders, within his

Court

Court, which might ſerve as Models for my Treatiſe, but to avoid the affectation of all compliance with this World, I did expreſly forbear it, my own nature and my long Robe having ſo far eſtranged me from all worldly pretences, that it would be a diſeaſe unto me, but to ſalute a man, if he had not Heaven and the Stars to return me for it.

As concerning the manner of writing which I have obſerved, I ſhall eaſily confeſs unto my Reader, that it proceeded rather from my Genius, then from Art, and though I have been curious enough to obſerve whatſoever the Greek or Romane Eloquence hath happily brought forth, yet I muſt acknowledge, that there is a Ray of God himſelf, which entring into our ſpirit, and mingling with our nature, is more knowing and effectual, then all precepts whatſoever. And this I can affirm for the inſtruction of youth, to thoſe who have demanded my advice, concerning the qualities and conditions of ſtiles. It is true, I have peruſed variety of Books, written in all Ages, and I have acknowledged that the moſt ſenſible amongſt them, have been raiſed both in their conceptions and their words, above the common reach, and alwayes without affectation. Others have been paſſionately taken with ſome fine niceties, which are the capital Enemies to perſwaſion, and above all, to be eſchewed in the Diſcourſes which are made of Piety, whoſe nerves they do infeeble, and whoſe luſtres they do foil: we may ſee that thoſe, who from the Chair do ſpeak unto us, either by account or by writing, although it be with terms diſcreet enough; yet they leave a leſſe impreſſion on our hearts, and ſometimes are ſo violently carried away to ſerve their own reputation, that they forget their engagements to the Truth. We may obſerve ſome, who through too much ſpirit, ſeek out by-ways of conceptions of common ſenſe, and extravagant words, and ſo ſtrongly adore their own thoughts, that they can ſuffer none but themſelves on their own paper, which is the cauſe, they ſeldom meet with the right uſe of humane underſtanding, being the true Citizens of Plato's Common-wealth, capable to controul all things, but to perform nothing. Others there are, who glory in a ſterility, and are wilfully angry againſt God, becauſe in ſome part of the Heavens he placed ſo many ſtars. Theſe can endure nothing that is generous, without ſnarling or biting at it. They conceive Beauty and Light to be blemiſhes, becauſe they are above their capacities. Laſtly, there are ſome, who in their continual Allegations, do ſo lay forth themſelves in the praiſe of others, that they make their Diſcourſes like thoſe pictures of Helena, which are all of gold: There is nothing but Drapery to be ſeen, you cannot diſtinguiſh the foot from the hand, nor the eye from the ear. But I will enter no further into the conſideration of our times, having learned rather to reſpect then cenſure the indifferent Works of our Writers. But to ſpeak ſoundly, I never thought it expedient, either to perſwade unto, or to follow the ſame faſhions. And as in this work I have not altogether renounced the learning and the ornaments, which I thought to be convenient, but have enchaſed them in it, ſo I would not fill my papers with Quotations and ſtrange Languages, this Labour being undertaken rather to perſwade the Great ones unto Virtue, then to fill the Extracts and Annotations of the Students.

I have ſo moderated the ſtyle, without letting my ſelf looſe to the emnty language of Complements, which had been beneath my Subject, that I conceive I have rendred it eaſie to be underſtood, even to thoſe apprehenſions which make no profeſſion at all of learning.

It is the onely Deſign that I have, to ſpeak ſo as to be underſtood, perſwading my ſelf, according to the ſaying of Philo, that Word and Thought are two Siſter-Germans, and that the youngeſt is born, onely to make the eldeſt known. I ſtudy more for weight of ſentences, then for ornament of words, pretending nothing to the glory of mundane Quills, which we ſee every day appear amongſt ſo many Authours of this Age, who would be more perfect, if they would apply themſelves to more grave ſubjects, and in ſome faſhion imitate the Sun, who being admired throughout the whole world, doth not know how to admire it ſelf.

Nevertheleſs it often comes to paſſe, but not to the more lofty Writers, who are ordinarily endued with more modeſty, but to certain men extremely profane, to idolize their own inventions, to condemn all Treatiſes of worth, and to eſteem, that one cannot be eloquent in our tongue, if he writes not Vanity or Impureneſs.

Certainly, if a queſtion were made to judge of the French eloquence, the riches of Babylon are not ſo exquiſite, that they may ſtand in compariſon with the beauties of Sion. As long as letters and men ſhall continue there ſhall continue the praiſes of ſo many excellent Books, which have come from the hands of ſo many Illuſtrious Prelates, and other qualified perſons, nay, and of the ſecular State, who have exercíſed their ſtyle on chaſte and honourable Arguments, and worthy all commendation. I ſpeak this by the way, having at this time no deſign to enlarge my ſelf on the recital of the number of thoſe able men, who have now the pen in their hands, nor praiſe thoſe of my own Robe, who have given their holy Labours to the publick, and who I know may be followed by a great number of excellent Spirits of the ſame Society.

For

For that which concerns me, I am acquitted of my promise, and I conceive, that I have sufficiently expressed in these two Volumes, the whole reach of my Design: for the rest, I conceive that the Books of Devotion which are to be made publick, ought to be rare, and to be very well digested, because there is already extant so great a number of them, that the number of the Authours will suddenly exceed the number of the Readers.

Satiety will cast a cloud on the brightest Beauties, and though a thing may be very good, yet we ought not to surfet with the exceſs thereof, for fear that good Offices be turned into misprisions, and Charity render it self too importunate. But so it is, that we must confess that Pieces well-wrought are never seen in so great a number, as to bring any fastidiousness to them who do know their merit.

Here do I stop my pen, and if there appears any worth in this Volume, I look upon it as on the Mirrour planted on the Wall of a Temple in Arcadia, where those that beheld it, in stead of their own face, saw the representation of the Divinity which they adored.

Even so in all this which may bring any profit to the Reader, I see nothing of my own, but I acknowledge the Father of Lights, who is the Beginning and the End of all which we do make praise-worthy. And I beseech him, if there be found any thing attractive in these Discourses, that He will, like the Load-stone, draw up the Readers, and carry them to the love of their Creatour, to whom is due the tribute of all honour, as to him who is the Beginning of all Perfection. It is indeed the onely consolation which we can receive from our labours. For, not to dissemble the Truth, he that cares more to write then to live, flattering his pen, and neglecting his conscience, shall have work enough to defend himself from the Scurf, the Rat, and from Oblivion. And when in a passionate life he shall carry with him the applauses of the World, it shall be as a small sacrifice unto him of smoak abroad, to lodge a fire and tempest in his own house.

It is reported, that the Stars contribute their beams to enlighten the Infernals, and I can affirm, that all the lights of Understanding and Reputation shall serve onely to inflame the torments of a reprobate soul, who shall shut his eyes against God, to open them onely to let in Vanity.

In the end, after many Editions of the HOLY COURT, as I desired here to put the last hand to it, I am now retired into the solitary place of Quinpercorentin, for the love of the truth: where the honesty of the Inhabitants have made me to finde it as my Countrey, which other men have taken for a place of banishment: There on the banks of the Ocean, at the feet of a Saint, who is the Tutelar of the Village, perceiving that God had sweetned to me all the bitterness both of men and of the times, by the infusion of his Paternal Consolation, I have composed more Treatises, both of Doctrine and Piety, to render in some sort my silence profitable to the publick, of which one day I will give a good account unto my Readers, if God shall grant me life.

Amongst other things, I have digested into good order, this Work of the HOLY COURT, and I have enriched it with a remarkable Augmentation of the Lives and Elogies of the Illustrious Personages at Court, as well in the Old as the New Testament.

Now I do produce it to the light, after that by the singular favour of Heaven, the obstacles are removed, and Truth acknowledged on the Throne of Lights, with which God hath round environed it.

THE

THE

TABLE

OF THE

Chief CONTENTS of the First Tome of the HOLY COURT.

FIRST BOOK.

Motives to stir up Persons of quality to Christian Perfection.

MOTIVE.	Page
THat the Court and Devotion are not incompatible.	1
I. Name of Christian.	2
II. Nobility.	4
III. Eminent Dignity.	5
IV. Riches.	8
V. Corporal endowments.	10
VI. Endowments of the mind.	12
VII. Courage.	14
VIII. Education.	16
IX. Court a life of penance.	18
X. Gratitude.	20
XI. Example.	22
XII. Punishment.	23
XIII. Reward.	25

SECOND BOOK.

Hinderances that worldly ones have in the path of Salvation.

OBSTACLE.	Page.
I. VVEak faith.	27
II. Errour in faith & in Religion.	31
III. To live according to opinion.	39
IV. Inconstancy of manners.	41
V. Masked life.	42
VI Ill manage of time.	45
VII. Liberty of tongue.	47
VIII. Curiosity in hearing affronts.	49
IX. Carnal love.	51
X. Superfluous attire.	53
XI. Envy.	56
XII. Ambition and Avarice.	58
Conclusion. A bad Courtier's life is a perpetual Obstacle to virtue.	61

THIRD BOOK.

Practise of VIRTUES.

SECTION.	Page
I. DEvotion for Great-ones.	62
II. Wherein consisteth all Devotion and Spiritual life.	63
Character of the spiritual man.	64
Character of the carnal man.	ibid.
III. First combat of a spiritual man, against ignorance.	ibid.
IV. Practise of faith.	65
V. Four other lights to disperse ignorance.	66
VI. Twelve Maxims of salvation.	ibid.
VII. Twelve Maxims of wisdom.	68.
VIII. Practice of Devotion and Prayer.	70
IX. Necessity of confession.	ibid.
X. Practice of confession.	71
XI. Practice of examen of Conscience.	73
XII. Practice of receiving.	74
XIII. Practise of hearing Mass.	76
XIV. Practise of meditation.	77
XV. Practice of vocal prayer, and spiritual reading and frequenting Sermons.	80
XVI. Second combat of the spiritual man against pusillanimity.	81
XVII. Twelve Maxims to vanquish temptations,	ib.

XVIII. Remedies against the passions and temptations growing from every vice 83
XIX. Shame in well doing. 84
XX. Affection towards creatures 85
XXI. Indiscreet affliction of mind, and sadness 86
XXII. Third combat of the Spiritual man against impurity 87
XXIII. Practice of chastity 88
XXIV. Practice of temperance 89
XXV. Practice of modesty 90
XXVI. Practice of prudence, and government in conversation ibid.
XXVII. Against another impurity, to wit, desire of having, and first of poverty of the rich 91
XXVIII. Practice of Justice 92
XXIX. Practice of thankfulness 93
XXX. Practice of charity 94
XXXI. The practice of humility and magnanimity 95
XXXII. Practice of patience 96
XXXIII. Practice of daily actions. 97

Instructions for married.

XXXIV. Misery of marriages ill managed 99
XXXV. Evils of marriage grow from disorders therein committed. 102
XXXVI. Selected instructions for the married. 104
XXXVII. Instructions for Widdows 105

To Maids.

XXXVIII. Praises of virginity, and of the modesty they ought to observe in their carriage 107

To Fathers and Mothers.

XXXIX. Concerning bringing up and instructing children. 110

To Children.

XL. Of piety towards parents 114

The fourth Book treateth of Impiety of Courts, and Unhappy Policy, page 147
The fifth Book setteth forth Fortunate Piety. page 141

A TABLE

OF THE

TITLES and SECTIONS contained in the Second Tome of the HOLY-COURT.

THE PRELATE.

SECTION. Page

I. THat it is convenient the Nobility should govern the Church 168
II. That the Nobility should not aspire to Ecclesiastical offices, but by lawful ways 170
III. Of the Vocation or calling of a Prelate 172
IV. Virtues requisite in the carriage of a Prelate ibid.
V. The second virtue of a Prelate, which is Fortitude of spirit, against Avarice and Riot 173
VI. The third Quality of a good Prelate which is purity of life 174
VII. The fourth perfection of a Prelate, which is observed in Zeal and Charity 175
VIII. The fifth excellency of a Prelate, which is science and prudence ibid.
IX. The Motives which noble Prelates have to the duty of their profession 176
X. The Examples of great Prelates, are very lively spurs to virtue 177

Saint AMBROSE.

I. HIs Calling 179
II. A short Elogy of the life and manners of S. Ambrose 180
III. His government 181
IV. His Combats, and first against Gentilism 184
Oration of Symmachus to Theodosius and Valentinian the Younger, for the Altar of Victory, Exercise of Pagan Religion, and Revenue of Vestals ibid.
V. Oration of S. Ambrose against Symmachus 186
VI. The triumph of S. Ambrose in the conversion of S. Augustine 188
VII. Dispositions to the conversion of S. Augustine 192
VIII. Agitations of Spirit in S. Augustine upon his conversion 195
IX. Accidents which furthered this conversion 196
X. The admirable change of Saint Augustine 197
XI. The affairs of Saint Ambrose with the Em-

THE TABLE.

Emperours Valentinian the Father, and Gratian the Son 200
XII The death of the Emperour Gratian, and afflictions of S. Ambroſe 202
XIII The Embaſſage of S. Ambroſe 205
XIV The perſecution of S. Ambroſe, raiſed by the Empreſs Juſtina 207
XV Maximus paſſeth into Italy 209
XVI Affliction of S. Ambroſe upon the death of Valentinian 211
XVII The Tyranny of Eugenius, and notable liberty of S. Ambroſe 212
XVIII The differences of S. Ambroſe with the Emperour Theodoſius, and his death 213

The SOULDIER.

I The excellency of warlike virtue 217
II The entrance into the Palace of Valour, and the illuſions of the Salmoneans and Rodomonts 218
III The Temple of Valour, and ſage Precepts given by the Chriſtian Souldier to refute the manners of the times. And firſt that Piety helpeth Valour. 220
IV Manifeſt proofs, which declare, that Piety and Valour are not things incompatible 222
V Againſt Duels 225
VI Againſt the ill manage of Arms 226
VII Againſt ſenſual Love and Impurity 229
VIII Againſt the perfidiouſneſs of Intereſts 232
IX Short and notable Inſtructions ibid.

CONSTANTINE.

I The providence of God over Conſtantine 234
II The Nobility of Conſtantine 236
III His Education and Qualities 238
IV His entry into the Empire 239
V His proweſs againſt Maxentius 241
VI The death of Dioclefian, and feats of Arms performed by Conſtantine againſt Licinius 243
VII The vices and paſſions of Conſtantine before his Baptiſm, with the death of Criſpus and Fauſta 244
VIII The calling of Conſtantine to Chriſtianity. The progreſs of his Converſion and Baptiſm 247
IX The Acts of Conſtantine after his Baptiſm 249
X The endeavour of good works, with the Virtues and Laws of Conſtantine 250
XI The zeal of Conſtantine in the proceedings in the Council of Nice 252
XII The government of Conſtantine 256
XIII The death of Conſtantine 258

The STATES-MAN.

I The excellency of politick Virtues 263
II The Table of Babylon, drawn from ſundry conceptions of the moſt ſingular wits of Antiquity 264
III The deſtruction of Babylon, and the government of the Divine Providence over the Eſtates of the World 266
IV The Table of the City of God, otherwiſe called, The City of honeſt men, drawn out of many excellent conceits of ancient Authours, and things practiſed in ſome former Common-wealths 269
V Sage Precepts drawn out of the Monuments of the divine Agathopolis 271

BOETIUS.

I His great Nobility 277
II The eminent wiſdom and learning of Boetius 279
III His entrance into Government of State 281
IV The entrance of Theodorick into Rome, and his happy Government by the counſel of Boetius 283
V The honours of Boetius, and alteration of Theodorick 288
VI The impriſonment of Boetius 291
VII The death of Boetius 293

The LADY.

I That the Holy Court cannot ſubſiſt without the virtue of Ladies, and of their piety in the advancement of Chriſtianity 296
II That women are capable of good lights, and ſolid Inſtructions 297
III The ten Orders of women, and the vicious qualities, which Ladies ought eſpecially to avoid 298
IV The tenth Order of women, full of wiſdom and virtue 301

THE TABLE.

V A brief Table of the excellent qualities of a Lady. And first, of true Devotion. 301
VI Modesty. 302
VII Chastity 303
VIII Discretion in the manage of affairs 304
IX Conjugal love ib.
X The care of Children 305
XI The conclusion of the Discourse 306

CLOTILDA.

I Her Birth and Education 307
II Clodovæus requireth Clotilda in Marriage 308
III Embassage to the King of Burgundy, for the marriage of Clotilda 309
IV The arrival of Clotilda in France, and the life she led in the time of Wedlock 311
V The prudence which the Queen used in the conversion of her Husband 312
VI The conversion of Clodovæus 314
VII What Clodovæus did by the perswasion of Clotilda after his Baptism 315
VIII The good success which God gave to Clodovæus after he became a Christian 317
IX The life of Clotilda in her widow-hood. Her afflictions and glorious death. 318

INDEGONDIS.

X Issued from the blood and house of Clotilda; she transporteth the Catholick Faith into Spain. 322
XI The persecution of Indegondis 324
XII The retreat of Hermingildus, and his Conversion ib.
XIII The reciprocal Letters of the Father and the Son, upon their separation 326
XIV The treaty of peace between Levigildus and his Son, by the mediation of Indegondis ib.
XV Hermingildus is wickedly betrayed 327
XVI The letter of Hermingildus to Indegondis, and his generous resolution 329
XVII The death of Hermingildus 330

A TABLE OF THE MAXIMS AND EXAMPLES

Contained in the Third TOME of the HOLY COURT.

The First Part of the Third Tome, touching the DIVINITY.

I Maxim. Of Religion 337
I Example. Of the esteem we ought to make of Faith and Religion 340
II Maxim. Of the Essence of God. 341
II Example. The power of God over faithless Souls 344
III Maxim. Of the excellency of God 347
The greatness of God compared to the abjectness of man 348
III Example. Of the weakness of man, and inconstancy of humane things 350
IV Maxim. Of the Providence of God 353
The foundation of truths of the Providence of God 355
IV Example. Divers observations upon Providence 357
V Maxim. Of Accidents. 358
V Example. Of the Providence of God over the estates and riches of the world 362
VI Maxim. Of Predestination 364
VI Example. Of the secret power of Predestination 367
VII Maxim. Of the Divinity of Jesus 369
Of the revelation of the Word Incarnate, and how all Creatures bear witness of his Divinity ib.
VII Example. The triumph of Jesus over the enemies of Faith 372
VIII Maxim. Of perfections of Jesus which make him to be beloved 374
Excellencies in the person of our Saviour 375
VIII Example. Of the admirable change of worldly love into the love of Jesus Christ 378

The

The Second Part, touching the Order of this present Life.

IX Maxim. Of Devotion 381
Of dark Devotion ib.
Affected Devotion 382
Transcendent Devotion 384
Solid Devotion 385
IX Example. Of Solid Devotion 386
X Maxim. Of Interest 389
X Example. Of Liberality, and the unhappiness of such as seek their ends by unlawful ways 392
XI Maxim. Of Craft 394
XI Example. Of Craft 397
XII Maxim. Of Revenge 399
XII Example. Of Reconciliation 402
XIII Maxim. Of the Epicurean life 404
XIII Example. The dreadful events of Sensuality 407
XIV Maxim. Of Sufferings 408
That the Divine Providence excellently appeareth in the afflictions of the Just 409
XIV Example. Of constancy in Tribulation 411

The Third Part, touching the State of the other World.

XV Maxim. Of Death 413
XV Example. Of the manner how to die well, drawn from the model of our Lady 417
XVI Maxim. Of the Immortality of the Soul 420
XVI Example. Of the return of Souls 424
XVII Maxim. Of Purgatory 426
XVII Example. Of the Apparition of Souls 429
XVIII Maxim. Of eternal unhappiness 431
XVIII Example. Of the Day of Judgment, and the pains of Hell 435
XIX Maxim. Of Sovereign Beatitude 437
XIX Example. Of contentments of Beatitude 440
XX Maxim. Of Resurrection 441
The condition of the glorified Bodies 443
That the Resurrection of Jesus Christ is the foundation of ours, and that we should behold the sweetness and glories of it as the sources of our Eternity. 444
XX Example. Divers observations on the length of Life, and desire of Resurrection 447

Conclusion of the MAXIMS.

I Obscurity and persecution of Truth 448
II The definition of Sensuality; the description, division, and sundry sorts of Libertines 449
III The causes of Sensuality well described by the Apostle Saint Jude 450
IV The ignorance and nullity of Sensuality 451
V The effects of Sensuality, and punishment of the wicked 452
VI Hideous usage of the wicked for the sin of Impiety 453
VII Advice to Youth, and such as too easily give way to Impiety 455
VIII That the remedy of our Evil consisteth in Zeal towards Faith 456

Division

THE TABLE.

Division of the DIARY.

I. ACTS OF DEVOTION.
II. PRACTICE OF VIRTUE.
III. BUSINESSE.
IV. RECREATION.

A Table of the SECTIONS.

THE FIRST PART.

Concerning Devotion.

SECTION. Page.

I The importance of well-ordering every action of the day 458
II At waking ib.
III Five good actions to begin the day 459
IV Of Adoration, the first act of Devotion ib.
V An example of Adoration ib.
VI Of Thanksgiving, the second act of Devotion 460
VII A pattern of Thanksgiving ib.
VIII Of Offering or Oblation, the third act of Devotion. ib.
IX The manner of offering our selves to God 461
X Of Contrition, the fourth act of Devotion ib.
XI A form of Contrition ib.
XII Of Petition or Request, the fifth act of Devotion. ib.
XIII A form of Petition 462
XIV Of the time proper for spiritual reading ib.
XV An Abstract of the Doctrine of Jesus Christ to be used at the Communion ib.
XVI What we are to do at the Celebration of the blessed Sacrament, and other ensuing acts ib.
XVII Devotion for the days of the week 463
XVIII Devotion for the hours of the day 464
XIX Of Confession, a very necessary Act of Devotion; and advice thereon ib.
XX An excellent prayer of S. Augustine for this Exercise, taken out of a Manuscript of Cardinal Seripandus 465
XXI Of Communion, the chiefest of all acts of Devotion; with a brief advice concerning the practice of it ib.

THE SECOND PART.

Of the Practice of Virtues.

I Twelve fundamental Considerations of Virtues 466
II Seven paths of Eternity, which lead the Soul to great virtues 468
III Perfection, and wherein it consisteth 469
IV Of Virtues, and their degrees ib.
V Four orders of those that aspire to perfection 471
VI A short way to perfection, practised by the Ancients ib.
VII The means to become perfect 472
VIII How we ought to govern our selves against temptations, afflictions, and hinderances, which we meet with in the way of virtue ibid.
IX Remedies against Passions and Temptations which proceed from every vice 474

THE THIRD PART.

Of Business.

I Business, of what importance 474
II Two heads to which all business is reduced 475
III Of the government of a Family ibid.
IV Of direction in spiritual matters ib.
V Advice for such as are in office and government 476

THE

THE TABLE.

THE FOURTH PART.

Of Recreation.

I. Recreation, how necessary 477
II. Of the pleasures of the Taste ibid.
III. Of Gaming ib.
IV. Of Dancing 478
V. Of wanton songs and plays. ibid.
VI. Of walking and running. ibid.
VII. The four conditions of Recreation. ibid.
VIII. Of vicious conversations and first, of impertinent. 479
IX. Of vain conversation ibid.
X. Of evil conversation. ib.
XI. The conditions of a good conversation. ibid.
XII. Conclusion of the DIARY. 480

EJACULATIONS for the Diary. 481
PRAYERS for all persons and occasions. 482

A TABLE.

OF ALL THE

Gospels, and Particulars of our SAVIOUR's Passion, mentioned in the ENTERTAINMENTS of LENT, with their Moralities and Aspirations.

Upon the words of Genesis, cap. 3. Thou art dust and to dust thou shalt return. page 483
Upon the Gospel of S. Matthew, cap. 6. Of hypocritical fasting. ib.
Upon S. Matthew the 18. Of the Centurions words, O Lord I am not worthy 484
Upon S. Matthew the 5. Wherein we are directed to pray for our enemies. 485
Upon S. Matthew the 6. Of the Apostles danger at sea. ibid.
Upon S. Matthew the 4. Of our Saviour's being tempted in the desart. 486
Upon S. Matthew the 25. Of the Judgement-day. 487
Upon S. Matthew the 21. Jesus drove out the buyers and sellers out of the Temple 488
Upon S. Matthew the 12. The Pharisees demand a sign of Jesus. ibid.
Upon S. Matthew 15. Of the woman of Canaan. 489
Upon S. John the 5. Of the probatick pond. 490
Upon S. Matthew the 17. Of the transfiguration of our Lord. ibid.
Upon S. John the 8. Jesus said to the Jews, Where I go, ye cannot come. 491
Upon S. Matthew the 23. Jesus said, The Pharisees sit in Moses chair, believe therefore what they say. 492
Upon S. Matthew the 20. The request of the wife of Zebedee, for her sons James and John. 493
Upon S. Luke the 16. Of the rich glutton and poor Lazarus. ibid.
Upon S. Matthew the 21. Of the Master of the Vineyard, whose son was killed by his Farmers. 494
Upon S. Luke the 15. Of the prodigal child. 495
Upon S. Luke the 11. Jesus cast out the devil which was dumb. 496
Upon S. Luke the 4. Jesus is required to do miracles in his own Country. 497
Upon S. Matthew the 18. If thy brother offend thee, tell him of it alone ibid.
Upon S. Matthew the 15. The Pharisees asked, Why do thy Disciples contradict antient Traditions? 498
Upon S. Luke the 4. Jesus cured the fever of Simon's mother-in-law. 499
Upon S. John the 4. Of the Samaritan woman at Jacob's Well, near Sichar ibid.
Upon S. John the 8. Of the woman found in adultery. 500
Upon S. John the 6. Of the five fishes and two barley loaves 501 Upon S. John the 2. Of the whipping buyers and sellers out of the Temple 502
Upon S. John the 7. The Jews marvel at the learning of Jesus who was never taught 503
Upon S. John the 9 Of the blind man cured by clay and spittle ibid.
Upon S. Luke the 7. Of the widows son raised from death to life at Naim by our Saviour. 504

Upon

Upon S. John the 11. Of the raising up Lazarus from death. 505
Upon S. John the 8. Of our Saviour's words, I am the light of the world. 506
Upon S. John the 8. Of these words, Who can accuse me of sin? 507
Upon S. John the 7. Jesus said to the Pharisees, You shall seek and not find me: and he that is thirsty, let him come to me. ib.
Upon S. John the 7. Jesus went not into Jury, because the Jews had a purpose to take away his life. 508
Upon S. John the 10. The Jews said, If thou be the Messias, tell us plainly. 509
Upon S. John the 7. Of Saint Mary Magdalen's washing our Saviour's feet in the Pharisee's house. ib.
Upon Saint Mary Magdalen's great repentance. 510
Upon S. John the 11. The Jews said, What shall we do? for this man doth many miracles. 511
Upon S. John the 12. The Chief Priests thought to kill Lazarus, because the miracle upon him, made many follow Jesus. ib.
Upon S. Matthew the 21. Our Saviour came in triumph to Jerusalem a little before his passion. 512
Upon S. John the 12. Mary Magdalen anointed our Saviour's feet with precious ointment, at which Judas repined. 513
Upon S. John the 13. Of our Saviour's washing the feet of his Apostles. 514
Moralities upon the garden of Mount Olivet. 515
Moralities upon the apprehension of Jesus. ib.
Aspiration upon S. Peter's passionate tears. 516
Moralities upon the Pretorian or Judgment-Hall ib.
Moralities for Good Friday, upon the death of Jesus Christ. 517
The Gospel For Easter day, S. Mark the 16 519
The Gospel for Easter Munday, S. Luke 24. 250
The Gospel on Tuesday, S. Luke 24 521
The Gospel on Low-Sunday, John 20. ib.

THE

A

TABLE

Of the Treatises and Sections contained in the fourth Tome OF THE HOLY COURT

The First TREATISE. Of the necessity of LOVE.

Section		Page.
1	Against the Philosophers who teach Indifferency, saying, We must not Love any thing	529
2	Of Love in general	531
3	Of Amity	533
4	Of Amity between persons of different sexes	535
5	Of the entertainment of Amities	539
6	Of Sensual Love its Essence and Source	543
7	The effects of Sensual Love	545
8	Remedies of evil Love by precaution	546
9	Other Remedies which nearer hand oppose this Passion	548
10	Of Celestial Amities	551
11	Of the Nature of Divine Love. Its Essence, Qualities, Effects, and Degrees	554
12	The practice of Divine Love	556
13	A notable Example of Worldly Love changed into Divine Charity.	558

The Second TREATISE. Of Hatred.

1	Its Essence, Degrees, and Differences	561
2	That the consideration of the goodness of the heart of God, should dry up the root of the Hatred of a neighbour	563
3	That Jesus grounded all the greatest Mysteries of our Religion upon Union, to cure Hatred	ibid.
4	Of three notable sources of Hatred, and of politick remedies proper for its cure	564
5	Natural and Moral Remedies against this passion	566
6	Of the profit may be drawn from Hatred, and the course we must hold to be freed from the danger of being Hated	567

The Third TREATISE. Of Desire.

1	Whether we should desire any thing in the world; the Nature, the Diversitie and Description of Desire	569
2	The Disorders which spring from inordinate Desires, and namely from Curiosity and Inconstancy	570
3	The foure sources, out of which all ill rectified Desires proceed	571
4	That the tranquillity of Divine Essence, for which we are created, ought to rule the unquietness of our Desires	572
5	That we should desire by the imitation of Jesus Christ	573
6	The Condemnation of the evil Desires of the world, and the means how to divert them	574

THE TABLE.

The Fourth TREATISE.

Of Aversion.

SECTION.	Page.
1 THe Nature and Qualities thereof	574
2 The Swetnesses and Harmonies of the heart of God shew us the way how to cure our Aversions	575
3 The consideration of the indulgent favours of Jesus Christ towards humane nature is a powerful remedy against the humour of disdain	576
4 The conclusion against disdain	577

The Fifth TREATISE.

Of Delectation.

1 THat Delectation is the scope of Nature. Its Essence, Objects, and differences	578
2 The baseness and giddiness of Sensual voluptuousness	579
3 The Sublimity, Beauty and Sweetness of heavenly delights	ibid.
4 The Paradise and Joyes of our Lord when he was on earth	580
5 Against the stupidity and cruelty of worldly pleasures	581
6 The Art of Joy, and the means how to live contented in this World	582

The Sixth TREATISE.

Of Sadness.

1 ITs Description, Qualities, and the diversity of those who are turmoiled with this Passion	584
2 Humane Remedies of Sadness, and how that is to be cured, which proceedeth from Melancholy, and Pusillanimity	585
3 The remedie of Sadness, which proceeds from divers accidents of humane life	587
4 That the Contemplation of the Divine patience and tranquillity, serve for remedy for our temptations	589
5 That the great temper of our Saviour's soul in most horrible sufferings, is a powerful lenitive against our dolours	590
6 Advice to impatient soules	591

The Seventh TREATISE.

Of Hope.

1 THe Description, Essence and appurtenances thereof	592
2 That one cannot live in the world without Hope, and what course is to be held for the well ordering of it	ibid.
3 That God not being capable of Hope, serveth as an Eternal Basis to all good Hopes	594

The Eighth TREATISE.

Of Despair.

1 ITs Nature, Composition and effects	596
2 The causes of Despair, and the condition of those who are most subject to this Passion	597
3 Humane Remedies of Despair	598
4 Divine Remedies	599
5 The Examples which Jesus Christ gave us in the abyss of his sufferings, are most efficacious against pusillanimity	600
6 Encouragement to good Hopes	ibid.

The Ninth TREATISE.

Of Fear.

1 THe Definition, the Description, the Causes and effects thereof	601
2 Of the vexations of Fear; Its differences and Remedies	602
3 Against the Fear of the accidents of humane life	603
4 That the Contemplation of the power, and the Bounty of God, ought to take away all our Fears	605
5 That the Example of a God-man ought to instruct and assure us, against affrightments of this life	ibid.

The

THE TABLE.

The Tenth TREATISE.

Of Boldneſs.

Section.		Page.
1	The Picture and Eſſence of it	607
2	The diverſity of Boldneſs	608
3	Of laudable Boldneſs	ibid.
4	That true Boldneſs is inſpired by God, and that we muſt wholly depend on him to become Bold	610
5	That Jeſus hath given us many pledges of a ſublime confidence to ſtrengthen our Courage	612

The Eleventh TREATISE.

Of Shamefac'dneſs.

1	The decency of Shamefac'dneſs. Its nature and definition	613
2	Divers kinds of Shamefac'dneſs	ibid.
3	The Excellency of Shamefac'dneſs, and the uglineſs of Impudency	615
4	Of Reverence due to God	ibid.
5	Of the Reverence which the Holy Humanity of our Lord, did bear to his Eternal Father	616

The Twefth TREATISE.

Of Anger.

1	The Origen of Anger, its Nature, Cauſes and Diverſities	618
2	Three principal kinds of Anger	619
3	The Contemplation of the ſerenity of the divine Spirit, is the miſtriſs of meekneſs	620
4	That the example of our Saviour doth teach us the moderation of Anger	ibid.
5	Politick Remedies to appeaſe ſuch as are Angry	621
6	Moral Remedies againſt the ſame paſſion	ibid.

The Thirteenth TREATISE.

Of Envie and Jealouſie

1	The Picture thereof	623
2	The Definition of Envie, its ſeveral kinds, and firſt of Jealouſie	124
3	Two other branches of this ſtock, which are Indignation, and malicious Envie, with Calumny its Companion	626
4	Humane remedies of Envie	627
5	Divine remedies drawn from the benignity of God	628
6	The merciful eye of Jeſus, ſerveth for an antidote againſt all ſorts of Envie	625
7	A deteſtation of Envie	626

The Fourteenth TREATISE.

Of Mildneſs and Compaſsion.

1	The great miſery of Man, makes Compaſſion neceſſary in the World	627
2	The Eſſence of Compaſſion, and how it findeth place in hearts moſt generous	ibid.
3	Moderate ſeverity is neceſſary in Government; but it ought to be free from Cruelty	631
4	The goodneſs of God beateth down the rigour of men	ibid.
5	The Mercies of the incarnate Word are able to ſoften the harſheſt hearts	632

HISTORICAL OBSERVATIONS

Upon the four Principal Paſsions, which are as Four Devils, diſturbers of the HOLY COURT.

Observat.		Page.
1	The diſaſters of ſuch as have yielded to the Paſſion of Love; and the glory of ſouls which have ſurmounted it	635
2	Obſervations upon the Paſſion of Deſire: wherein we may behold the miſery of Ambitions and turbulent ſpirits	641
3	Obſervations upon Anger and Revenge	646
4	Obſervations upon Envie, which draweth with it Jealouſie, Hatred and Sadneſs	650

A TABLE

Of the LIVES and ELOGIES of Illustrious Persons contained in the Fifth Tome.

Monarchs	653	Joseph	742
David	663	Moses	751
Solomon	675	Samuel	759
Justinian	682	Daniel	765
Charlemaign	696	Elijah	772
S. Lewis, King of France	701	Elisha	779
Judith	705	Isaiah	784
Hester	711	Jeremiah	786
Josuah	720	S. John Baptist	790
Judas Maccabeus	721	S. Paul and Seneca	794
Godfrey	732	Mary Stuart	811
George Castriot	733	Cardinal Pool	835
Boucicaut	735	A Treatise of the Angel of Peace to all Christian Princes	841
Bayard	738

THE

THE HOLY COURT.

FIRST BOOK.

Of Reaſons, which ſhould excite men of Quality to Chriſtian Perfection.

That the COURT and DEVOTION are not things incompatible.

The FOUNDATION of this TREATISE.

THE wiſe Hebrews have obſerved a matter worthy of conſideration for the direction of Great-ones, to wit, that between the bed of the Kings of Judea, and the Altar of God, there was but one ſingle wall; and they add, that David, one of the moſt holy Monarchs, had reſerved for himſelf a ſecret Poſtern, through which he paſſed from his chamber to the houſe of God, that is to ſay, the Tabernacle; which ſerved as a Sanctuary for his afflictions, and an Arcenal for his battels. They ſay likewiſe, he left the key of this ſacred Poſtern to his Poſterity, a key a thouſand times more pretious then Fortune, the golden Goddeſs of the Romans, giving to it the imitation of his virtue as an everlaſting inheritance. Achaz was he, who, ſtopping up the gate of the Temple, ſhut againſt himſelf the gates of Gods mercy, and thereby opened the paſſage to his own confuſion. This is to inſtruct Princes, and all Perſons of quality, that as the element of Birds is the air, and water of Fiſhes, ſo the element of great ſpirits, if they will not betray their own nature, nor belie their profeſſion, is piety.

The Gloſs upon Iſai. chap. 38. obſerveth alſo, Juxta parietem Templi Salomon extruxit palatium. A notable obſervation of the Hebrews.

Paral. 2. 28. Clauſit januas Templi.

Yet notwithſtanding it is a wonder, how the Court, where the moſt noble ſpirits ſhould reſide, hath in all Ages been cried down in matter of virtue. You will ſay, hearing thoſe ſpeak, who make many fair, and formal deſcriptions of the maners of Courtiers, That the Court is nothing elſe but a den of darkneſs, where the heavens, and ſtars are not ſeen, but through a little crevis: That it is a Mill, (as the Antients held it) always skreaking, with a perpetual clatter, where men, enchained as Beaſts of labour, are condemned to turn the ſtones: That it is a priſon of ſlaves, who are all tied in the golden Guives of ſpecious ſervitude, yet in this glitter ſuffer themſelves to be gnawn by the vermine of paſſion: That it is a liſt, where the Combatants are mad; their arms nothing but fury, their prize ſmoke, their carreer glaſſie Ice, and utmoſt bounds but precipices: That it is the houſe of Circes, where reaſonable creatures are transformed into ſavage Beaſts; where Buls gore, Lions roar, Dogs worry one another, Vipers hiſs, and Baſilisks carry death in their looks: That it is the houſe of winds, a perpetual tempeſt on the firm land, ſhipwrack without water, where veſſels are ſplit even in the haven of hope: Briefly, that it is a place where vice reigneth by nature, miſery by neceſſity, and if virtue be found there, it is but by miracle.

An admirable definition of the Court, drawn out of divers antient Authours.

Such Diſcourſes are often maintained with more fervour of eloquence, then colour of truth. For, to ſpeak ſincerely, the Court is a fair School of virtue, for thoſe, who know how to uſe it wel. In great Seas great Fiſhes are to be found; and in ample fortunes, goodly, and heroick virtues. This Propoſition, which putteth an incompatibility of devotion, and ſanctity into the life of men of eminency, ſeemeth to me very exorbitant for three reaſons. The firſt, for that it is injurious to God: the ſecond prejudicial to humane ſociety: and the third ſheweth it to be falſe by the experience of all Ages. To prove theſe three verities is to ruin it in the foundations: the proofs whereof are eaſie enough, which we will begin to glance at, that hereafter we may deduce them more at length. For, as concerning the firſt, it cannot be denied to be a great injury to Almighty God, to ſtrike at his heavenly, and paternal providence. This is to touch him in the apple of his eye, and in the thing, which he eſteemeth moſt precious. Now, ſo it is, this Maxim, which eſtabliſheth an impoſſibility of devotion, the firſt wheel of virtue, in the life of Great-ones, imputeth a great defect unto the government of God. The divine providence is a skilfull poſie-maker, who knoweth artifically how to mingle all ſorts of flowers to make the Noſegay of the elect, called in holy Scripture Faſciculus viventium. It conſtituteth the different maners of lives, different qualities, and conditions. It leadeth men by divers ways to the ſame Port. It is that, which maketh Kings to reign, and giveth them officers as members of their State, and by this means frameth the Court of Great-ones: but if after it hath ſo made, and compoſed them as of the flower, and choice of men, it ſhould abandon them in the tempeſt, without poleſtar, without rudder, without Pilot, were not this with notable deformity to fail in one of the prime pieces of its workman-ſhip? Judge your ſelf.

The Anſwer.

The Defence of the Court.

1 Reg. 25. 29.

For the ſecond Reaſon, it is moſt evident, that to further this impoſſibility of devotion, in the courſe of Courtiers lives, is to caſt them, through deſpair of all virtues (which cannot ſubſiſt without piety) into the liberty of all vices, which they will hold, not as extravagant ſallies of frailty, but as the form of a neceſſary portion of their profeſſion. And as the rank they hold maketh them tranſcend other men, who willingly tie themſelves to the maners, and affections of thoſe, on whom they ſee their fortunes depend; that would be, as it were by a neceſſary law, to precipitate mankind into the gulf of corruption.

To conclude for the third Reason, this Proposition is manifestly contradicted by an infinite number of Examples, of so many Kings and Princes, of so many worthy Lords and Ladies, who living in the Ocean of the world, as the mother Pearls by the dew of heaven, have preserved, and do yet still preserve themselves for ever in admirable purity, and in such heroick virtues, that they cannot gain so much wonder on earth, but they shall find in heaven much more recompense. This is it, which I intend to produce in this Treatise of the Holy Court, after I have informed the mind with good and lively reasons, which, as I hope, by the grace of the Holy Spirit of God, shall make all persons of quality to behold they do infinite wrong to take the splendour of their condition for a veil of their impieties, and imperfections. Virtue is a marvellous work-woman, who can make Mercury of any wood; yea, should the difficulty be great, the victory would be more glorious: but all the easiness thereof is in their own hands, and the obligations they have to tend to perfection are no less important then those of Hermits, as I intend shall appear in the process of this Discourse.

The first MOTIVE.

Of the obligation, which secular men, and especially persons of quality have to perfection, grounded upon the name of Christian.

A Great abuse is crept into the minds of secular persons, who hold vice in predominance, and virtue under controle. It is in that they esteem Christian perfection as a Bird out of their reach, and a quality dis-proportionable to their estate. As for my self (saith one of these) I have made provision of virtue according to my quality. I pretend not to be a St. Francis, nor to be rapt as a St. Paul to the third heaven. I find there is no life but with the living, and to hold Time by the fore-lock while I can. Let our pleasures take that scope, which nature presenteth to them: were We as wicked as Judas, if we have the faith of St. Peter, the mercy of God pardoneth all. An impertinent discourse, as I will hereafter declare. On the other side, there are women, who chatter, and say: I will not be a St. Teresa, it is not my intention to be canonized. I love better to see my Diamonds in my life glitter on my fingers, then to carry them after my death on my Statues. I better love a little perfume whilest I yet breath air, then all the Arabian odours after my death. I will have no extasies, nor raptures. It is enough for me to wallow in the world. I may as well go to Paradise by land as by water. Such words are very impure in the mouth of a Christian, nay, so prejudicial to eternal salvation, that through the liberty of speaking too much they take away all hope of doing wel. For pursuing the tender effeminacy of that spirit, they take the measure of virtue very short, and dis-proportionable, their intentions being infirm, the works are likewise the more feeble, not squarely answering the model of knowledg; from whence proceedeth a general corruption. I affirm, not all Christians ought to embrace the perfection of S. Francis, & of S. Teresa. No, There are some, whom the Divine providence will direct by other aims. But I say that every Christian is obliged to level at perfection, and if he hath any other intention, he is in danger to lose himself eternally. A bold saying, but it is the sentence of S. Augustine: You shall always be displeased with your self for that which you are, if you desire to attain to that which you are not: and if you chance to say, It is enough, you are undone. And who are you that dare limit the gifts of God? and who are you that say, I wil have but such, or such a degree of graces, I satisfy my self with such a sanctity, I have proceeded far enough in a spiritual life; let us set up our staff here? What wickedness is this? Is not this to imitate that barbarous, and senseless King, who cast chains into the Sea, to tie the Ocean in fetters? God hath given us an heart of a larger latitude then the heavens, which he will repleniſh with himself, and you will straiten it like a Snail, to lodge him in narrow bounds, whom the whole world cannot comprehend. Judge, if this proceeding be not very unreasonable, and if you yet doubt, weigh two or three Reasons, which you shall find very forcible, and by them you will conclude with me, you have no less obligation to be perfect, than the most retired Hermit, that ever lived in the most horrid wilderness of Egypt.

Aug. Serm. 11. of the Apostle. Semper tibi displiceat quod es, si vis pervenire ad id.

quod non es. Si dixeris Sufficit, periſti. A notable Speech of S. Augustine.

Xerxes.

The first Reason I propose to underprop this assertion is drawn from the nature and essence of perfection. At what mark think you should one aim to arrive to this scope? If I should say, Will you be perfect? bury your self alive in a Sack, put a Halter about your neck, go roast your self in the scorching beams of the Sun, go roul your self in Snow, and thorns; this would make you admire, your hair stand an end, and blood congeal in your veins: but if one tell you, God hath as it were engrafted perfection with his own hands upon the sweetest stock in the world, what cause have you of refusal? Now so it is, as I say, There is nothing so easie as to love; the whole nature of the world is poured, and dissolved into love: there is nothing so worthy to be beloved, as an object, which incloseth in the extent thereof all beauties and bounties imaginable; which are the strongest attractives of amity: yea, it forceth our affections with a sweet violence: to love is natural, not to love is monstrous.

Perfection engrafted upon love.

Then here admire the charms of Divinity, which hath placed all the perfection of man, in the love of his Creatour, and Saviour, to love an infinite good which one cannot hate, and not become a Devil. St. Peter Chrysologus crieth out: A more delicate warfare never was seen, then to conquer all by love. Ask, I pray, of all Divines, if Charity be not the quintessence of perfection? Ask of Religious men where they pretend to place it? in sack-cloth, or hair-shirts? They will answer you, No. In the vows of poverty, chastity, obedience? No. These are most undoubted ways to perfection, but they are not properly perfection. In what then? In the love of God, which S. Irenæus expresseth by a most elate Epithete, Eminentissimum charismatum, the most eminent of all the gifts of God.

Chrysol. Serm. 94. Tenera militia, delicati conflictus est amore solo de cunctis criminibus reportare victoriam. The warfare of Christians delicate. Iren. lib. 4. cap. 63. Eminentissimum charismatum.

The Master of the Sentences, and some other Divines have placed Charity so high (in which we establish perfection) that they have presumed to say, it was the substance of the Holy Ghost, united, and as it were incorporated to man's soul; adding, that as light is called radical light in the Sun, light infused in bodies transparent, colour in bodies, which we call coloured: in like manner this Charity, as it is (say they) originally, and radically in God, is the Holy Ghost; as it is united to the substance of our soul, it is Grace; as it maketh sallies out upon our neighbour, it is Charity.

The excellencie of charity.

This Doctrine is very subtile, and really giveth a very high idea of the merit of Charity: but if we would wholly examine it according to the strict rigour of the Schools, and weigh it in St. Thomas his equal balance, we shall find Charity is not, to speak properly, properly, the Holy Ghost, but as it were the first ray of Divinity, which bringeth with it self all perfections. This beam, if you will, is as it were in your power; God every day presenteth it unto you, as freely as the Sun doth his light; it onely behoveth to will, it behoveth seriously once to resolve to love an object so amiable, and then behold your selves perfect. Notwithstanding if you lay your hand on the bottom of your conscience, you shall ever find it in its proper interests, in humane respects, in intentions and affections nothing sincere, in the love of creatures. This is to coyn false money in matter of love; this is to put God under the Altar, and the love of himself above, that it may have the better part of incense. What think you of this indignity? See you not the obligation of being perfect still remaineth, but the effect is ever pretermitted?

Notable opinion of some Divines.

Imitation of Jesus Christ, a bridgement of Wisdome. Matth. 5. Estote perfecti, sicut & Pater vester cœlestis perfectus est. Greg. Nyssen. κεφάλαιον τῆς ἀνθρωπίνης σοφίας. In the book of the life of Moses.

For the second reason, I say, the perfection of man consisteth in the imitation of God. Be ye perfect as your heavenly Father is perfect: and very well S. Gregory Nyssen assureth us, that this imitation is an abridgment of all wisdom. Now who is able to mount by force of wing, and flie into the bosom of the eternal Father, thence to draw a pourtraict of his holinesses? Certainly no creature can aspire thereto. And what I pray, hath God, all goodness, all wisdome, done? He hath imprinted all his perfections upon our Saviour, the true figure of his substance, as if one should impress a golden seal upon virgin-wax; which made Origen say, his most sacred humanity was as the foot-step and shadow of the Divinity, and agreed with it as equal well-made dyals with the Sun; whereupon the spirit of God calleth all Christians, and saith to them, Imitate couragiously, behold your Prototype, behold the model of your actions. He saith not, I have two Images of my substance, I have two Sons, I send them both upon the earth; one shall be for men of eminencie, the other for the multitude: Behold one delicately curious, crowned with roses for the Nobility: behold another crowned with thorns for the vulgar. It is meer dotage to imagine it. And see you not, it is like sottishness, since all Christians bear the same name, the same livery, participate of the same God, the same Sacraments, and pretend to the same Paradise, to think perfection is not appointed but for a silly handful of men, separated from secular life, and that others are excluded? Miserable creatures, who to sooth their own remissness plant their own condemnation upon their foreheads!

Humanity of Jesus. An excellent conceit of Origen. Origen. 2. περὶ ἀρχῶν. Indeclinabiliter eosdem motus suscipiebat. One same Jesus for the Nobles and plebeians.

Briefly to conclude, the title and dignity of a Christian draweth with it great and just obligations, which you cannot countervail but with an exact endeavour of perfection. Do you think one requireth too much of you, who have been nourished and trained up in the Church of God, if you be demanded (at the least) to shew resolution and courage to resist a sin, as some Heathens have done in their infidelity? And to produce in gross three examples, upon the three most ordinary temptations, behold, with S. Austine, Polemon, who telleth you: I was an infidel, a young man deprived of the knowledg of the true God, resigned over to all sort of intemperance: wine, love, play, rashness were the Chariot, which drew my youth to downfal. I was no sooner entered into the schole of a Heathen Philosopher, as my self, but behold, I was wholly changed. And thou, O Christian, dost thou think it will be lawfull for thee amongst so many important and forcible instructions, so many enlightenings, so many inspirations, to play the smith's old dog, and lie sleeping under the anvile? This man here, upon the onely word of a man, layeth down his flowery crowns, which he bare on his head, his drunkenness, his unthrifty riots, and where is there a worldly woman at this day, who at the end of a Sermon, enkindled with zeal, dissolveth one piece of her gaudy dressings?

S. Augustine Epist. 130. saith of this. Non humano operi tribuerim, sed divino. Polemon praised by S. Augustine.

Behold on the other side Spurina, who saith in S. Ambrose: I was a Gentile, bred in the corruption of an age, where virtue was in declination, and vice on the top of the wheel, I was endowed with an exquisite beauty, which by right of natural force gave me the key of hearts: and I seeing it was too much affected, and courted by wanton eyes, and served for a stumbling-block to chastity, I purposely made scars in my face, extinguishing with my bloud the flames of them that sought me. For I loved better to seal my innocency, as with the seal of voluntary deformity, then to possess a beauty, that served onely as a bait for anothers lust. O thou Christian woman, who dost paint thy self with an ill intention, seeking to gain that by imposture, which thou canst not attain by truth, and not satisfying thy self with adulterating thy beauty, spares not to discover among company a scandalous nakedness, to shew in thy breasts the impudence of thy forehead! Consider a little what thou wilt answer to this Panym with all thy curiosity, when her blood, her wounds, scars, her beauty disfigured, which served as a sacrifice to her chastity, shall accuse thee before the inevitable tribunal.

Spurina. S. Ambrose in the exhortation to virginity. Deformitatem sanctitatis meæ fidem, quam formam iritamentum alienæ libidinis esse malui.

Greatness of Lycurgus. Behold likewise, Lycurgus is elected King of the Lacedemonians, if so his dead brother should leave no heir in his wives body. The perfidious and unnatural Queen sendeth this message to the King new chosen: SIR, I am with childe, and, according to the laws of the country, it may fall out, the fruit of my body may snatch the Scepter out of your hands. I see the kingdom is a dainty morsel, hard for them to disgorge, who once have swallowed it. If you will be wise in your own affair, I know a means by a potion, to put your crown in safety, and by anticipation, taking away the life of this little creature, settle your throne for ever. Onely be mindeful of me your faithful hand-maid, who with loss of my own bloud tender this grateful office. Hereupon Lycurgus, detesting in his heart the treachery of this ravenous she-wolf, dissembleth, and answereth: MADAM, Let the infant come into the world; be it male, or female, it importeth not: we always shall find means enough, whensoever we shall think good, to dispatch it. As soon as the childe was born, which proved a boy, he took it in his arms, he assembled the Magistrates and people, and covering the little Creature with his royal Robe, saith: Sirs, long live justice, and loyalty. Behold your King, I am but his vassal. O Christian, what sayest thou to this Pagan, that would not purchase a Kingdom by the single sin of another? Yet many times a little interest makes thee neglect all that which is divine in Faith, Justice, and Religion. It is not required of thee thou shouldest be a S. Antony, a Macarius, an Angel of the desert. It is demanded of thee, that for God's honour thou shew some small resistance of sin, which these infidels have done for a shadow of virtue, and it shall suffice. Dost thou not behold, that thou art enforced not onely for good fashion, but for necessity to this Christian perfection, which thou imagineſt to be far separated from thy condition?

Conclude (O ye Noble men) out of this discourse, that the obligation, which you have to be perfect, is most evident, since you have JESUS CHRIST for a sharer, the charges easie, it consisting not but in loving a goodness, which one cannot hate, and which never any one can love, if he offer not the homage of his proper interest to his divine Majesty. Behold all perfection.

The second REASON.

Drawn from Nobility.

HAving in general declared the obligation all Christians have to become perfect, let us in particular behold the reasons which invite Nobility to perfection. I doubt not if you maturely ponder those which I have to propose, you shall find them no less obliged to the solid eminency of all Christian virtues, than Hermits themselves, and this by the right of their condition: so as that which seemeth to enlarge their scope to a life of greater liberty, rather serveth as a bound of their dutie, and a bridle for their dissolutions. Let us take the first reason, which is their Nobility. It is an argument that cannot proceed but from a low judgment, or a spirit soothed with its own effeminacie, to say he is Noble, he is a Courtier, he is a States-man; his quality tyeth him not to perfection, his virtue must be measured by the ell of the world; if he were over virtuous, the excess of his sanctitie would be prejudicial to his fortune. What an extravagant humour is it to fix ignominie upon the front of Nobility in the first beginning? He is Noble, he therefore should be the less devout, and less virtuous. Change the Gamuth, and say: He is Noble; he hath therefore the more obligation to be perfect. Nobility hath put the yoak of a happie necessity upon him, which he cannot shake off without much cowardize. And to make you thereby behold that Nobility is a bond of Christian virtue in all eminencie, no man will deny but that by how much the more God giveth powerful, and effectual means to man to arrive at a good end, so much more obligation he hath to carry himself with fervency of affection; and in case of failing, his neglect is made the more faulty. The Servant to whom the Master hath given five talents to negotiate with, ought much more to profit and bring gain home, than he that received but one single talent. Who can deny this, if he will not belie the light of nature? Now so it is. Great men have many more talents of God, for the traffick of virtues, than others have; and behold the first of all, which is the happiness of their birth. An Oratour making a solemn Oration in the praise of Constantine the Great, in the Citie of Trier, let fall these words: The first and greatest gift of heaven, was to be born happy, and as soon to be in the lists of felicitie, as of nature. The Scripture it self recommendeth Nobility in the persons of the three valiant Children, held in the Captivity of Babylon; in that of Eliazar, and others. It is a wonder how S. Hierome in the Epitaph of S. Paula, hath not omitted that she was descended from Agamemnon. Which would never have been mentioned, were it not that Nobility is valued amongst the temporal goods, which are distributed to us by the providence of Almighty God. Now that Nobility is a good instrument to conduct to perfection, appeareth by an irrefragable reason, which I intend to express. I will not say what might be proposed, and fortified by experience, that the bodies of Noble and Gentlemen are ordinarily better composed, and as it were more delicately moulded by the artfull hands of nature; that they have their senses more subtile, their spirits more agile, their members better proportioned, their garb more gentile, and grace more accomplished: and that all these prepare a fair shop for the soul, to exercise her functions with greater liberty. Let us rather say with Petrarch: If Nobility were not tied but to flesh and blood, it were a small matter; since it is very difficult to distinguish between the blood of Cæsars and Porters. Nor yet will I touch what might pertinently be disputed, that the souls of men extracted from the treasures of Heaven, though they be all cast in one mould, and be of the same kind; may notwithstanding be created by God with qualities very different, as we behold in the flowers of a beautiful meadow, which are of the same name and nature, a very great disproportion in figure, colour, and other accidents: semblably between the stars and precious stones, which are of the same substance, one will have a lustre more sparkling, another more dull and blunted. This maketh us probably believe, that the souls of men, when they are infused into bodies, although they be essentially marked with the same stamp, may have some accidental perfections one above another; and that this great diversitie which we observe therein, making one man appear of gold, another of lead, doth not onely depend on the varieties of Organs. Mercury Trismegistus was of this opinion, when under the bark of a fable, he represented souls unto us which before they entered into the bodie, drank in the cup of spirit, not all of them, but those which happily encountred that fortunate succes. For he feigneth, according to the inventions of his brain, that God sendeth a messenger upon the earth, to wit, one of his Angels, who placeth a large cup as big as (it is to be supposed) that of Semiramis was, which as Ælian reporteth, weighed a thousand and four-score pound: and this cup is full of a celestial liquor, of power to make men subtile and spiritual: the messenger maketh his proclamation, and saith to every soul: Up soul, drench thy self deeply, and drink with all thy force in this cup of spirit. Thereupon they drink, some more, some less, which maketh a great diversity of understandings. Some wholly abstain, who when they have entered into the body, have no other share but the gifts of reason, which necessarily is a prerogative of their nature: but as for spirit they are deprived, as being absolutely stupid, and extreamly shallow. It is a wonder how these ancient Sages have pleased themselves in these fabulous discourses. Needeth there so much outward cover to give us this maxime, that all souls have not one and the same relation to accidental qualities, though, as Aristotle teacheth us, they are in their own essence, as unchangeable as numbers in Arithmetick?

This diversity of spirits presupposed, one may say, that great and noble men are more privileged from the time of their birth, and that with some probability. So Philo hath given to Kings and Potentates, a double understanding, the one for the rule of themselves, and the other for the government of their estates. But not to sooth the Nobility with feeble and superficial reasons, it behoveth they know, that although one should admit this accidental diversity in the Oeconomie of humane spirits, yet would the consequence not necessarily ensue, that they always thereby should be the better provided. God maketh no difference of persons in this distribution. There are spirits that have come into the world from among the cobwebs of a nasty cottage, who have filled Ages with admiration of their greatness. Others have been clothed in golden glitter and purple, who have been miserably stupid and dull: and although fortune doth still hold to the oar, who deserve to be at the stern; yea, and some be at the stern who merit to be at the oar, yet the providence of God doth mannage it as best pleaseth himself for certain ends, which our foresight cannot penetrate with the best light. What infallible motive shall we then derive, to establish the obligation which tieth the alter altero clarior inventus sit non id nobilitas efficit sed sanitas. Petrarch. l. 1. de remediis dialog. 16.

The souls of men different in qualities.

Mercur. Trismeg. in Cratere sive Monade.

Cup of spirit.

Bibat uter os & Horatius. ait velut equites.

Nobility first gift of God. Mihi Deorum immortalium munus, & primum videtur & maximum, in lucem statim fulicem venire. Panegyr. Constant.

Nobility not tied to blood. Omnis propemodum sanguis est cancolor, si unde sorte

Double understanding.

Mens ista aurea quam de communi Deo plusquam unus hausisti. Auson in panegyri Gratian.

the Nobility to virtue above others, since we rather seek weight of reason than colour? Behold one which cannot well be denied by a well rectified judgment. It is, that as God hath given to women, I know not what instinct of shamefac'dness, which enforceth them as it were with a sweet violence, to the defence of their honour; and this in them is so powerfull a touch from Heaven, that they cannot discharge themselves thereof; rather they feel it in every part, unless they be wretchedly insensible. Pliny affirmeth the same, who saith, their bodies after death, float in such posture upon the waters, that they hide the nakedness from humane eyes, whereof nature, during life, hath been so carefull. Even as God hath ingrafted the love of modestie upon this sex, so likewise he hath affixed a spur of honour upon the spirit of Noble-men. This is the pourtraict of Phidias which cannot be taken away without breaking the Minerva. This is the character wherewith God will imprint virtue in them. They are all naturally sensible in the points of honesty, or else degenerate from their Nobilty.

Shame-facedness of women.

Plin. lib. 7.

Prona fluitant pudori earum parcente natura.

Where is the motive of virtue in the Nobility.

Behold, I pray you, the force and power of this spur which God hath used for the good of Nobility. They would flie if it were possible to Heaven, and penetrate the depths, to avoid the least stain of dishonour. What flames actually would not they go through, to what breaches, assaults, musket-shots, to what images of death, which make nature to tremble with cold fear, do not they expose themselves, to conserve or acquire reputation? The spirit of lies, seeing they cannot be altered in this spur of the inseparable honour of their condition, what doth he? Not being able to wrest it from them, he rebateth the point; nay rather he rebateth the brain, and makes them place the point of honour in infamy, knowing very well that this is an effectual means to ruin them without discovery. A wonder! They rather will become Apostates from Christianity, than from the spur of honour. They meet in the field, cut one anothers throat, and empty their quarrels through the channels of their blood, for that they think the thing is honourable. Judg now, and conclude what I am to say: if they would suffer this spur to pursue that course which God hath begun in their souls, perswading themselves what is most undoubted, that the most ignoble act which a Gentleman can do, is to serve sin, would not they quickly become perfect? Would not they be invincible against all vices, and ever in possession of virtue? This argument is very strong, and will admit no evasion. Noble spirit, thou naturally lovest honour more than thy life, and therein thou dost well: Thou art a Christian, if thou wilt not renounce thy baptism and the blood of thy Saviour; Christianity teacheth thee that the highest and most solid honour thou canst ever pretend unto, is to put vice under foot, and virtue over thy head; why stayest thou to make resolution?

Against such as betray their Nobility.

Unworthy that thou art, if thou goest about to tye Nobility to flesh and blood, or to some old rotten ruins, to some Monuments, which cover a nothing under the golden traces of an Epitaph. Ridiculous that thou art, if with full mouth thou vantest a paper-Nobility, yea, which is not thine: as if a blind man should boast his Grand-Father had had good eyes, and a stammerer that his great Grand-Father had been an excellent Oratour. Miserable that thou art, if after thy Ancestours have planted the French Lilies amongst the Palms of Palestine, sincerely led thereto with the zeal they bare to their faith, thou betrayest religion, virtue, and conscience, by a brutish life drenched in wild passions, and framest to thy self under a head of gold, a foot of clay. God who breatheth on the intentions of men, reproveth such a Nobility: and though these mongrels should make themselves as white as Swans, God esteemeth them as black as Moors. All Nobility before this great Judg, is nothing in comparison of justice and perfection. Yea so it is, that in Holy Writ the Nobility of Noe is valued, Hæ sunt generationes Noe. Noe vir justus erat atque perfectus. Behold a marvellous manner (saith Saint John Chrysostom) to delineate a Genealogie. The Scripture beginneth and saith, Behold the Genealogie of Noe. It seemeth to make way through all the Patriarchs from whom Noe was descended. It seemeth to make a rehersal to us of all their titles and signories, of their acts and atchievements: and presently endeth in saying, Will you know the Genealogy of Noe? he was a just man, and a perfect. Behold all his Nobility. On which subject S. Ambrose hath an excellent saying: Nobility hath no better a character then that of Sanctity: the race of men, are men, but the race of Souls are virtuous.

Amos 9 Nunquid ut filii Æthiopum vos estis mihi Israël?

Nobility of Noe, where-in Gen. 6. Chrys. in Genes.

S. Ambr. li. de Noe & arca. Virtues the race of souls.

Noblemen, if you desire to be esteemed worthy your rank, do not as the little Sea-crabs, who by chance finding the shels of great fishes emptie, enter into them without saying, by your leave, and make boasts of a borrowed habitation. Cover not the giddie fantasies and illusions of a spirit, drunk with self-love, under a vain veil of Nobility. Rather do as Boleslaus the fourth, King of Poland, who bearing the picture of his father, hanged about his neck in a plate of gold, when he was to speak or do any thing of importance, he took this picture, and kissing it, said: Dear father, I wish I may not do any thing remisly, unworthy of thy name. Rather do as that brave Eleazar, mentioned in the Book of Maccabees, who being assaulted with all sort of batteries, blandishments, menaces, and torments, to make him counterfeit but one sole sin against his own law, he fixed his eyes upon the true point of honour, upon the consideration of his Nobility. Ont alas (said he to himself alone) the whiteness of that venerable hair, with which thy head is covered, after it hath grown hoarie in the exercise of thy religion, hath it not yet taught thee where the point of honour lies? It is not enough for Eleazar, not to counterfeit impiety, but to profess virtue; even at the price of his blood. Now God grant I may not serve as a stumbling-block to the youth of this City, since God will make this day a Theatre of my constancie. I will not belie the law of my Master, I will not dishonour the Schole in which I was bread and brought up. My soul shall flie out of this body, wholy innocent, discharged of infidelity, into the bosom of my Ancestours, and the honour of my life shall be conveyed into the ashes of my Tomb. These words mixed with his blood, stopped his mouth and life with one and the same seal.

Probati viri genus, virtutis prosapia est: sicut hominum genus homines ita animarum genus virtutes.

Notable Act of Boleslaus. Cromer. lib. 5.

Nobility of Eleazar.

Excellent speech of a noble man. 2. Maccab. 6. Capit cogitare ingenita nobilitatis canitiem, atque à puero optima conversationis actus.

Behold you not a Nobility worthy the sight of Angels, the imitation of great spirits, and the admiration of the whole World?

The third REASON.

Drawn from the greatness and dignity of Gentlemen.

Aug. Sol. 14. Nobis magna indita est necessitas justè recteque vivendi quia cuncta facimus ante oculos judicis cuncta cernentis.

SAint Augustine hath spoken very prudently, discoursing upon the presence of God, to wit, that of necessity it behoveth us to be virtuous, since we are perpetually discovered by the eyes of the great Judg, before whom neither the bottomless abyss, nor nor hell it self hath darkneſs enough to hide us. If this exerciſe of the preſence of God were as familiar to us as it is effectual, it would be a powerful motive to cleanſe all the impurities of our intentions, and affections, and quickly would give us leave to arrive at the top of perfection. A wiſe Hebrew ſaid very well, to extirpate ſin from the earth, it behoveth every one to figure himſelf a great eye, always wakeful upon our actions, an ear always open to obſerve our words, an hand indefatigably ever writing and ſumming up the accompt of our works. But ſeeing our ſoul, while it is in this mortal habitation, folded up in fleſh and bloud, ſtirs it ſelf but lazily to the conſideration of things purely ſpiritual, expecting the ſenſes, by which ſhe operateth, ſhould give her the alarm; God, all-wiſe, all good, ſerveth himſelf with an efficacious means to fix us in the contemplation of his preſence, which is the conſideration of men in themſelves, the moſt perfect images of God, that can be found in this great univerſe. By how much the more we are encompaſſed, and as it were ſhot through with the eyes of beholders, who view, ſerving as witneſſes of our actions; ſo much the more doth our obligation of perfection increaſe. The greater part of ſins are committed for want of witneſſes, ſaith very pertinently a grave ancient Writer. If Venus ſhould make a veil of clouds to cover all her favourites, (as Fables imagined) the earth would ſoon be filled with adulterers, and quickly become a Gomorrah. Nothing diſmantleth vice ſo much as its own nakedneſs; take the mask from it, and you bereave it of the means of progreſſion.

Wiſe Counſel. Ribbi in Apopheg. Hebræ.

Maxima pars peccatorum tolliturſi peccatorum teſtis abſidat. Sins committed for want of witneſſes. Seneca.

It is from this point I intend to draw the firſt reaſon, which bindeth the Nobility to great perfection, eſpecially thoſe, who are of ſtate and dignity, ſeeing that how much the more they are eminent in honour, ſo much the more they are propoſed as an aim to the eyes of all the world. If a little planet happen to be eclipſed, who can tell the news thereof, but ſome cold-ſoundred Mathematician, who perchance beholdeth it in the ſhadie obſcurities of the night? But if the leaſt change happen that may be to the Sun, every one lifteth his eye to Heaven; he cannot make a falſe ſtep, but the numberleſs numbers of men, which inhabit the four quarters of the earth, do obſerve it. The like thing is ſeen in the life of Great men, and private perſons. If an Hermit in his Cell ſuffer himſelf to be tranſported upon ſome motion of choler, who knoweth it but his cat, or table? And if it be a religious man in a Covent, his imperfections are manifeſted but to few, which would be of force to cheriſh their vices, if they did not take their aims rightly levelled towards God. But as for great ones, all the eyes of men are fixed upon them, nor can they ſuffer eclipſe but as ſuns; ſo darkning the whole world with their ſhadie obſcurities, that they, who in their own errour have eyes of moles, are Arguſes and Lynxes to ſee and cenſure the actions of men of quality. Great men vitious, reſemble King Ozias; they all carry their leproſie upon their forehead. Then I demand of you, this admitted, that they cannot hide themſelves no more then the Sun, and that they all have honour in ſpecial recommendation, fearing the leaſt blemiſhes of fame; do you not behold them between the deſire of honor, and fear of contempt, as between the hammer and the anvile, enforced, as it were with a happy neceſſity to do well, ſince to do ill is ſo chargeable?

Life of Great men enlightned.

You will ſay unto me this intention were impure, to carrie ones ſelf in praiſe-worthy actions by the paths of humane reſpects; to which I agree, but withall add, it may eaſily be purged and freed, if yon prefigure in yaur mind, that ſo mony men as watch upon our actions are ſo many meſſengers of God, if you conſider them not as men, but as Angels of this Sovereign Majeſty, who are aſſigned for the inquiſition of your actions. This contemplation well imprinted in your ſpirit ſhall by little and little proceed, rarifying the moſt groſs thoughts, as the Sun-beams do the vapours of the earth, and you ſhall change this neceſſity you have to do well, by the honeſt enforcement of thoſe, who enlighten you, into a will ſo free and diſ-intereſſed, that you will ever after put on a reſolution to remain in the liſts of virtue, although all the world ſhould be blind. You will reſemble the Sun, who placed in Heaven by the Creatour's hand, if happily he one day ſhould chance to have no ſpectatours of his light, would ſhine as radiant for the eyes of a Piſmire, or ſilly Bee as for the greateſt King in the world. S. Auguſtine maketh mention of an old Comedian, who in his younger days, after he had a long time played in the Comedies, which thoſe blind Idolaters had inſtituted to the honour of their gods, with the general applauſe of the people, the glory thereof did ſo intoxicate him, that playing for the gods he acted all as for men: when he grew old, and not ſo followed by his ordinary troup of Auditours, he went to the Capitol, and made much ado to play his Comedies alone before the ſtatues of his falſe gods: doing all (ſaid he) then for the gods, and nothing for men. If this poor Pagan had not failed in the principles of true Religion, he had hit the mark. It is true, men many times ſerve to poliſh our actions; their preſence is to us a ſharp ſpur, which makes the ſpirit to leap, and bound beyond it ſelf. The like whereof is ſeen in Oratours, and Preachers, to whom their Auditorie ſometime ſerves as pipes to Organs. Such penetrate the clouds, born upon the wings of the wind, who otherwiſe had low flagged in the duſt, void of the eſtimation of men. It would be a miſerable vanity to have no other aim, then always to play for men, and never for God. It is fit that all theſe creatures ſhould ſerve us for ladders, to mount up to Heaven. And this it is, wherein men of ſtate, who are in eminent place, have much advantage; they are in a great Theatre, which is to them a powerful ſpur to do well; yea ſo forcible, that it was a wonder admired by the judicious Caſſius Longinus, to hear it ſaid, that a Grecian Captain, ſeeing himſelf in a dangerous encounter, involved in night and death, deſired not of God the ſafeguard of his life, but onely ſo much day as might ſuffice to ſee himſelf die valiantly.

Aug. de Civit Dei. l. 6. c. 10. Doctus Archimimus, ſenex jam decrepitus, quotidie in Capitolio Mimum agebat, quaſi libenter Dii ſpectarent, quem homines deſiderant. An obſervation of S. Auguſtine upon a Comedian.

Longin.

Behold the force of this motive, to give up a life, the moſt pretious thing in the whole world, to enjoy one glimmer of a day-light, which could ſerve to no other purpoſe, but to enlighten his death. Then, Noble-men, who are ſeated in dignity, I leave it to you to conclude, if you, perpetually being in the mid-day, and in the rays of ſo many as behold you, who illuſtrate your life, and make your death lightſom, have cauſe, or not, to ſlacken, or grow remiſs in the courſe of perfection.

For the ſecond reaſon I ſay, the foyl ſetteth off the ſparkling of the diamond, and greatneſs the luſtre of virtue. How doth a man know what he is, if he ſee not himſelf in the occaſions of good and ill? The triumph of virtue, as Plato ſaid very well, is to have ſin in power, and virtue in will. To be able to ſin, to be thereunto ſollicited by attractive pleaſure, and yet not to commit it, this is all which a good man can do. A ſolitary life is not alwaies laudable, if it be not guided by divine and ſuper-natural helps, as that of Saints. For what honour is it for a retired man to have this Epitaph of Vacia inscribed upon him: Here lieth he, who fled from the world, and the affairs thereof, confined to himself by the misery of his passions; who could not endure any man to be more happy then himself: who hid himself for fear; who in present liveth not, either for another, or for himself, but for his belly, sleep, and pleasure. Behold a poor praise, and which well sheweth, virtue doth not always consist in the flight from greatness, but in the conquest over passions, which is by so much the more glorious, by how much the adversaries are more invincible. Theophylact said, that Gold is like the River Rhene, for one cause; which is, that anciently those warlike Nations, inhabitants of Germany, used it to prove their children in, as we use to trie Gold with a touch-stone. As soon as these little creatures were born, they carried them to the Rhene, and plunged them in that River, and then knew by certain signs given by the child, either in wrestling with the waves, or in shewing much terrour, and affrightment, whether he would be couragious, or cowardous. He that bare himself bravely in this mercileſs element, was their true Son. Men are not tried in Rhene, said this learned Authour, to see whether they be men, but in Pactolus, in a River of Gold: place them in honours, reputation, in affluence of riches, this will procure you a never-erring judgement of their virtue. What knoweth one how he, who is born, and bred all his life-time amongst cobwebs, would use cloth of gold, if he had it? What knoweth one how humble a man may be, who is as soon found in misery as in nature, by the course of his lineal extraction? Who knoweth how abstinent one would be in the full delicacies of a great Feast, who hath never seen upon his table but Cabages, and Turneps? Who knoweth how temperate another would be in commanding over men, who never hath exercised his power, but over Dogs, and Calves? It seemeth all virtues either are no virtues, or are stifled in a low condition, if we speak morally. But to see a man poor in spirit in abundant plenty of riches; humble in large trains of attendants, which he daily beholds prostrated at his feet; temperate in a thousand occasions of accesses, which hourly are presented to him; moderate in a fortune ever upon increase; peacefull in the clattering clamors of affairs; uniform, and equal in the vicissitude of humane accidents; a man, who can do all he would, and will do nothing but what is reasonable; a man that suffereth not his appetites to flie like little Butter flies, fluttering amidst the concupiscence of creatures, but limits them in the lists of modesty, and not touching the earth, but with the soles of his feet, fixeth the better part of himself in Heaven; this is to behold a perpetual miracle.

Evit illi gloria aterna, qui potuit tranſgredi, & non eſt tranſgreſſus. Eccl. 31.

of

Epitaph of Vacia. Quia res & homines fugit, quem cupiditatum suarum infelicitas relegavit, alios feliciores videre non potuit: qui velut timidum, atque inerm animal metu obstupuit: ille sibi non vivit, nec aliis, sed, quod est turpissimum, ventri, somno, libidini. Senec. Ep. 55.

Theophylact. in Collectan. Græc. Epist.

An excellent passage of Theophylact, Χρυσὸς τοῦτο ἀρετῆς ἢ κακίας ἔλεγχος.

Great vertue of Great men

Aug. tract. 13. de verbo Domini.

Magna virtus est cum felicitate latari, magna felicitas a felicitate non vinci.

We must then necessarily aver, if we will not belie our judgment, and reason, that in the greatest occasions of ill is shewed the greatest reflection of good. Great felicities are so tickliſh, that it is more easie to live on the dung-hil of Job with patience, then in the manage of great Kingdoms with moderation. Saint Bernard said to Pope Eugenius, He is truly great, on whom fortune hath smiled, and not deceived him. It is a heavie burthen to bear a great fortune. This is daily seen in the spirits of this Age: there needeth but a little sparkle of felicity to dazle their eys, to puff up their skin, to drench them in pride, in ingratitude, in tyranny, in a deluge of dissolutions. One sole hour, which a favourite may have in the prosperity of the Court, will make him forget a friendship of thirty years standing; a most evident mark of a weak spirit. On the contrary, to pass from a poor garden into a King's Palace, as Abdolonym did, and handle the Scepter with the same humility of heart, without prejudice of Authority, that one would do a Spade, is a vertue, which rarely hath an example upon earth, but is admired in Heaven it self. It is a vertue, which cometh to men from the treasures of God, not from their pedegree. It is the faireſt object which the Sun, drawing aside the curtain of the night, discovereth upon earth. And I doubt not, but the divine providence hath purposely held some religious Monarchs in the world, as our St. Lewis, for example, to declare how high Christian perfection may ascend, which is to plant humility upon the Diamonds of regal Crowns; to lead in Court an Hermitical life; to command greatness, and humility, which seldom are of alliance, mutually to embrace as sisters.

Bernard, ad Eugen. l. 2. Magnus cui præsens felicitas si arrisit, non irrisit.

Abdolonym.

Add for the third Reason, which is received by the common consent of all men living in the world, that tribulation serves as a furnace for virtue: the more stout, and masculine it is, the more it glitters in affliction. What knoweth a man, that hath always been bred in a lazie languishing life, as the trees of Sodom in the dead Sea, with what measure perfection is measured? Prosperities are like a veil tissued with Gold by the fingers of Fortune, to cover the ulcers of Vice: and Adversity is the Theatre of generous spirits, who feed themselves with afflictions, as the Sun with salt water. What a glorious spectacle is it to behold, saith S. Cyprian, an invincible courage, counter-buffed with storms and tempests, on whom it seemeth Heaven will burst, and fall in pieces, to behold him, I say, amongst the threats of the air, ruins of the world, always standing upright, as a great brazen Colossus, scorning these as mists, and small flakes of Snow.

Prosperity.

Cyprian. de Mortal.

Quanta sublimitas inter ruinas generis humani stare erectum. Sen. de Provid.

What a brave word is it, to hear a man say in a world of contrarieties, which oppose him, God be praised, who hath deemed us worthy to serve as a trial of humane nature, to see to how high a pitch Patience could mount? What a Majesty it is to be able to bear this fair ensign, wherewith our Lewis the Twelfth with a generous affection was much pleased, which was a celestial cup, advanced in rays of Gold, amongst eclipses, with this Motto, Inter eclipses exorior. And surely Virtue never shineth so much, as when she is in eclipse; which it seems the Holy Ghost would mysteriously signifie in these words of Job: Thou brave spirit, who struggleſt against tempests, thou shalt find thy noon in the evening, and when thou shalt esteem thy self annihilated, thou then shalt elevate thy self as the morning-star. It is a wonder, that in this passage he useth an Hebrew word for two purposes signifying two contraries, to wit, to shine, and to be darkened. It is to shew us, that obscurity, which cometh from adversitie is a true and perfect light.

Digni visi sumus Deo, in quibus experiretur quantum humana natura posset pati. Typotius in Symbol.

Quasi meridianus fulgur consurge tibi ad vesperam, & cum te consumptum putaveris orieris ut lucifer. Job 11. 17.

עֵרֶב A worthy letter in Job.

It then being admitted, which all mouths do preach, and pens do write, that adversities are necessary to make up a great virtue; we will thereon conclude, that perfection will be more sutably accommodated to the lives of Great men, then any other, though never so good, since they are those, who daily are exposed to the greatest hazards. The crosses of religious, and private men, are but meer paper in comparison of those, which happen to the Great men of the world. The learned Synesius saith, they are illustrious on every side; one while they mount as high Heaven, another while they descend even to the abyss; their change is never in the mean, and their fortune is pointed out in extremities: this manifestly declareth, that as their fortune hath no bounds, so they should not limit their virtues. O men of honour it is a brave thing to see you courageous in disasters; as Eagles, who flie confronting that part of heaven, where raging tempests most reign; not unlike Dolphins, who leap and bound with full carreer in the tumultuous waves; or as vast Rocks, who erect their crests against the clouds, and mock at the foamy waves, billow-beating their feet. This is truly the element of virtue, resembling the pretious stone, called Ceraunia by the Grecians, as one would say The Thunderer, for it is bred among thunders, and is found in places, where heaven, all swoln with anger, hath cleft the master-pieces of the world's great magazin. So after the black vapors of obloquie, after the misty clouds, which have dis-coloured our reputation, after envy, rage, after brutish furies, after oppressions of innocency, after the death of kindred, after faithlesness of friends, after disgrace, after thunders shot from the Capitol; when you behold a heart firmly fixed in a fair situation, which enfoldeth it self within it self, and sucketh in the tastefull sweetnesses of a good conscience, then behold a thunder-stone, which gladdeth Angels, and dazeleth eyes fearfull of his lightning flashes.

Synesius De regno ad Arcadium. Θαύμα μεγάλης ἐυδαιμονίας.

men

Ceraunia.

Conclude then upon this whole Discourse, that greatness is the very element of great virtue; and if you yet doubt hereof, learn the same from the authority of God, who hath judged greatness so necessary an object for virtue, that he hath conducted all his greatest servants to perfection, if not by the enjoying of greatness, at the least by contempt thereof; and never had they been so great, if struggling with greatness, they had not scorned to be great. Our Saviour, to shew he was the example of perfection, would appear great in refusing a world, which Satan had (as it were) unfolded before his feet. He would the virtue of the greatest of all men should apppear in the refusal of the greatest of all titles, when Saint John Baptist denied the name of Messias. He sheweth the greatness of his faithful servant Moses, in the contempt of Pharaoh's kingdom. He gave Nero's Court to St. Peter, and St. Paul, as the Amphitheatre of their glory. He likewise many times hath drawn Hermits from the unfrequented desarts, to make them manage great matters in the Catastrophe of their lives, in the palaces of Princes; so necessary it is to have to do with greatness, to act something important. If God hath transferred to Court (as it were on the wings of impetuous winds) those, that were by birth, and profession alienated, to work wonders there; what Theatre (O ye Noblemen) expect you more suitable then this, to place virtue in her faireſt seat? Or what obligation can you have more strictly binding to perfection, then your selves?

The fourth REASON.

Proceeding from Riches.

IT was a thing very strange amongst the Plagues, wherewith Egypt, ever bent to resist the spur the more deeply to wound it self, was chastised by the angry hand of God, to behold Nilus, that great and goodly River, wholly become bloody: but yet more marvellous to see that from one and the same River the Egyptians drew blood, and the Israelites a lively and crystalline stream.

Joseph. Antiquit. Jud. lib. 2. cap. 5.

The like ordinarily is seen in the lives of good and bad rich men. The bad draw into their store houses Gold, and Silver, heaped one upon another by rapines, and violence, as in a River consisting of the veins, and blood of the poor. The good, in the honest abilities, which Heaven hath graciously given them, find pure water, which they suffer to distill for the publick good, as through the conduit of their liberalities. All that, which the holy Writ and eloquent tongues of the Fathers thunder out, replenished with threats, horrour, and malidiction against riches, is not understood but of those, whereof the vices of men, and not the condition of the things, have made the use damnable. Such riches are deceitful shadows, which cover an apparent good under an undoubted evil; they are hands, that take their Master by the throat; they are poinyards with a golden haft, which delight the eyes with vain seemings, and pierce the heart with mortal wounds; they are precipices, furnished with precious jewels, such as Heliogabalus desired to allustrate his death with; they are heights, which are not measured but by their falls; they are deadly poisons steeped in a golden cup. For this cause Eusebius Emissenus said: Poor man, who admirest those, that are on the top of the wheel of the favours, and riches of the world, whereunto they have ascended by iniquitie, are maintained by violence, and cannot descend but by headlong ruin! How blind are you to have thoughts so unmanly and unworthy of a Christian? Esteem you a frantick man to be stout, and couragious, who stabs himself with a poinyard? Say you, he hath a brave steddy hand, who hits his own heart right with a dagger's point? Say you that man is happy, who holdeth the shadow of good in his hands, to produce to himself an eternity of evils? Who hath ever said, He, who nimbly mounteth on a rock, to precipitate himself, was an able man? Who hath said, seeing him on the steepy cliffs top ready to fall, This man is happie, all the world hath an eye upon him? Who hath said of him, that hath a golden cup in his hand filled with poyson, This man is fortunate to drink in so rich a goblet? And you yet daily say the same, when you behold a man in the iniquity of ill-gotten goods coveto's, ungrateful, disloyal, perfidious to God, and men; you think him happie, and see not, that he twisteth his own ruin in threads of gold, and silver. Such riches are damnable. It is true. But who maketh them damnable? The perverse disposition of men. Take away vice, which is not of the essence of riches, you will find they are a great prop to virtue, and a powerful motive to perfection, for those that possess them. It is to you, Noblemen, to whom St. Hierom (*) addresseth this worthy saying: To you it appertaineth to have riches, to tread them under your feet, and not carry them on your head: the more they are under you, the more they raise you, and the more they elevate you to perfection. The reasons are manifest, and pertinent.

Eusebius Emis. Hom. De Sancta Epiphania, nisi sit Episcopus Rhegiensis. An in hunc hominem potentem & felicem vocas, qui in suam mortem fortis est? Cui proventuum fallax umbra praesentium aeternorum congregat causa malorum? Quis tam dixerit validam in suum jugulum dexteram? Quis laudet velocem ad arcta precipitia festinantem? Quis ejus miretur ascensum, quem de summo prospicit esse casurum? An illum felicem vocas, qui gemmato atque aurato sibi poculo venena miscet?

(*) Hieron. Epist. ad Demetriadem; Vestri generis est & habere, & calcare divitias.

First, it is a matter very difficult to preserve a great virtue in a great povertie, it being given but to very few souls; yea, and to those of the best temper. The poorer sort ordinarily have so much employment to think how to live, that little time remaineth for them to think how to live well. The belly, that hath no bread, hath no ears; and precepts of wisdome are found very short, and insufficient, among people perplexed, and over-whelmed with want. A father of a family, who beholdeth poverty in his house, besides a multitude of children, ranked like Organ pipes, whom he must cloath, feed, and provide for; who seeth creditours attending on him at their day, Sergeants dogging him, processes that afflict him, cattle casually to die on the one side, his house utterly to sink on the other side, his debts not payable but with bankrupting, and rents to sail him at a need, hath full enough to do to cast time, as the Proverb saith, behind his back. Necessity many times is the mother of vice, and when one hath no more goods, he is in danger to do that, which is not good.

Difficulties of the Poor in virtue.

Mendicitatem, & divitias, nè dederis mihi, tribue tantùm victui meo necessaria, nè necessitate compulsus furar, & perjurem nomen Dei mei. Prov. 30. 8.

good. Behold why the Wise-man asked of God, if not great riches, at the least exemption from poverty. You, who have, be it great, or indifferent means, are not brought into this penury, if you call not that a penury, when you cannot satisfie an exorbitant concupiscence, which hath no other pleasure then excess, nor other bounds but infinity. You see in your house a settled estate far distant from the multitude of discontents, under which so many mortal men do groan; ought not this to serve you for some small motive to perfection? See you not in Genesis, how God, willing to exercise Adam in a contemplative life, caused him to find at his first coming, house, table, bed, and cloath laid? If it had then behoved him to take pains to get his dinner, and build himself an house, as little birds do their nests, then had he had pain, and care; but to the end he should have full liberty for his Master's affairs, God took all obstacles from him, that he might have no cause to accuse any man in his miserable mis-fortune, but his own ingratitude. O you Noblemen, God useth you as Adam in terrestrial Paradise, he suffereth you to eat the corn at ease, which others have sowed, and the wine, which others pressed; he causeth your meat to come to your tables, as if it were born by certain invisible engines; he holdeth the elements, creatures, and men in breath, not onely to supply your necessities, but your well-beseeming accommodation: and can you then think he requireth a thing unreasonable of you, if giving you all things above other men, he would have you virtuous as other men?

Privileges of Nobility.

Secondly, I say, poor men, admit the case they be not so pressed with painfull necessities of life, and that time passeth with them a little more sweetly, they may perhaps deafly attend devotion in the silence of a little family; but their virtue is not strong enough in the wing to take a long and distant flight, nor have they arm enough to undertake great enterprises. Their little authority maketh their words not to have much weight, nor their actions (how laudable soever) to be of power to draw others to imitate them. Besides, rich men sometimes have an aversion from doing well, for fear they should have virtue common with the poor, from whom they would (if it were possible) be separated even in elements; but great men are ever powerfull to authorize good works. I leave you to think, if many not through malice, but by the servile slavery of complacency, do praise even their vices, and imperfections, what will they do with their virtues? For we must not suppose (as saith the Wise-man) that the state of hell is wholly established upon earth, and good conscience eternally banished: many are vitious more through infirmity (as not being able to resist the tyranny of opinion, and custom) then out of affection they bear to vice. If it happen, rich men advance the standard of piety, all the world rangeth themselves under their banner: some, that were willing, and not daring to do it; others, though unwilling, were drawn along with a swinge of superiority, which they would not contradict. This is an argument, which I will hereafter deduce more at large, when I shall speak of example. And from hence, O you rich men, judge, if God giving you such a liberty, and reputation to do well, you make ill use thereof, what neglect you fall into, when you employ your authority to raise vice with a strong hand, and put virtue in dis-estimation. Antiently Pearls were called Ushers, because they made way for Ladies, who were adorned with them. Rightly may now Riches bear the like name; every where they are obeyed; even where they make place: it is a good reason, if all the world serve them for ushers, they do the same office for piety, without which all their goodly lustre will be but unjust pillage. Then shall they potently reign, when they have restored virtue to her throne.

Authority of great men to strengthen their devotion.

Pearls are Ushers, saith Seneca.

Finally, to conclude with a third, and in my opinion the most formal reason, which evidently declareth how riches are absolute obligations unto you of Christian perfection: it is, that God seemeth to have enchased all in the charity, which is exercised towards our neighbour: Give alms, and behold your selves wholly pure. This practice of giving alms is so excellent, that God hath chosen no other for himself. His nature is to give, and to do good, as fire to heat, and the sun to illuminate, saith the eloquent Synesius. And to speak unto you the richest word, which ever came out of the mouth of a Panym: It is Plinie, who, after he had well wandred through all sects of Philosophers, describing the essence of God pronounceth this goodly sentence, That the greatest divinity is to see a mortal man oblige his like, and that it is the shortest way to arrive at eternal glory. We also see in the Canticles the hands of the Spouse compared to golden globes, which in them hold the sea enclosed. These hands are of gold, to denote to us the munificence of God by this symbole of charity: His hands are globes made round, there is nothing rugged, clammy, or bowed; nay they are smooth, neat, polite, to pour his blessings incessantly upon men. They always emptie themselves, and are always replenished; for they are filled with a sea of liberality, which never will be exhausted.

Luc. xi. 41. Date Eleemosynam, & ecce omnia munda sunt vobis. Alms the works of God. Ἀγαθὸν ποιεῖν ἐστιν ἐκ θεοῦ. Synes. in Epistol. Deus est mortali juvare mortalem, & hac ad æternam gloriam via. Plin. l. 2. c. 7. Cant. v. Manus ejus globi aurei, pleni mari. Where our translation saith, manus ejus tornatiles, aureæ, plenæ hyacinthi. Hands of God, a golden bowl full of the sea.

God then, having bounty so natural, and intrinsecal in him, will needs see it shine in his servants, and therein establisheth salvation, and perfection. Which admitted, who seeth not, O you rich men, you have a particular obligation above all others, since God hath elected you to be the Stewards of his goods, the messengers of his favours, and the conduits of his liberality? Religious men, who have given the tree, and the fruit all at once, have nothing more to give. The indifferently rich are ordinarily full of appetites, and produce no effects. You have power in your hands to discharge the duties of all the world, you have met with the Philosophers stone, you have the books of an heavenly alchimy in your coffers, you have a golden rod, which can turn the durty pelf of India into celestial substance. Consider what greater ties of dutie can you have, what more pressing necessity to be perfect, then to have the instrument of perfection in your full power? Perswade your selves no longer, that riches are impediments of glory, and salvation; for this unhappiness proceedeth not but from corruption, and ill custom; if you take them on a false byas, they are of lead, to drench, and drown you; if on a good, they are feathers to bear, and lift you up to Heaven. Propliane storie maketh mention of one Sesostris, King of Egypt, who triumphantly rode in a Chariot drawn by Kings, he was so swoln with the success of his prosperities. It was to take the way of hell in the Chariot of pride, so to triumph; but you may in the Chariot of charity, all glittering with gold, and silver, harnessed out with poor men (each person whereof representeth the Sovereign King, who raiseth all Imperial scepters) take the right way of Paradise, and that by the means of riches. Then judg whether they lead to true felicity, or no. If you love these terrene things, you do well; love them boldly, but as the objects of your glory, as the instruments of your salvation, as a gift of your friend, as a benefit from your Chariot of Sesostris applied to the rich. Pharios currus regum cervicibus ægri. Luc. l. 10.

Augustin. Si ista terrena distinguas, ut subjecta diligas, ut famulantia diligas, ut munera amici, ut bene- ſpicia Domini, ut arrham ſponſ.

your Maſter, as the earneſt-peny of your ſpouſe, as the pledg of your predeſtination.

The fifth REASON.

Drawn from perfections of the body.

IT is a lamentable miſery to behold, how ſin hath ſo perverted the nature of things, that it not onely giveth ill under the appearance of good, but alſo ſometimes evil effects to that which is good. Behold for as much as concerneth the perfections of the body, (not ſpeaking here of health, or ſtrength, wherewith the Great-ones are not always the beſt provided:) beauty, grace, or garb, which ſeem to be more connatural to them, they are ſo cried down by the corruption of maners, that one knoweth not what apt place to give them, either among things good, or evil. St. Auguſtine ſpeaketh with indifferency in theſe terms: Beauty of body is a benign gift of God, but he beſtows it often on the bad, that the good may not deem it a great good. Not onely the writings of Saints, and of moſt auſtere religious, have made great invectives againſt beauty, but even thoſe who at other times have with paſſion praiſed it, condemned it, as ſoon as they became wiſe. Petrarch, that worthy ſpirit, after he had adored a humane beauty, doth ſuddenly caſt down the Altars thereof under his feet, and diſ-avowed in ripe age that, which fooliſh youth had made him vehemently commend. For what ſaith he not in his book of the vanitie of the world, which he entitleth the Remedies of Fortune? "You, who eſtabliſh your glory in the "beauty of the body, know, you have an enemy un- "der your roof, and which is worſe, a flattering and "with-delight-tempting enemy. You harbour a "thief, who ſtealeth your repoſe, and time, two the "moſt pretious things of the world. You lodge an "executioner, who always will hold you to the rack, "and torture. You entertain a ſubject of toil and af- "fliction, a motive of warfare and contention; an "incendiary of ſenſual apetite, which is no leſs capa- "ble of hatred then love. This deceitful beauty put- "eth a ſnare on your feet, a veil over your eyes, and "bird-lime on your wings. It is a ſuperficial grace, "which covereth with the ſmooth delicacie of the "skin loathſom, and horible ſtenches, ſo with her poi- "ſon charming the drunken ſenſes. Another (a) ſaith, it is the nurſe of love, the ſpur of ſin, and that virtue lodged with beauty hath always a ſlippery foot, as being in the houſe of a dangerous hoſteſs. S. Chryſoſtom (b) in an Homily, which he made upon the vain beauty of women, hath delicate obſervations, not being able ſufficiently to admire the ſottiſhneſs of thoſe cold-ſtarved Amoriſts, who haſten to roaſt themſelves in the aſhes.

Notwithſtanding all theſe ſayings of wiſe men, we muſt affirm, that beauty & graceful comelineſs of body is a great gift of God, able to do infinite good, when they once hold correſpondence with ſincere virtue: and therefore they rather ought to be eſteemed among the motives of well-doing, then the inſtruments of miſchief, it being unreaſonable to condemn a benefit of God the Creator, for the abuſe of men, ſince no man blameth the candle, that clearly burneth in the houſe, though butter-flies findg their wings in it. For proof whereof I will produce three reaſons onely, which ſeem forcible enough to convince the underſtandings of wiſe men, and evidently declare to all thoſe, that are endowed with corporal beauty, the injury they do to God, when they abuſe the beauty of the body to the hindrance of the ſoul, and drag the gifts of God along in the duſt.

Lib. 15. cap. 22. de Civitate Dei. Pulchritudo corporis bonum Dei donum: ſed propterea etiam id largitur malis, ne magnum bonum videatur bonis. Beauty condemned by Idolaters themſelves. Petarch. l. 6. de remed. Dialog. 2. Habes hoſtem tuum domi delectabilem, & blandum: habes raptorem quietis, tortorémque perpetuum. Habes materiam laboris uberrimam, diſcriminum cauſam, fomentum libidinum, nec minorem quærendi odii, quàm amoris aditum. Habes laqueum pedibus, velum oculis, alu viſcum; ſuperficie tenus fulget decor multa, fœdáque tegens & horrenda leviſſima cutis obtenta, ſenſibus blanditur, & illudit.

(a) Tab. d' inconſt.

(b) Chryſoſt. Homil. de vanit. pulchr. mulieb. κόσμ τ τοῦ εἴσω & τ ἔξω.

Defence of beauty, as the gift of God.

First it is undoubted, that to attribute the work of corporal beauty to any other original, then that of the wiſdom, and goodneſs of God, were to apoſtatize from Chriſtianity, and to rank ones ſelf among the Manicheans. God neceſſarily approveth beauty, ſince he himſelf is the authour thereof. He hatched it in his boſom, as light in the Eaſt, and diſtributively ſpred it upon all the creatures of the earth, as the rays of a bright day. Man hath been from the beginning the beſt provided for, ſince God hath made him as it were a Scutcheon, whereon he hath pourtrayed all the titles of the moſt excellent beauties of the world. Origen ſaith, he is fair as the firmament, which we ſee enameled with ſo many ſtars, that reſplendently ſhine as torches lightened before the Altar of the Omnipotent. St. Chryſoſtome, that the Angels are the morning-Stars, whereof mention is made in Job, who inceſſantly praiſe God: and men are the evening ſtars, faſhioned by the hand of God, with the ſame beauty in proportion to do the ſame office. And St. Ambroſe, that God the Creatour, for ſingular teſtimony of love, hath granted to man the ſame graceful habiliments, with which he himſelf is garniſhed, all which are nothing but beauty. Behold whether this be not highly to raiſe the merit of beauty? I add hereunto alſo two conſiderations very pertinent, which Favorinus hath judiciouſly obſerved in the book he compoſed of the excellency of man. It is, that the Creatour, who hath given beauty to man in proportion, hath by the ſame mean impreſſed in his heart a love ſo tender, that every well-underſtanding man would rather deſire to be reduced to nothing, (an eſtate which ſome have leſs accompted of, then that of the damned) then to be tranſlated, according to the imaginations of Pythagoras, into the form, and figure of ſome ugly, and monſtrous beaſt. The other reaſon is, that the wiſeſt Nations (as he obſerveth) deteſting the beaſtlineſs of thoſe, who have cloathed the Divinity in ſhapes of beaſts, have made expreſs Decrees, forbidding all painters, gravers, and Image-makers to repreſent God in any other figure then of man. And the reaſon they give is very admirable: for you would ſay if you heard them, they had already ſome knowledge of this great alliance, which ſhould be made between the Divine, and humane nature, when they ſaid, That God was not a lover of horſes, or birds, but a true lover of men, and that he was much pleaſed to be converſant with thoſe, who were moſt virtuous and capable of his preſence. Ponder with your ſelf whether this beauty (which God from the infancy of the world hath ſo carefully lodged in man) ought not to be eſteemed an important thing, and a ſtrong motive to virtue?

Natural beauty of man praiſed by Poets. Origen in hæc verba. Vocavitque Deus cælum firmamentum. Homo ipſe cælum eſt. Job. 38. Chryſ. in Geneſim. Quæ major dignitas quàm indem hominem veſtibus indui, quibus ipſemet dominus juxta illud: Dominus regnavit, decorem indutus eſt. Ambr. l. de dignit. human. condition. Favorinus l. de excellentia hominis. Excellent obſervations of Favorinus.

Θεὸν δ φιλεργὸν, & φιλόπονον, ἀλλὰ φιλάνθρωπον, ὅτας τοῖς ζαφρονοῦσι ἀγαθοῖς ἐθέλειν συνεῖναι.

Beauty an inſtrument of God.

For the ſecond reaſon I ſay, that, God making uſe of it in good occaſions, it is an infallible mark he approveth the nature thereof; for never doth he purpoſely make uſe of things unlawful, to make the greatneſs of his counſels, and works ſucceed. Now it appeareth, that he oftentimes hath choſen beauty as an inſtrument of his wonders, a lightning-flaſh of his power, a bright torch of his victories. As when he purpoſed to ſtay the violent ſtream of Olofernes arms, he could with an omnipotent hand have touch'd the rocks, and made men to ruſh out in armed equipage, yet notwithſtanding without ſtretching his hand to any other miracle he raiſed the beauty of a widow to triumph over the flouriſhing legions of the prime Monarch of the world, and himſelf added a certain air, or gracious garb of attractive parts in Judith to ſurpriſe this barbarous commander, drunk with love, and wine, in the ſnare of her her eyes. He fought with the self-same engine, with the same arms against the proud, and insolent Aman; for when he was ready to command the throats of infinite numbers to be cut, as sheep marked for the slaughter, God set a frail beauty before him, which made him leap from the height of Fortune's wheel to the strangest calamitie, that may be imagined, and changing in an instant King Ahasuerus from a Lyon into a Lamb, confirmed the safety, and liberty of her people.

Judith 10. 4. Dominus hanc in illam pulchritudinem ampliavit, ut incomparabili decore omnium oculis appareret.

Esther. 8.

Would you have greater proofs of the estimation, which God maketh of beauty wedded to virtue, then his affording it so glorious triumphs? Hath not the Son of God consecrated the same in his own most illustrious Person, and in that of his most holy Mother, whom ancient traditions (joyned with the interpretation of the Fathers upon the texts of Scripture) shew to have been endowed with an admirable grace, and singular beauty, to serve even as an adamant to captivate hearts, and sweetly range them under the yoak of the Gospel? I am not ignorant, that Clemens Alexandrinus thought our Saviour was willing purposely to deprive himself of corporal beauty, as from the possession of riches, searching out in all things the greatest lowlinesse; but in this proposition he hath grounded himself upon a passage of the Prophet Isaiah, which describing the Saviour of the world in the day of his passion, saith, We have seen him, and he had neither favour, nor beauty. This foundation is ruinous, and this Authour doth no otherwise then as a Painter, who to represent the Moon in her proper nature should delineate her in her eclipse. Other Authours, grounded on this passage of the Psalm xliiii. Speciosus forma præ filiis hominum, assure us our Saviour expressly selected for himself an excellent beauty of bodie, and a supream grace of speech. Nicephorus relateth certain lineaments of his stature, colour, and proportion of his body, which he drew out of antiquity, in all parts lovely, and specious. And St. Epiphanius speaking of the beauty of the blessed Virgin, saith, She was Majesty it self. Judg, and behold, since God (voluntarily despoiling himself of honours, riches, and greatness of the world, to give us an example of humility) would notwithstanding sanctifie beauty in himself, and his Mother, what value you ought to set upon this Heavenly gift, and whether it be lawful for you to profane it. Moreover I affirm, that the Creatour hath not onely cherished beauty, but hath likewise held in accompt the instruments employed to the service thereof. It is a wonder, that in Exodus he commanded Moses to make a brasen bason, with a foot to bear it, for the Priest to wash in, and to furnish, and adorn it with looking-glasses, who kept (as it were) centinel before the gate of the Tabernacle: To what purpose was it to fasten these mirrours in an holy place to this sacred vessel? Theodoret, St. Cyril, and Procopius observe, that the Ægyptians went to the sacrifices of Isis, clothed with a linen garment, holding a scepter in one hand, and a looking-glass in the other, and that the Hebrew women afterward appeared in the desert in the same manner. But God, who would shew the spoils of Ægypt were reserved for his greatness, caused them to lay aside these mirrours, to consecrate the use of them in his own Tabernacle. The Hebrew Interpreters yield another reason, to wit, that the Israelites seeing themselves to languish in Ægypt, in the fetters of a painful bondage, had resolved to abstain from the act of marriage, that they might get no children to inherit their misery. But God, who intended another web, different from that which the thoughts of men wove, stirred the women, who tricked, and adorned themselves so well with these Ægyptian looking-glasses, that they enkindled the chaste loves of their husbands, buried under the ashes of their servitude, to produce a posterity, by help whereof the Nations of the earth should be blessed. And this action of the women so pleased Almighty God, that he afterward caused these mirrours to be placed in his Tabernacle, which they had used to grace that beauty, which had been the cause of so much good. It then being so, see you not God hath made himself a favourer, and a protectour of corporal beauty; who then dare to condemn it?

Clemens Alex. Pædagog. l. 3. c. 1. Ἀισχρὸν τὸν θεὸν γεγονέναι. Errour of Clemens Alex. Isai. 35. 2.

Niceph. l. 1. c. 40. Beauty of our Saviour.

Fecit labrum æneum cum basi sua de speculis mulierum, quæ excubabant ante ostium Tabernaculi. Exod. 38. 8. Mirrour for women. Theodoret. in Catena Zephyr. Cyrillus de spiritu, & veritate. l. 9. Procopius in Exod.

In the third place, I add, this command, which beauty exerciseth over hearts, is not a thing due to human forces, to the end, that nature become not ambitiously proud; it is God, who (as it were) imprinteth with his finger upon the foreheads of men, and especially of great ones, the beams of grace, and majestie to make them more reverenced of the people, which he doth to excellent purpose; but the creature sinisterly abuseth the gifts of the Creatour. Power of beauty.

Maximus Tyrius saith, that a fair soul in a fair body is as a river, that windingly creepeth with many wavie turnings within the enamel of a beautiful meadow, and ravisheth the whole world with the admiration of its excellency. A brave Oratour in a Panegyrick he made of Constantine, who was one of the goodliest Princes of the earth, saith, that nature was sent of God as a gallant Harbinger, to compose a bodie for him suitable to his great spirit, as a stately house for a beautiful Ladie in it; and that onely this exteriour form made him to be beloved, and esteemed of all the world, no less then a God descended from Heaven. Which is also much more admirable in the other sex. How many Monarchs, after they had with horrour terrified the world, have been seen to become tributaries to a mortal beauty, captives to their slaves; and how many to buy out their bondage have yielded at the feet of silly women, to do services, and commit follies unworthy to be remembred on paper? Bathsheba was neither a Lion, a Goliah, nor a Saul, yet notwithstanding with the glance of an eye she powerfully quelled him, who tore Lions, trampled Goliah under feet, and resisted all the arms, power, and legions of Saul. The Philistines found not cords strong enough to bind robustious Sampson in; yet Dalilah quickly captivated, and fast tied him with one hair of her head. Solomon had a heart as deep as the sea, yet women found the bottom of it. It is a wonder what Pythagorical transanimations this beauty of body maketh, which causeth it to be acknowledged, and esteemed every where a true tyrannie without an executioner, as Carneades calleth it. Doubtless the impostures, the sinister intentions, the unchaste loves, the abuses which are affixed to beauty, proceed from the sleights of Satan, and depraved will of man: but the lustre, and commanding power thereof is the real gift of God, which operateth that in human bodies, which the Sun doth in the clouds to form a Rain-bow in the Heavens.

πολλὰς κάμπας λαμπρὸν ἐκφέρων. Beauty of Constantine. Te cum milites vident, admirantur & diligunt, sequuntur oculis, animo tenent, Deo se obsequi putant, cujus tam pulchra forma est, quam certa divinitas.

Carneades apud Lactantium

Ladies, think hereon, you to whom God hath imparted this grace, this delicate composition of body, whether it be not a great motive to you, to serve him well, and to employ it wholly to his glory? You shall be accomptable for your beauty at the Judgment-day, even to the least hair of your head. If you harbour an ill hostess in this goodly mansion, which God hath builded for his service, a wicked soul, an unchaste Soul; if you make glorious Abuse of damnable beauty.

vaunts of borrowed coyn, of a fading flower, the spoil whereof time, age, sickness, and death, will divide between them; if you display a scandalous nakedness to kindle the fewel of lustful affection; if you seek the courtship, and unlawful love of men, with a gift which is not yours; if you so often consult with your looking-glasses, and take so much pain gaudily to dress and attire your selves for a meer vanity, which you turn into an absolute profession, you shall be the marks of the wrath, and vengeance of God. This great Justicier will suffer this malediction pronounced by the Prophets to fall upon you, That your carkasses shall one day be drawn out of their tombs, shall be shewed to the eyes of Heaven, and to the rays of the Sun; and it shall be said, Behold the bones of them, who heretofore have boasted the frail beauty of a little white skin, spred over these corrupt impurities! Worms and Serpents now triumph thereon, as in a town taken by forces, the bodies are a prey of putrefaction, and the Souls have hell for their Tomb.

Ejicient ossa de sepulchris & expandent ea ad solum, Hier. 8.

O what a Catastrophe is this? Preserve your beauty for God, men love it as the hunters the flesh of the Boar, but God cherisheth it as his Temple. Handle the matter so, that all the extent of its reputation and power may be limited to the service of its Creatour. It shall have command sufficient, if it obey him that created it. A good Authour relateth, that a strong Town debauched was heretofore reformed by the beauty of women, who seriously addicting themselves to virtue, never beheld any of all those with a good will, who required them by the way of lawful marriage, that had not first ranged themselves in the lists of devotion and piety. This was an effectual means to extirpate vice, and gloriously advance the Standard of perfection in such sort, that in short time the face of the City was seen to be changed. Practise the same, and God will bless your beauties, when they shall offer all their homage to his Altars.

Lud. Vives.

The sixth Reason.

Drawn from the beauty of the Soul.

Excellencies of the Soul remarkable.

The Beauty of the Bodie, compared to that of the Soul, is but as a Candle in comparison of the Sun. All the greatness, Empire, and signorie of man, doth onely flow from the excellencie of the Soul, as a streaming brook from the Fountain head. If the Bodie be a fair shell, the Soul is the pearl. If the bodie be the lantern, the Soul is the light. If the bodie (as St. Ambrose saith) be the triumphant chariot of the peaceable Solomon, the soul is the Queen, which sitteth thereon to guid and govern it. If the bodie be as the green moss of some sea-neighbouring rock, the Soul is the Diamond, which within hideth its lustre. It is the well-beloved of God, which is fallen from his mouth into this mortal prison; it is that which advantageously is marked with his stamp and image, it is that which beareth the rays, and exteriour lineaments of this great Majestie; it is that, on which the Creatour hath distended his royal Purple, as is said in the Prophet Ezechiel: And this royal garment is no other, then a collection of all the perfections of creatures, contracted in the Soul of man, as the figure of the world would be in the circumference of a ring. And as heretofore Aaron the High-Priest of the old law bare upon his robe the whole world, embroidered, and heightned in Gold-smith's work: in the same manner our soul beareth in its liveries all created excellencies, which are most lively representations of the perfection of the Creatour. The Seventie Interpreters, in the fore-alledged place of the attire of the Soul, called it by the word Τείχασμον, which is very obscure; our Translation foundeth it, a thin, and slender garment, Induite subtilibus: Origen deriveth it from the Greek word σπίξ, which signifieth hair, as it were saying, that this habit of the Soul is an attire woven with most fine hair, and so subtile, that the most strong and sharpned sights cannot penetrate the contexture. Faith teacheth us it is a substance, which is not substance of Elements, nor substance of God, but a substance created of nothing by the Word of God, reasonable, intellectual, spiritual, always active, always lively, so capable, that nothing but God can repleniish it. He that will know more then the eternal Wisdom hath revealed, and will not believe it immortal for his glory, shall feel it immortal by the eternity of punishments, saith St. Augustine. It is not my present purpose to speak either of the excellency, or immortality of the Soul, having fundamentally treated these questions in other discourses: I onely speak of this part of the Soul which we commonly call the spirit. It is undoubtedly true, that all men have one Soul of the same kinde, but very different in their functions and qualities. In some this their Soul sleepeth perpetually in flesh and fat, and abideth as a sword beset and garnished with Diamonds, always sheathed in a scabbard of straw, and morter, without a stroke striking; all we can do, is to find some sparkling glimmers of common sense, and reason therein. In others this Soul glittereth, and twinkleth from its most tender years, afterward it penetrateth the clouds, and diveth into bottomless abysses, with great promptness, fervour, and vivacity; and that is called the spirit, which ordinarily we behold in great, and noble men, excellently well thereunto disposed: for they are for the most part docible, intelligent, capable; from whence I draw a great motive of the obligation they have in this point seriously to dispose themselves to virtue.

Τείχασμον. Ang. Solil. 30.

What the Soul is.

Si credit, immortalis est ad vitã: si non credit, immortalis est ad pœnam. Id. de Symb. ad Catechumen. 3. c. 3.

Spirit, wherefore?

The Soul clothed with royal Purple of God. Ezech. 16. Expandi amictum meum super te.

Constantine the Great heretofore made a law, by which he forbade to adorn the Country to the prejudice of the Citie: If any body after the publication of this law, be found to transport the ornaments of Cities, to wit, Marbles, and Columns, to Country-dwellings, let him be deprived of the possession thereof. Oh alas! Our Soul is the Citie of God, garnished with so many fair embellishments, titles, trophies, so many triumphant Arches, so many graces! Yet notwithstanding, O Noblemen, it often happeneth, you forsake the Citie to build in the Country, to leave your Souls barren, languishing, bare, and naked, whilest you in the mean time stretch all your sinews, all your veins, to the decking, and easeful commodities of the bodie. You deserve to be deprived of your possessions, and inheritance, since you manure it so carelesly.

Law of Constantine Cod. Inst. l. 8. tit. 10. Si quis post legem hanc civitate spoliata, ornatum, hoc est marmora, & columnas, ad rura transtulerit, privetur ea possessione quam ita ornaverit.

I will onely propose two or three reasons, to demonstrate how unworthy a thing it is, to apply a noble spirit to trifles, and sottish toys, which easily may be proved, but not sufficiently commiserated. First, it cannot be denied, but that every thing which exceedeth the limits of its own nature, thereby becometh very irregular: we see all the elements, plants, beasts, and all creatures of the world, do constantly hold the rank, which God the Creatour appointed them. The fire always retaineth its heat; the water, though it be boyled on burning coals, returneth to its natural coldness: hony assumeth not the nature of wormwood, the Lyon playeth not the Ape, nor doth the Eagle become an Ostrich, to trail her wings on the ground. Now the nature of the spirit, how how much the more noble and elate it is, ſo much the more it ought to transfer it ſelf to the conſideration of things divine, to wit, from whence it cometh, whither it goeth, what within it ſelf it acteth. This is (ſaith the Oracle of Roman Philoſophie) an infallible mark of a divine ſpirit, when it pleaſeth it ſelf to diſcourſe of things divine, and is entertained in theſe contemplations, as with her familiar, and peculiar affairs. Judge then what indignity it is, to bury this vigour, and light of the ſpirit, which God ſo freely hath communicated to you, in frivolous employments, and petty ſopperies, which diſcolour the luſtre and honour of your name. What a ſhame it is to ſay this Sovereign hand hath moulded man to be the King of creatures, and he betraying his nature maketh himſelf the Comedian, the Mimick ſtage-player of all creatures, acting all ſorts of perſonages but the good, and that which his own excellency is obliged unto. Which verily is the ſame the great Tertullian deplored: Man is the Work and Image of God, who having apoſtatized from his Creatour, as well in mind as body, maketh himſelf an Actour of all the evil perſonages in the great Comedy of the World. Yet that ſeemeth more tolerable in perſons, who are not eminent, either in judgement, learning, or ſpirit; but Great-ones, whom God hath created advantageouſly to tranſcend all others, and who ſhould live, and converſe among men like Angels, to play the Hogs, and Monkeys, abaſing themſelves to I know not what kind of childiſhneſs of ſpirit, and to a life corupted with the curious delights, and voluptuouſneſs of the body; conſider (I pray) whether this be not a thing as unreaſonable in its own nature, as prodigious in the effects.

Abuse of spirit, how reprehensible it is.

Senec. Praf. lib. 1. Natur. quæſt. Hoc habet argumentum Divinitatis ſuæ, quòd illum divina delectant, nec ut alienis intereſt, ſed ut ſuis.

Man a Stage-player of the world.

Tertul. De ſpect. cap. 2. Homo omnium flagitiorum actor non tantum opus Dei, verumetiam imago eſt, & tamen corpore, & ſpiritu à ſuo deſiivit inſtitutore.

Secondly, It is to do a great wrong to one's ſelf, to live in ſuch faſhion; yea, it is a meer frenzy, which is not made probable to any man, but by the multitude of mad men. See you not very well, that to employ ſome rich and precious inſtrument, to a baſe and ſordid uſe, is an act of a man, who hath loſt his wits? If you ſee a great Monarch employ his purple robe to ſtop an Oven with, and his Scepter to ſhake Hay, you would cry, Out upon it: and yet the Soul which God hath given you, incomparably more precious then the Purple, and Scepter of Kings, you ſuffer to wallow in the filths of fleſh, you apply it to perpetual idle diſcourſes, to vanities, quarrels, and revenges. Is not this wholly to abuſe the gifts of Almighty God? It is ſaid, Nero took delight to dig the earth with a golden Spade, and when there was queſtion about cutting the Iſthmus of Corinth (a deſign which long time troubled his brain) he went thither, led on with Muſical Violins, holding in his hand the golden Spade, with which he began in the ſight of the whole World, to break the ground; a matter which ſeemed ridiculous to the wiſeſt living in that Age. For my own part, I find it more ſtrange, that a noble ſpirit ſhould amuſe it ſelf in things frivolous and impertinent. For, to dig the earth with Gold, was to bring back Gold to its courſe, ſince it firſt ſprang from the entrails of the earth: but for a heavenly ſpirit to delve in ordures, ſtenches, and dung-hils, this is it which is wholly inexcuſable, eſpecially in the Nobility.

A great indignity in the abuſe of the ſpirit.

Folly of Nero.

Mauſonii Dialog. de Nerone.

In the third place, I ſay, that ſuch maner of proceeding is manifeſt ſacrilege, for two reaſons: the firſt is, it retaineth wickedly, and traiterouſly, a thing ſacred, for a profane uſe. St. Auguſtine in an Epiſtle that he wrote to Licentius, a young man of a noble ſpirit, which a little too looſely he abuſed in the vanities of the world, preſſeth this argument in theſe terms, If by chance you had found a golden Chalice in the ſtreets, you would take it from the ground, and give it to the Church, otherwiſe it would be a ſacrilege. God hath given you a Soul all of gold, ſo excellent it is, ſo delicately purified; and you uſe it as an inſtrument of ſenſuality, and make of it a veſſel of abomination, Wherein you preſent your Soul to Satan as a ſacrifice. Fear you not the anger of God?

Sacrilege of fair ſouls.

Aug. Ep. ad Licentium.

Si calicem aureum inveniſſes in terra, donares illum Eccleſia Dei. Acceptiſti à Deo ingenium ſpiritaliter aureum, & miniſtras inde libidinibus, & in illo Satana propinas tepſum.

The other reaſon is, You not onely with-hold a veſſel conſecrated to the ſervice of the Omnipotent, but you attempt upon the Image of God himſelf. This fair Spirit, which he hath given you, as the flower, and quinteſſence of your Soul, is a true character of the Divinity, and you haſten to proſtitute it to publick affections. Remember, I pray, it hath heretofore been held a capital crime, to carry the Emperor's Picture into a place undecent, or uncleanly: and expreſsly Paulus, a man of eminent quality, as one who had been Pretour, was accuſed, and proſecuted as criminal under Tiberius, for that he took a Chamber-pot into his hand, having a Ring uopn his finger graved with the Emperour's form. And can you think it will be lawfull for you to carry, not a dead Figure, but the living Image of your Heavenly Father, into the impurites, and pollutions, which your exorbitant paſsions extrude, as the ſcummy froth of folly? Is not the blame moſt formidable, which God by the mouth of the Prophet Ezechiel pronounceth againſt an ungratefull Soul, in ſuch maner abandoning it ſelf? Ingratefull, and wicked as thou art, thou then haſt dared to take away the moſt precious veſſels framed of my Gold and Silver, to make maſculine Idols, and ſo to ſatisfie thy fornications. Thou haſt cauſed my Oil to burn, and Incenſe to ſmoke before their Altars. What ingratitude is like to this? Alas, what Idols are daily made of the Gold and Silver of God, when ſo many brave ſpirits are employed to figure Chymeras, and monſters in their own ſenſual wills? What Oil burneth, and Incenſe ſmoketh before the Devil's Altar, when ſo many talents, ſo many perfections are unprofitably waſted in vice and vanity? In the mean time, the 70 Canon of the Apoſtles excommunicateth thoſe, who onely bear oil to the Jews Synagogue, or the Paynms Temples. And in what account ſhall we hold the Chriſtians, who make a perpetual ſacrifice of all the faculties of their Souls, to the corrupt vice, and follies of the world.

Images of Emperors, how much reverenced Senec. de benef. l. 3. cap. 26.

Ezech. 16. 17. Et tuliſti vaſa decoris tui de auro meo, atque argento meo, & feciſti tibi imagines maſculinas, & fornicata es in eis; & oleum meum, & thymiama meum poſuiſti coram eis.

Abuſe of an idolatrous ſpirit.

Si quis Chriſtianus oleum tulerit ad Sacra gentilium, vel Synagogam Judæorum feſtis ipſorum diebus, aut lucernas accenderit, de ſocietate pellatur. Canon. Apoſt 70.

Wiſe men affirm, that beſide the fire, which ſhall devour the bodies and ſouls of the damned for ever, there is a hell of ſcience, and conſcience, which ſhall particularly torment thoſe, who have been endowed with a generous ſpirit, and have ill employed it. When Adam opened his eyes to ſee his nakedneſs, his ſpirit and knowledge ſerved him for a keen knife to transfix his ſoul, his ignorance in that kind was a great part of his felicity. What diſaſtrous miſery ſhall then befall thoſe unhappy ſpirits of the damned, when they ſhall know their abilities, all the good things they might have done, and all the ill they have done? Although all the flames and tortures ſhould ſurceaſe, they would find their hell in the eye of their own knowledge, and in their own underſtanding. No eye to a man is more troubleſome then his own. It is that which the cloudy conſcience deſireth moſt to avoid, and can leaſt do it, ſaith St. Bernard, ſpeaking of the eye. Ponder hereon (O Noblemen) whether this motive meriteth not to be ſeriouſly conſidered. Hell vomiteth up brave ſpirits, who after they have ſerved for inſtruments of vice, are now become the food of flames. Augment not the number. The knowledge of God, of one's ſelf, and the ſtudy of virtue, is a fair employment of a noble ſpirit, wherein man cannot be too ſeriouſly buſied, nor more fruitfully.

Hell of ſcience.

Bern. lib. 3. de conſid. Nullus moleſtior oculus cuique ſuo, non eſt aſpectus quem tenebroſa conſcientia foſſugere magis velit, minus poſſit.

ment

The ſeventh REASON

Proceeding from Courage.

OF all theſe Reaſons before alledged, which ſerve as a ſpur to the Nobility ſeriouſly to imbrace Perfection, I ſee not any comparable to Courage, which is a force of ſpirit, conſiſting in two principal points, as Ariſtole, and St. Thomas obſerve, to wit, to undertake, and ſuffer great things with jndgement, and by the excitement of honeſty. This courage among all the excellencies of the ſpirit is powerfull, elate, ſtirring, and aſtoniſhing: and very well St. Ambroſe compareth it to the River Tygris, which among all ſtreams hath its current moſt ſwift, and violent, ſo as with an unreſiſtible impetuoſity it combateth, and ſurmounteth all obſtacles oppoſed againſt it. Thus (ſaith he) courage flieth through perils, breaketh throngs, and works it ſelf a paſſage through a world of contrarieties. This courage is an Eagle which confronteth ſtorms, a Lion which oppoſeth all violences, a Diamond which never is broken, a Rock which ſcorneth waves, an Anvile which reſiſteth all the ſtrokes of the hammer. It is a thing, which with admiration raviſheth heaven, and earth, to behold in the fleſh of a frail, and feeble man, a ſpirit to make trial of all accidents, which is amazed at nothing, which ſurmounteth all difficulties, and which would rather caſt it ſelf into the gates of hell with undoubted loſs of body, then into the leaſt ſuſpition of remiſsneſs. This ſtriketh the ſpirit with admiration, and be it either in military actions, or civil, Courage is highly valued, though ſucceſs always anſwer not good enterpriſes; and enemies moſt cruel are enforced to admire a valour, and vigour of ſpirit, that never bowed under an evil, which it was not able to vanquiſh.

Ariſtot. 3. Eth. 22. q. 125.

Courage compared to the River Tygris by St. Ambroſe.

Ambroſe in hac verba. Geneſ. 2 Nomen fluminis Tygris, Quodam curſu rapido reſiſtentia quaque tranſverberat, neque ab ipſius curſus ejus impedimentorum haret obſtaculis.

Greatneſs of courage.

The Hiſtory of Herodotus relateth, that one called Callimachus in the battel of Marathon, being found by the Perſians ſtuck all over with Arrows like a Hedg-hog, ſtanding bolt-upight amongſt a heap of dead bodies, as if he had been under-propped by the counterpoiſe of the ſame Arrows, they were ſo aſtoniſhed with the dauntleſs valour of this dead man, that they held him as immortal. Never did Seneca ſo demonſtratively ſhew the ſtrength of his eloquence as in praiſing the courage of Cato. This man (ſaith he) hath not oppoſed, nor fought with ſavage Beaſts; it is for Hunters. He hath not purſued monſters with fire and ſword, he lived not in an Age in which it was believed, that a man ſupported Heaven with his ſhoulders. Behold why he was not eſteemed as an Hercules, nor as an Atlas, who notwithſtanding fought with greater monſters then Hercules. He carried another maner of burthen then did the fabulous Atlas. He alone combated againſt ambition (a monſter of many heads) againſt the vices of a degenerate City, and which daily, like an old houſe, was ſinking with the exceſs of weight. This incomparable man ſupported the Roman Common-wealth as long as he could; yea, even when it fell into the abyſs of a thouſand lamentable confuſions, he yet held it up with a hand prompt, always upon the brink of the Precipice; and not being able longer to underprop it, over-born as he was by the violence of miſchiefs, he choſe his Tomb in the Sepulchre of his Country. What greatneſs, what Majeſty! Undoubtedly courage hath ſo much luſtre, and glitter, that obſtinacy it ſelf, which is a vice in all things elſe very hard and rude, being clothed with the mantle of courage, findeth much reputation amongſt men. Now this generoſity, of which we ſpeak, is a faithfull, and an inſeparable companion of true Nobility. All great men ordinarily have a courage very high, and even as certain brave Lacedemonians were born from their mother's womb with a Lance pourtayed, and characterized upon their skin; ſo all Noblemen ſeem to bring magnanimity into the world, from the day of their birth. This might be a marvellous motive to lead them in a ſtraight, and direct line, to great and valiant actions, were it not that the evil Spirit inſtantly ſpreadeth a Film over their eyes, and makes them feel impreſſions of meer ſluggiſhneſs, under the falſe veil of courage.

A Lance graven on the skin. Dion. Chryſ. Orat. 4.

Two things, O Noblemen, will make you exactly accountable before the juſtice of God. The firſt, to abuſe this gift of courage with vanity. The ſecond, to defile it with cruelty. The one favours of childiſhneſs, the other of barbariſm. What can one imagine more weak, and childiſh, then to have received a courage from God, capable to conquer Heaven, and to employ it in petty fopperies, wherein the thoughts better part, and the days actions are waſted, to court a Lady, to gormandize a Banquet, nicely to quarrel upon the interpretation of a word, to ſuck up wind, to feed a fond curioſity with other affairs, to buy plumes of Feathers, to cenſure mens apparel, to dreſs himſelf up for dancing, to play at Dice, to hold a Racket in a Tennis-court, to play the Buffoon in a feaſt, to utter a ſecret, to forge a calumny, to envie one greater then himſelf, to deſpiſe equals, to baffle inferiours, and a thouſand other ſuch like exerciſes, which are the ruſt, and moth of the ſpirit. Behold into what theſe brave courages, which ſhould plant the Flower-Deluces in the Eaſt, are diſſolved. Is not this a ſhame? Is any thing more puniſhable, then ſo to abuſe the gifts of God? Is it not a goodly thing to behold in Poets a Jupiter, who hath forſaken his fiery Chariot, and winged Horſes, letting all go at random, in the mean time to buſie himſelf in painting upon the clouds, ſometimes Goats, Apes, and Centaurs? Behold what Great men do, when forſaking the duty of their charges, and the obligation of their profeſſions, the vilifie themſelves in inferiour actions, beſtowing therein a great part of their time, and (as it were) their whole ſpirit.

Baſeneſs of courage in certain Noblemen.

A Jupiter painting Goats on the clouds, what it ſignifies. Philoſt. in Apoll. lib. 21. cap. 19.

Vanity would alſo be more tolerable, were it not that it changeth into cruelty, which is apparent in the beaſtly quarrel, and bloody Duels, that transform the nature of men into bruitiſhneſs abſolutely ſavage, and tyrannous. We muſt draw Iron out of the entrails of the earth, to make it (as it were) firſt to bluſh with ſhame, before it be ruddy with blood, to ſee it ſelf employed in ſuch a uſe, to behold it ſelf ſharpened by the hands of men, to cut, and tranſfix men: differences muſt be determined with the loſs of life. Theſe miſerable creatures, ſometimes for the interpretation of a word, ſometime through promptneſs of ſpirit, provoke one another to ſingle combat, they ſend a letter of challenge, the place of meeting is appointed; they chooſe Godfathers, as if they would make a Baptiſm with a ſacrifice of Furies, they procure Seconds, who well ſee, that to go upon cold blood to hazard their lives in an unhappy combat againſt a man that never had offended, nor known them, is a ſublimity of folly; notwithſtanding on they go tyrannically, led along by the laws of vain honour, which hath no other foundation, but the ſottiſh brain-ſick folly of men. All of them have for the moſt part more outward ſhew then malice, their hearts tremble with cold fear, Againſt Duels.

Herodot. & Suid. in voce. Death of Callimachus.

Seneca. De conſtantia ſapient.

A notable praiſe of ſtrength of Courage.

Stetit ſolus, & cadentem Reſpublicam quantum modo una retrahi manu poterat retinuit: donec vel abreptus, vel abſtractus comitem ſe ruinæ diu ſuſtentatæ dedit.

A ſingular commendation of Cato.

fear, in the consideration of the peril, to which they expose themselves, yet their lips leave not to sound vain-glorious bravadoes. They seek out solitary places like Sorcerers, and sometime they go by Moon-shine to act this hatefull outrage, not seeing at all, that God beholdeth them with as many eyes of vengeance, as the Firmament hath Stars. At the end of all this, they think to do an act full of courage, most Heroick and manly. What shall we say here? that this passion is a rage more then brutish, which hath for inheritance the death of the body, the eternal, and irrecoverable loss of the Soul, the inevitable anger of God, the indignation of Kings, the thunder of Laws, the execration of the just, the malediction of heaven, and earth? No, this is not it, which I now intend to speak. For seeing I treat of generosity, which obligeth the Nobility, first to Almighty God who giveth it, secondly to Virtue, which seeketh it as a most necessary instrument: I must shew that in this action of Duels, pretended to be all courage, there is nothing less then courage in it. And although they were not liable to the vengeance of God, for being infringers of Laws, both divine, and humane, by this detestable maner of proceeding, yet they would be ever greater culpable, to blast, and defile with this abject humour, and remiss spirit, the gift of courage, which is particularly granted to them out of the treasury of Heaven.

Reasons.

I know not what false spectacles are clapt over the eyes of the Nobility, by the spirit of Lies, forged in the Shop of Hell, which oftentimes make them to take Glass for Diamond, and a Kestrel for a Faulcon. Yes verily, you have a certain Bird in the mystery of Faulconry, called the Hobby, which coupleth with the race of Faulcons, Gosshawks, and Sparhawks: Yea, this wreched Bird doth also mix with the Saker, and Lanaret, she flieth after the Faulconers, and hovering over the field, if the Dogs spring some little Bird, she sowceth upon it, making boasts over this feeble creature, seeing she hath neither heart, nor resolution to grapple with the great ones. Justly herein behold the model of a Gallant, who maketh profession to present the letter of challenge to call others to Duel: he hath degenerated from true Nobility, and real courage, which is produced in goodly, and great actions, undertaken for the service of God, and his King; he hath no longer left in him ought but a little fierce rebellious spirit, to peck at those, whom his own temerity judgeth more weak then himself. And shall then this man be taken for a man of courage? O Noblemen, see you not that true actions of courage are too high and eminent, to impart their worth and honour to Lackeys, and Horseboys? Now it is so come to pass, that there is not any inferiour Foot-man, nor petty Groom of a Stable, that will not watch to take revenge by Duel, that will not endeavour to determine differences by some kind of single combat. There is not any vain Braggard, descended from ignoble Plebeyan parents, under the pretense that he carrieth a pen in his ear, (which peradventure might be the Sword and Lance that his Father, or grand-father made boasts of upon a shread of Parchment, to gain six pence a day) that strives not to have a sword of a good temper, to provoke his adversary to single combat, and the more infamous he is, the more audaciously he furnisheth himself out for this enterprise, presupposing that this is a true means closely to cover his base condition. Antiently, in the wisest, and most valorous Kingdom of the world, those which engaged themselves in these Duels were people gathered out of the dregs and lees of men, slaves, vagabonds, and loytering Rogues, furnitures for a Gibbet: then judge you, if it be not a madness to say, you desire in all things to separate your selves far from the multitude, to enworthy, and distinguish your Nobility, and yet in this one action alone you lessen, and vilifie your courage, even to the condition of the most captive, and abominable creatures of the earth.

Kestrels of Nobility.

Duel is not an act of courage.

Who entered into Duels antiently.

You will say, That is true, but a man cannot refuse a Duel when he is urged. Why? because shame and ignominy always attend, say you, on these denials. See you not by this answer, you give Arms against your self, and freely confess that a Duel is not an action of courage? For, to lay apart the Ordinances of the Church, take but the Laws of Aristotle, a worldly man as your self, and more then you, doth not he most pertinently demonstrate in his Ethicks, that it is not an action of valour, when a Souldier is valiant, while his Captain hath set the Enemy on one side, and a River on the other, to enforce him to fight? or because a Sergeant of a Band is ready to transfix the veins of his back with a Halbard, if he retire? Virtue, which is not virtue but for avoidance of dishonour, is true pusillanimity under the veil of false courage. I then demand of you, who more tyrannically assaulteth a man, either the Sergeant of a Band, who thrusteth a Sword into his reins, or the point of honour, which possesseth his brains? Without all doubt, you will agree with me, that there is no tyranny comparable to that of this mad Duel, which is called Point of Honour. And in the mean space, because (forsooth) this goodly Sergeant of a Band enforceth you, and beareth you forward upon the hips with the helve of an Halbard, you must hasten to a Duel, you must go to precipitate your self into the throat of Hell, whereas otherwise, were it not for the shame of the world, you would not stir a foot. Behold a brave act of courage!

Great want of generosity in Duels.

Ethic. cap. 8.

What then shall we answer to those, who provoke you? That which conscience permitteth, and Doctour Baines adviseth; that you seek not dens, nor caverns, that you go into every place with your head erected, and if they shall be so temerarious as to assault you, they may find you upon that defence, which the law of Nature permitteth. Behold a good answer of a Doctour! but the world is not payd in such coin. Answer them as the wisest among worldings, Augustus Cæsar to Mark Anthony, who challenging him in single combat, he caused in plain terms to be said unto him, that when the despair of the success of his affairs should reduce him to the furious rage of hating his life, yet he would find out other ways to die much more honest, then by this butcherly frenzy. Yea, but this is an answer of a coward. This coward in the mean time established the prime Empire of the world, struggling by strength of arm against a torrent, both of arms, and opinions, which hindered his passage, constraining the whole world to yield obedience to his valour; and he that challenged him, with all his magnanimity, and courage, died in the arms of a woman; rage and effeminacy sharing the rest of his life, as well as the triumph of his death. Behold you not a goodly courage? Howsoever the matter stands in refusing of a Duel, the dishonour of the world cannot be eschewed. What is the world? A mass of mad men. If you have sworn to please them by sacrificing your blood, your life, with the damnation of your Soul, are you not then the most miserable slave, that ever was fettered in the Guives of a rigorous servitude? Are you not a Soul prodigiously servile, so far off are you from having one sole point of of courage? We then must go out of the world? Leave it, if you cannot live without the damnation of your Soul? be gone, break the chains immediately. But I am too much bound, it is fit the Goat bronse where he is fastened. What counsel shall one give you? You can neither go, nor stay. Resolve then to live in the world, trampling under your feet the opinion of the world, subjecting the Laws of the earth to the Empire of Heaven, and then fear not, but you shall have courage enough.

The eighth REASON.

Proceeding from Education.

Force of education.

ONe of the greatest benefits, which man can receive at God's hands, is the favourable blessing of good Education. It is it, which polisheth, and purifieth nature, as one would do a precious stone, wholly defiled with earth, and filthy ordure; it is, which maketh men become Angels, and without it the goodliest, and best natures would perpetually dwell in brutishness. The History of Germany telleth us, that heretofore a child was taken in the Forests, which was presented to Henry Landgrave of Hassia. From four years old he had been bred among Wolves, the Wolves taught him to go on four feet as a brute Beast, he went a foraging with the Wolves, he divided the prey with the Wolves, he slept amongst the Wolves to be the more warm; to conclude, he wholly became Wolf. When he came to be made tractable, and tame, they were enforced to tie his hands to Staves, to teach him to go as men do, yet did he break all to return to the condition of a Wolf: so powerfull is the force, and tyranny of education. Another, sucking the Milk of a Sow, took a singular pleasure to wallow in the dirt; and Lambs, nourished with Goats Milk, retain the roughness of hair.

A Wolf-child.

Hereupon judge, O you Noblemen, what obligation you have to the Divine Majesty, and what motive to tread the paths of perfection, since ordinarily (as I intend here to prove) you meet with all those things, which may conduce to the happiness of good education. How many spirits think you are there in the world, that for want of education remain as Diamonds buried in a Dung-hill, which if once you unearth, and free from rust, and putrefaction, will set the Sun before your eyes? Behold an Infant blessed with a beautifull body, a fair spirit, but yet born with a yoak on his neck, the yoak of poverty, and servitude. The condition of his birth hath shut him in a Cage, what means then, I pray, hath he to work wonders? As soon as ever he beginneth to open his eyes, he beholdeth himself to be born in a house hanged round about with Cobwebs, he beholdeth his father, and mother to groan under the burthen of a needy life, his brothers, and sisters to roul the same stone. There is no question made of civil education, instruction, or knowledge; bread must be sought for, so much sollicitude must be had only to live as brute Beasts, that no leisure will be found to think how to live like a man: and admit it were thought on, there are no Books in this poor Cottage, but rotten worm-eaten walls; no arms, but the Anviles of a Shop, or Forge; no other Musick, but their obstreperous clatter; no other Master, but the necessity of learning nothing; no other lesson, but ignorance, and misery. Behold, seeing you might have been reduced to this condition of life, what have you done to God before your being, to be that which you are? He hath not been content to give you blood, wealth, qualification, spirit, and courage, but also he alloweth you the happiness of good education, which setteth, and composeth all the natural parts into a fair way.

Defect in education.

Misery of want.

You demand of me, whether I judge seriously the education of Great-ones, and men of quality to be such? I affirm, at the least it hath all the possible means and opportunity so to be, in which consisteth the knot of obligation we seek for.

And, without going further, is it not an uncontrolable proof which sufficiently declareth, that even the education of Court is worthy recommendation, to say that God, seeking out a Schole for the greatest States-man, that ever was in the world, chose no other place then the Court of a King? You know what a man Moses was, how great, how eminent; how much beloved of Almighty God, who elected him to be a conduct, and captain of six hundred thousand men at arms, to give him a regency over the elements, and a power to repleniſh the four quarters of the world with the greatness of his prodigies. What did he to breed him, and frame him to so high, and supereminent a condition, to so heroick virtues? Did he suffer him to be bred, as other Hebrew children, in fear, in bondage, in poverty, which overwhelm the goodliest, and best disposition, as soon as they begin to set forward? No, he brought him into the Court of Pharaoh, he caused him to be nourished in the exercises of Nobility, to swallow all the wisdom of the Egyptians, who then were in reputation, to be the wisest men in the world. This is it which St. Stephen said in the Acts, Eruditum omni sapientiâ Ægyptiorũ. And Philo in the Book he hath wrtten of the life of Moses, unfolding to us the History of his education, saith, he learned in the Court of the King of Egypt Arithmetick, Geometry, Musick, as well contemplative, as practick Philosophy, and the secrets of Hieroglyphicks. But to shew Noblemen how lawfull it is to learn Court civilities, and garbs, without contracting the vices, the same Moses, who learned all lawfull sciences from the Egyptian Doctours, never would suck Milk from Nurses of the same Nation, which might infuse any bad influence upon his manners. God held the very same course in the education of the Prophet Daniel, and of those three holy children, who planted the trophy of their Faith among the burning coals of an Oven; he caused them to be educated in the Court of King Nebuchadnezzar, he caused them to learn the Chaldaick Language, to be trained in Literature, to be afterwards presented to the King, well instructed in all sorts of Sciences.

Educatiõ of Moses at Court.

Acts 7. 12. Learning, and courtliness of Moses.

Philo de vita Mosis.

Daniel, and his companions bred at Court.

Pueros, in quibus nulla esset macula, decoros formâ, eruditos omni sapientiâ, cautos scientiâ, & doctos disciplinâ. Dan. 1.

From hence you may judg, that education of great men is a matter full of worth, and recommendation, since God, who disposeth all with so excellent Oeconomy in favour of the just, hath pleased to give to his greatest Minions, and Favourites, the Courts of Kings for a Schole. And in effect we must aver there is the best education, where the best tools, and instruments of great actions are, and these are found in the houses of Personages of quality. Education of children is begun in the choise of Nurses. Poor people take such as necessity permitteth, many times surcharged with imperfections, & disproportions of nature, which make corruption creep into the child with the milk; the rich, & those of quality elect them with all possible advantage, which gold, credit, or authority can procure. This choise of Nurses is of no small importance. The Scripture observeth, that King Nebuchadnezzar, having been from his infancy exposed in a forest, & nourished by a wild Goat, contracted thereby brutish maners, so that degenerating into a vehement stupidity, and most barbarous pride, it made him afterwards, by the just punishment of heaven, return to the life of Beasts, among whom he had been bred.

Why men of quality are best bred.

Glossa Lyr. in Daniel. Nebuchadnezzar nursed by a Goat.

The

Dio. Caſſius. Nurſe of Caligula.

The ſame happened in the perſon of the Emperor Caligula, (a portentous prodigie of man) who ſeemed to be born for no other purpoſe, but to ſhew the world the miſchief, which a great power can perpetrate in a great brutiſhneſs. It is held this corruption came to him neither from father, nor mother, who both were reputed the moſt honeſt, and prudent in the Roman Empire. But it is ſaid, that (perhaps) of purpoſe to make him one day Martial, they gave him a maſculine brave Nurſe. For ſhe was hairy on the face as man, ſhe drew a Long-bow, ſhe ran at the Ring, ſhe curvetted a Horſe like a Rider, but in other kinds ſhe was miſchievous, and cruel, and made her little nurſe-child ſuperlatively inheritour of her vices.

If then the goodneſs of Nurſes be one of the principal favours, which happeneth in education, who will have them if not Noblemen? As ſoon as Ladies, and women of Quality are ready to be brought in bed, every one will preſent them a Nurſe, every one will offer one of their own choiſe, there is not a Viſitant, nor Goſſip, that will not roam from houſe to houſe for this purpoſe, and redouble journey after journey. It falleth out oftentimes, that after the mothers do neglect perſonally to give their children ſuck, and uſe ſo much curioſity in the election, drawn by conſiderations meerly terrene, that overmuch choiſe maketh them to elect ill. The children of rich men become droughty amongſt a maſs of Fountains, wherewith they are preſented to ſuck from their infancy; and thoſe of poor men, amongſt the incommodities of nourtriture, grow up as Saffron under hail; God counterpoizing to the one their over much ſolicitude of humane helps, and ſupplying the want in the other. Notwithſtanding it cannot be denied, but that a moderate choiſe of Nurſes, ever accommodated to God's greater glory, is moſt available to the Infant, and that perſons of Quality have this favour much more tranſcendent then others.

After the Nurſes, come the Governours, and Governeſſes. The poor creatures are inſtantly abandoned, and caſt amongſt a little crew of children, their ordinary companions, and play-fellows, and there have they all liberty to beſmear one another as a Collier's ſack. In the houſes of Great-ones there is always ſome ſage women, who giveth the firſt tincture and impreſſions to the Souls of children, and beginneth to trace on their tender hearts the firſt draughts of the fear of God. When the Infant is capable to learn any thing, the poor creature much wanteth inſtructions; for the Chariot of learning is now adays moved with the arms of Gold, and Silver. Great men make all Arts, and Sciences tributary to their fortune. If books be wanting, goodly Libraries are erected with money. If good Teachers, all the beſt Spirits, and choiſeſt Maſters make haſte to enter into the houſes of Great-ones. There is not a Grammarian, Geographer, Chronologer, Rhetorician, or Philoſopher will fail them. If they could not otherwiſe have it, but that they muſt fetch learning from the furtheſt confines of the earth, to infuſe it into their brain, they would have it at what price ſoever. If they be to be trained in Military exerciſe, the braveſt Academies are opened to them. If the Parents ſhew themſelves (though it be never ſo little) affected to Devotion, and Virtue, they that never were bent thereto will be pliable, and ſeek rather to make ſale thereof, then to uſe it.

Arts tributary to great men.

Verily you, O Noblemen, behold that the help of education is great, and wholly in your own hands. Judge now then the injury you do to God, and the wrong you inflict on your ſelves, when you abuſe theſe bounties of Heaven. Wherein do we abuſe it then? In two principal points. The firſt is neglecting good inſtruction. The ſecond in ſubvering it by vice contrary thereunto. How is that? Firſt, many fathers, and mothers at this day, reſembling Oſtriches, who lay their Egs in the open way, without hatching them, little regard to till the minds of their children, by planting therein the fear of God, to gather afterward a rich harveſt of eminent virtue, ſuitable to their condition. But if a Propoſition be made, to expoſe them to the height of the wheel of worldly honours, with the freſh gale of favour, then are they eagerly buſie. Is not this it, which the Prophet Jeremy did deplore, when he ſaid, Hieruſalem was cruel as an Oſtrich in the deſerts? Such fathers there will be found in the world, who, without any guidance, or direction, thruſt their Sons into the throng of many hazards of being undone, and will not ſpare to ſend them into the fellowſhip of Devils, into the contempt of Religion, and looſe Liberty, ſo that it may be a degree to advance their fortune. What Chriſtianity is this? Guevarra, a great Courtier, ſaith, that Parents, who ſo ſend their children to Court, without preſcribing how they ought to demean themſelves, and not allowing them ſome perſon, who may ſeaſonably reprehend their imperfections, ſhould do much better to load them with Irons, and place them in the houſe of Fools, becauſe there they are bound, that they may become more wiſe, and in the Court, they are let looſe to make them more fooliſh. If a young man have deſerved the wheel, do but put him into the hands of his own will, a more butcherly executioner you cannot give him.

Bad education of Noblemen, and why?

Fathers, and Mothers compared to Oſtriches.

Filia populi mei crudelis quaſi Struthio in deſerto. Thren. 4. 3.

Guevarra in the alarm to Courtiers, tranſlated by Monſieur Hardy

The other point is yet more perillous when they are not onely neglected, but are purpoſely bred in pride, and ſenſuality, which are the two Rocks whereon theſe young ſouls make ſhip-wrack. One of the wiſeſt men of the Roman Empire complained of the Time he lived in, wherein they firſt built Palaces before the mouth was formed; that young boys were wrapped up in Scarlet, that they grew up in Litters, and Coaches, without ever ſcarce ſetting foot to the ground, and that their lips were kiſſed for having ſpoken ſome ſottiſh foppery. This was ſomewhat tolerable amongſt Heathens; but to ſee Chriſtian children bred up in pride, in flatteries, in perpetual apiſh toys, ſervices, and ſubmiſſions, which raiſe their high ſpirit, is it not a prodigie? Theſe little Thraſoniſts are no ſooner out of the ſhel, but inſtantly they eſtabliſh a jurisdiction in the family, they make a noſe of Wax of their Parents, drunk with love, and childiſh indulgence, to lead, and turn them where they liſt; they do, and undo what they pleaſe, and indeed, exerciſe even then a petty tyranny, to make themſelves afterwards looſe, and unfettered Lions. And they, ſeeing all things are permitted them, do inſtantly take that vogue, which depraved nature doth preſent unto them, they follow the track of pleaſure, and voluptuouſneſs, ſo fattening, and engroſſing their ſouls, that all the luſtre of the ſpirit is wholly buried, and extinct. Their houſhold-ſervants who nearly attended them, ſeeing their favour may this way be gained, deſperately corrupt them, propoſing vices to them, of which they never had the leaſt knowledge.

Great corruption of Nobility.

Antè palatium eorum quam os infiximus: in purpura regnant, in laſciviis crepant, gaudemus ſi quid licentius dixerint. Verba, ni Alexandrinis quidem permittenda deliciis, riſu & oſculo exceptum. Fabius Quintilianus.

Domeſticks vicious, how abominable.

Hereupon, fathers, and mothers, take heed, cankers, which devour bodies, and peſtilences, which ſuffocate hearts, are not ſo dangerous as are theſe creatures,

Education of children recommended by excellent paſſages of Fathers.

tures, unworthily ſlaviſh in the moſt prodigious ſervitude that may be, when under pretext of welwiſhing, they thruſt your children into vice, before their eyes are open to diſtinguiſh it. Know, that children are, as ſaith Clemens Alexandrinus, the flowers of marriage, nothing is ſo eaſie to be corrupted, a little contagious breath will tarniſh, and dry up all their beauty. Underſtand, they are your poſſeſſions, and inheritances; Poſſedi hominem per Deum, ſaid the firſt mother of mortals. If you leave them unmanured, all overrun with thorns, and briars, you ſhall become anſwerable to the juſtice of Almighty God, Look well unto it, ſaith St. Hierom, that they carouſe not in the cups of Babylon, and be not ſtrucken with the hammer, the noiſe whereof wil reſound through the earth, otherwiſe they will one day be nails, and lances in your ſides (as ſaith the Scripture) to transfix you even to the heart. In the fourth book of Kings 42. children ill brought up were devoured by Bears, to teach Parents, that ſince they have done leſs then Bears, who ſhape their whelps by much licking, & ſmothing them, they therefore by Bears were bereft of them: and ſuch infants (ſaith S. Cyprian) will one day complain at the tribunal of God, ſaying, The perfidiouſneſs of others hath betrayed us, our fathers, and our mothers have been our parricides. In like maner youth, take heed how you abuſe the gift of your good education, and the many inſtrumental means, which God hath granted you for the exerciſe of virtue, otherwiſe you ſhall pay the loſſes thereof in the length of a corrupt, and miſerable life, and your bones in old age ſhall be filled with the follies of youth, which ſhall ſleep with you even in your Tomb, and drag your ſouls into the bottomleſs precipice, from whence there is no recovery.

Clemens Alexand. 2. Pædag. cap. 3.

Hier. ad Latam.

Erunt vobis quaſi clavi, & lancea in lateribus. Num. 33. 4 Reg. 2. 23

Cyprian de lapſis. Perdidit nos aliena perfidia, parentes ſenſimus parricidas.

The ninth REASON,

Which maketh it appear, the Court is a life of Penance.

AMongſt the Motives, which the exact Maſters of ſpiritual life propoſe to Religious men, to invite them to perfection, they ſet before their eyes, that they are all ſtirred up to virtue, when they already are in the arms of penance. The like with juſt reaſon we may ſay to Courtiers, the more to enflame them to fortify themſelves in great, and glorious virtues, to wit, that arriving at Court, they enter into a houſe of penance, where they every day have a thouſand occaſions of ſuffering, which is the ſhorteſt way to perfection. That the Court is a place of publick penance, appeareth for the reaſons, which I intend now to produce. Firſt, Antiquity hath called penance, by the word Envy, as Tertullian hath done, who ſaith, We ſtrike at the gates of Heaven, as with the hammer of envy; that is to ſay, with penance. This name hath been given, either for that it doth make God as it were envied, if he pardon not, ſeeing the eſtate of Penitents ſo deplorable; Invidiam facit Deo niſi ignoſcat, as the moſt learned Biſhop of Orleans hath noted in his Obſervations upon Tertullian: or for that the Latine word invidere ſignifieth originally not to ſee any thing, but to turn the eye aſide as from a ſad object; and the habit, eſtate, and condition of the Penitents was heretofore ſo lamentable, that the nice, and curious averted their eyes from them, and could not endure ſo much as onely to behold them. Howſoever it be, the title of Envie doth excellently well agree with the Court. That is the neſt where Envie hatcheth her Egs, the Throne where ſhe exerciſeth her Empire, the Altar where ſhe hath many ſacrifices, and were ſhe baniſhed from all the corners of the earth, we then ſhould ſearch for her among Courtiers, their life always being between the two ſcales of the balance, whereof the one is called Envie, the other Miſery. This is it, which obligeth them to an extraordinary perfection, that they may perpetually ſtand upon their guard, and avoid the leaſt defect. This is it, which if they know well how to uſe it, doth abſolutely ſhut up from them the gate to all exceſs; for if Envie (according to the Proverb) will offer to ſhave an Egg, what will ſhe not do in a Meadow?

Tertul. Apol. c. 40. Invidia cælum tundunt.

Penance called by the name of Envie.

Envie of Court.

Secondly, the antient Canons, and Doctours of the Church, as St. Baſil, obſerve five degrees of penance. The firſt was called Sorrow, which was a ſtate of tears, and grones. The ſecond is called Audience, which was a degree, to which Penitents, after an infinite number of ſighs, were admitted to hear the inſtructions, and preachings of the Word of God, whereof they were before deprived. The third, Humiliation, which was when the Penitents were admitted to a certain part of the Maſs, but not at the Sacrifices: for they went out before the conſecration, a little after the newly-inſtructed Chriſtians, the Prieſt repeating over them a certain Prayer, during which time they made a low obeyſance, their face bowed to the ground. The fourth degree is called Conſiſtence, where the Penitents had leave to hear Maſs at the full length as others, but not to make any Oblation, nor to communicate: for that was reſerved to the laſt degree, called Communion, where they obtained a full reconciliation in the participation of the holy Myſteries, as the fore-alledged Biſhop hath moſt excellently explicated.

Five degrees of Penance among the Antients. πρακλαυσις. ἀκρόασις. ὑπόπλωσις. ὑποστασις. μέθεξις.

Of theſe five parts of Penance, Courtiers for the moſt part exerciſe thoſe, which are moſt irkſom, and very ſeldom participate in the conſolations of the other more ſweet, and benign. If Penitents have a degree of tears, and lamentations, where are ſighs, and groans more frequent then in Court, for the many diſaſters, which ordinarily occur in their affairs? One may well apply to them that paſſage of Job, expreſſed in St. Gregory the Great, The Giants, or men of the earth, do groan under the waters. Out alaſs! how many times the poor miſerable creatures, after a world of travels, purſuits, and hopes, which are dreams without ſleep, ſeeing themſelves tranſported into diſgrace with a furious torrent of envy, ſigh, and mourn in an Ocean of calamities? One frown of an incenſed Prince is more formidable to them then the eye of a Baſilisk, yea, more terrible then the crack of a Canon. The favours they enjoy are winged, and ſlippery; all the contentment they can poſſibly receive in ten years will not afford ſo much joy to their hearts, as the repulſe of one ſole day, coming as a ſtroke of thunder, afflicteth them, and maketh them give ground, if they have not recourſe to heavenly conſolations. See you not how Abſalom re-eſtabliſhed in Court, yet deprived of the King his father's ſight, bare this diſgrace with ſo much anxiety of mind, that he asked a bloody death for his remedy? What will the look of a Lion be, if the onely deprivation of a favourable eye be ſo ill to be digeſted? What will become of ſo many other contrarieties, which at every turn tranſfix ſo many brave deſigns, ſo well projected? Where will not occaſion of many moſt bitter ſorrows be found, among ſo divers accidents, which cauſe us to ſtand at all times prepared for blows? If Penitents be in a ſtate of humiliation, wherein, as other Interpreters obſerve, they not onely humbled themſelves, proſtrated on the earth at the Prieſt's benediction, but they lowly Practiſe of theſe degrees at Court.

Job 20. Gigantes gemunt ſub aquis.

Eſtate of tears.

Obſecro ut videam faciem Regis: quod ſi memor eſt iniquitatis meæ, interficiat me. 2 Reg. 14.

State of humility.

lowly laid themſelves under the feet of all the world; where I pray, are Souls found, born more to ſervitude, more pliant, more abaſed, then the Courtiers? They bend like the Fiſher's angling-line, they ſtoup, they turn, and wheel about to all purpoſes, that they may arrive where they pretend. They buy all their Honour at the price of great ſubmiſſions, their Scarlet at the price of ſordid ambition, and glory with the coin of ſlavery. That is it, which St. Cyprian excellently well obſerved: Behold ye this Courtier, who gazeth on himſelf in Scarlet? If you knew how many baſe ſubmiſſions the flaſhing luſtre of this bright garment coſt him, if you knew what ſcorn, what repulſ, what contempts, even of ſuch as were more arrogant then himſelf, he hath ſwallowed; how many proud gates he hath (as it were) beſieged every day, going to perform his complements; and how many times he hath made himſelf a ſtirrop-holder, or foot-boy for the ſervice of a diſdainfull Prince, to gain this train, which now attendeth him, you then would have more pity of his perſon, then envie of his fortune. An antient Courier being asked, how he had grown old in Court, did not he anſwer: By receiving injuries every day with thanks? Many men fatten with diſgraces, as faithfull Dogs with baſtonadoes.

Cyprian. ad Donatum. Qui amiſſu clariore conſpicuus fulgere ſibi videtur in purpura, quibus hoc ſordibus emit, ut fulgeat? Quos arroganti-um faſtus prius pertulit? Quas ſuperbas fores matutinus ſalutator obſedit? Quot tumentium contumelioſa veſtigia ante praceſſit, ut ipſum etiam ſalutantium comes poſtmodum turba praecederet.

A notable anſwer of an old Courtier. Injurias accipiendo, & gratias agendo. Genes. 2. de Ira, c. 35.

Behold how Courtiers participate with penitents in pains, and not in comforts: for penitents after many auſterities come to enjoy with taſtful contentment the hearing of the Word of God. A Courtier after a thouſand, and a thouſand mortifications, ſhall not gain oft-times one good word from his Prince. Penitents, after they had been throughly turmoiled, came to the ſtate of repoſe, and conſiſtence: but Courtiers are always upon the wheel, not finding a firm footing of conſtancy to fix themſelves on. The Penitents came in the end to the participation of myſteries: and Courtiers with all their miniſteries of iniquity ſeldom enter into the Temple of hoped honour, and if they do enter, they find not the myſterie, which can ſatisfie all their appetites.

Comparison between a Courtier, and a Religious man.

Behold you not a rough penance? Behold you not a patience able to make Saints, yea, Martyrs, if they did onely meaſure themſelves with the Ell of torments? Guevarra, who had lived in a Cloiſter, and a Court, found the penance of Religious men was much ſweeter then that of Courtiers. A religious man many times ſtayeth long in one houſe, and buildeth at his good leiſure a little neſt, to die in the ſweet-ſmelling odours of good life, and holy converſation: and it ſeemeth (ſaid he) the malediction of Cain is fallen upon Courtiers; for they are always in motion, as ſtrangers, and every day change Inns, and Hoſteries. A religious man obeyeth but one onely, a Courtier hath ſo many Maſters, as he hath paſſions, and pretenſions, which fetter his liberty, a good never to be eſtimated by a valuable price. A religious man maketh an account of his demeanour to his ſuperior: a Courtier hath a thouſand controllers of his actions. So many parts and members as the eſtate of the King hath, are to him ſo many chains, ſo many obſervances. He muſt (ſaith this Authour) ſerve the King, wait on Favorites, viſit Noblemen, Court-treaſurers, give to door-keepers, frugally endear Auditours, entertain Provoſts, gain harbingers, flatter pay-maſters, do for his friends, diſſemble with his enemies. All which things infinitely exerciſe obedience, and attract unſpeakable ſlavery. If a Courtier once do what he can, he is a thouſand times made to do what he would not, and admit he be a favorite of the Prince, he is a ſlave to all the officers, and to all reſpects, and relations, by which he holds his fortunes, as if one ſhould hold a Wolf by the ears.

A Religious man maketh a vow of poverty: ſuch a Courtier there may be found, who, without vow-making findeth himſelf the moſt part of his time miſerable poor; great fortunes, yea, thoſe who carry all, at the end of their account, finding themſelves hunger-ſtarved, and wretched. A poor Religious man at diner-time findeth his Napkin laid, and without taking of further care the gifts of God arrived, as ſeaſonably as if Elias Crow had brought them. Such a Courtier is to be found, who oft-times lodgeth in ſome crooked narrow lane, he eateth on ſome hired table, lieth on ſome borrowed bed, and abideth in a chamber without door, or portal, and at the end of all comes an Hoſt, who ſurprizeth him when he hath nothing to content him; at which time his affliction is greater to diſcover his poverty, then to feel it; leſs it grieveth him to be miſerable, then to have a witneſs of his wretchedneſs. Such an one hath been ſeen poſſeſſed of above two thouſand Ducats of yearly rent, who neither had bread, fewel, ſpit, nor kettle in his houſe, but every day a regiſter ready of great mens boards, where he might go to beg a diner. What beggary is this? Guevarra addeth alſo to this ſpecious poverty of a Courtier, that Grooms rob him, Caters bring in falſe reckonings, Buffoons importune him, Ladies of Court unplume him, other women, leſs honeſt, filch from him. When every one beholdeth him unfeathered, they haſten to pull the plumes off his wings, and if his wings fail him, he no more ſhall have friends, nor ſuccour.

A Religious man, having made a vow of chaſtity, hath very great, and undoubted means to obſerve it, provided by his rule: the chaſtity of a Courtier is always in ſnares, and combats, his battels are perpetual, his victories moſt rare, the obligation notwithſtanding of continency ſticks upon him, and his transgreſſions are reſerved to God's vengeance. A Religious man hath his watchings for the ſervice of God, and notwithſtanding hath his ſeaſon of watching, repaſt, and ſtudy all diſtributed with a prudent Oeconomy: the Courtier hath neither repoſe, nor repaſt certain, for the ſervice of the world. He dineth when it pleaſeth his Alexander; and his ſleep is no more his own then his liberty, of which he is diſpoiled before he go to bed; a thing notwithſtanding ſo precious, that whoſoever well knoweth the price thereof, would not lend it out, though he had the whole world for a pledge. A Religious man maketh voluntary abſtinencies, with merit, and conſolation: your Courtier faſteth oftener then he would, with demerit, without comfort. Briefly, a Religious man weareth hair-cloth, and the Courtier thorns, and cares, which never forſake him. A Religious Recluſe hath as it were no body to pleaſe but himſelf: a Courtier, who endeavoureth to content all, many times ſatisfieth no man: if he hold his peace, he is a Lourdane; if he ſpeak, he is a Babler; if he ſpend, he is a Prodigal; if a good husband, covetous; if he ſtay in his lodging, he is an Hypocrite; if he make many viſits, he is a Buſie-body; if he be bravely atttended, they ſay he is a Fool; if he eat alone, he is miſerable.

In fine, this great Courtier Guevarra, after he had repreſented the faſhion of the time, and diſpoſition of the Court moſt lively, draweth this concluſion, That the life of Court is not a life, but rather a publick penance: aud that we ought not to call Courtiers living men, but interred alive, becauſe they die as often as they underſtand, that another is more in favour of the Times then themſelves.

Judge then upon all this, which I have here diſ-courſed, whether one ought to fortifie himſelf ſo much the more with virtue, and courage, by how much he beholdeth himſelf expoſed to great and perpetual occaſions, either of ſin, or miſery? Whether the Courtier have leſs obligation to virtue then the Religious, ſince he ſeeth himſelf at all turns in greater, and more evident perils? Judg, if this be a favour of Almighty God to have a ſubject of penance, and a fair field to exerciſe patience, how Courtiers herein are made happy, and how many palms they might reap, if they would add the application of ſpirit, ſincerity of intention, and ſpiritual direction to the exerciſes of their profeſſion. Through the want of theſe virtues, thinking to gain all, they loſe all, merit eſcapes them, and all their life the bad thiefs croſs abideth with them. And that, which is moſt deplorable, is, that they adore their puniſhments, and like the tribe of Zabulon, of whom Scripture ſpeaketh, they ſuck in the water of the Sea as Milk, and all bitterneſs ſeems ſweet as ſugar to their depraved taſts.

Deut. 33. Inundationem maris quaſi lac ſugent.

The tenth REASON,

Which dependeth on acknowledgment, or gratitude.

HAd Noblemen, and worldly Great-ones no other ſpur to incite them to perfection, but the acknowledgment of ſo many benefits, which they have received from the liberal hand of God, it were always a potent motive to a heart truly generous, who feareth ingratitude more then death.

It is not without myſterie, that God in the beginning of the world's creation, of twelve names attributed unto him, he taketh that of Elohim, derived from an Hebrew word, ſignifying to tie, and oblige, making himſelf at the very firſt known to man, even in the world's infancy, under the title of Obliging, to teach him, that he is born among benefits, the acknowledgment of which ſhould become natural to him. That great man Philo the Jew, in the Book he entituled Noë's Plant, figureth unto us a certain tradition of the Sages of his Nation, to wit, that God the Creatour, after he had framed the world as a Scucheon of his Nobility, a contracted table of his Titles, a mirrour of his greatneſs, and wiſdom, demanded of the Prophets, or the Angels then in glory, what they thought of this work; and that one among them, after he had highly commended the architecture of this goodly univerſe, ſaid freely, that he alſo therein yet required one perfection, to ſee a Seal upon ſo many brave, and rich inventions. What is it, ſaith the Eternal Father? I would deſire (replied he) a ſtrong voice, powerful, harmonious, which born upon the wings of the winds, and clouds, upon the Chariot of the air, might repleniſh all the parts of the world, and inceſſantly eccho forth night and day in praiſes, and thanksgiving for your incomparable benefits. Verily a good invention, and worthy of an Angelical ſpirit, yet notwithſtanding, God hath ſufficiently provided for this defect. For framing the world as a large clock, he hath proportionably given to man the place, which this celeſtial ſpirit ſeemed to require. And, that it might not be otherwiſe then ſo, the firſt wheel of this great clock of the world is the primum mobile, the continual motion, the ſecret influences of Antipathies, and Sympathies, which are as it were hidden in the bowels of Nature. The hand thereof is this goodly, and beautiful embowed frettizing of the heavenly orbs, which we behold with our eyes. The twelve Signs are as it were the diſtinctions of the twelve hours of the day. The Sun exerciſeth the office of the Steel, and Gnomon to point out time, and in its abſence the Moon. The Lights, and Stars contribute thereto their luſtrous brightneſs. The Sea the azure of his waves for ornament. The Earth ſerves for counterpoize. The ſtony Quarries, the metals, and the plants, for an Emblem to exerciſe the wiſeſt in the knowledge of this great Work-man. The living Creatures are the ſmall chimes, and Man is the great clock, which is to ſtrike the hours, and render thanks to the Creatour.

God named Obliging in the beginning of the world.

A notable diſcourſe of Philo.

The world a Clock, and how.

This acknowledgement of courſe is due to God from all men, and the failing herein is greatly puniſhable for two reaſons. The firſt is, That God hath with his finger engraven it in the nature of the world. The ſecond, That he extraordinarily recommended it in the new, and old Law. As concerning what toucheth the law of nature; benefits are the wings of love, more ſwift then tempeſts; they overtake Birds in their flight. We behold in Hiſtory, where on one ſide a Stork cometh to caſt a precious Stone into the boſome of a Maid, which had healed her of a wound; and on the other ſide an Eagle, that ſeeing the body of a young man burned, which had fed, and cheriſhed her, caſt her ſelf with alacrity into the flames of her enkindled pile. Good turns are golden Nets, which catch the ſwifteſt gliding Fiſhes; we find the proof hereof, when the Dolphins aſſembled with troops upon the Sea-ſhore, where they celebrated the obſequies of one called Ceranus, who had before freed them from the ſnares of the Fiſher-men. Benefits are ſharp-pointed Arrows, which throughly penetrate the heart of Tygers, and Lions. We find it in the Hiſtory of Androdus, who, becauſe he had pulled a thorn out of a Lion's foot, made a Beaſt of ſervice of him, and led him through all the City of Rome, gentle, and meek as a Lamb. O how ſtrong bird-lime is a benefit! all generous birds are taken with it, there is none but ſome certain ill-conditioned Owls, which eſcape from it.

Natural gratitude, excellent proofs of it. Elian. lib. cap. 22. Plin. l. 10. cap. 5. Elian. lib. 2. cap. 3.

Interroga jumenta, & docebunt te: & volatilia agri, & indicabunt tibi. Agnovit bos poſſeſſorem ſuum, & aſinus præſepe Domini ſui: Iſrael autem non me cognovit. Iſaiah 1.

Noblemen, will you think you do too much, if you ſhould acknowledge the benefits of your Creatour, ſince Beaſts the moſt ſavage recompenſe good turns received from ſlaves, and forgetting their nature cannot but remember a benefit, though ſmall? As for the written Law, what virtue is more often recommended, then gratitude, and thankful acknowledgement? God giveth not any benefits without preparing Monuments. If he deliver his people out of Egypt, a Lamb of Paſs-over, under the title of gratitude, is to be offered for ever: if he give Manna, a Pot thereof is reſerved in the Tabernacle: if he work wonders with Moſes rod, it is preſerved for an eternal memery. Gratitude is the Key of the land flowing with Milk, and Hony; ingratitude is a chanel, from whence all the plagues of heaven pour down upon rebellious, and contumacious heads. Is it not very remarkable, that the Iſraelites were more carefull to carry with them into the deſerts Timbrels to praiſe God with, then Arms to defend themſelves? Praiſes go before curtilaxes, and all warlike engines. The Captains of the valorous Debora are for the ſame cauſe termed in Scripture Notaries, becauſe they went into the war with pen, and ſword. The ſword to fight with, and the pen to write the praiſes of God. If you demand of Rupertus, why in Geneſis, when all creatures are ſpoken of, there is not one word of the ſphere of Fire: he will anſwer you, that Fire, becauſe of its barren unfruitfulneſs, is the ſymbol of ingratitude, and for that purpoſe it is not once mentioned in the place where queſtion was made of the ſacrifice of acknowlegement. If you ask of St. Chryſoſtom, why God, coming to give a Gratitude in the Law of God.

Excellent obſervations upon this. Exaltationes Dei in gutture eorum, & gladii ancipites in manibus eorum. ὀρθρίζοντας ἐν στόμασιν γραμματεῖς. Pſal. 49. Jud. v. 14. Interp. 70. Interpretum à Rupert. in Geneſ.

Law

Law to his people, appeared amongſt Briers, and Thorns, he will tell you, it was to ſhew to this ungrateſull people the deformity of their ingratitude, ſignified by thoſe thorny plants. S. Ambroſe likewiſe obſerveth it was the providence of heaven, to give young Toby an Angel, and a Dog for companions of his voyage. The Angel to do him good offices, and the Dog, who is moſt ſenſibly mindfull, to cauſe him to remember a benefit. See you not the world, and the law are extended, and diſpoſed, one in his creatures, and the other in all his precepts, to impreſs gratitude in our hearts? One of the Antients ſaid, that to die ungrateſull was the moſt infamous death might be imagined. Would you then (Nobles) have your bodies buried in Churches, in places moſt eminent, and conſpicuous, yet ſpare not to make ingratitude a Sepulchre for your ſouls?

Ambr. l. 6. Hexaëm. c. 4.

Marcus Aurel. 1. Antoninus de vita ſua. κάλλιστος ἀλάστωρ.

Add hereunto preſently a conſideration well worthy to be pondered, that by how much the benefits you have received from the liberal hand of Almighty God are great, and glorious, ſo much the more is it a hideous thing, to repay them in the coin of ingratitude. Follow the ſoot-ſteps of the Oracle of Doctours, St. Auguſtine, purſue the practice, which he uſed to enflame himſelf to gratefull acknowledgments. Go ye upon the brink of abyſſes, and ſpeak to Nothing, which is not at all, nor ever was, nor ever ſhall be. Caſt up your age, and demand of it, Where were you ſo many years? It will reply to your heart with dumb words, and tell you, That which you have been, it is. And what have you done to God, to be at this time that, which it is not? Take into your hand a Diamond, it will tell you it hath eſſential being with you, but it liveth not; and what have you done to God to have life above the ſame? Go to Cedars, and Palm-trees, and you ſhall underſtand, they have life common with you, but you ſenſe above them. Under what title was it due to you? With what mony did you purchaſe it? Go to Eagles, and Lions, and they will tell you, they have ſenſe common with you, but you have reaſon, an incomparable good above them: You have judgment, memory, underſtanding, free-will; you are men, and they are beaſts. What have you done to God to be made man? to be a reaſonable creature capable of an infinite good? What have you done before your being, to be that which you are? What ſacrifice have you preſented, being as then in nothing, to be born into the world ſupereminently prelated above all the creatures of the world? Well, admit you had deſerved your being: where have you merited your wel-being? Say you had merited to be men, where have you deſerved to be Chriſtians? to be ſelected by the hand of God from ſo many infinite Nations, which daily people Hell? to be waſhed with the blood of his Son, to be regenerated by the waters of Baptiſm, to be impreſſed with his own ſtamp, to be beautified with his grace, ſupported with his merits, enlightened with his knowledge, protected under his wings, and the ſhelter of his Angels, to have all the means, and opportunity to begin in the world a celeſtial life, and afterward to reign in heaven for ever, and there to remain abſorpt in an ocean of pleaſures, and felicities?

Excellent practice of St. Auguſtine to encourage himſelf to gratitude.

At what price have you bought all that? Are you not a jadiſh Mule to ſuck ſuch a Teat, and then to kick with your heels?

Particular obligations of Noblemen.

But you ſay, it is common to you with all Chriſtians. I anſwer, the Sun is no leſs the Sun to you, for that it enlighteneth the eyes of a Piſmire. But behold what perſonally toucheth you, and that which you cannot forget without diſloyal ingratitude.

Nature hath caſt all men in one, and the ſame mould, all are equal according to birth, all equal in death, who uſeth to meaſure with the ſame ell Linſy-woolſey, and cloth of Tiſſue. But what inequality is there in the conditions of life? It ſeemeth when the courſe of each man's eſtate, and fortune is well conſidered, there is more difference between man, and man, then between man, and beaſt.

How many creatures are born ever in the fetters of miſerable ſervitude, and ſalute life with a yoak on their neck? And behold you are not onely born free, but Noble, but great, but eminent, you come into the world like Diadumenus, with a diadem of honour on your foreheads.

How many do you behold born with very great diſproportion of body, with bunched backs, crookedneſs, maladies, deformities, which they are enforced to carry with them from their mothers womb to their grave? And behold you are born with a body well-compoſed, that nature hath framed to ſerve as a Cabinet for the ſoul, which God would lodg in.

How many ſtupid, groſs, and obſcure ſpirits, unjoynted judgments, irregular brains are there in the world? And yet God hath given to you a ſpirit capable of all kind of lights, knowledges, a judgment well-grounded, a faithful memory, and all the moveables of a fair ſoul. How many children come into the world as little abortives, and are afterward left without inſtruction, guid, or conduct, as lees, and dregs of the creatures of the earth? And behold how all things co-operate to your education.

How many millions of mortals daily diſſolve into poverty, in a wretched, and needy life, in extream miſeries, which make them feed upon gall, and every day to drench part of their life in tears? And behold you are born to great patrimonies, infinite riches, large revenues; behold not onely men, and beaſts, but all the elements alſo are kept in breath to contribute to your ſervices, your magnificence, your felicities, your delights.

How many are at the foot of the wheel, trampled on, and oppreſſed under the tyrannie of men, many times more cruel then wilde, and ſavage beaſts? And behold you are on the top of the wheel, behold you are upon the higheſt ſpheres of honour, feared of your enemies, cheriſhed by your equals, adored by your inferiours; doth this ſeem nothing to you? Or if it ſeem fit to you, to caſt it up with your accompt, tell me if you have it from your ſelves? Tell me if you were, before your being, able to merit all theſe favours from Heaven?

Take now the balance your ſelf, and judg, if it be not a looſe, and barbarous ingratitude to ſteal the ſilver, and gold of God to make Idols to Baal; to light your lamp at the Altar-fire of the Omnipotent, to make pillage afterward of his Temple; to take bread from the Maſter of the houſe with one hand, and to ſtab him with the other? And this is it, which you do, when you wholly abuſe all theſe gifts of Heaven in impiety, injuſtice, ambition, luſt, envie, rage, in a brutiſh, and ſtinking life. This is it, which bringeth aſtoniſhment even to the gates of heaven, and cauſeth the heavenly Father to ſpeak theſe lamentable words of Jeremie: How comes it to paſs that my wel-beloved hath commited ſo many outrages in my houſe? Have I then (O my beloved) lodged thee in my Temple, have I nouriſhed, and bred thee from thy Cradle with a fatherly hand, to betray mine honour, and defile the glory of my Altars? See you not that in doing this you weave the thread of your eternal ruin?

Weigh

Weigh ſeriouſly (O Noblemen) what you are, what you can, what you have, what you are worth, and in good time take hold of this Maxim, not to deſire to be, nor to be able, nor to be valued, but for him, to whom you ow all your being.

The eleventh REASON,

Drawn from the effect, which examples ſhould produce.

ON what ſide ſoever I turn me (O you Great-ones) I find motives for you in every place of duty, ſpurs of honour, and inevitable obligations of virtue. Behold one of the moſt principal, to wit, Example: Yea, the example of great men is one of the moſt potent charms, as well for good, as ill, that may poſſibly be found in nature. See you not how the ſpirit of lies, who keeps an open ſhop of all wiles, and active pliantneſs, hath not found in all hell an engin better able to ingulph mankind in a thouſand lamentable confuſions, then to ſet before him the bad example of great-ones, who by cunning ſleight, and tyrannie came to that height as to cauſe themſelves to be accompted as God? Satan, having ſet them upon the Altar, puts himſelf in poſſeſſion of their hearts: for coming to ſhew to theſe blind idolaters an adulterous Jupiter, an unchaſt Venus, a bloudie Mars, he whiſpered in their ears, The God, whom you adore, and for whom you erect Temples, and Altars, hath done this, and that, and are you better then he not to do the ſame?

The world heretofore perverted by the example of great-ones.

Depraved nature, which no ſooner hath being, but that concupiſcence entereth thereinto, being already vehemently tranſported into exorbitancy by general inclination, and coming afterward to feel the ſwinge of this ſo alluring example (in thoſe, who were not onely eſteem'd great, but Gods immortal) ran to miſchief with full ſpeed, erected trophies of its own diſhonour, and covered its ulcers with a golden veil.

Julius Firmicus de errore profan. Religion. Adulterio delectatur quis? Jovem reſpicit, & inde cupiditatis ſuæ fomenta conquirit: probat, imitatur, & laudat, quod Deus ſuus in Cygno fallit, in Tauro rapit, ludit in Satyro.

The great wit Julius Firmicus, hath excellently well obſerved this reaſon in the book he compoſed of the errours of profane Religions. "Is man an adulterer? He caſteth his eye upon Jupiter, and "draweth from the Idol of his falſe God the enkindling tinder of his luſt. He approveth, he imitateth, he praiſeth his God, becauſe he deceiveth "a ſimple credulous maid in the figure of a Swan, "raviſheth another in the form of a Bull, and afterward in another encounter perſonateth the "ſhape of a Satyre.

Tyrannie of Example.

What may be ſaid more of the force, and tyranny of example, then to ſay with St. Auguſtine: Not onely the vitious purſue vice in full ſpeed, which lead the way, but even thoſe, who have the fillet of ſhame-fac'dneſs upon their brows, ſuffer themſelves haſtily to run after the torrent of examples, and ſuppoſe to have a portion in the fortune of great men, when they have a ſhare in their vices. I heard my companions, who boaſted their wickedneſs, making themſelves ſo much the more glorious, by how much they were more beaſtly, and diſhoneſt. And needs would I do as they, not ſo much through appetite of doing ill, as for complacence to be applauded for ill. It often happened to me to counterfeit the ill, which I had not done, doubting to be innocent, for fear of being reputed a man of no worth, and loth to be eſteemed chaſt, leſt chaſtity ſhould make me contemned by the world.

Aug. Conſeſ. 2. c. 3. Audiebam eos cantantes flagitia ſua, & tanto gloriantes magis, quanto magis turpes eſſent: & libebat facere, non ſolum libidine facti, verum etiam laudis: fingebam me feciſſe quod non fecerim, ne viderer abjectior, quo eram innocentior, & ne vilior haberer, quia eram caſtior.

Importance of the example of Noble-men.

Behold, O Noblemen, what power Example exerciſeth upon the hearts of men. Blame none but your ſelves, if you create not a new world, that you baniſh not vice from the earth, and make a golden Age return again. God hath planted you upon the higheſt ſteps of greatneſs, and cauſeth you firſt of all to ſee the ſtorm, and calm. God hath planted you with his hand as ſtars in this goodly firmament of honour, upon your influences depend the whole courſe of this inferiour world. If they be good, they bring health, ſolace, and life into the whole world. The people are as the ſea, and you are the winds, which raiſe, or depreſs them when you pleaſe. The people are like the Polypus, who changeth colour according to the diverſity of objects; and you are the rocks, to which he is tied with a long chain of ſervitude; you take his liberty, and give him colour. The people is as Ivie, which creepeth, and clingeth according to his ſupport; you are the Coloſſus, and walls, which under-prop it. The people hath a heart of wax, and clay, and you are the Maſter-potters to give what proportion you pleaſe. A good Prince ſheweth the way of doing well to his ſubjects, in well doing himſelf, and though he be great by the title of power, he is much greater, and more potent by the force of example.

Velleius. Facere reſte cives ſuos Princeps optimus faciendo docet, cumque ſit imperio magnus, exemplo magis eſt.

Hereupon, I leave you to judg the great offence you commit, when by ill example you make vice to paſs for law, vice, which would have no force, nor vigour at all, if you did not give arms, and weapons into its hand, to ſack, and ſubjugate all the world.

Great ſin through bad example.

Firſt, you commit a great ſacrilege abuſing authority, which is a ray of the omnipotencie of God, impreſſed on your inferiours to duty; and you make boaſt as if it came from your ſelves. Thieves, that you are of the treaſure of God; you have rifled the chief of his coffers, which is that abſolute power, by which he is God; you have taken from thence a pearl, which himſelf afterwards enſigned into your hands, which himſelf fixed upon your head, to give you, as it were, a participation of his own eſſence, and you unworthily retain it, without making it tributary to its Creatour. My God it is true, that he, who ſeeketh his own glory from thine ornaments, is a very thief, and a robber, who endeavouring to filch God's honour from him ſtealeth Paradiſe from himſelf. What ſacrilege, I pray, can you think comparable to this?

Aug. Sol. 5. Qui de bono tuo gloriam ſibi quærit, & non tibi quærit, hic fur eſt, & latro.

Ill example the work of Antichriſt.

Secondly, what an indignity it is to do that, which the ill example of Great-ones operateth, ſo to put vice into grace, and virtue into neglect? Think you not, if proof be made unto you, it is the work of Antichriſt, but that will ſuffice to make you deteſt it? And what will Antichriſt do? To what will he bend, and diſpoſe all the ſinews, and arteries of his power, but to ſet vice on the Altar; and you will beforehand prepare a way for him? All that, which Jeſus Chriſt hath ſaid, and done, all that which he hath ſweat for, all that he endeavoured, all that he hath wept, all that he hath bled, he hath done to blot out, and extinguiſh with works, with words, with ſweat, with tears, with bloud, the work of ſin.

And you, forſooth! will again erect the ſtatues. If ſin coming from you were eſteemed as ſin, it would always be unreaſonable, but leſs dangerous. But now it happeneth not to be ſo reputed. The ſins, which in a mean fortune would be thought ſins, when they are dreſſed up with a diadem; or covered with a ſcarlet cloak, become the virtues of the times: which is a thing moſt abominable. And by your ill example you are the cauſe of this illuſion of man-kind, which holdeth vice for virtue, and crime for trophie. Obſerve what puniſhment a falſe coyner deſerveth. Adviſe with your ſelf, if Idolatrie be the firſt, and chief of all ſins, what would he merit, who were not onely an Idolater, but the authour, and inventour of a new idolatrie?

Definunt eſſe probri loco purpurea flagitia.

And

And bad example doth it. When you, O Noblemen, degenerate, you impress sin with the stamp of virtue, you place it upon the Altar, you are the cause that a thousand, and a thousand present oblations to it; you make a stable for horses of the Temple of Honour, and you being by the world esteemed as little gods, employ all this reputation to destroy the honour of the true God, through the example of your wicked life. You make a dung-hill of Heaven, you cruelly, and miserably dragging wandring souls through headlong precipices, when to cause them to sin the more freely, you shew them the examples of the petie gods of the earth. These are the words of Julius Firmicus. What ingratitude will make Heaven blush, and the earth to shake, if not this? If you well weigh this consideration, it will never escape you to do an act of ill example, or if passion should happen to be exorbitant, at least you should imitate that bird, which by antiquity was called Just, because she hid her excrements, which she knew to be very pernicious, for fear they should infect men; so you rather should bury your ill deportments in night, and obscurity, then expose them to publick view.

Cœnum de cœlo facitis, & errantes animos per abrupta precipitia crudeli calamitate ducitis; cùm hominibus peccare volentibus facinorum viam de Deorum monstratu exemplis. Julius Firm. Photius in Bibliotheca.

For the third reason, consider what wickedness it is to thrust the knife into the throat, not onely of a multitude, that adores your fortune, and glorieth in the imitation of your vices, but also to pollute all posterity with the authority of your crimes. Every Age teacheth us, we may do what hath been done, and crimes become examples, saith the eloquent St. Cyprian. Your sin is like much rust, which cleaveth close to all your successours, and how much the greater you are, so much the more precipitation, and malice it hath.

Admonetur omnis ætas fieri posse quod aliquando factum est; exempla fiunt, quæ jam esse facinora desiterunt. Cyprian. ad Donat.

Say not, you are personally culpable, and no more; that you are not to answer to God, either for the sin of those who live with you, or those that come after you.

Eccl. 1. Sicut aramentum arbiginat ne quitia.

Which is so much otherwise, that the Scripture ordaineth, who shall open a common cistern without shutting it again, if it happen that cattle fall therein, he was bound to repair this loss. Your brother doth he not more nearly approach to God then a bullock, or a horse? You have opened to him the gulf of scandal, and corruption, he is fallen into your snares, you shall give an accompt to God for a soul redeemed with the price of his blood.

Figure of ill example. Exod. 21.

Exod. 22.

Although you have caused but one small spark of fire to flie out, if it happen to blast, and burn the fruitful fields, and destroy the corn of your neighbour, you are bound by the law to make the possessour satisfaction. A flashing sparkle of concupiscence which proceedeth from your eyes, and afterwards enkindleth a great fire of vices, and calamities, shall be imputed to you in the day of judgment. And what satisfaction for such damage?

But on the contrary (O Noblemen) when you seriously embrace virtue, you ravish, and appease the most savage spirits by your authority. Nothing resisteth this sweet violence. Goodness born in the Chariot of greatness hath darts so sharp, and flaming, that they make the flint-stones to melt. The present times invite you, the most distant admire you, all posterity blesseth you, and God most gloriously crowneth you.

Plin. lib. 12. cap. 24. Rain-bow upon flowers.

It is said when the Rain-bow in Heaven boweth his crooked horns directly upon the flowers, he imparteth to them a most celestial odour, which infinitely reviveth their kind. God hath fixed you in the sphere of greatness, as heavenly arches; you know from whence he hath extracted you, and that no otherwise, then the Rain-bow in Heaven; you are but a petty vapour, but this Sun hath guided you, enriched you, enameled you with so many perfections, that justly we may call you the children of admiration. Be you then to mankind that, which the Rain-bow is to plants; leave it to the order of a good conversation, which may become natural, you shall reap here below true and solid glory, contentments so tasteful, that a man may more easily feel them then express them; and in Heaven your recompense shall be equalled to the profit, which your example shall have made on earth.

I know not what may be produced more pressing to a generous heart, to oblige him to perfection.

The twelfth REASON,

Drawn from punishment.

Clemens Alex. Strom. 5.

Clemens Alexandrinus observeth, that the belief of one God, and the faith of one judgment, are in the soul of man by like consequence necessary; and that the Heathens in the dead obscurity of infidelity were not able to shut their eyes against this veritie.

There is no soul in the world so barren, which by force of the light of nature conceiveth not, that if there be certain rays, or reflections of virtue diffused through the actions of men, the same ought to be in God, as in their source, with a radiant lustre of supereminence. Wherefore? Because, as Dionysius Areopagita saith, in the book of divine attributes, God is a great Thesis, which hath but one word for expression, but this draweth along with it all essences, verities, and perfections. And for the same cause St. Augustine calleth this Sovereign Majesty Bonum omnis boni. Now so it is, that we behold shining in men (though otherwise very imperfect) certain traces, or draughts of Justice, and we observe they are naturally addicted to the love of this virtue, were it not that passion maketh them belie their hearts, and betray their own nature. We must then necessarily conclude, that Justice is in God, as water in the Fountain, lines in the center, and beams in the Sun.

God a great Thesis. Θεὸς ἐστι νόησις θέσις. St. Dionys. de divin. nominib. c. 2. August. de Trinit. l. 8. c. 3.

Justice, and mercy.

Justice, and Mercy are the two arms of God, which embrace, bear, and govern the whole world; they are the two engins of the great Archimedes, which make Heaven descend upon earth, and earth mount to Heaven. It is the base and treble-string of this great lute of Heaven, which makes all the harmonies, and tuneable symphonies of this Universe.

Now, as Mercy is infinite, so is Justice. The divine Essence holdeth these two perfections, as the two scales of the balance, always equally poized. Judg hereupon, O Noblemen, if the favours, and mercies of God are so eminent with you, what part shall Justice have amongst you?

Psal. 89. Quis novit potestatē iræ tuæ, aut præ timore tuo iram tuam dinumerare? Sap. 6. Horrendè citò apparebit vobis, quoniam judicium durissimum his qui præsunt fiet. Exiguo enim conceditur misericordia, potentes autem potenter tormenta patientur. Non

David, who had felt the scourges, cried out as in a deep extasie, Oh my God, who can be able to know the force of thy anger! Who can be able, amongst so many perplexities, and affrightments, to recompt the effects of thy indignation! True it is, thy Justice doth most extraordinarily appear on the rebellious heads of sinners, but especially upon the Great-ones of the earth. These words of the Wise-man are terrible to any that will maturely consider them: "You, "who hold the highest place amongst men, and live "without fear or aw of that Majestie, which hath con- "stituted you where you are, know God will visit "you, and appear to you with speed, and horrour. "A most rigorous judgment shall be executed on "those who command over others. Mercy is for "the little ones, and humble; but if you persevere "in your wicked life, as being potent, you shall "powerfully be tormented. God is not a man to

"sooth

"sooth you, to distinguish your persons, and treat "with you, with observance of your qualities. Beware. The reasons why the chastisement of great men shall be more severe, are clear, and evident, the principal whereof I will briefly here produce.

Unius substrahet personam cujusquam Deus, nec verebitur magnitudinem cujusquam.

Knowledg of good and evil makes the sin the more foul.

First, by how much the more a sin is committed with exact knowledge of good, and ill, so much the more punishable it is, because it participateth the more of the venom of malice. Ignorance unto many is part of their Sanctity, others with open eyes run headlong to ruin. Now, can it be denied, but that Great-men (ordinarily being endowed with good spirits, capable judgments, and most happy memories, and they instructed by so many Doctours, both speaking, and dumb) should have much more light, and knowledge then the ordinary sort of men. Behold, why degenerating, it cannot be but they must needs break a thousand bonds that held them in their duty, blunt a thousand sharp points, a thousand inspirations from Heaven, that feelingly touch their conscience, the which cannot be done without great, and determinate malice, which rendreth their sin the more enormous, and their heads the more punishable. This is the reason Divines give touching the punishment of the Angel apostate. A strange thing, that God coming from Heaven upon earth, to take humane flesh, to distend his Imperial Robe upon mane (who lay on a dung-hil) drawing him out, washing him, gilding him over with grace, (the true seed of glory) in the mean time left the bad Angel without mercy, for a prey of punishment, which shall not end no more then God himself. Wherefore is this, but that the Angel offended with an absolute, and deliberate malice, as one much more illuminated, and Adam suffered himself to slide into sin rather by surprizal, by infirmity, by complacence to the humours of his Wife, as St. Augustine observeth, then purposely, or contemptuously? Alas! methinks this horrid punishment of the contumacious Angel should make the blood congeal in the veins of all the Great-ones of the earth, who offend their Creatour with as much malice as they have knowledge. Ask (O Noblemen) of the Divine Justice, from whence it proceedeth, that these evil spirits have been so roughly handled? If beauty could mollifie the rigour of a Judge, they were adorned with an incomparable beauty above all creatures. If the excellency of nature be esteem'd, they were the most lively Images of the Divinity, amongst all things created. If the spirit contribute thereunto, they penetrated, by their active vivacity, even from Heaven to the deepest abyss. If the glory of God were in this act considerable, they were creatures, who could love, bless, and glorifie God eternally. If evil had been to be prevented, this great Judge saw there would arise from their damnation an infinite of blasphemies, and invincible obstinacy, a long web of contrarieties, opposite to the advancement of his honour amongst men, a subversion of the world. All this might have been avoided in giving them one small hour of repentance; which with what fervour, detestation, and dolour would they have embraced? Yet notwithstanding, without regard to this beauty, this grace, this excellency of nature, these praises, this good, or ill, behold them taken in the boiling ardour of their crime, strucken with the thunder of the Divine Justice, thrown down, broken in shivers, captivated in prisons of fire, left to the sword of vengeance, to eternal tortures, never seeing amidst their darkness, and sulphurous flames, one sole beam of the eyes of Mercy. O terrible sentence! inexorable sentence! O unhappy spirits! O judgements of God! What a terrour, what a bottomless depth you are! Judge now (O ye Great-men) if the crimes of knowledge, and malice are so rigorously punished, what will become of you, if you live neglective of the Divine Majesty, you being among the people, as were the Angels among other creatures?

Why bad Angels were punished without mercy.

Ob perfectam cognitionem, & subitum animi impetum peccatum Angelorum incomparabiliter gravius. Vide Greg. lib. 4. Moral. cap. 9.

Marvellous Justice.

Secondly, no punishment is more sharply, nor lawfully inflicted, then upon the ungratefull, who deserve that all the elements with their best forces should conspire in the avengement of their offences, since they violate a law engraven on this universe by the hand of nature. Their punishment is the sacrifice of jealousie, spoken of in Scripture, whereon neither Oil, nor Incense is powred: there is no more Oil of mercy to sweeten their torments, no more Incense of prayers to appease, God's anger; nothing is there but thunder, lightnings, and vengeance. Now it appeareth, that Noblemen, and Great-ones cannot depart from the service of God, without a deep mark of ingratitude, for the benefits, which I have touched before; and you thereon will necessarily infer, they transcending others in condition should not in case of failing, or neglect, expect an equality of punishments, God will call Heaven, and Earth to their Judgement, and then speak to them in the presence of all creatures, with a voice of thunder. Hearken ye (O you Princes of the earth) I made you as Eagles, I gave you strong wings to lift you up to mount Libanus, and to extract pith from the Cedars. I advanced you in spirit, in judgment, in courage, in riches, in reputation, in honour above other men. I imprinted the rays of my power upon your fronts, to infuse the regard of your persons into the hearts of the people. I held heaven, and earth, men, and beasts in breath, to contribute to your authority, and services. And you have taken arms employing all my treasures to make War against me, you have lived, not as reasonable men, but as brute beasts without God, without law, without ever casting your eyes to Heaven, but to vomit out blasphemies in the face of it. If I have put power into your hand, you have employed it in oppressing the weak: If Justice, you have perverted the use of it, and made the balance incline to the tyranny of your passions. What can such an ingratitude expect? I leave the conclusion to your selves.

Punishment of the ungratefull sacrifice of jealousie.

Non fundet oleum, nec imponet thus. Num. 5.

Horrible execrations of God upon great men vitious.

In the third place, seeing the bad example of great men is most pernicious to the inferiours, by the strength of their Authority (which draweth their weak souls to a servile imitation) God expresly counterpoiseth the insolence of their vices, by singular, and remarkable punishments, to the end that those, who are attracted by the lustre of their fortune, may be affrighted with their falls. It is true, we are in this world, as Owls in the night, our eyes benummed, and surcharged with terrestrial humours, which hinder us throughly to penetrate this cloud of the Divine Providence. Notwithstanding, God darteth forth, as it were, out of these clouds certain flashing sparks of fire, and light, to make you read in the punishment of so many ill-living great men the unrelenting rigour of his justice.

Exemplar crimes deserve exemplar punishment.

High Steeples are not so often rent, and defaced by the violence of thunder, as are Crowns, and Diadems on the heads of wicked Princes with Heaven's chastisements. Read sacred, and profane Stories, what strange punishments are there of great men? One sheweth a desire to leap into Heaven, to plant his Throne among the Stars, yet God maketh him eat Hay with the Beasts, enforcing him to die alive, not onely to honours, and the nature of man, but to lead lead a life in brutishness. This was Nebuchadnezzar. Another in the middest of the fervour of a feast heareth the great clock strike his hour, and seeth the hand of a man on the wall, drawing a dreadful sentence against him. This was Belshazzar. Another dieth eaten up with lice, as Herod. Another loathsom with infections, as Antiochus. Another hanged on a tree, as Absalom. Another on the gibbet, which he had prepared for him, whom he accompted for his slave, as Haman. Another dying by his own hand, not being able to find any other in the world more cruel then himself, as Nero. Another maketh himself a Sepulchre with drunkenness, as Alexander. Another is massacred in the midst of the Senate, as Cæsar. Another from the Throne of the Romane Empire goeth to prostrate his so, the Persian, to become thereby a foot-step for him to mount on horse-back, as Valerian. Another is carried about in a Cage, as Bajazet. Another is strucken with lightening, as Anastasius. Another is slain in his Camp by an hand invisible, as Julian the Apostate. Great Volumns might be made, if one would compile all these mortalities; they make Theatres to resound, and Tragedians deplore.

Strange punishments.

Consider (O Noblemen) if in this world good and ill are given to us as it were in picture, (since the figure of the world passeth away, saith the Apostle) and since God useth such rough rods to chastise the vices of Great-men, what will that be in the other world? The arrows of chastisement do presently pass away, but the voice of thunder, the sentence of judgment shall go like a wheel, and the execution shall have no end. If there happen unto you a loss of goods, it is an arrow that passeth; loss of children, an arrow that passeth; sickness, an arrow that passeth; disgrace, an arrow that passeth; temporal death, even a feathered-arrow, which doth nought else but pass away: but eternal death is the thunder in the wheel, which never passeth. To be drenched in a lake of Sulphur as a victime of vengeance in a fire enkindled with the breath of God's anger, to see nothing but Devils, to abide in nothing but Torments, to suffer pains in every sense, to finde Hell in his own conscience, to have no other life but an eternity of torments, is a thing to be feared above all things most dreadful.

Praterit figura hujus mundi. 2. Cor. 7.

Sagitta tua transierunt; vox tonitrui tui in rota. Psal. 76. 19.

Paulus Orosius, in the History he dedicated to St. Augustine, observeth that the tracks of Pharaoh's Chariots, after his detestable death, remained a long time upon the sands of the Red-Sea, to serve as an example for posterity. Behold (O Noble-men) the bloudy foot-steps of so many, and so many Great-ones, who have gone before you, whose spoils are perhaps (as yet) in your hands, their bodies in putrefaction, and their souls in torments! Resemble not those, that pillaged the Souldiers of Sennacherib, who, strucken with the revengeful hand of Heaven, found men of ashes in golden arms; they took the gold, without thinking at all of the ashes, which scattered by the ways. Take good heed, how you suffer your selves to be deceived with the glimmer of the honours of these ill-living Great-ones, lest you be surprized with their death, and Catastrophe. The day of death will come, be it sooner, or later, the post is on the way, who bringeth the date hereof. If you have lived ill, a thousand terrours, a thousand frightful fantasies will then besiege your heart, altogether drenched in the bitterness of death. A tumultuous army of thoughts shall strike an alarm to your repose: some shall represent unto you your goodly palaces, many times cemented with the blood, and sweat of poor men, which you must forsake, and pay all in one gross sum; others all the goods, which you shall have invaded, either by violence, or subtilty, whereof you shall be stript, and shall go to the judgment of God, devoid of riches, and surcharged with accompts: others shall decipher unto you the follies of your youth: others will depaint unto you the day of Judgment, and Hell, before you sensibly make proof of them. The Lady, which sleepeth by your sides, and ever holdeth the fire, and spur in your hearts, moving you to new violences, and extortions, to foment her pride, and entertain her pompous vain-glory, shall leave you then to wrestle with death, and shall seek the safety of her own affairs. Your eldest Son, for whom you presently pawn your soul to all in justice, and exhaust your own abilities as the Spider, to make him great, shall willingly outrun the steps of death to close your eyes, and scarcely shall there be found in the house some poor old woman to shrowd your body in a winding-sheet, to be put into a Coffin. In the mean while, the soul, separated from the body, shall be presented to the judgment of God, to receive the inevitable sentence.

Alass! doth he not sleep a long and deadly sleep, who is not awakened with the sound of such a trumpet?

State of worldlings

Desperate death.

Paul. Oros. l. 1. c. 10. Chariots of Pharaoh.

The thirteenth REASON,

Taken from Reward.

AN Antient said, that the two most powerfull Deities of Common-wealths were Punishment, and Reward. These are likewise are the two bases, and, as it were, the two fundamental laws, upon which God the Creatour hath established the Policy of the Universe. As he is a severe Revenger of offences, so he is most liberal in Rewards. The Scripture teacheth us this in very remarkable terms, speaking of the Justice of God, and gives it him in strict measure, when there is no question of chastisement, as if it were an act disproportionable to his nature, and his ordinary practice. But when he is actually disposed to pardon a sin, to reward a good work, to crown a virtue, he poureth out his graces, as out of a golden tunnel, with a free, and plenteous provision. For the same reason the Prophet Isaiah saith, He measureth the waters with his fist, and poyseth the heavens with his palm; that is to say, he giveth chastisements, and afflictions, signified in the Scripture by the Waters, with a sparing, and close hand, but as concerning rewards, represented by the Heavens, he pours them on all parts, with his sacred, and bounteous hands. Fear not then (O Noblemen) that you, having vowed a faithfull service to your great Master, shall be in any kind frustrated of the recompense, which he hath established for his servants. He hath always the reward in his hands. If he present on one side the Sword of Justice to sinners, on the other he extends unto you the Olive of Peace and benignity. Figure to your selves the great Emperor, bearing in his Arms an Eagle with two heads, who in one beak held a Thunder-bolt, and in the other a branch of Palm, with this Motto, Every one in his time. God runneth the same course; if he hath Thunder bolts to crush rebellious heads, he hath Palms to crown the faithfull services, which men of quality render to him. And without speaking here of rewards (O Noblemen) common to you with others, if you be constantly ranged in the way of virtue, you shall find that God will liberally give you three things, which those of your condition ever hold in great esteem. And what are those? A house competently rich, a solid glory, a flourishing Punishment, and Reward, Deities of the Common-wealth.

Miserationes ejus super omnia opera ejus. Psal. 144.

Justice by weight, Mercy infinite.

Pondus, & statera, judicia Domini.

Ponam in pondere judicium, & justitiam in mensura. Prov. 6. Isaiah 28.

Joel 2. Effundam de Spiritu meo super omnem carnem.

Isaiah 40. Qui mensus est pugillo aquas, & palmo cælos ponderavit.

Merces mea mecum est. Apoc. 22.

Ἐν καιρῷ ἕκαστον. Maximil. ii. apud Typotium.

Three sorts of Great men, make fortunes.

posterity, and how is that? Amongst those, who enjoy great fortunes, some build like Moths, others like Swallows, the rest like Halcyons. Those build like moths, who raise houses of injustice, and iniquity, which, in the same proportion as they are reared to the Clouds, unperceivably sink into Hell, wear, waste, and in the end quite vanish away. This is the goodly consideration of holy Job, speaking of the palace of the wicked: He hath built his house as the moth. And how doth she build? With destroying. You will say this little creature, harboured in some cloth, or old garment, maketh much adoe, he gnaweth, and gnaweth day, and night, as endeavouring to build a lodging for himself, and in gnawing discovereth himself; the end of his travel is his loss, and nakedness. O, how divine is the Scripture, to represent so natively to us the blindness of the great, and rich of this world, who suppose they can make magnificent, and happy houses without the Foundation of the fear of God!

Job 27.18. Ædificavit sicut tinea domum suam.

House of the Moth.

All in doing this build as the Moth, that is to say, in gnawing; they have plots, and designes in the Country, in the Citie, in every place they have Overseers, and Architects; they employ the Mason, the Carpenter, they raise houses of pleasure, they make Magazins fretted with gold, and silver, they buy, they purchase, they contrive in their imaginative brains their rents, and revenues, and measure all things with the ell of eternity. Notwithstanding, one would be amazed to see, that all this goodly building of fortune, composed of injustice, concussions, and rapines, cemented together with the sweat, and blood of the poor, falleth by little and little into ruin; and when this cometh into the judgment of God, the fooliſh moth, who hath so gnawn, to feed, and cover himself, findeth himself naked, hungrie, ashamed, and extreamly miserable.

House of Swallows.

Those build like Swallows, who also much labour to erect houses, but with little succes of fruit for posterity. Swallows, after they have well built in Summer, forsake us in Autumn, and leave no other memory of, them but of morter, straw, and dung: so, many Noblemen oft-times build palaces, make huge purchases, and that with unspeakable industrie, but because they proceed therein with sinister and impure intentions, God suffereth not their posterity to enjoy it. We see houses emptie as Swallows nests in Autumn. Some men will ask, who built this house? Answer will be made, such a one, a Mushrome of the Court, coming from nothing in one night, in all other things faithless to God, and men, who hath not left any thing memorable behind him but his vices; and thus all the fame of this man consisteth in picking of straws, which are temporal riches scattered here and there, and in the dung of an ill name, which he leaveth to posterity. Behold an aim ill taken, for the raising of fortunate buldings!

House of Halcyons.

But as for you (O virtuous Noblemen) God permitteth you to build as Halcyons. How is that? Two notable properties are observed in the nest of the Halcyon. The first is, that the architecture of it is so strong, so durable, it cannot be broken, or cut, even with the violent stroak of iron. The second, that it is so proportioned to the bird, as if it were sowed to her body, in such manner that no creature can therein be received but the Architect himself. Justly behold the conditions, which God hath given to your houses, when they are built upon the fear of his holy Name. They are strong, of force, lasting against all the strokes of fortune, nor is there any violence, which can open them to destroy them. It is the infallible promise of God: The house of the wicked shall be demolished, but the tabernacles of the just shall flourish. Moreover they have a certain benediction, which disposeth all things in good order, the rule of expense proportioned to the quality of their persons, the Oeconomie sage, and prudent, in such sort, that all things are managed there with measure, and compass, as in the Halcyon's nest. And, as an ancient Writer hath said, order is the world of worlds, which retaineth all things in their lustre, and uniteth them with a seam, and lasting band, when once it is fixed in the families of Great-ones, which happeneth by the means of piety, where it always produceth the same effects, which it doth in this great Universe.

Domus impiorum delebitur, tabernacula verò justorum germinabunt. Prov. 12.7.

The second reward is the honour so much desired by noble spirits. It falleth out, that the wicked are sometimes raised to the greatness of the world: but they are therein as Comets, as stars of mud and earth, who taking a false lustre make shew for a time in the air of vanity; and afterwards they are scattered, casting pestilence, and poison into the four quarters of the world. On the contrary, real Noblemen are like true stars planted, and enchased by the hand of God, even in the firmament of honour, to enlighten an eternity. Their glory is fixed with nails of adamant. Calumnie may perhaps shake it, but never overthrow it; yea, time it self confesseth, that there is neither pincers, nor hammer can work this effect. It is God, that promiseth this: Whosoever shall glorifie me, I will glorify him; and those which despise me, shall become ignoble. Hereupon judg, how solid the honour of Great-men truly virtuous is, since it is fastened to the honour of God himself, who glorieth in honouring them. A thousand, and a thousand Princes, and phantastick great Ladies have galloped honour upon the full speed, and with a discomposed spirit have invented imaginary forms to find credit, and admiration in the hearts of men. Some have caused Mountains, and rocks to be cut to raise statues to themselves; as Semiramis. Others have taken Crows, Parrats, and other birds, counterfeiting humane speech and have taught them a lesson, which was to salute them as Gods, and afterward enfranchizing them for the open field have sent them into the air to carrie these salutations, and impress in the minds of men a false Idea of their Divinity; so did Psapho.

Quicumque glorificaverit me, glorificabo eum: qui autem contemnunt me, erunt ignobiles 1 Sam. 2. 30.

Fantasies to gain honours.

Others have taken the figures of Eagles, Lyons, and Serpents, (as certain Kings of Egypt) to strike a terrour into the souls of mortal men: others have left Medails, triumphant Arches, Colossuses, goodly Palaces, Theatres, Amphitheatres; as the Romane Emperours: others have placed themselves openly upon Altars; as Caligula, who set the figure of his own head upon the Statue of Jupiter. Posterity hath exploded all this, the times have derided it, oblivion hath swallowed all of them; or if it hath not set its biting tooth therein, it hath been for no other cause, but to leave them to a hateful, and detestable memory, a thousand times worse then forgetfulness. Much otherwise, Great-men, that build their fortunes upon the foundations of the fear of God, from small, and feeble beginnings have come to so high a pitch, that they have replenished all tongues with their praises, all hearts with their admiration, all Ages with the monuments of their glory. For it is God alone, that causeth men to take aims of true, and solid greatness, and who with a puissant arm dasheth, and overwhelmeth those spirits, which suffer themselves to be transported with the torrent of vanity, courting airy smoaks, empty apparences, parences, and flying clouds, whereby they produce monſters inſtead of deſerved honour, ſeated fairly upon the firm rock of conſtancy. God hath in ſuch wiſe ſhewed himſelf to have greatneſs in his own hands, that extracting men from the dregs, and froth of the earth, he hath made them mount ſo high, that oftentimes Imperial heads, radiantly glittering with Rubies, and Diamonds, have bowed under the aſhes of a poor fiſher-man. And who ſeeth not, that the true, and onely mean to enter into the poſſeſſion of honour is ſtraitly to unite ones ſelf with this Divine Majeſtie, from whence on man reflect all the luſtrous rays of greatneſs?

For a third reward, this ſovereign Mover, and Architect of our lives, and fortunes, doth propagate alſo the glory of Fathers to their children, and giveth them a flouriſhing poſterity, which makes them eternally live in the memory of men, by the moſt lively images of their virtues. It is often obſerved, that Noblemen, who have eſtabliſhed tyrannie in the world, have neither been fruitful, nor fortunate in their poſterity; and as nature is ſcantie in the propagation of Wolves deſigned for ſpoil, which otherwiſe would bring all the world into deſolation; ſo Almighty God, by a ſecret œconomie of his divine Providence, permitteth not that great men (who have made themſelves diſturbers of publick peace, and infringers of laws, both divine, and human, whereof they ought to be protectours) ſhould make the brutiſhneſs of their ſavage ſouls to ſurvive them in their poſterity. But as for thoſe, who are arranged in the liſt of ſanctity, and modeſty, God hath (as it were) immortalized their blood in their poſterity, as we ſee it happen in worthy, and illuſtrious families. But to what value amounteth all this, which I have ſaid, in compariſon of that crown of glory, which God placeth on the heads of Noblemen in the other life, when they have virtuouſly governed in this mortal manſion? Oh, what a brave death it is to die under the ſhadow of the Palms of ſo many heroical virtues! Oh, it is the death of a Phœnix, to die in the odours of a holy converſation, to change his ſepulchre into a cradle, and even draw life out of the Tomb! Oh, what an immortality it is, to ſurvive eternally in the mouths of men, but much more to live in Heaven, enjoying the knowlege, love, life, and felicity of God! O Nobles, betake your ſelves betimes, and in a good hour, to the way of this Temple of Honour, by the exerciſe of holy virtues, which are like Elias chariot, all flaming with glory, to carrie your purified ſouls even to the height of the Emperial Heaven.

THE SECOND BOOK.

Of Hinderances, which worldly men have in the way of SALVATION, and PERFECTION.

The firſt OBSTACLE.

Faintneſs, and weakneſs of Faith.

Againſt Atheiſts.

HAving ſufficiently proved the obligations, which Great-ones, and men of quality have to perfection; let us now ſee the hinderances, which may ſtop the increaſe thereof, as well to take from them all pretext of falſe liberty, as to denote the confuſions, very frequent in the corruptions of this Age. The firſt is a certain languor, and debility of faith, which openeth the way to all ſorts of vices; ſo that putting all the greatneſs of the world into a falſe ſeeming, it beholdeth Paradiſe, and all the bleſſings of the other life with blear-eyes, and clouded with a perpetual eclipſe. And that you may well conceive this, let us obſerve, that in this Age, greatly changed by hereſie, liberty, and vice, two ſorts of men are to be ſeen, whereof the one doth ſymbolize with juſt Abel, and the other are of the ſect of Cain. Theſe two brothers began to contend together even in the world's cradle, as Jacob, and Eſau in the belly of Rebecca. Abel had a ſoul impreſſed with a good ſtamp, religious, docile, pure, perpetually fixed in the chaſte apprehenſions of the Divinity. Cain, quite contrary, an impious ſoul, greatly infected with the Serpent's breath, black, variable, wavering in faith, and in the virtue of the Divine providence. He verily is the father of Atheiſts, and St. Bernard hath properly ſaid, He killed faith before he murthered his brother. Procopius calleth him The ſon of the earth, becauſe this unfortunate creature perpetually looked downward, having already, as it were, buried in the tomb of oblivion, the lights, and knowleges of heaven. From thence proceeded the irreverence of his unbridled ſpirit, his wicked ſacrifices, his envie againſt his brother, afterward his fury, murther, and blood, and laſtly a deluge of calamities. The onely example of his diſaſter ſhould ſuffice to terrifie thoſe, who following him in his impiety make themſelves undoubtedly the companions of his misfortune: but ſince it alſo is expedient we proceed herein by diſcourſe, and reaſon, I obſerve the cauſes and remedies of this infidelity. Faintneſs and debility in faith, and conſequently Atheiſm, is formed in three ſorts of conſciences, to wit, the criminal, the brutiſh, the curious. Atheiſm proceedeth from a criminal conſcience, when a ſoul findeth it ſelf involved in a long web of crimes, and as it were overwhelmed in the habits of ſin. In the mean time God doth inwardly torture, prick forward, and ſcourg it, and then all bloody, and ulcerous as it is, not able longer to remain within it ſelf, but taſting ſo many diſturbances in its proper manſion, it ſearcheth evaſions, and ſtarting-holes, expatiateth in the pleaſures, and delights of the world, to diſſolve her many griefs, and findeth in every thing her gnawing worm.

Procop. in Geneſ.

Two ſects of men.

Three ſorts of conſciences, from which impiety ſprings.

Horrible ſtate of a ſinful conſcience.

Bern. ſerm. 24. in Cantic. Fidei ida antequam fratricida.

She

D 2

She looketh back upon the path of virtue, which ſhe hath either forſaken, or never troden, as an impoſſible track, the ſpirit of lies repreſenting it unto her all paved with thorns, and briars: ſhe re-entereth into herſelf, and ſaith in her heart, that there is none but God, who afflicteth her, and that neceſſarily ſhe muſt free herſelf from him; for our felicities are meaſured by the ell of our opinion, and no man is miſerable, but he, that apprehendeth his own unhappineſs. Then, ſoothing herſelf with theſe humane diſcourſes, ſhe herein much laboureth to acquit herſelf from God, from the belief of judgment, of Hell, and the immortality of the Soul. Notwithſtanding ſhe cannot, (albeit theſe wicked ſpirits have ſcoffed at the myſteries of Religion with their companions, as if they would put on a bold fore-head, and an impudence ſtrong enough to endure a ſtroke ſo dreadful) but contend againſt the eſſence of God. Care findeth them in their bed, and is pinned to their ſilken curtains, the thoughts of a Divinity, which they ſuppoſed to have totally baniſhed from their hearts in pleaſures, upon the leaſt afflictions return, and make themſelves felt with very piercing points, which head long throw them into deſpair. The Prophet Iſaiah hath divinely propheſied of ſuch a ſoul: I will make her the inheritance, and poſſeſſion of hedg-hogs. Verily the miſerable caitiff hatcheth in her entrails a thouſand little hedg-hogs, which, as they encreaſe, make their pricks, and darts multiply a thouſand gnawings, a thouſand apprehenſions, as uncapable of repoſe, as apt to afflict a conſcience.

Et ubi Deus non timetur, niſi ubi non eſt? Tert. de Præſcrip. 41. Ponam eam poſſeſſionem ericii; Iſaiah 14. 2.

Such heretofore was the ſtate of Nero: for this barbarous monſter, who ſo often had dipped his hand in blood, ſought out a bath of delights to bath himſelf in; he ran up and down to prie into all the inventions of the pleaſures of the world, to rid himſelf from the arrow, which he had in his heart, and to deſpoil himſelf for ever of an opinion of the Divinity. This was a matter for him impoſſible. When he was at feaſts, ſports, or Theatres, the apprehenſion of God ſtung his heart as a Bee, and there left the ſting. If he ſlept upon roſes, the ſhadows of dead men approached to his downie bed, to require an accompt of their blood. He ſcoffed at Religion, and feared it; one while he deſpiſed ſacred things, and at another time they made him tremble with horrour. He ſought out waters of expiation to waſh his ſins, and never opened his eyes to thoſe, which St. Peter, and St. Paul preſented to him. His Soul was torn with pinters within it ſelf, as on a perpetual ſcaffold of exquiſite torments: when it would iſſue out of it ſelf, it was like a wild Colt, courſed, and chaſed by men, and beaſts; or as a Bull ſtung with a gad-flie, who fain would run from himſelf, yet ſtill findeth himſelf with himſelf. Judg (O Atheiſts) what a life this is?

Condition of Nero.

Brutiſh conſcience. Clemens Alex. Pædag. Plotin. apud Philon. Ψυχαὶ σωμαλοπεπέμφθαι κίνδυνον ἔχουσιν ἀπολυθρωθῆναι. Irreverens, & infruniras animus. Eccl. 23. 6. Lev. 1. 16. Veſiculam gutturu projicies in loco, quo cineres effundi ſolent.

The ſecond cauſe of Atheiſm is the ſenſual love of favours, pleaſures, eaſe, and delights of the world, which often times degenerate into the mere brutiſhneſs of a ſoul, which ſleepeth in fat, and greaſe, ſo intricated, and confounded in earth, that it loſeth all knowledg of Heaven. Clemens Alexandrinus ſaith, that it happeneth to ſouls, which are great lovers of ſenſual pleaſures, to engroſs, and thicken themſelves in ſuch ſort, that, as Plotinus very learnedly writeth, they live not but as a plant. Theſe ſpirits are much enclined to Atheiſm. For, as the Wiſe-man obſerveth, after the concupiſcences of the belly cometh unbrideled irreverence, which ſerveth as an harbinger to impiety. God deſired not, that in offering a bird (as a ſacrifice unto him) the gorge ſhould be preſented, which is the little magazin of the meat, but commanded to caſt it into the aſhes: which is to declare to us, that carnal men are moſt uncapable of celeſtial things, and very fit to be dragged to the dung-hill, and aſh-heap. The more they are affected to things preſent, ſo much the more, yea even in deep draughts, they drink down the forgetfulneſs of Heavenly things. All thoſe ſay with Eſau, To what uſe will this goodly prerogative of primogeniture ſerve me? This title of the children of God, this happineſs of future life? If there be no ſenſual pleaſures, nor carnal contentments in Heaven, I will have none. They become the true diſciples of Mahomet, who, in his Alcoran diſcribing the Turks Paradiſe, placeth there good water, good fruits, rings, carkanets, ſilken tapeſtry hangings, and ſuch like. All theſe things they would enjoy, but the water, which they willingly would change into wine. What ſwine are theſe!

Of. 11. Saturati ſunt, & elevaverunt cor ſuum, & obliti ſunt mei. Geneſ. 25. Quid mihi proderunt primogenita? Alcor. Aazoara 2.

The third cauſe, if not of formal Atheiſm, at the leaſt of weakneſs, and faintneſs in matter of faith, is when a ſoul will proceed in matters of Religion by politick, and humane ways, and ſuffer it ſelf greatly to be pleaſed with curioſitie, which inceſſantly moveth it to draw the curtain of holy myſteries, to enlighten them with the torch of reaſon, and to behold all that paſſeth there. Such ſpirits are not ſo malign, nor ſtupid as the firſt, and ſecond, notwithſtanding they are weak, and very ignorant, ſince they fail in the firſt rule of wiſdom, which diſcovereth to us, that it is an abſolute folly of a diſcompoſed judgment to be deſirous to meaſure things divine, by the rule of ſenſe, and humane experience. They turmoyl themſelves, and bate like a hawk upon the perch, and often ſay in their heart that, which the Apoſtle St. Peter obſerveth in the perſon of infidels: Where are theſe promiſes? Where is the coming of the Son of God? See you not that times revolve, men come, and go, all things have their ordinary courſe; and we muſt expect no other miracle? They imagine that all the counſels of Heaven ſhould turn, and roll according to the projects of their underſtanding, and that if God had his eye open (as it is ſaid) upon the œconomie of the world, both this, and that would ſucceed, as they have contrived in their feeble brain: which is a great illuſion. Such kind of men would willingly ſpeak with ſpirits, to hear them tell tales of the other life, they would know (as St. John Chryſoſtom ſaith) what habit, what cloathing the Son of man weareth, covered under the ſpecies of the Sacrament, how the Angels are formed, of what colour the Devils are, nothing would pleaſe them better then to talk with one really poſſeſſed, to know things future, to divulge predictions, to behold prodigies, and miracles. Briefly, it ſeemeth they have no other purpoſe but to believe in God by the Devil. Such kind of proceedings are very exorbitant, and unfortunate, for the reaſons, which I will preſently produce.

Curious conſcience. Pet. 2. 3. Ubi eſt promiſſio? ubi eſt adventus ejus? ex quo enim dormierunt patres, omnia perſeverant ab initio creaturæ.

Reaſons to ſettle a ſoul. Impious curioſitie pülls out both its eyes.

First, O you wretched ſouls, who betake your ſelves to this way, ſee you not, that by this means you pull out the two eyes, which God hath placed within your ſouls, which are as the Sun, and Moon in the Firmament, to wit, the eye of Faith, and that of natural prudence. You ſeem to your ſelves ſharp, and clear-ſighted, and are more blind then Moles. For tell me, for as much as concerneth the light of nature, can there be found a folly more groſs, and abſurd, then to behold men (who are born, and bred in Chriſtianity, as in their proper element, after a thouſand, and a thouſand witneſſes of the truth of their religion, which even the very marbles do ſpeak, and ſtones proclaim) to make themthemſelves ſo wiſe, and able, as to ſeek out other proofs then thoſe, which have won worlds to the Goſpel? You would have a God, that ſhould give you new ſignes, and tokens, to confirm you in faith; a God, which ſervilely will be captivated to pleaſe the ticklings of your curioſity. Senſeleſs men as you are, this were not to have a God, but a lame Idol. Are you not very blockiſh to treat with God much more wickedly then one would do with a mean man? If you had paſſed your word to two friends, you would praiſe him with all freeneſs, that ſhould reſt ſatisfied therewith, and would condemn the other, whom you ſhould find fearfull, inconſtant, and ever upon miſtruſt: yet would you that God ſhould favour your fidelity by extraordinary ways? What apparency is there for this? All curioſity is damnable, it is an ulcer that ever itcheth, and which without ceaſing is iterated by continual ſcratching, it is as a Horſe-leach, which draweth out all the bad blood, and filleth till it burſt. It is a Magpy, a biting Worm, which taketh men by the ears, as well as Dogs. But above all it is pernicious in matter of Religion. Sixtus, an antient Authour, cited in the Bibliotheke of the Fathers, hath ſpoken a thing very remarkable: When a man ſpeaketh of God, yea, with all verity, we muſt always therein proceed reſervedly, as if we trode upon thorns. It were better (ſaith St. John Chryſoſtom) not to know him, then to know him ill. Heſychius teacheth us, one muſt approach to him as to fire; too great a diſtance maketh us quake with cold, and over-near approaches burn us.

An unworthy way to treat with God.

Inſuſpicabilis ſecreti, reverendæque majeſtatis cognitio eſt Deum noſſe niſi Deum. Tert. Apol. 28.

Curioſity dangerous.

Curioſitas rerum efficit, non peritum. S. Zeno, Serm. 2. de filii gener.

Chryſ. de Fato.

Βέλτιον ἀγνοεῖν καλῶς, ἢ εἰδέναι κακῶς. Sixtus in Biblioth. P P. De Deo etiam vera loqui periculum eſt.

Heſychius in Levitic.

Secondly, judg whether any Body would not ſay, it were a great weakneſs of underſtanding, to be deſirous to proceed in matters of Religion by ſuch knowledges, as are common with brute Beaſts, and forſake thoſe of men? And yet this is it, which you do, when leaving the eye of underſtanding, and the right of a rectified judgment, (which God hath given man by privilege of excellency) you will hear, ſee, and touch, begging a truth from brutiſh ſenſe: which is abſolutely to raiſe them above their reach. See you not how the Moon by her interpoſition eclipſeth the Sun, and when you in matter of faith interpoſe ſenſe, you obſcure the light of judgment (the true Sun of your Soul) which dictateth to you, that it is a thing moſt reaſonable, the creature ſhould ſubmit himſelf to the Creatour; that it careſully keep it ſelf from daring to comprehend him in the univerſality of his nature, and ſhut up this vaſt Ocean in a little Cockle-ſhel. It is a pitifull thing to hear, that theſe curious ſpirits ſhould ſuffer themſelves to be ſurprized by a quack-ſalving Impoſtour, who caſteth miſts before their eyes by force of deluſions, and to contend with God, who giveth them as many obligations, and aſſurances of his promiſes, as there are letters in the Scripture. This is not onely to crack the eye-ſtring of a reaſonable judgment, but alſo to pull out the eye of Faith, all pure, and celeſtial as it is. You demand proofs of your Religion (frantick man) look back upon the birth, the progreſs, and ſtate of the Church. This is the great ſign, the Lady clothed with the Sun, which one cannot be ignorant of without a prodigious blindneſs.

Perverſe proceeding of the wicked.

Deus tot & tantis voluminibus cavet, & debitor non tenetur. Chryſ. Serm. 25. Apocal. 12.

Admit it were nothing to have for proof, ſo great, ſo univerſal, ſo conſtant conſent of all the Prophets, to preſage many Ages before, the effect, the birth, life, death of the Meſſias, the eſtabliſhment of the Church, the converſion of the Gentiles, ſo determinately, and punctually, that even the moſt Diabolical ſpirits, who had from all times theſe Scriptures in their hands, ſeeing this conſequently to happen, which ſucceeded in the Oeconomy of Chriſtianity, were enforced to yield to truth.

Invincible proofs of piety.

That it were nothing to have ſeen through all Ages a thouſand, and a thouſand miracles, in Heaven, in Earth, on the Sea, done in confirmation of Chriſtianity, in the ſight of the moſt witty, and malicious, who bent all their endeavour to cenſure, reject, and contradict them. Notwithſtanding, the evidence was ſo palpable, ſo ſtrong, ſo invincible, that Tyrants, yea, the moſt enraged bloody executioners, convinced with the proofs thereof, let fall the ſword, which they had taken in their hand for the ſlaughter of Martyrs, and ſtretched out their necks to the perſecutours to be beheaded. That it were nothing to tell what a good Authour, upon accompt taken, hath obſerved, that there have been eleven millions of Martyrs of all ſexes, ages, and conditions, who have ſealed the Religion, which we profeſs, by effuſion of their blood, and in this liſt an infinite number of perſons of eminent quality, who conſiderately proceeded in the leaſt occaſions, that have abandoned the eaſefull accommodations of their fortunes, their eſtates, dignities, yea, their Scepters, and Diadems, to deliver as a prey to moſt enormous, and exquiſite torments, a moſt precious life, which they might have led in honour, in reputation according to the world, in pleaſures, in delights, in wonders. That it were nothing to ſay, that after perſecutions there ſprung up an infinity of brave ſpirits, intelligent, clear-ſighted, furniſhed with all ſorts of humane knowledges, as the Juſtins, Tertullians, Cyprians, Auguſtines, and ſo many other of the ſame profeſſion, who, after they had ſeriouſly, and judiciouſly examined the ſtate of Chriſtianity, have embraced it, profeſſed it, defended it, ſome with their pen, ſome with ſweat, and ſome with their blood.

The Heavens are not enameled with ſo many Stars, as the Church hath had great men, the prodigies, and lights of the world, who by their learned writings have illuſtrated the verities of our Religion. I leave you to think, if among ſo many great Suns, which have garniſhed heaven, and earth with brightneſs, one ſhould behold a ridiculous reere-mouſe to creep out of a hole, and ſay it is not day, and that all theſe Suns are but darkneſs, whether he deſerve not to be burnt, and ſtampt to powder? That all this, which I have ſaid (being very ſtrong, and ſpecious) enter not into the liſt of accompt: what may one anſwer to two things, which are very eminent in Chriſtianity, the conſideration whereof is of power to ſettle the moſt wavering ſpirit, to wit, the marvellous proceeding, which hath been held in the eſtabliſhment of our Religion, and the moſt pure ſanctity of the doctrine thereof? What is there humane in this law, which is eſtabliſhed againſt all humane ways, by a ſucceſs ſo ſtrange, and admirable, that it engulpheth all ſpirits in wonder? Where were in theſe beginnings eloquence, favour of Princes, their renews, their eſtate, their arms, their ſouldiers? Where were the promiſes of honour, reputation, dignity? Where were the moving allurements of ſenſe, and all that which uſeth to feed, and foment Sects? From whence cometh it, that the Church alone hath encreaſed under tempeſtuous ſtorms, in perſecutions, in the ſlaughters of three hundred years, during which time there was no engine, which Hell uſed not, no torment, which the Devil invented not, no inventions, which the Great-ones of the earth, with powerfull hand conſpiring, executed not? All the plaiſtered pretended Sects, which have ſeemed deſirous to take this way, are Great force in two points.

Eſtabliſhment of the Church.

quite

Sola Eccleſia perſecutionibus ſtetit, martyriis coronata eſt. Crudelitas illecebra eſt ſectæ, plures efficimur, quoties metimur à vobis: ſemen eſt ſanguis Chriſtianorum. Hier. in vita Malach. Tertul. in Apol. cap. 50.

quite vaniſhed. From whence it cometh to paſs, that the Church alone hath maintained it ſelf in a bloody tempeſt of three Ages, in the contradiction of a thouſand Sects. From whence it proceedeth, that the cruelty of Tyrants hath ſerved for encouragement to the faithfull, and the blood of Martyrs for ſeed to Poſterity. Where can a Religion be found, which with ſuch innocency, and purity of life, ſuch humility, ſolidity, ſanctity, and, which is more, with the arms of diſgraces, poverty, deſpicable contempt, auſterity, and torments, hath changed the eſtate, and face of the world, hath planted the Croſs in the capital City of the Empire, above the thunder-bearing Eagles of the Emperours, and the aſhes of a poor Fiſherman, maſſacred for this law, above the Diadems of Kings?

What would the antient Cæſars ſay, if they roſe again from their graves, to behold in Rome, where all the Monarchies were eſtabliſhed, and incorporated, where all the Devils, and Furies were cantonnized, as in their laſt and ſtrongeſt fortreſs; in Rome, from whence came all the fulminating thunders, and bloody Edicts againſt Chriſtians, where the ſword of Perſecution was ſharpened to reap a harveſt of heads, where was a Pantheon, the Magazin of all their falſe Deities, to ſee there the ſtate of the ſupreme * Biſhop of Chriſtians, to ſee there a Church erected to Peter the Fiſher-man, much more magnificent then ever was the Pantheon? Say humane wiſdom, if the SAVIOUR of the world at the age of twelve years, when he began publickly to teſtifie he was come to redeem the Kingdom of his Father from violent, and unjuſt uſurpers, had asked counſel of you touching the proceedings, which ought to be held in this buſineſs, what had you adviſed him? Had you not demanded of him, where are your treaſures? Have you not inexhauſtible riches to oppoſe an Empire, which hath an hundred and fifty millions of revenew? No, I pretend to have no other riches but poverty. Have you ſome five hundred thouſand men in pay, for ten years to maintain one army on Nilus, another on Euphrates, one on Rhene, another on the Ocean, another within the entrails of the Romane Empire? No, I purpoſe not to levie for execution of this deſign but twelve poor men, Sea-faring men, without ſtrength, without induſtry, arms, or ſo much as a Staff. Have you a thouſand brave Oratours, men of great learning, eminent eloquence, who will endeavour by the charms of their flowing tongues, to attract the people, and diſpoſe them to their wills? No, I have none but ſimple, ignorant people, Ideots, that go out to preach the Croſs. What would you have ſaid thereupon? O folly, how do you think to come to honour by ignominy, to riches by poverty, to greatneſs by the infamous puniſhment of the Croſs, to immortality by a bloody death? And yet behold it is done. What ſay you? Is there in all this proceſs any thing that is humane? Muſt we ſearch out other miracles for confirmation of faith?

Wonderfull proceeding.

Alii (nec minùs Chriſtiani) aliter ſentiunt.*

Add hereunto, that the Devils craftily counterfeited wiſdom, power, force, by deceitfull, violent, and brutiſh ways, but never could they conſtantly feign humility, patience, purity, ſanctity. Sects, which have taken this diſſembled maſk, have not been able long to keep it, they all have ſhivered, and broken with pride, preſumption, private and publick impurities, with ordures of execrable ſacrileges. The ſpirit onely of Chriſtianity hath always appeared as a true ſpirit of piety, humility, patience, charity, continency, chaſtity, manſuetude, contempt of the world; virtues ſo noble, ſo elate, ſo heroick, that the life alone of a Chriſtian, being with conformity directed fairly to the doctrine of our SAVIOUR, is a perpetual miracle, able to convert worlds. All that, which the great Philoſophers of this Univerſe could not attain with the flight of their feathers, the Chriſtian toucheth with his hand, he hath demonſtrated more in his works, then they have ſaid in their Books; they have built Common-wealths on paper, and our Religion hath raiſed Monarchies of real virtues. And if the wicked, who ſtagger in their belief, had addicted themſelves to the exerciſe of good works, never would infidelity have made prey upon their underſtandings, but for that they ſuffered themſeves to be transported with the overflow of pride, preſumption, curioſity of toys, vanities, and carnal ſenſualities of the world, God in juſt vengeance ſuffereth them to fall into a reprobate ſenſe.

Sanctity an irrefragable argument.

Oh loſt Soul! which giveſt way to this faintneſs, and remiſsneſs in thy Religion, conſider a little attentively all that I have ſaid hereupon. And if truth content thee not, thou mayeſt well hereafter expect the lot of Cain, the abſence from the face of God, perpetual frightfull anxiety, terrours, and menaces from heaven, the indignation of the ſovereign Judg, the hatred of men, the ill ſucceſs of thy affairs, extraordinary maladies, deſolation, the life of a ſad howling Wolf, a tragick death, and deteſtation of thy poſterity.

Even Atheiſts, amongſt the confuſions of Paganiſm, have ſeldom or never found aſſurance therein: ſome have been ſacrificed to flames, as Diagoras; others eaten up with Lice, as Pherecydes; others devoured by Dogs, as Lucian; others thunder-ſhot in a bath, and turned into aſhes in the twinkling of an eye, as Olympius; others have ſuddenly loſt humane ſpeech, and have bellowed like Bulls, and in this roaring have yielded up their Souls, as Simen Thuvan, a wicked Pedant, in the year 1201; others have burſt in pieces in an infamous Privie, infecting the Sinks, and publick Sewers with their ſouls (much more ſtinking) as did the wicked Arius; others have loſt their Scepter, and eyes, as a King of the Bulgarians, who was deprived, and blinded by his own father Trebellius, as ſoon as he returned from a Monaſtery, where he had retired himſelf with armed power, to chaſtiſe the Atheiſm of his Son. We are not yet in an Age ſo caitiff, where brave, and couragious Magiſtrates are wanting to bridle the impudency of thoſe, who would advance theſe deteſtable Maxims of impiety. We have ſeen in freſh memory the Decree of that great, and illuſtrious Parliament of Paris, that condemned to the fire the Authours of ſuch abominations, which powerfully ſtayed the violent courſe of black, and beaſtly impieties, that diſpread themſelves under the maſk of goodneſs; which ſhewed an heroick zeal, both of the glory of God, and general integrity, and maintenance of laws, for which God hath reſerved to them a Crown of immortality. This decree hath been attended with favours from heaven, which even in an inſtant hath ſweetened notably theſe puniſhments, and invited the bleſſings of all good men, that have with thanksgiving lifted their hands to heaven. We had ſeen a little before the aſhes of ſome to flie in the wind, perhaps into the eyes of thoſe, which imitate them in their doctrine. If they expect any other arguments, it will appear their frenzie would have no other remedies, but the fearing-Iron, and fire.

Dieg. Laer. Paulus Diac. lib. 13.

Polydor. l. 5.

Sabel. l. 6. Lan. 85.

As for other Catholicks, who believe as the faithfull

Picus Mir. Ep. 1. Magna inſania Evangelio non credere, cujus veritatem ſanguis Martyrum clamat, Apoſtolica reſonant voces, prodigia probant, ratio confirmat, elementa loquuntur, Damones confitentur: ſed longè major inſania, ſi de veritate Evangelii non dubites, vivere tamen quaſi de ejus falſitate non dubitares. Adviſe to cold Catholicks.

full, and live as Infidels, pronouncing JESUS CHRIST with their mouth, and renouncing him with their hands; I pray them to ponder a ſaying of one of the rareſt Wits, which the world hath a long time had (it is Picus Mirandula) expreſſed by him in theſe words to his Nephew: It is a prodigious folly not to believe the Goſpel, the truth whereof is ſealed with the blood of Martyrs innumerable, teſtified by the Apoſtles, proved by miracles, confirmed by reaſon, publiſhed, and declared by the elements, and creatures inſenſible, confeſſed even by the Devils: but it is a much more notorious folly, not to doubt at all of the verity of the Goſpel, which one profeſſeth, and yet to live, as if he made no queſtion of the falſity thereof.

What a mockery it is, to carry the name of a poor SAVIOUR, and to burn with enraged avarice? of an humble SAVIOUR, and ſuffer himſelf to be expoſed to tempeſtuous winds of exorbitant ambition, which breatheth nothing but breaches, and Ship-wracks? of a crucified SAVIOUR, and to live in a maſs of fleſh, wholly effeminated with delights, and curioſities, even to the making their ſpittings to ſwim in Gold? of a meek SAVIOUR, and to carry, under the name of a Chriſtian, a Gorgon's eye, the anger of an Aſp, the heart of a Tyger, a ſoul full of revenges, of gall, of blood, of Monſters, of beaſtly brutiſhneſs? O God, what Chriſtianity is this! Salvianus ſpeaketh a word very remarkable: We cannot ſin without making our ſelves capable of ſpiritual treaſon in the higheſt degree: the ſins of Chriſtians are ſacrileges, the name which they bear condemneth their life, without any other form of proceſs. Theſe Colds of the North, this Ieineſs, which ſome Catholicks ſhew in their belief, is greatly ſcandalous, and prejudicial to verity; becauſe the miſ-believing, which ſee them live in ſuch exorbitancy, cannot perſwade themſelves they firmly believe the Goſpel, which they profeſs, but that all their Religion is but an exteriour countenance, and rather an idle amuzement of words, then a true liſt of virtue. This bringeth an horrible prejudice into the Church of God, which ſhould even rent our hearts, if we yet retained one onely vein of that noble blood the Martyrs profuſely ſpent for the defence of the truth.

Salvian. 4. de guber. Dei. Omnes Chriſtianorum culpa Divinitatis injuria eſt. Atrocius ſub ſanctis nominis profeſſione peccamus. Ipſa errores noſtros religio, quam profitemur, accuſat.

Remedies. The remedies for theſe eſſential impediments in the act of Chriſtianity are, to take away, and cut off the cauſe of this infidelity.

1. To prepare a conſcience chaſte, and timerous, which never will make it ſelf an Hoſteſs for mortal ſin; and if by chance it give harbour thereunto, to diſlodge it preſently: for ſins, heaped one upon another by a diſſolute deadneſs of confeſſion, make a ſavage, and brutiſh ſoul, which ſeeketh nothing but to be freed from God, though it be a matter impoſſible.

2. Not to taſt the bleſſings, contentments, or honours of the world, with too much ardour; they eaſily enſnare our affections, and make the forgetfulneſs of Heaven ſlide into an inſenſible ſoul.

3. To eſchew curioſity, principally in matter of Religion, as the canker of Faith. We muſt reſemble the Cuttle, a very wiſe Fiſh, who during ſtorms fixeth her ſelf firmly upon the Rocks, without motion: amongſt the floating thoughts, which a dark cloudy conſcience may ſuggeſt, always to hold one's foot on the Rock of St. Peter, fixed, and ſtable: to truſt the direction of the Church, and not to forſake our hold. It is the moſt palpable folly, which can creep into the brain of man, to deſire wiſdom contrary to the wiſdom of Saints, which is Humility.

Non plus ſapere quàm oportet ſapere, ſed ſapere ad ſobrietatem. Rom. 12. 3.

4. To exerciſe your ſelf diligently in good works, as Prayer, Abſtinencies, frequentation of Sacraments, and Alms-deeds. Faith is given to you, as an inheritance of Heaven, whoſoever endeavoureth not to husband it, loſeth it.

The ſecond OBSTACLE.

* Errour in Religion.

 Canis hoc caput, & non miſ cum doloſu adhibito legendum.* S. Hieron. in the letter to Cteſiphon.

Friendly, and wholſom counſel to the Nobility of the pretended Religion.

AN Hereſie diſcovered is a face unmasked. Take away the vizard, you diſarm her, pull away this ſemblance painted with hypocriſie, wherewith ſhe hath plaiſtered her face, you ſufficiently refute her; you need but to know her, to overcome her, and when the head of her Arrows are bare, they have no more force. Catholick Doctours have hitherto couragiouſly endeavoured to take from her this veil, and adulterated colours: yea, even ſhe at this time hath ſo favourably for you unmasked her ſelf, that a man muſt pull out his eyes, if he will not behold her deformity in her rebellion, juſtly deteſted by the ſage, and moderate of her own ſide.

Hæreſin ad originem ſuam revocaſſe, confutaſſe, Hæreticorum ſententias prodidiſſe, ſuperaſſe eſt.

And I beſeech them to conſider, that this Egg, which they abhor, is laid by the Raven, that broodeth in their boſom, and it is a great blindneſs to break the Eggs of the Aſp, and cheriſh the Serpent, which hath laid them.

Good, and generous ſouls, which yet retain ſome ſparks of a French ſpirit, do well ſee theſe proceedings are not according to Scripture, which ſo ſeverely recommendeth the honour of Kings, and therefore they found a retreat, they fold up their Enſigns, freely confeſſing they have erred as men, and proteſting not to perſevere in miſchief like Devils. There are none but enraged ſpirits, that will be healed by the experience of their own ill, and bury themſelves in their ruin; wiſe men always make a medicine for themſelves of others folly.

Optimum eſt alienâ inſaniâ frui.

Go to then, you, who after ſo many voices from Heaven do ſtill ſtagger, and adviſe, if you ought to return to the Romane Church, which is the womb of your beginning, and boſom of your repoſe, give me leave, that I may take this Film from your eyes; grow not outragious, to what purpoſe ſhould you ſtand quaking in theſe frightfull agonies? Exerciſe a little patience, I do not doubt, but you will bleſs the hand, which layeth hold on you, when you ſhall come to ſee the light. I come not with ſword in hand, to put a Religion into your heads with main force; I come to you full of compaſſion of your miſery, full of affection for your ſalvation, full of the deſire of your eaſe, of your contentment, of your glory. Do you refuſe me? A truth doth not gall your ears: when you have underſtood, and diligently conſidered it, if it pleaſe you not, you may reject it. But I beſeech God the Father of light, and mercy, may open your heart, and eyes, to reſolve you herein accordingly to his holy will.

Importance of the choiſe of Religion, matters very conſiderable.

It is a matter of no ſmall importance to handle the affairs of ſalvation. We well know we have an immortal ſoul, which ſhall ſurvive to all eternity, either in the boſom of the glory of Heaven, or in the flames of the damned; we well know by what gate it entered into this life, and where it at this preſent ſojourneth, but we underſtand not by what paſſage, when, or how it ſhall iſſue out. We have nothing here more certain then death, nothing more uncertain then the hour, and manner: nothing ſo aſſured in the other world, as to find there is a judgment of God, a Heaven for virtues, a Hell for ſin: nothing ſo doubtfull, as the determinate determinate sentence of your proces: nothing so absolutely confirmed, as that one cannot be saved without true Religion; and nothing so controverted by the malice of Satan, as the verity of Religion. Notwithstanding, if you err in the choise, you make ship-wrack before you weigh anchour, and so long as you remain in errour, nothing can save, nor deliver you from eternal damnation. For it is a belief of all Christianity, witnessed by Saint Fulgentius in the book, which he composed Of Faith, that all those, who shut up the course of their life out of the true Church, although they have filled the world with Hospitals, and shed their blood for the name of Jesus Christ, cannot free themselves from the eternal torments of Hell. See, wretched soul, if at this dreadfull hour of death, and God's judgment, you find your self miserably deceived by your Ministers under the pretext of Scripture, whither will you have recourse? Verily, whatsoever is said to you, you well know in your conscience, that dying in the Faith of St. Lewis, St. Bernard, St. Francis, who have directly opposed yours, you have all the possible assurance of a good Religion: nor do I think you have so laid down all shame, that you condemn so great and illustrious Personages.

Truth worthy to be embraced. De fide ad Petrum Diaconum cap. 43. Qui extra Ecclesiam Catholicam praesentem finiunt vitam, in ignem aeternum ituros, quantascumque eleemosynas fecerint, etsi pro Christi nomine etiã sanguinem fuderint, nullatenus posse salvari.

Assurance of the Catholick.

You are not ignorant, that all innovation is dangerous, but principally in matter of Faith. They, that follow the main current, and generality of a Religion antient, and well-grounded, cannot perish but by falling from Heaven; cannot stumble in their belief, but by entombing themselves in the ruins of Christianity, which God neither can, nor will suffer to be lost, according to his promises.

They, which adhere to novelties, sail in a Sea of monsters, and tempests, without Pole-star, without Rudder, without Pilot, without any other guid, then their own judgment, which cannot choose but very easily deceive them.

Danger of novelty in Religion.

If there be flames in Hell employed in the punishment of sinfull souls, there is no doubt, but they shall chiefly be inflicted on them, who have laboured to rend the garment of Jesus Christ, to break the connexions and seams of the Church, to strike at the lawfull powers ordained by God, to throw disorder, fire, and blood into the State of their Prince. What horrour will it be in this great, and general day, when you shall see your innocency, by association of Religion, engaged to the enormity of so many disastrous crimes, which you must expiate with pains, which shall have no other limits, but eternity? Enter again into your self a little, and afford so much patience as to know your self. For, if you desire to proceed with all security, I advise you three things.

Three things necessary to dispose one's self in Religion.

First, to have a spirit throughly discharged of anticipations, bold animosities, and apprehensions, which raise mists even amongst the most resplendent lights of truth. It is said, that heretofore at Smyrna, a City of Greece, there was a false mirrour kept in the Temple, which did represent the most beautifull, and amiable faces, with notable deformity; and on the contrary, gave to creatures ugly, and mishapen, a lustre of borrowed, and wholly imaginary beauty. Your Ministers in the false glass of their Doctrine represent the Romane Church to you, this lovely, and chaste Spouse of Heaven, as a monster composed of all sorts of abominations, you have your ears perpetually beaten with the seven Hills of Rome, with Anti-Christ, with the horned Beast, with Idolatries, and Superstitions, which they maliciously obtrude to us. If you remain fixed in these perswasions, how can you do other, but hate that, which you know not?

First, to avoid prejudice. Mirrour of Smyrna, Pausanias.

On the contrary, you are made to behold a Sect, which you well know to have been begun by a general revolt from superiour Powers, by scandalous sensualities, and an infinite number of cruelties, as a celestial Doctrine, beautifull, radiant, under the pretext of Scripture, which is a meer subject to fancy; and considering it under this veil, you love it: and as Nero, who through an Emerald beheld the flames, and blood of his Country, and found it a pleasant mirrour, so whilest you view the pretended Religion under a veil, all seemeth beautifull, and goodly to you. Take away for one hour at least this partial prejudicate spirit, drunk with passion; and take another, calm, reposed, settled, which hath an indifferent care for each part.

Second disposition, to avoid the spirit of quarrels, and eager contentions. Indefesso motu adversandi studium persistit, ubi non rationi voluntas subjicitur, sed his, qua studemus, doctrinam coaptamus. Hilarius 10. De Trin. Truth in the calm. Non in commotione Dominus: in sibilo auræ tenuis. 3 Reg. 19. 12. Omnes disputant malunt, quàm vivere. Senec. A singular Axiom of Chrysol. and Tertullian. Qui fidem quærit, rationem non quærit. Quid Athenis, & Hierosolymis? Quid Academiæ & Ecclesiæ? Nostra institutio de porticu Salomonis est, quæ docet Deum in simplicitate cordis quærendum. Chrys. Ser. 58. & Tertul. lib. De Præscrip.

The second thing is, you must not too much stick upon petty curiosities of a thousand Controversies, and unprofitable Disputations. Truth ordinarily is therein ill handled under the shadow of cherishing it, it is haled this way, and that way, with such boldness, that it seemeth every one would dismember it, and each man take his share away with him. After so many stabs, and stoccadoes on this side, and that side, no other fruit is derived, but Yea, and No, and the soul oft-times findeth it self as much void of peace, and reason, as it is full of gall, and darkness.

You know what is written in the Vision of the Prophet Elias: God is not to be found in the rustling of impetuous winds, in boisterous storms, in turmoils, in fire; but in a gentle gale, which bringeth light, and refreshment in its wings.

Likewise, verity, fit to handle the conversion of souls, is not ordinarily in these ardent, and contentious Disputations, where the prizes of fast and loose are played: but in the repose of a quiet spirit, temperate, molded in the hands of a prudent docibleness. For Faith runneth a different course from humane Sciences. To say, Why this? and Why that? to sift the causes, the effects, the Tenents, the utmost bounds of a point, it is the vulgar track of inferiour Scholes. Faith, which hath God himself for object, who is a bottomless abyss of light, and perfection, cannot demonstrate all that it believeth, otherwise it would not be Faith, nor God would not no more be God. He, that seeketh Faith, seeketh not reason. Athens hath nothing to intermeddle with Jerusalem, nor the Academy with the Church. Our Schole is the porch of Solomon, which teacheth us, we must search for God with simplicity of heart, and not with frivolous curiosity. Faith moveth upon two poles; the first is to believe what God hath revealed; the second to believe, because he, who is an eternal truth, hath revealed it, without any other restriction, specified modification, or humane distinction. What wrong doth the Creatour to us, if he would have us believe more of him, then we are able to comprehend? It is not for the Iron to ask of the Magnet, or Load-stone, from whence those charms, and secret influences come, wherewith he attracteth, and captivateth him. It is enough that he follow. When God proposeth a verity unto thee by the voice, and general consent of the Church, (poor man) thou kickest, thou friskest, thou dost appeal to humane reason, to sense, to judgment, which have wings too short, and insufficient to undertake such a flight.

Whilest thou therein proceedest in that maner, thy Faith will be no true Faith, but a phantasie, which will entertain thee with false illusions, and leave thee real torments. It is a great Science in matter

Obinet tument, omnes scientiam pollicentur. Sapientia hæc veritas est interdum sapere quod nolis. Hilar. 5. De Trinit. initio.

matter of Religion to have an holy, and conscientious ignorance. All Hereticks (saith Tertullian) promise reason, and knowledge. All of them assail Faith with humane understanding. God teacheth us another way, which is to adore his Mysteries with submission of spirit, and make of our own proper judgments a sacrifice on the Altar of Faith.

Third Disposition, Purity of life.

The third thing, which you are to have in great recommendation, is diligently to purge your conscience from the rust of Sin. The Spirit of God is pleased, and fed amongst Lilies, and nothing so much hindereth heavenly Doctrine, as impurity of life. Pearls are dissolved in Vineger, and Truth in a heart made bitter with the corruption of Vice. If you desire, that it should come to you, observe three things exactly. First endeavour, as much as you can possibly, to free your self from a certain spirit of presumption, which puffeth men up, and inebriateth them with the love of their own judgment, before they be throughly awakened: and from hence it cometh, that they affectionately embrace themselves, and make such esteem of their own thoughts, words, maxims, that all seemeth Gold. This is a pernicious illusion, and which stoppeth up all access to our SAVIOUR, who is much pleased to converse with the humble.

Qui diligit cordis munditiem, amicum habebit Regem: incorruptio facit esse proximum Deo. Prov. 2. 2. Sap. 6.

Secondly, live with great purity of soul, and body, carefully preserving your self from being engulphed in sensual affections, pleasures, and ordures of flesh, which bury the soul in a puddle, and make it uncapable of all good. God hath not upon earth a more pleasing hostess, then purity of heart. 'Tis that, which procures for us the amity of the Sovereign King, and placeth us near the Divinity. Finally, labour to adorn your self with Charity, and the very bowels of pity towards the poor, and persons afflicted, assisting them according to the ability, which you have; and when you, fortified with such Arms, shall daily knock at the gates of Heaven by incessant Prayer, asking Grace, speaking, and conferring oft-times with some Catholick Doctour, virtuous, charitable, and peacefull, I have infinite hopes, the Father of Light will dart upon your heart his beams, and give you leave to know the truth.

Four very notable points to discover the falsehood of the Pretended.

In the mean space, ponder a little in your heart four notable points, which will make you discover the falsity of the pretended Religion.

The first is, the beginning. The second, the progress: The third, the foundation of the Doctrine. The fourth, the fruits. Behold four touch-stones to judg aright of Religion. If all this do well accord with reason, and verity in the pretended Religion, I give you leave to follow it; but if all therein be tottering, and ruinous, I beseech you open your eyes a little, and view your misery, after you have so often shut up your ears against reason, and your heart against charity.

Original.

Then first of all consider, whether this Religion you profess be antient, or new. If it be antient, and the Religion of the Apostles, you ought to follow it: if new, you ought to condemn it; no man doubteth. Now, it is as new as novelty it self: which is proved, first by the name thereof, since every Religion, which is called reformed, ought necessarily to have been deformed; for a thing is not reformed, which never had deformity. This is clear. And every Religion, which is said to be reformed in things essential, as are Sacraments, was then before deformed in matters essential, and so deformed, that in a word it was no longer a Religion.

For it is as impossible a Religion can subsist without the verity of Faith, and Sacraments, as to say, that a man can be a man without a reasonable soul. Now this Religion, of which we make question, according to your saying, was deformed in essential things, to wit, in Sacraments, whereby it appeareth, it was no more a Religion, then a lying truth; to speak properly, is truth it self.

Pretended Religion new, and therefore none at all.

Wherefore we must conclude, that those, which boast they have reformed it within these hundred years, have made it wholly new: as if the Sun had been annihilated for a thousand years space, and that God came to restore it, it would be an absolute new Sun; so is this Religion wholly new. Behold then, if every new Religion (as is most evident) carry its condemnation, see you not, that this same, which you profess, is false, since it proveth it self to be new, and onely discovered since Luther, and Calvin.

The proof thereof is evident.

And think not, this novelty is onely proved by reason. It is your own confession in the one and thirtieth Article, where you openly profess, the Church hath not onely been reformed, but absolutely made new: this sole innovation (if you judg aright of it) should give you occasion to suspect it.

Novelties ever suspected by the wise.

The sage Common-wealth of the Lycians heretofore ordained, that all those, who would propose any novelty in matter of law, should deliver it in publick, with an Halter about their necks; to the end, that if their Propositions were not found to be good, and profitable, the authours thereof should be strangled in the place.

And what can one think of them, which have brought in such huge noveliſm in matter of Religion, so disasterous, and so prejudicial to Christendom by the effusion of so much blood? Judg your selves, and weigh at leisure the force of this argument; you shall perceive it is very hard to find evasions against this verity. For of two things you must confess one, either that the Church hath wholly been extinct the space of about a thousand years, and then was newly repaired according to the antient model of the Apostles: or that it hath always been on foot, but invisible, and unknown.

Force of argument.

Weak evasions of Ministers.

First evasion refuted.

These two evasions are very vain, and frivolous, as you shall understand, thereunto a little applying your judgment. For, to speak of the first, expressed in the one and thirtieth Article of your Faith, that the Church hath been newly reformed: First, this is against the Word of God, who to his Church promiseth an assistance without interruption, even to the end of the world. These are his words in Saint Matthew: Behold, I am with you all the days, even to the consummation of the world. He admitteth not one sole day of interruption, and you make one of a thousand, or eleven hundred years.

1. Reason. Mat. 28. 2.

2. Reason.

Secondly, you make a Jesus Christ disarrayed, a Church reduced to nothing, for the space of ten Ages: which is very intolerable, and shall never be, nay, not during the time of Anti-Christ's persecution. Moreover, were it so, you must deny the providence of God, so to have abandoned to a general desolation a work fast cemented with the blood of his Son: yea, he, who hath a care even of the nests of the little Halcyons. Finally, you must say, that Jesus Christ was an Impostour, and unable: an Impostour, to have promised a Church without interruption; unable, in that he could not preserve it: all which is blasphemous.

3. Reason.

Second evasion overthrown.

To affirm the second, that this Church hath always been, but yet unknown, and invisible: if all men were changed into Beasts, it might happen they would be thus perswaded; but, if they yet retain one dram of humane capacity, it were impossible; so impertinent is this Proposition.

For firſt of all, becauſe you will affirm nothing without proof out of Holy Scripture, it is demanded of you, where it is ſpoken of this unknown Church, of this inviſible Church? Much otherwiſe, ſhe is compared to a City planted upon an Hill, to the Light, to the Pavilion in the Sun, as the Scripture teacheth us, and St. Auguſtine proveth it by the ſame Scripture, upon the eighteenth Pſalm.

In Sole poſuit tabernaculum ſuum: in manifeſtatione poſuit Eccleſiam ſuam. Aug. in Pſal. 18.

Secondly, if this Church were unknown, whither ſhould the Gentiles have addreſſed themſelves for their converſion? or thoſe that were doubtfull for their reſolution? or all the faithfull for their direction? God referreth them all to his Church. Is it not a meer mockery to ſend them to a thing inviſible?

Thirdly, if there be no proof in Scripture, which averreth this, ſome humane reaſon at leaſt is required. Can a Propoſition more reaſonable be made, then to ask of thoſe, who maintain a thing to have been in former Ages, to produce ſome marks thereof? That they ſhew, how for a thouſand years of deſolation their Church hath been in being? That they ſet before us one ſole Hiſtory, which witneſſeth how in the thouſand, two, three, four, and five hundred years there was found a company of Brethren, who profeſſed an univerſal ſum of all the Articles which theſe men now maintain?

Allatus eſt Phœnix in urbem anno urbis 800. Tlin. lib. 10. cap. 11.

The Phenix is very rare; but yet it is ſaid in ſuch and ſuch a year, a Phenix was ſeen in Rome. Do we find that any man ſaith the like of the pretended reformed Religion? There is not a word of it. We find the Waldenſes, Circumcellians, Gnoſticks, Borborites, and Beguins, who have held ſome piece of our Hereticks belief, and we likewiſe behold, that all have been condemned as Hereticks. But there is not one to be found, who hath framed this body of the pretended Religion, as it is at this day compoſed. What meaneth this? Is it to have one ſmall ſparkle of the underſtanding of man, to affirm ſuch a thing to have been, and not to know how to produce one proof?

Æſop's Aſs.

Is not this to play Æſop's Aſs, that vanted he had great ſecrets of wiſdom to communicate to other Beaſts; and to authorize it, he hid himſelf a long time in a dry pit, from whence he came with a Philoſophers, Cloak, ſaying, That whileſt he had been inviſible, he had much addicted himſelf to Sciences, and the knowledg of truth. In the end it was known he was an Aſs, and with many blows, and baſtonadoes he was ſent back again to the Pit, from whence he came. This the Parable, which Tertullian ſpake to the Hereticks of his Time. You now come forth, as an Aſs out of Æſop's Pit, and you cry out: Tell me, who are you? From whence come you? Who ſent you? What right have you upon us, to extinguiſh the belief of our Fore-fathers? Do you not behold a beginning of the pretended, ſhameleſs, and ridiculous Religion, which well proveth its nullity?

A notable paſſage of Tertullian. Aſinus de puteo modò venit, & jam exclamat. Dic qui ſis, à quo venias, & quod ſit tibi jus in nobis? Tertul. in Marc. lib. 4. cap. 23.

Second point, progreſs, and publication of the Sect.

The ſecond Conſideration, on which we muſt reſt, is well to balance the progreſs, advancement, and publication of this Sect. If you find it conformable to the antient manner of the Primitive Church, follow it: if it be directly oppoſite, have you not great reaſon to abondon it? Now Sir, ſo it is, and behold how.

Reperire apud nos eſt permultos viros, & mulieres, qui in calibatu conſenescunt.

The true Church from her infancy hath had four marks moſt evident. The firſt is a profound humility. The ſecond, a great love of virginity, chaſtity, and continency, witneſs Athenagoras, a moſt antient Authour, who maketh mention of this great purity of body, and ſaith: It is the mark of the excellency of our Religion. The third, a great obedience to Superiours, recommended by St. Paul to the Romans: Let every ſoul be ſubject to ſuperiour powers. Rom. 12. The fourth, a ſweetneſs, and an admirable patience in perſecutions. Behold what appeared in the publication of the Goſpel. If you obſerve any thing like in the progreſs of the pretended Religion, then have you cauſe to have a good opinion of it. But if you therein do ſee all her proceedings oppoſite to the ſame, conclude it is not of God. And tell me, what are her proceedings in the fore-alledged points?

Conſider the force of this proof.

First Mark.

It cannot be doubted, but that the virtue of humility is the foundation of Faith, and one of the moſt noble characters of Chriſtian Religion. Where humility is (ſaith the Wiſe-man) there is wiſdom, and God is pleaſed to dry up the roots of proud people. Now all Hereſie is inſeparably tied to a proud ſpirit, from whence it took beginning, derived nouriſhment, and receives increaſe.

Trov. 11. Ezech. 10.

We might alledge an infinite number of teſtimonies to this purpoſe. But we do not now tell you how two Heretick-women of the race of Elxay, did as it were, cauſe their Spitle to be adored, nor how one Hildebert gave the paring of his Nails to his Sectaries for Reliques; ſo true is it, that Hereſie, being a ſprout of the evil Spirit, ſtill retains the mark of that pride, which having once aſſayed to diſturb Heaven never ſuffers the earth to enjoy repoſe.

Epiphan. Hæreſ. 19. Hildebertus hæreticus ſub Zacharia.

It is well known how in the laſt Age, one called John Leyden, by trade a Botcher, and Ring-leader of Hereticks in Germany, having firſt publiſhed a law of plurality of Wives, went into the field, drawing along with him huge troops of unchaſt creatures; where, after he had played the Prophet, he cauſed himſelf to be choſen King, took a triple Diadem, erected a proud Pavilion, wherein he gave audience, eſtabliſhed his Court, and Potentates, chooſing out Rogues, and Reprobates, at that time attired in cloth of Gold, and Silver, and other coſtly Stuffs, which having but a little before ſerved for ornaments on Altars were now cut in pieces by the hands of theſe Harpies, and employed to cover infamous bodies, that rather deſerved to be involved in Sulphur, and flames. When this King of Cards marched through the City, you would have taken him for the Great Duke of Muſcovia, or ſome antick King of Hieruſalem. A Page mounted on Horſ-back bare a Bible covered with plates of Gold before him, another carried a naked Sword, willing thereby to expreſs he was born for the defence of the Goſpel. Beſides he commonly had in his hand a golden Globe, whereon theſe words were engraven: King of Juſtice on earth. Ann Delphonſe, the firſt of fourteen wives this Impoſtour had married, went along with him, covered with a Mantle furred with Ermines, claſped with a great Buckle of all maſſie Gold.

Corvin. and Florimon.

This would ſeem ſtrange, if we had not lately known the inſolence of Rebels, and their imaginary Regalities, which are mounted to ſuch an height of fury, that they draw very near to the like frenzy. Yet will we not at this time inſtance hereupon in any thing concerning this Article. We onely ſay, that to ſeparate Religion from Rebellion, and the manners of men from doctrine, the maxims of Sectaries make an abſolute profeſſion of the moſt enraged vanity that may be obſerved in the courſe of humane life. For, if the Scripture doth ſo ſtrictly recommend unto us in the practice of Humility, not to make our ſelves over-wiſe, or able, not to reſt upon our own judgment, nor proper prudence, to hearken to our Fore-fathers, to obey Paſtours, who have lawfull ſucceſſion, to work our Salvation with fear, and trembling at God's judgments, what may we think think of a Sect, which authorizeth a peculiar ſpirit, which hath ever been the Seminary of all Schiſms, and Diſorders, which without diſtinction putteth the Scripture into all hands, to judg of points of Faith, from whence have riſen amongſt them an infinite number of diviſions; which teacheth to accompt as dotages all that, which the Piety of our fore-fathers reverenced, all that the wiſeſt, and moſt religious men of the earth decided, which teacheth to ſpit againſt light, and trample under foot the commandments of Paſtours, and Prelates; to flatter one's ſelf with aſſurance of Salvation, and Predeſtination, in the greateſt exorbitancies, and neglects of life?

Rom. 12. Non alta ſapientes, ſed humilibus conſentientes.

Prov. 35. Ne innitaris prudentiæ tuæ.

Verily, it is an admirable thing to behold, how the petty ſpirits of Artificers, and ſilly Women buſie themſelves herein, and to what a degree of pride they come, when, abuſed by I know not what imaginary Texts of Scripture, they grow big with the opinion of their own ability. What pride more irregular, then to ſee men not content with the Religion of Charlemaigne, and St. Lewis, nor of the Churches, and Tombs of their Anceſtours, to become ſo curious, as to think their Kings, and Paſtours to be Idolaters, and all the better part of mankind beſtial, from whom they ſeparate themſelves, as from people infected with a ſpiritual contagion, and do all they can to Deifie their own opinions? What Phariſee ever came near this height of pride?

If there were any the leaſt ſpark of Humility, a good Soul would ſay within it ſelf; "What do I, "or where am I? It is an old ſaying, He, that too "much believes in himſelf, is a Devil to himſelf. I "think I am grounded on the Word of God: but "have not all Hereticks had the ſame foundation, "which they in concluſion found onely to ſubſiſt in "their own imagination? Why ſhould I ſeparate "my ſelf from the main Body of the antient Church, "to ſatisfie the itch of my peculiar judgment? It is "not credible, that ſo many men of honour, and "worth, who are clear-ſighted in all other things, "ſhould be deceived in this, they may have had "doubts, and opinions as we, but they have over-"come them by Humility, and Reaſon, they have "ſtuck to the body of the Tree, they have followed "the general conſent of People, which rather live in "Uniformity, then adhere to Novelty.

"Let them not be figured to me as Idolaters, Ide-"ots, and men ſuperſtitious; they have far other "aims then theſe. The wiſeſt, and moſt temperate "of our ſide believe them not to be damned in "their Religion. To what purpoſe then is all this, to "handle a buſineſs apart, to be ſeparated from our "near Allies, from Sacraments, Church, Tombs, and "to be the cauſe of ſo many diviſions, ſpoils, and "blood-ſhed? I plainly ſee, we muſt hereafter live in "re-union. It is the Spirit of God, which command-"eth it. If I have beliefs in my heart different from "the ordinary, I ought not to divulge them to cre-"ate Schiſms, and Scandals. I ſhould inform my ſelf. "I ſhould obey: it is fit, I ſomewhat yield to the love "of thoſe, who look after me for my good, and the "authority of ſuch as command over me by juſtice. "I cannot periſh in making a ſacrifice of my proper "will, for peace, and the common good, to thoſe, "whom God hath appointed me for Guiders, and "Superiours. This is the great Science, which I will "hereafter ſeek in the government of the inward "man. Behold what an humble creature might ſay: but inſolency, the inſeparable companion of Hereſie, proceedeth much otherwiſe.

2. Mark. And as concerning Purity, let us not go about to ſpeak of the Vices of particular men, which are exceſſes of nature, not laws of profeſſion. For to ſay, there are vices in one Body, and in one Sect, is to ſay nothing; but to ſay theſe vices are confirmed, and authorized by the Maxims, and Examples of the ſame Sect, this is to ſay all.

Now, this is it, which we behold in the proceedings of the Pretenders. For it cannot be denied, but we ought to keep promiſe with men, and by a much ſtronger reaſon what we promiſe to God? Yet notwithſtanding the principal of the Pretenders have taught by word, and practiſed by example the doctrine of the whole Body; which is, that one may break a vow of chaſtity, to wit, of a thing very good, for it is praiſed by the mouth of our Saviour, and St. Paul, of a thing very reaſonable, for millions of Saints have practiſed it in the beginning of the Church; of a thing moſt holy, for the Scripture hath given it the name of Sanctity: to break a vow ſealed as with the ſeal of the invocation of the holy Trinity, and the blood of Jeſus: to break it not by frailty, but profeſſion, againſt the doctrine, and practiſe of all Antiquity. Is this a mark of the true Church? Matth. 17. 2 Cor. 7. Theſſal. 4.

Take the third mark, Obedience, moſt natural to the Primitive Chriſtians, and all juſt men, who are called a Nation of Obedience, and you ſhall find in the infancy of the pretended Religion a revolt againſt all Eccleſiaſtical, and Secular Powers, continued in all times, and in all the parts of the world, where ſhe might be introduced with ſuch cruelties, as we know by experience. 3. Mark. Eccleſ. 3.

Take laſtly the fourth mark, which is the Dove-like ſweetneſs, that ſhone in the firſt Chriſtians, even in the times of perſecution, and you ſhall find in the pretended Religion, there is nothing but Conventicles, Conſiſtories of State, Factions, Armies, Ranſackings, and Horrours, which make all good conſciences to tremble. Should I enlarge upon this Diſcourſe, I could mention matters able to make Marbles weep: but I will not labour to be eloquent in our evils, which I ſeek to ſweeten what I may, not intending to exaſperate any. 4. Mark.

Onely I ask, what will your prime Sectaries anſwer to the Church at the day of judgment, when ſhe ſhall ſay: My firſt Children bare neither Rod, nor Stick to plant Faith in the hearts of men, and you have publiſhed a Religion all briſtled with Swords, & ſooted over with the ſmoak of Cannons, all ſprinkled with the blood of Catholicks. My lawful Children, at the publication of the Goſpel, ſpake not one bitter word againſt Executioners, amongſt the moſt exquiſite torments, which might be inflicted. And you, what vein, I pray, have you ſpared in my Body, from whence you drew not rivers of blood to diſtain the Lilies of France. Publication of the Pretended, how far from true Chriſtianity.

Your fore-fathers built Churches for me, and you have demoliſhed them: they erected Altars, and you have pulled them down: they advanced Croſſes to me, and you have broken them: they have conſecrated Prieſts for my ſervice, and you have maſſacred them in my Arms. The Apoſtles taught me to place the bodies of Saints under Altars, and you have taken them from that repoſe, whereunto Nature conſigned them, from that repoſe many times afforded to malefactours, you have divided them between fire, and water; yea, you have infected Elements, making them as executioners of thoſe venerable bodies, whoſe foot-ſteps they honoured. And of what bodies? of a S. Irenæus burned at Lions; of a S. Hilary at Poictiers; of a S. Aygnan at Orleans; of a S. Martin, and a S. Francis of Paula at Tours: not to ſpeak of others. The Apoſtles teach to honour Kings, and you have loaden them with reproaches, even to the See Monſieur de Saintes in his Book of Sacrage.

figuring of King Charls the Ninth with marks moſt unworthy in a Coin you ſtampt with Croſſes, and Church-Chalices, yea, to the diſ-enterring of the heart of Francis the Second, enterred at St. Croſs in Orleans, and the waſting it in flames.

Judg now (O you Pretenders) whether a Religion, which carried on the brow thereof acts ſo barbarous, pollutions ſo hideous, cruelties ſo execrable, can poſſibly have the leaſt ſpark of Piety.

3 Point. Foundation of Catholick Religion. Auguſtin. Contra ep. fun.

For a third Conſideration, examine well the foundation of this new Religion, and you ſhall diſcover the deceit thereof. Catholick religion hath for foundation all that, which may ſettle a fair, and generous ſoul, as St. Auguſtine obſerved. If the Word of God ſhould hold the chief place, & ſerve as a Baſis for this great building of the Church, (as is moſt reaſonable) we inceſſantly challenge your Miniſters to ſhew us one onely Text expreſs, formal, and irreproveable, contrary to the Articles of our Faith. For hitherto they have produced nothing but ſemblances to deceive inferiour judgments, being unable to make them good before underſtanding, and capable men.

If a lawfull ſucceſſion, and miſsion of Paſtours be required, which is abſolutely neceſſary for the eſtabiſhment of an Eccleſiaſtical Hierarchie, we ſhew, that from the Apoſtles hitherward, our Prelates, and Biſhops do all ſucceſsively follow one another. If the authority of Councils be demanded, which are the ſinews, the mouths, and living Oracles of a true Religion, let them be looked on in the revolution of ſo many Ages, and they will be found altogether for us.

If the Interpretations of Fathers, and Doctours (who were the lights of their Times, the inſtruments of the Holy Ghoſt, and Secretaries of the Divinity) have any weight with a ſoul well-compoſed, to eſtabiſhed a truth; then eſpecially, when they all with one accord, and conſent do ſpeak, they loudly condemn the errour, and noveliſm of our Adverſaries.

If Miracles, which were wrought in the ſight of all mankind, with ſo much approbation, that they have evicted confeſſion from the moſt incredulous, and reverence from the moſt ſtupid, weigh down the balance, it is on our ſide. If the ſtudy of perfection, and holineſs of life be infallible marks of true Faith, you may as ſoon tell the Stars in the skie, as reckon up the number of holy Perſonages, who have flouriſhed through all Ages amongſt us, and who therein are daily noted with ſuch excellencies, that living as Angels they ſpeak like true Oracles of the Divinity. Finally, if we will give any credit to antient Monuments, the Marbles in Churches, and Tombs of our Anceſtours ſpeak for us.

Moſt wholeſome adviſe how to reſolve on choiſe of Religion. Auguſtin. Contra ep. fund. Euangelio non crederem, niſi me Eccleſia Catholica commoueret authoritas. Contra ep. Manic.

Behold verily the powerful, and invincible reaſons, which made Saint Auguſtine reſolve upon the Religion, which we profeſs. Many great conſiderations (ſaid he) with much reaſon keep me in the obedience of the Catholick Church: The conſent of People, and Nations hold me: The authority of the ſame Church, which is riſen up by Miracle, nouriſhed With Hope, augmented by Charity, eſtabliſhed by its Antiquity: The ſucceſſion of Biſhops holds me therein, which beginning in the See, and Authority of Saint Peter, to whom God recommended the care of his flock, is maintained to this preſent time. Laſtly, the name of CATHOLICK holds me in it. He addeth, He would not believe the Goſpel it ſelf, if he were not convinced by the authority of the Church.

Moſt weak foundation of the pretenders.

Let us now ſee, whether you have better choiſe, and more conſideration, then this worthy man, who is one of the prime Wits of the World. Let us ſee what your Miniſters oppoſe againſt ſo many infallible proofs, to cover their want of antiquity, miſſion, ſucceſſion, miracles, ſanctity, judgment, and reaſon. They ceaſe not to buz out every where a falſe pretext of Scripture, which verily is the greateſt illuſion that ever was. For theſe wicked ones, ſeeing themſelves battered on every ſide, from the beginning of this Reformation, knew well in their conſciences, the Scripture was againſt them. Yet, notwithſtanding (ſaid they, to mock at the Faith of mankind, and lead them into Atheiſm) we muſt avoid the deciſions of a Power, lively, and lawfull; we muſt onely take colour from the Holy Text, we will make it ſay what we liſt: we will maintain, nothing is to be believed, but what is written, and that, which is written, we will diſguiſe with our Gloſſes, and Conſequences, to catch thoſe, who think they have ſome wit. Behold the onely means to colour our pretences!

Reaſons, which ſhew the nullity of this foundation.

You then, who are endowed with ſufficient, and ſolid judgment, conſider a little how deceitfull, weak, and ruinous, this foundation is. Firſt, it appears the Devil, and all Hereticks of former Times have taken the ſame foundation, ever ſaying, the Scripture was on their ſides: which is moſt untrue. Notwithſtanding, behold to what paſs all Hereticks came. Muncer proved by Scripture he was the Prophet David; George, a Diabolical man, that he was God; Eon, condemned by the Council of Rhemes, that he was the true Meſſias, even by the ſame Scripture.

1. Reaſon. Neque enim nata ſunt hæreſes, niſi dum Scriptura bona intelliguntur non bene. Auguſt. ad Conſentium. ep. 222.

Secondly, the world having been two thouſand years, and more, without Scripture, the firſt were written in Hebrew by abbreviation, with ſuch ambiguity, that every one, following his own opinion, might frame a Bible to his own liking: yea, ſometimes ſuch diverſity was found in the Hebrew, Greek, Latine, and Chaldaick letter, that where one read David, another read a Bowl; where one the Liver, another a Pillow, where one beauty, another a ſavage Beaſt; where one the Word, another Life, where one read the Living, another the Dead. And you, who neither know Hebrew, Greek, nor Latine, on whom will you relie?

2. Reaſon.

3. Reaſon. Juliani Aymuſ. ura.

Thirdly, upon paſſages written in very expreſs terms, as, This my Body, the ſpirits of men have forged two hundred opinions quite different; what then will become of difficulties more thorny? Julian Biſhop of Toledo wrote a Volumn Of apparent Contradictions in Scripture, which in ſubſtance hath none, but which notwithſtanding ſeem many times to ſay things directly contrary; ſuch obſcurity there is in ſome paſſages. Whom ſhould we believe? Do you not ſee this were a means to maintain eternal diviſions, if there were not Judges to decide differences in a Kingdom, but that every one ſhould carry the cauſe according to the proportion of his loud crying, to make his Texts, and Allegations to be of force? What would this come unto? And you would bring the like diſorder into the Church.

4. Reaſon. Malac. 2. 7.

Fourthly, in the antient Law the Bible was in the Ark, and no man durſt open it, and turn it to reſolve Controverſies upon this rule, but did expect the deciſion thereof from the Prieſt's mouth, who had a lawfull ſucceſſion. The lips of the Prieſt are the ſtore-houſes of knowledge, and from his mouth you ſhall enquire the Law, ſaid the Prophet Malachy.

5. Reaſon.

Fifthly, the wiſeſt men in the world, after they had maturely thought upon it, found no other way to determine controverſies, but to have recourſe to the deciſion of a Head. Such is the opinion of St. Irenæus, St. Auguſtine, and St. Hierom, Vincentius Lirinenſis, and all others.

Sixthly, it is the commandment of God: When any contro-

Deut. 44. 24. controverſies ſhall be raiſed, my Prieſt ſhall hold ſeſſions, and ſhall judg. For of neceſſity we muſt have an authority commanding, magiſtral, and deciſive.

A moſt juſt proceeding.

For concluſion, Can one ſpeak any thing more juſt, then that, in caſe any place of Scripture hath obſcurities in it, it were to much better purpoſe to hear thereupon the deciſion of antient Fathers, diſintereſſed from our controverſies, then to enforce our ſelves to paſs upon the judgment of a paſſionate Adverſary, without warrant, or authority. When in the year 1523. Hereſie began firſt in France, and that there was but one Miniſter, a wool-carder, called John Clark, in the City of Meaux, where ſhould we finde the interpretation of Scripture, in the mouth of this carder, or in a lawful Council? Judg, behold what you go about: you may hereby ſee how much this pretext of Scripture is malicious, ſhifting, and frivolous.

6. Reaſon.

7. Reaſon. I add, that they overthrow themſelves by thoſe ways, wherewith they ſeek to eſtabliſh themſelves. For, if we ought not to believe any thing, but that, which is written, in what place of their Bible will they finde, that twenty thouſand paſſages muſt be taken out of ours? In what place will they ſhew us the Books of the Macchabees are not Canonical? In what place, that Sunday muſt be kept holy, and not Saturday? In what place, that vows muſt be broken? In what place, that Jeſus Chriſt is eaten by the mouth of faith? And ſo many other places, which make us ſufficiently underſtand, they ruin themſelves by their own hands.

4. Point. Matth. 7. Finally, for the fourth conſideration, take the Maxim from the Son of God; To judg well of a ſect, you muſt judg by the fruits, and the effects. What fruits, and what effects have we ſeen to come from this pretended Religion? The fear of God ſtifled in the hearts of men by a preſumption of their ſalvation, Chriſtian diſcipline oppreſſed by liberty, Chaſtity troden under foot by unbridled luxury, the ſtandard of rebellion advanced againſt the ſacred perſons of Kings, a million of French expoſed to ſlaughter, four thouſand Church-veſtiaries pillaged, five hundred Churches demoliſhed, France ſo many times given over as a prey to ſtrangers, corruptions ſo ſtrange, deſolations ſo dreadful, acts ſo barbarous, that they make the hair ſtand an end on the heads of all good men, which have never ſo little underſtanding. A ſtyle of fire were needful, or a pen of Adamant ſteeped in blood to expreſs them.

Effects of Hereſie.

Monſieur de Sainctes in his Book Of Sacage.

Ah poor France! France the Paradiſe of the earth, Eye of the world, Pearl of all beauties! How many times by the means of this Hereſie haſt thou ſeen thy boſom, heretofore crowned with ears of Corn, and gilded with Harveſts, all briſtled with Battalions? How many times haſt thou ſeen the land covered with blades, and the ſea with ſhips? How many times haſt thou felt the arms of thy children to encounter in thy proper entrails? How many times haſt thou ſeen flames of brother's hoſtility fly through thy fat, and fruitful fields? When haſt thou not ſweat in all the parts of thy body? When have not rivers of blood been drawn from thy veins? but ſuch blood as was able to cement together huge Bulwarks for the defence of our Country, or to ſerve for ſeed for Flower-de-lyces, to make them grow, and be advanced in the plains of Paleſtine, and they have been ſacrificed to Furies.

Innocency ſeemed to afford Infants ſhelter from the tempeſt, yet the ſword of Hereſie found a paſſage into their tender bodies. Age rendred old men venerable, yet would no pardon be granted to their gray hairs, moiſtened with the maſſacre of their children. Virgins were guarded in their mothers arms, as a Temple of God, yet have they been diſhonoured. So may perſonages of eminent quality have ſerved as an aim for their impiety, their pains have been ſport for them, and their deaths a ſpectacle. What hair would not ſtand an end with horrour, and what eye not weep forth blood, when we ſpeak of theſe diſaſters, which your ſelves deteſt? Nor can you ſufficiently wonder at the crueltie of thoſe, who have taken the liberty of ſuch barbarous outrages, and ſo bloody Tragedies.

I paſs over this diſcourſe, as over coals covered with aſhes, and would willingly be ſilent, were it not that, as it was fit to expoſe maſſacred bodies to view, thereby to cure the madneſs of the Mileſian Maids, ſo muſt I diſcover ſome bloody effects in the pretended Religion, to raiſe a horrour againſt it in good ſouls. Why alſo have you in this time renewed ſo many wounds, which were not well cloſed, and for want of a little obedience, ſo lawfully due to the moſt juſt Prince of the world, do you make a Civil war to exhauſt France of gold, and blood, after ſuch expenſe, and ſo many blood-lettings?

If theſe acts ſeem ſo baſe, and inhumane to you, why abhor you not the Sect, which produced them? If God curſe him, who is the cauſe of ſcandals: were it not fit, if you have ſome belief eſtranged from common ſenſe, rather a thouſand times to ſtifle it in the bottom of your conſcience, then to divulge it with theſe diſturbances, diviſions, and ſpoil of a Country, which you ſhould love as men, and honour as true Children? Were there ſome ſtain in the houſe of our Mother (which never was) muſt you therefore call her Whore, drag her along by the hair, and carry fire to burn her houſe, in ſtead of providing water to quench the flames? Is it not better to become patient, to ſweeten the acerbities of times, ſpare wounds on ulcered bodies, or at leaſt to be ſatisfied with ſilence, in a matter, where you can pretend no right of correction?

What was that ſo exorbitant, which the Church commanded, for which you ſeparated your ſelves, and took arms to defend the wranglings of our Apoſtates, made afterward your Apoſtles? What Maxims have we ſo rough, and unreaſonable, that they muſt be taken away with the ſword, there to plant Reformation? Conſider a little the notable corrections, and admirable policies, which Arch-Hereticks have invented to introduce them into the Church. I will here with all ſincerity recite the Maxims of the chief Sectaries, of which ſome have afterward affrighted you, and you have diſavowed them, as you daily do by others, God making you plainly ſee in the inconſtancy, and great diverſitie of your Doctrine, the little confidence you ſhould put therein.

Maxims of the Catholick, and the Pretended.

The Catholick Church teacheth, that God would have all the world ſaved, as the Apoſtle hath expreſſed in the Epiſtle to Timothie; that he deſireth good, of which he is the ſource, and that he communicates himſelf to all his children. 1 Tim. 2. 4.

The Pretended ſay, that God abſolutely deſires evil, yea doth it willingly, predeſtinating men without any regard, ſome to life, others to eternal damnation: as if a father, who had daughters, ſhould cut the throat of one moſt innocent, and marry the other wealthily, having no reaſon for it, but his will; which is moſt execrable impiety pronounced by the authour of this Sect in the book of his Inſtitutions, and Chapter 21. where he ſaith: Men are not all created to the like condition, but that life eternal is preordained for ſome, and eternal damnation for others.

The

The Catholick Church ſpeaks of our Saviour, with moſt profound, and religious reverence. The Authour of the Pretended makes him inferiour to his Father, calling him The ſecond King after God, and attributing ignorance to him, deſpair on the Croſs, and the pains of the damned: which are things moſt horrible. The Catholick Church holdeth, Jeſus Chriſt is the onely and ſole Mediatour of Redemption, and that there is no other name, either in heaven, or earth, in which, and by which we can be ſaved, and for that cauſe ſhe honours it all ſhe can, extending, and multiplying the fruits of honour, and praiſe, not onely in his own perſon, but in his dear friends alſo, which are the bleſſed Virgin, and the Saints, whom we pray unto, as the fruits of his Croſs, and take them for Mediatours of Interceſſion, grounded therein on the word of God, which commandeth the friends of Job to take him for interceſſour, though he were in this tranſitory life; and not at all doubting, if the ſoul of the evil rich man prayed unto Abraham out of Hell, but we on earth may be permitted to call to our aid ſouls ſo faithful, ſo much honoured by God, and whoſe praiſes he reckons his own greatneſs.

Calvin. in Evang. Matt. 27. Inſtitut. lib. 2. cap. 16.

Job. 42. 8.

Luc. 16. 23. 24.

We likewiſe reverence holy Images, ſince it is an antient cuſtom in the Church: the marks whereof we yet behold in Tertullian, who might have converſed with the Diſciples of the Apoſtles. The Pretended quite contrary, feigning they honour Saints, as one would Socrates, or Phocion, perpetually mock thereat, break down their Images, call them by the name of Idols, and falſe Gods.

Tertul. cap. 7. De Pudicitia.

The Catholick Church holdeth man hath Free-wil, ſupported in this Article upon ſo many Paſſages of Scripture. The Pretended deſpoil man of all liberty, which is to deſtroy the worth of his conditions, and to deprive him of the beſt part of his eſſence.

Geneſ. 4. 7. Deut. 30. Eccl. 15.

The Catholick Church holdeth the blood of our Saviour is a treaſure infinite, and very able to purge away all maner of evil, and to merit all good; but that it is applyed to us by works of Satisfaction, and Merit, and purgative pains, in thoſe, who ſtand in need of it, as a Medicine, which profiteth the ſick man, by the co-operation he bringeth. The Pretended teacheth, Good Works are not neceſſary to ſalvation, but onely Faith juſtifies: which is to open a gate to the corruption of good maners, and to all kind of liberty.

The Catholick Church believes a Purgatory for ſouls, which going out of the body are not yet purified, grounded therein on nineteen, or twenty Paſſages of Scripture, all underſtood by the antient Fathers according to our belief. The Pretended, having diſturbed the aſhes of the dead, deprive them of the aſſiſtance, and prayers of the living, contrary to divine, and humane Laws, and the manifeſt practice of all Antiquity.

The Catholick Church makes a Sacrament of Marriage according to S. Paul, and the interpretation of moſt eminent Fathers of the Church. The Pretended make their Marriages like thoſe of Barbarians.

The Catholick Church holdeth the reality of the Body of CHRIST in the Sacrament of the Altar, and believe, that under the Sacramental ſpecies, which are ſenſible, and corruptible, our Saviour ſubſiſteth with a glorious body, which is called by St. Paul a ſpiritual body, becauſe it is dignified with qualities, and conditions of ſpirit, though it looſe not the eſſence of a body. She adoreth therein with all humility that, which ſhe cannot comprehend ſufficiently, after expreſs paſſages of Scripture, the deciſion of fourty Councels, the teſtimony of five hundred Authours, antient, grave, and ſincere. Adding from the authority of the moſt illuſtrious Councel of Nice, that it is the unbloody Sacrifice preſented for the expiation of the ſins of the world. The Pretended will place inſtead of it Chimæras, imaginary figments, ceſſation of Sacrifices, and abominable deſolation.

The Catholick Church publiſheth Confeſſion, and remiſſion of ſins by the miniſtery of Prieſts, as the Son of God did inſtitute it in St. John. The Pretended, ſhaking off ſo wholſome a yoak, hath made himſelf a way to liberty, and diſſolution.

John 20.

The Catholick Church acknowledgeth a viſible Head on earth, eſtabliſhed by the expreſs word of Jeſus Chriſt in St. Matthew, averred by all the holy Fathers, confeſſed by the continuation of a lawfull ſucceſſion in the revolution of ſo many Ages. The Pretended ſeek to bring into the houſe of God an Anarchy of the children of Belial.

Matth. 15.

The Catholick Church is the bright Star of truths. The Pretended is a furious Comet, which throws diſorder, and poyſon into all the parts of the world.

To ſay truly, ſhould an Angel have ſpoken to it, yea, could it create a golden Age, never might this deſigne be accompliſhed by ways ſo furious, and turbulent. But having coſt France ſo much gold, and blood, what hath it done, but that, which is mentioned by the excellent Pen of Cardinal Berule in the Preface Of the Greatneſs of Jeſus: A Church without Apoſtles, Apoſtles without miſsion, Paſtours without ſheep, ſheep without Shepherds, Faithful without Churches, Chriſtians without Baptiſm, Prophets without Miracles, Temples without Altars, Altars without Sacrifices, a Religion without Ceremonies, a Law without obedience, a Faith without works, and a Charity without effects.

Behold excellent pieces, and well worthy of a Reformed Church!

In the name of God, weigh at leaſure theſe conſiderations, which would deſerve a whole Volumn, and ſince you are convinced by reaſon, kick no longer againſt the prick, go no more about to forge difficulties, nor ſay how ſhall I put this in execution? What means have I to do it? What will ſuch, and ſuch ſay? What will our whole ſide ſay in general? Muſt I confeſs I have erred? And a thouſand other thoughts, which are true illuſions. You ſhall no ſooner ſet your foot in the Roman Catholick Church with ſo many men of note, lately converted, but all theſe fantaſies will vaniſh, you ſhall live in peace of conſcience, and ſhall receive before God glory immortal.

Humanum fuit errare, Diabolicum per animoſitatem in errore manere. Auguſt. Serm. De verbis Apoſt.

O! That we might quickly ſee that great day, wherein France may no longer ſpeak but with one tongue, wherein the names of Lutherans, and Calviniſts may be baniſhed out of the memories of men, wherein all French-men, re-united under one faith, one Law, one Head, one Church, may eternally bleſs the name of Jeſus. What joy! What comfort! What embracements of both ſides! What conſolation for ſo much afflicted kindred, which waſte themſelves with grief, and ſorrow for theſe poor ſtragglers! What ſatisfaction for the ſacred perſon of the King! What honour for France! What peace for the Church! What edification for all the world! What triumphs for heaven! What bleſſings of God will fall upon their heads, who ſhall give example of this re-union, and ſhall conſent to the peace, ſafety, and honour of this Monarchy?

The

The third OBSTACLE.

To live by Opinion.

Overmuch wit troubleth us.

THe tree of the Knowledg of Good and Evil doth alſo yeild fruits, which coſt us very dear: we labour here with too much application of wit, which goeth up, and down, ſearching, and prying into all the objects of the world, often forſaking the better for the worſe. St. Thomas moſt judicially obſerveth, that there is much difference, between the natural appetite, the ſenſual, and the intellectual. The natural aymeth always at things, which are really good for her, and proportionable, the ſenſual is ſcattered, the intellectual much more, to deſire evil plaiſtered over with the ſemblance of good. The plant deſireth moyſture, with which it is nouriſhed, and will never take a ſtone for the dew. Man having too much wit, and ſenſe, not contenting himſelf with things, that really are good, and truly conſonant to this nature, forgeth others in his Idæa, which are good in appearance, and evil in ſubſtance. Notwithſtanding, apparence taketh upon her, when ſhe hath ſeduced the ſenſe, and conquered the imagination, to dive even into the Cabinet of the Prince, which is the underſtanding, and putting falſe ſpectacles upon his eyes, to make him believe that black is white, glaſs is diamond, and darkneſs light. It is neceſſary, that the will ſhould dance to this tune, and purſue the good, which is repreſented unto her by the underſtanding, be it true, or falſe; from hence, there glide into the condition of humane life a thouſand extravagant illuſions. It is even at this day, that truth hath loſt her garment, falſhood is cloathed with it; and opinion in this Court-like habit hath really and actually produced little monſters, but ſuch as yet holding, and retaining the malice of their father, and levity of their mother, attire themſelves with certain veils, which make them ſeem beautiful; they fly up, and down like little Cupids, they make a trade of deceiving, and practiſe with ſo much ſubtilty, that they enſnare even the wiſeſt. Behold our unhappineſs; we are in this world, as in the Iſland of dreams, whereof Lucian ſpeaketh. We dream broad-waking, and ſuch dreams, which are by ſo much the more perilous, by how much we the leſs look into the danger. A man, who hath dreamed all the night, as ſoon as he beginneth to open his eye-lids, mocketh at his owne fantaſies, and ſaith, they were dreams: we dream all the days of our life, and ſay, they are verities. We run after theſe falſe imaginations, as children after Butterflies. When the great night of our death draweth near, we begin to diſcharge our ſelves from this waking ſleep, and from this ſleeping vigil, we find we have death at hand. And as for the Butterflies, which we ſo eagerly followed, after we have broken our heads, and ſhins in their purſuit, we neither have their legs, nor wings in our hands. Behold one of the greateſt impediments of perfection.

S. Thom. 1. 2. Quæſt. 8.

Intellectual appetite faulty.

Apparence.

Semblances the children of opinion, and lying.

The world the Iſland of dreams. Verar. Hiſt. lib. 2.

Alas Noble Spirit! Thou wouldeſt be truly Noble, if thou couldeſt ſhake off this golden yoak, the opinion whereof hath ſo ſurcharged thee, conſecrating thy bondage thereunto by a pretious impoſture. But who will do it? Had not he antiently a notable ſubject hereon, who ſayd, when he conſidered the eſtate of the world, the ſouls of men ſeemed to him to be all thrown headlong from the Palace of verity into the torrent of opinion, all of them tumbled in the throng into the mercy of the waves, and few were to be found, that would bravely ſettle themſelves to row againſt the ſtream.

Mercur. Triſmeg. Souls in the torrent of opinions

Seneca hath well obſerved, and touched the true ſource of the corruption, which at this day reigneth upon the earth. We live not according to reaſon, but by relation to the life of an other, and from thence cometh, that we fall one upon another by heaps, as blind men into a ditch.

Seneca de beata vita. Opinion the ſource of all corruption. Non ad rationem, ſed ad ſimilitudinem vivimus: inde iſta tanta coacervatio aliorum ſupra alios ruentium.

To take away this confuſion, I produce onely three conſiderations, which are very preſſing, and pregnant. The firſt, that this life, which is ſo lead by opinion, is very ridiculous. The ſecond, that it is baſe, and ſervile. The third, that it boweth under a cruel tyranny, from whence it may with a little courage diſinfranchize it ſelf. And firſt I demand, if it be agreeable to a noble, and generous heart, to forſake the gravity incident to his nature, and to embrace idle toys, and fopperies? No man will conſent hereunto, but he that will betray his reaſon. Now ſo it is, that all the opinions, which at this day intoxicate the world, are not builded but upon the flying ſand, upon the giddie humours of windy brains, upon the paſſions, and affections of a debauched, and corrupted multitude. Where the ſheep feedeth that goeth before, they which follow muſt graze though they die for it. Every one attendeth his companion, as the wiſeſt, and he that venteth folly with the greateſt confidence is the beſt welcome. What Monſters, what prodigious fantaſies of ſcattered and uncollected ſpirits, have not been received for laudable actions, being favoured and authorized by opinion? It is a thing ridiculous, and almoſt incredible, to ſee the Chimerical conceits, that it hath perſwaded, making them to be taken not by a particular man, or one ſole family, but by a whole and entire Nation for Maxims of wiſdome.

Against the life of opinion.

Cornel. Tac. Hiſt. 2. Multitudo vulgi more magis quam judicio, poſt alius alium quaſi prudentiorem ſequitur. Strange giddyneſs of opinion.

The Moſſins, a people, performed all the actions of moſt ſecrecy in publick, yea even thoſe, which are ordained for the neceſſities of nature, and treated the affairs of the Common-wealth in their houſes, conſtantly believing it was very requiſite ſo to do. The Tibarenes, as ſoon as their wives were delivered, bound up their heads with a kercheff, lay down on their bed, and made themſelves to be attended like the childe-bed woman. The poor women in the mean time were up, and about the houſe, endeavouring to make ready Baths for their husbands, and to dreſs, and ſeaſon their viands, to tend, and cheriſh them, as if they had born all the pain of feminine travel. Could you have any thing more ridiculous? And yet opinion made it appear very reaſonable. There are ſuch to be found, who place all their honour, and glory in drinking hard, and eating freely: to call a man a robber, a thief, an adulterer, were in this Country nothing, to ſay that ſuch an one were not a great gourmandizer, nor a great drinker, would be to do him an unpardonable injurie. Others placed all the excellency, and dignity of man in carrying a huge logof wood a great diſtance, and by this tryal choſe their Kings. The greateſt Burthen-carriers, and Porters were their great Lords. Others did kill and eat their aged Parents for a ceremonie of Religion. And opinion made this good. What alſo do not thoſe people of India, and other parts diſcovered in our daies? Some think it is honourable to turn their back to ſalute one. Others thruſt their finger to the earth, and after lift it to heaven, to do reverence. Others gather up the ſpittle of their Prince, and ſpeak to him through a hollow trunk. Others offer to their Gods their old ſhoos in ſacrifice. A man would laugh, when he heareth ſpeech of it, and yet we ſee that the proudeſt Monarchs of the World world, who ſuppoſed they had ſhut up all wiſdom in their Laws, and Cuſtoms, trampled virtue under their feet, and placed Dragons, Bats, and Quartan-Agues on their Altars. Behold what Opinion can do. Theſe follies, you will ſay, are not now in practice. He, that would well examine all the fantaſtick humours of apparel, all the giddy conceits of ſports, and paſtimes, the folly of complements (which at this time reign amongſt men) ſhould find things as ridiculous, as theſe: as it were to adore an humble, poor, crucified God, and yet to be mad after greatneſs, riches, and curioſities. To believe, that one perpetually liveth under the eyes of God, yet to behave himſelf like a wild Colt at his own fantaſie, neither knowing God, nor man. To expect a judgment, and to live in continual injuſtice. To know, that we muſt return naked to the earth, and yet to deſpoyl the whole world to cloath our ſelves. To build, as if one ſhould always live; eat, and drink, as if we ſhould never die; ſome men to trace up and down the ſtreets with a plume of Feathers on their head, and Fetters on their heels; Women, to beſtow a fourth part of their life-time in dreſſing, and beſmearing themſelves, to make themſelves groſs on one ſide, and little on another, to raiſe Turrets on their heads, to put Shackles on their heels, to be tranſported with ſo much ſollicitude about a Ruff, as if they had a Venetian Common-wealth to manage: Others to confound with courteſie, whom they would gladly eat with Salt: Others to kill one another about the interpretation of a word, and a thouſand ſuch like things, which are indeed moſt impertinent. Notwithſtanding opinion diſguiſeth them, opinion beſotteth them, and opinion giveth credit to all this. Do you then think it a matter worthy of your generoſity, to ſerve follies under the ſhadow, that fools approve them?

Apollonius 2. Argon. verſ. 138.

Idem ibidem.

Aruncani. Lipſ. Politic.

Do you not behold for the ſecond Reaſon, that you, being free of condition, and not having the power to diſgeſt ſome reaſonable ſervice, you notwithſtanding undergo the baſeſt ſervitude, that may be imagined? A young Lacedemonian, whom fortune had made a ſlave, rather choſe death, then to carry a Chamber-pot to his Maſter, ſaying, it was unworthy of his condition; and yet opinion maketh us to bear a Fool's Bable, opinion maketh us carry, not in our hands, but in the prime piece of man, the head, a ſink of old dotages, amaſſed together by light, idle, fantaſtick ſpirits, and afterward confirmed by laws, by the tyranny of cuſtom. What ſhall we call ſlavery, if this be none?

A notable ſaying of Auguſt. lib. 6. De Civitate Dei, c. 10. Si cui intueri vaces quæ faciunt, quæque patiuntur, invenient tam in decora honeſtis, tam indigna liberis, tam diſſimilia ſanis, ut nemo dubitaturus ſuerit furere eos, ſi cum paucioribus furerent: nunc ſanitatis patrocinium eſt inſanientium turba.

I call your conſciences to witneſs, if you ſometimes ſhall begin to breath in a more free air, and ſee the bright day of the children of God, you in your ſelves will blame all theſe inventions of the worldly life, which enforce you to feel tormenting racks in your attires, in your recreations, in the complements of converſation. O! how often are verified thoſe Sayings of the ſage Roman, inſerted by St. Auguſtine in the ſixth Book Of the City of God: When you ſhall come to conſider all the train of ceremonies, and hypocriſies of Court, you will find them ill agreeing with honeſt minds, unworthy of free men, and not different from fools; and in effect you will confeſs, that no creature ſhould doubt to term them follies, if the number of ſots were leſs: the beſt veil they have, is the multitude of fools. Do you not behold a goodly pretext? as if Moles were the leſs blind, becauſe they have companions in their darkneſs. Behold a point of ſervitude extremely unworthy of a noble ſpirit, to ſay, that one condemneth in his conſcience an act, which he putteth in practice, that he inſtantly may obey a vain opinion of the world. It is ſaid, the Abderites, after they had beheld the Tragedy of Andromeda, and Meduſa, became all frantick, even from the leaſt to the biggeſt, and ceaſed not to ſing, to clap their hands, to cry, to whiſtle through the ſtreets, and to have no diſcourſe, nor thought of any thing, but Meduſa, and Andromeda. If then you had entered into their City, you had played the fool for fear to be deſpiſed by fools. Is not this an intolerable weakneſs of ſpirit in a well-compoſed ſoul, to have good lights, and knowledges of Almighty God, which inceſſantly beat upon our underſtanding, and yet to play the fool, and to comply with another's humours?

Abderites, Cœlius, lib. 30. cap. 4.

For the third Reaſon I ſay, this belief, which is given to opinion, paſſeth into a wicked, and ſcandalous tyranny over Chriſtians: for by the force of cheriſhing, and fomenting theſe maxims in the heart of the world, they are transferred into Nature. Vices are not contented to be vices, but by this tyrannical law of opinion formed in the Ideas, and lives of Perſons of quality, they make themſelves to be adored under the colour of Virtue.

3. Reaſon. Tyranny of opinion.

Cardinal Jacques de Vitry relateth, that a Country-fellow carrying one day a young ſucking Pig to the Market, certain pleaſant Wits, who had agreed upon this ſport, every one of them ſeverally encountering him in divers croſs ways of the ſtreets, and asking him what was his purpoſe to carry a Dog to the Market, did ſo intoxicate his brain, that beaten out, blow after blow, with ſuch like Interrogations, he abſolutely perſwaded himſelf that to be true, which he firſt ſuppoſed was begun for ſport, and caſt his Pig with ſhame upon the pavement, and thinking it a true Dog, gave the other opportunity to gain by this ſleight.

A pretty obſervation of Cardinal Jacques de Vitry.

Behold what the tyranny of opinions re-doubled one upon another can do. They made this poor man believe, that his Pig was a Dog, although his ſenſes ſuggeſted the contrary. And I leave you to think what this torrent of the falſe Maxims of the world doth not, falling with unreſiſtable fury upon a dul, & half-dead faith. It weakeneth all that, which is Chriſtian in a ſoul, and planteth a wicked Idol of humane reſpects, which cauſeth, that all actions are meaſured by the Rule of vulgar opinions. And if there be yet any reliques of a good conſcience, this tyrant ſmothereth them, as a Pharaoh, and wholly perverting the nature of things, giveth boldneſs to ſin, and ſhame of well-doing to virtue. Behold a mean to drench all mankind in the gulph of confuſion. Is not this then abominable? If theſe conſiderations of the folly, ſervitude, and tyranny of this life (which are ſpun according to the Web of the opinions of the world) cannot ſerve for an Antidote for our ill, at the leaſt think the day will come, when truth ſhall take place, and vice vaniſh into ſmoak. It will happen unto you, as to Tigers, for whom Hunters, when they have taken away their Whelps, affix Looking-glaſſes in the ways to amuſe the ſavage Beaſts, and in the mean time they ſave their own lives by the help of flight. The Tigers forthwith moſt affectionately ſtay, thinking they ſhall draw their little captives from the reflection of this mirrour, and ſet them at liberty; in the end they ſtrike it till it is broken, loſing together both their young ones, and the inſtrument of their deception.

Illuſions of Tigers.

Theſe opinions, which you now adore, theſe dreams, theſe fantaſies, which you behold in the ſpecious glaſſes of the world, ſhall be loſt at the hour of death, and you muſt render an accompt to the Sovereign Judg, for that you have againſt his laws erected

erected that Idol of worldly reſpects, and always made Heaven bow under the will of the earth. What are you to do? Of neceſſity to caſt away the opinions of the world contrary to the Doctrine of Jeſus Chriſt. You ſay, it is impoſſible to live in the world without purſuing the ways of the world, and accommodating one's ſelf to the doctrine thereof. Forſake it then, break your fetters, enfranchize your ſelf; when you no longer hope in it, you ſhall no more be in danger to fear it. What would it avail you to have in your life the whole world for an inheritance, and after death Hell for a priſon? Why are you daily handling your ſore, making it itch by your tenderneſs? You need but one blaſt of wind, one ſtroke of the air, to put your ſelf into the aſſured haven of the liberty of the children of God.

The fourth OBSTACLE.

Inconſtancy of Maners.

Mercur. Triſm. Serm. 4.

MERCURY Triſmegiſtus ſaid, that the ſeed of Heaven was Immortality, and the ſeed of the earth was Inconſtancy. All here below is filled with this grain, in every place it produceth its effects, but principally in man; he hath more in his heart, then all the reſt of the world; it is the true Image of inſtability, as Ariſtotle affirmeth. And very well it is ſaid, that Inconſtancy, exiled for ever from the Palace of eternity, came upon the earth as to the real place of her inheritance, and would needs there cauſe her ſelf to be painted. It was plainly told her, there was no Pencil ſo bold, which durſt undertake this work, becauſe ſhe was ſometimes great, ſometimes little, ſometimes groſs, ſometimes ſlender, ſometimes ſtreight, ſometimes crooked, ſometimes white, ſometimes black, finally, ever unſettled, and uncapable of ſtay in any place; that notwithſtanding ſhe might addreſs her ſelf unto Time, for he was a notable work-man, who intermeddled in all things. Time, after he had well eyed, and, obſerved this Inconſtancy, reſolved to paint her, and, at that ſeaſon finding no Table better primed for his purpoſe, he painted it on man.

Ariſtot. μεταπτώσεις & εἰκών. Fable of inconſtancy.

It is a goodly invention, which bringeth to us an undoubted verity, marked, and deſigned out, as with a pen of Adamant, by holy Job, when he ſpeaketh of man in theſe expreſs terms: The flower, which ſhutteth up his date in the courſe of one morning, and evening, if it be not hail-ſtrucken at midday; the ſhadow, which ever flieth from the hand that would graſp it, and all which you may imagine to be tranſitory, is nothing in compariſon of the inconſtancy of man. Philip, a good Authour, who flouriſhed about the time of St. Hierom, and hath written a Commentary upon Job, ſearching out the cauſes of the inſtability of man's heart, hath theſe remarkable words: "Inconſtancy is a chaſtiſement of ſin. The ſpirit of "man would not reſt it ſelf with firm footing upon "the foundation of contentments, which God preſented to it in the ſtate of grace, and therefore the "Sovereign Judg, for puniſhment, ſuffereth him to "go continually floating, as in a tempeſtuous Sea of "thoughts, without either finding bottom, or ſhore. "He is ever turmoiled with new deſires, and diſturbances. If he be employed, he wiſheth repoſe: and "if he hath never ſo little repoſe, he is vexed, and "requireth buſineſs. And although all men reſent the effects of this inconſtancy, yet ſhe, notwithſtanding, often-times beareth ſway in the Palaces of Great men.

Job 14.2. Quaſi flos egreditur, & conteritur, & fugit velut umbra, & nunquam in eodem ſtatu permanet.

Animus hominis, quia ſtare noluit cum potuit, jam non poteſt ſtare cum velit: ſed ſemper deſideriis vexatur, ut quietus actionem deſideret, occupatus quietem. Philip. in Job.

There are to be found many Endymions, who embrace the Moon; hearts wheeled about in ſtrange labyrinths, ſurcharged with Quick-ſilver, and changeable atomes; ſpirits, which perpetually are upon turbulencies, gnawn with a certain itch of noveliſm, diſtaſted with what is paſt, and always perplexed with what is to come, they hear all the minutes ſtrike, but the hour of repoſe they know not. The cauſes of this exorbitancy are maniſeſt, and the conſideration is profitable, that remedy may thereunto be ſought. To ſome it happeneth by a certain natural levity of a ſpirit, ever gliding, and jumping upon all ſorts of objects, as a Butter-flie among flowers. To others by a certain facility, which they have to take diſtaſt upon the ſudden againſt all things, yea, even the moſt delightfull. To others by a certain greedineſs, which maketh them ever to have things preſent in ſcorn, and things to come in eſteem. They reſemble the Dog in the Fable, they no ſooner have the ſubſtance, but forſaking it they reach at the ſhadow, and afterward paſſionately ſeek what they did forego. To others by a certain curioſity, and impatience of too much repoſe. They do, as thoſe, who, having no great deſire to ſleep, caſt themſelves upon a Bed of eaſe, turning from one ſide to another, untill they found ſleep by their own wearineſs. To others by a diſtemper of Paſſions commixed together, which ſharply bite them like vermin. To others by certain timerous appetites, in ſuch ſort, that they dare not do all they deſire, and cannot obtain all they dare wiſh for; this ever holdeth them with a throat open for prey, which by its flight leaveth them nothing but a meer illuſion. To others by a certain mouldineſs of a dull ſpirit, which cannot diſ-involve their thoughts, nor fairly accommodate their purpoſe to eſtabliſh them in any kind of a confident life. They reſemble that little Bird of the Sea, called Cinclus, which during his whole life (as it is ſaid) uſeth no endeavour to build his own neſt, but goeth ever wandering up and down, if other for pure pity do not contribute of theirs. All this inconſtancy of life is an eſſential obſtacle, which totally hindereth the progreſs of perfection, the reaſons whereof are moſt evident.

Senec. De Tranquil. Salvian. lib. 1. Gubernat. Human. Humana mentis vitium magis ſuper-velle quæ deſunt.

Ælian. 12. De animal. Suidas, Κίνκλος.

The firſt is, that one can execute nothing in matter of virtue, if he have not an aim, and purpoſe well rectified: otherwiſe it is not to live, but to fright Crows, and Pies with fancy. Now ſo it is, that all thoſe, who dance this jig of Inconſtancy, have neither but, nor ſcope of aſſurance; they perpetually are tranſported where the ſtorm carrieth them; they are always ſtrangers in their own Countries, and gueſts in their proper houſes; you would ſay they had but one ſole motion, one ſole action in this life, which is to turn topſie-turvie all things, and to do nothing; and if they do good, it is when they leaſt think of it, and oftentimes they find they muſt leave to live, before they have once thought why they were born. St. Thomas ſaith: The property of a reaſonable nature is to work for an end, otherwiſe it is a brutiſh action. And although the ends ſeem greatly different, and ſcattered in the univerſality of creatures, notwithſtanding they are all recollected in God, as beams in the Sun, the center-light. 'Tis that, at which neceſſarily we muſt aim, to find the Temple of Repoſe. Quick-Silver creepeth up and down, and trembleth, untill it hath found Gold, with which it may commix: in like manner the heart of man boundeth, and skippeth here, and there in its own diſturbances. There is nought, but jumps, and ſallies, but ebs, and flouds, but acceſſes of Fire, and Ice, until ſuch time as it is united to its Creatour, ſubmitting it ſelf to ſome conſtant and regular maner of life, thereby to ſerve his Divine Majeſty. Saint Reaſons againſt inconſtancy.

S. Thom. 1. 2. Quæſt. 1. Sine propoſito vagantur, quærentes negotia, nec quod propoſuerunt agunt.

S. Auguſt. fol. 13.

Auguſtine very lively explicateth the miſery of this wandring life, which he had made tryal of, and the happineſs he enjoyed when he had couragiouſly ſettled himſelf to a ſtable ſtate of virtue. You would ſay, hearing this ſpoken, that this ſoul like a ſmall current of water, ſeparated for ſome time from God his true ſource, gliding along by the ſenſes, as by ruſty, and defiled pipes. There the ſoul is ever perplexed, and involved, finding pain in repoſe, and thirſt in abundance, until returning to its original head it cometh to reliſh moſt delicious contentments, which make it ſay to God: My God I now know, that no good can be had without thee, the true, onely, and Sovereign good; in every place where I am without thee I never am without pain. All the good which is not God ſeemeth unto me a meer penury. You manifeſtly behold, how this inſtability of life, for that it aimeth not at the ſcope at which our thoughts ſhould be levelled, not onely alienateth you from tranquillity, but expoſeth you to moſt thorny difficulties, and in the end to deplorable diſaſters.

Ex quo me ab unitate bonitatis tuæ, ſummo & uno bono temporalium rerum, multiformitas lapſum me per carnales ſenſus diſſipavit, & ab uno in multa diviſit, facta eſt mihi abundantia laboriosa, & egeſtas copioſa.

The other reaſon, which maketh inconſtancy very prejudicial to all virtue, is, that one can do no great thing, unleſs he faſhion it as the Bear doth her whelp by licking. Time and frequent diligence are neceſſarily required to make good habits bud in the heart of man. The plant, which is often transferred from one place to another, ſeldom beareth fruit. Viands, which the ſtomach doth not leiſurely entertain, are ill diſgeſted; remedies, perpetually changed one in the neck of another, kill the body: the wound, which continually is vexed, cannot conſolidate: the Wandering Scholar never becometh a good Clerk. We of neceſſity muſt break, and tame our ſelves to the thing we undertake. He that is every where is no where. And yet notwithſtanding this is an inſeparable property of inconſtancy, never long to leave the mind in any honeſt exerciſe, that ſo it may take a perfect tincture: from whence it cometh to paſs, that all her childe-beds are falſe conceptions, and her productions abortions.

2. Reaſon. He muſt lick his Bear. Senec. Epiſt. 1.

Vagus Scholaris non fit Magiſter.

Saint Anthony adviſed a ſoul deſirous of advancement three things. Firſt, to addict it ſelf much to the exerciſe of the preſence of God. The ſecond, to take the holy Scripture for the rule of his actions. The third, to hold firm footing in conſtancy. You will ſay, that Marcus Aurelius Antoninus had learned this precept of the Chriſtians: for in the firſt book Of his life he caſteth out of the Temple of virtue certain people, which he calleth by a very ſignificant Greek word πετασγικὰς, as one would ſay, balls caſt into the Air, and he addeth, that it is needful to reclaim, and accommodate one's ſelf to time, and occaſion, to obtain our deſire, which rules Syncleticus, famous in the deſerts, obſerving was accuſtomed to ſay: If the hen brood not her egs, ſhe hath no deſire to make them diſcloſe. And not to ſpeak of Saints, a wiſe Hiſtorian hath well obſerved: The greateſt hinderance which can come to the perfection of a good work is to go pearching, as a bird from bough to bough, without ever ſtaying.

Adviſe of S. Anthony. Apotheg. P. P.

Antonius libro De vita ſua.

πετασγικὰς.

Gallina, niſi ova fuverit, pullos non excludit. Frequens ac mobilis tranſitus, maximum perfecti operis impedimentum.

Why do you not then make a ſerious reſolution to forſake all theſe weakneſſes, and devote your ſelf for ſome good time to conſtancy? You anſwer: It cannot be done, we are in the Court, We are in the world, we live in the kingdom of inconſtancy, what means have we to deliver our ſelves from theſe laws? If we were Hermits, our recreation would be to tell the hours of the day, and to make them ours by a prudent Oeconomie; but here we follow the wind of neceſſity, the torrent of ſociety tranſporteth us, we no longer are our ſelves. It is a lamentable thing, to put purpoſely the diſeaſe into deſpair, for fear of recure. How unjuſt are we to accuſe all that which is about us, and ever to ſpare our culpable heads: we complain of the time, which ſlideth away from us, places, and ſocieties do us wrong, which would be ever profitable if we would our ſelves; the buſineſſes kill us, which we might make the inſtruments of virtue; all things afflict us; we accuſe Heaven, and Earth, and have no burthen more weighty then our ſelves. What neceſſity is there to lay the faults of your own levity upon things inſenſible? Your inconſtancy is your vice, it is your own nature. Were it not a goodly thing to behold the Tarand (a creature, which Ariſtotle, and Philo ſpeaketh of) who paſſing through a garden taketh ſo many colours as there are divers Plants, to complain, that theſe Herbs, and not his own skin do wrong to him, who is mutable, and penetrable with all ſorts of impreſſions? This happeneth not to any other creatures, why to him? Wherefore ſhould the Polypus and Camelion conteſt againſt objects? A thouſand gallant Courtiers, a thouſand perſons of Quality have lived, and ſtill live all their days in aſſemblies, in affairs, with a life ſo regular, that all goeth in meaſure, and compaſs: the days and nights have not more equality in the Equinoctial, then they in all their manages of affairs. And you through a certain remiſneſs of heart, weakneſs, a falſe Idea, or rather through a very ſoothing of Nature, ſuffer your ſelves to run without bridle upon all occaſions (changeable creatures) reſembling the various colours of the Dove's breaſt, which one knoweth not how to diſtinguiſh. See you not, that this is to betray your own manhood? What ought you to do to avoid this Obſtacle?

Ariſt. Περὶ ζώων μεμ. ἀνάτ. Philo libro De Temulentia.

Excuſe of Courtiers.

Anſwer.

Firſt, to enter into your ſelves to conſider what paſſeth there, to behold from what root, from what ſource this tumultuary life proceedeth, to take away the cauſe, to ſuppreſs the effect.

To apprehend ſeriouſly the end for which man is created, to bend all your ſinews and arteries to arrive thither, to uſe creatures as means and inſtruments of happieneſs, by the way of uſe, not fruition.

To purge the ſoul from ſins, which oftentimes raiſe this ſtorm, by a good general Confeſſion, and ſeriouſly cut off thoſe paſſions, which moſt ſeditiouſly aſſault you.

To accommodate all your daily actions by the adviſe of your Spiritual Father, and to make a good reſolution ſtrictly to obſerve it, as much as in you lieth.

To conſider, how many Pagans, to make themſelves eminently excellent in ſome facultie, have determined of their own meer motion to be confined to caverns, and ſhaved like fools, for avoidance of company, and retirement to that, which they intended; ſo did Demoſthenes the Oratour: why ſhould not we to ſave our ſouls do that, which he did to refine his language?

If any weakneſs occur after theſe good purpoſes, not to diſturb your ſelf for it, ſuppoſing conſtancy impoſſible, becauſe it falleth out you are inconſtant, to correct what is paſt, to order what is preſent, to prevent things to come, and to fortifie your ſelf even by falls.

The fifth OBSTACLE.

Diſſimulation.

ONe of the greateſt Obſtacles of virtue is, for that man liveth in the world as on a ſtage, perpetually with a Mask on his fore-head; every one would ſeem that which he is not, and none will

avow

avow what he is. Thoſe, which come neareſt to God, are the moſt ſimple, becauſe the Divine Nature is ſimplicity it ſelf. The moſt remote are the moſt double, and palliated. This ſimplicity, the prime virtue of Saints, which hath gilded the face of the golden Age with its rays, is ſo alienated from the cuſtom of our times, that not ſo much as the name thereof is known. It is taken to be ſopperie, although it be the quinteſſence of Prudence. To be ſimple is to make the heart accord with the tongue, and hands. It is to have in all your deportments a natural, and genuine ſincerity, exempt from fraud, from vanity, and hypocriſie. It is a thing almoſt as rare in Court, as a white Raven; the maſk is better beloved then the viſage, the reſemblance then the eſſence, opinion then conſcience. The moſt part of Courtiers are Monſters with two tongues, and two hearts; few are there, which take not Amphiaraus Deviſe the quite contrary way, who ſaid, he would be, and not ſeem. At this day in matter of virtue men better love ſeem what they are not, then to be what they ſeem. It were a ridiculous vanity, ſaid Saint Gregory Nazianzen, if an Ant ſhould take an Ape for a Lion, and the poor Ape ſhould afterwards fall into the throat of the Wolf, it ſhould be ſmall contentment, to be eſteemed by this little creature a Lion in fantaſie, and to be devoured by this other beaſt in verity. And yet notwithſtanding corrupt depraved nature doth elect all her virtues, and felicities in picture, and puniſhments in eſſence. I have much wondered at an antient Medal, which Villalpand in his Epiſtle in the Frontiſpiece of his Book, which he dedicated to Philip the Third, King of Spain, affirmeth to have fallen into his hands. In this Medal was ſeen on one ſide the magnificent Temple of Jeruſalem, with certain Hebrew Characters much deformed with ruſt; on the other ſide there was the figure of Mark Anthony, well engraven, with this Inſcription, SOLOMON. This invention came from Herod, a great flatterer of Roman Princes, on whom he ſaw his Fortunes depended, and verily he followed Mark Anthonie's Standard, while good ſucceſs waited on his colours, but afterwards beholding, that all yielded to the victorious arms of Auguſtus Cæſar, he ſought, and obtained his favour by all poſſible ſubtile endeavours. Howſoever he cauſed this beautiful Medal to be made, which gave to the verieſt ſot among Princes the name of the wiſeſt amongſt Kings, and Mark Anthony, who neither had Piety, nor Religion in his ſoul, beheld himſelf even willingly ſtamped in this coyn, as the true Guardian, and Church-warden of the Temple of God: ſo much man affecteth the very ſhadows of good, after he hath loſt the ſubſtance. At this day this paſſion outragiouſly predominateth even to furie; in all places there is nothing, but counterfeiting, and affectations. Hypocriſie reigneth in painting, in habits, Hypocriſie is in complements, Hypocriſie is in buſineſſes, Hypocriſie lodgeth in all ages, all ſexes, all conditions; Hypocriſie goeth even to Altars. Ambition, avarice, luxury, and other vices, although deeply rooted, forſakes man, when he forſakes himſelf, it is onely Hypocriſie, which attendeth him to his grave, and will ſleep under his aſhes: ſo many golden lies are witneſſes thereof, which perpetually do enſhrine carkaſſes. Man is ſo made to ſeem what he is not, and to diſſemble that which he is, ſo double, and ſo repleniſhed with mutable eſſences, that he himſelf is deceived in himſelf, and taketh himſelf for other then he is. Men are not contented to corrupt their apparel, their language, hair, viſage, ſoul, body, ſciences, arts, but they alſo will violate virtues, the daughters of the Divinity; they deſpoil them of their natural plumes to cloath vice. If there be exceſs of cruelty in the chaſtiſement of ſome crime, it is called juſtice; if choler be predominant, it is termed zeal; if effeminacy of heart creep in, it is entituled meekneſs; prodigality borroweth the name of mercy; niggardlineſs, of good-husbandry; cowardiſe, of prudence; obſtinacy, of conſtancy; inconſtancy, of facility, and circumſpection; weakneſs of courage, of humility; pride, of liberty; lazineſs, of tranquillity; diſturbance of ſpirit, of vigilancy; precipitation, of fervour; dulneſs, of good counſel; and not to keep promiſe with any man is ſaid to be equal with all men.

Saint Gregory the Great excellently moralizeth this in the book of Job, where he ſheweth, that the moſt part of men are all griſtle, which hath the reſemblance of bones, but not the ſolidity of bones; they have the appearance of virtue, but not the firmneſs. What remedy is there for this abuſe deep-rooted in Nature? I will onely produce two Reaſons, well worthy of conſideration. Firſt, that (ſpeaking to noble hearts) it ſeemeth to me it is to produce a moſt irrefragable motive of deteſtation of any vice, when the baſeneſs, and ignominie thereof is diſcovered: for that is it, which hath moſt power over generous ſpirits. Now ſo it is, this Hypocriſie, which maketh you (O Noblemen) always to live diſguiſed, is quite contrary to the condition of a brave, and generouſly-elated ſpirit. Becauſe, if it be impreſſed with a good ſtamp, it naturally loveth the liberty, and freedom, which unavoidably is oppreſſed in theſe palliations, crouchings, and counterfeitings. They are the tricks of Apes, and Foxes, and in no ſort are ſuitable to the nature of a generous Lion.

Beſides, ſeeing God openeth unto us the great book of the world, as a piece of Parchment gilded, and traced with his Pencil, for us therein to read that which is for our inſtruction, if we will conſider diligently the moſt ſublime things, we ſhall find they naturally ſtrike at this vanity, which maketh you to diſplay apparences to the eyes of men outwardly, having nothing ſolid within. It ſeemeth, that all the maſter-pieces of this celeſtial, and elementary world, as it were by a common conſent, do hide all what they have of moſt eminency, and worth, bearing for Deviſe: I hide the better part. It is true, that Heaven ſheweth it ſelf wholly relucent in ſtars, and brightneſs, but covereth his powerful influences, which by their ſecret extent give motion to this great houſe of Nature. It is true, the Air maketh his Meteors to appear to the view of the whole world; but this ſecret virtue, which doth penetrate us even to the heart, and bringeth life, and refreſhment to us upon its wings, who can tell me what colour it is of? The Fire unfoldeth his flames unto us: but this commanding heat, which conquereth, and ſofteneth the hardeſt metals, do we behold it? The calm Sea delighteth us with his ſmiling countenance, at that time eſpecially when it becometh (as it were) friſled and curled by ſome gracious and gentle gale, and coloured with the beams of a bright Sun, which beat upon it; but this luſtruous beauty, what is it in compariſon of the treaſures, which he concealeth in the ſtore-houſes of his abyſſes? The earth it ſelf likewiſe maketh her boaſt in the Spring, varied and enameled with her natural pieces of painting, and ſparkled with a thouſand petty flowers, which ſtand as the eyes of the meadows; but theſe do eclipſe each evening, and morning. Quite contrary, the Metals, which the earth encloſeth, and as it were engulpheth in her entrails, after they are Simplicity the chief virtue of Saints.

What it is to be ſimple.

Οὐ δοκεῖν, ἀλλὰ εἶναι. Deviſe of Amphiaraus. Greg. Nazian. in Iambic.

Τί γὰρ μικρὸν κύδος, εἰ δοκεῖ λέων;

A rare Medal of Mark Anthonie.

The kingdom of Hypocriſie.

Greg. Moral. 3. c. 22. Job 40. Sunt nonnulla vitia, quæ oſtendunt in ſe rectitudinis ſpeciem, ſed ex pravitatis prodeunt infirmitate.

Reaſons againſt Hypocriſie.

Baſeneſs of this vice.

Hypocriſie confuted in the great book of the world.

Parte ſui meliore latent.

Counterfeit virtues.

wrought, and poliſhed by the artful hands of Lapidaries, retain a luſtre of a long date, which reſplendently ſhine upon cup-boards of Kings, and the Great men of the earth. What leſſon of nature is this, to hide all, which it hath of greateſt value? And what corruption of nature in man, to hold in the bottom of his heart ſtench, and dung-hills, and to plaiſter it over with a vain hypocriſie?

Hypocriſie condemned by the laws of heaven. Sport of God, and what. 1 Cor. 1. Quæ ſtulta ſunt mundi elegit Deus, ut confundat ſapientes; & infirma mundi elegit Deus, ut confundat fortia; & ignobilia mundi, & contemptibilia elegit Deus, & ea quæ non ſunt, ut ea quæ ſunt deſtrueret.

God hath not onely imprinted this verity, of which I ſpeak, in the great book of nature, but he hath, as it were, engraven, and ſtamp'd it with his hand, in the monuments of the old, and new Law. The paſtimes of Great men are Theatres, Tiltyards, and Amphitheatres; and the ſport of the Divine wiſdom in this Univerſe is to hide treaſures under the bark, and mantle of ſome perſons, baſe, and abject in apparence. In the old Law a ſtammering ſhepheard is choſen to carry the word to a Monarch, to ſhake, and overturn with a poor wand the Pillars of his Empire, to divide Seas, to calm Billows, to open the bowels of Rocks, to command all the Elements, and fill the world with wonders. In the new Law ſimple fiſher-men, almoſt as dumb, and mute as the fiſhes themſelves, are choſen to catch in their nets Philoſophers, Kings, Cities, Provinces, and Empires. Behold the ordinary cuſtom of God to hold Pearls in ſhels, ſweet perfums in very abject boxes. The true mark of Greatneſs in the judgment of God is at firſt bluſh externally not to appear great. On the contrary, it is the act of a flat, ridiculous, and benummed vanity, to be deſirous to ſurprize the eyes with a counterfeit, and captious beauty, which afterward, appearing in its native colours, makes the deformity thereof the more disfigured.

Deformity of hypocriſie.

What a ſhameful thing it is to a heart, which hath never ſo little reſentment of nobility, to erect a reſplendent Sepulchre, to boaſt exteriourly marbles, gildings, characters, titles, and to have nothing within but bones, putrefaction, and aſhes; to caſt a certain luſtre through the ignorance, and obſcurity of an Age, become brutiſh, and then to be in effect but a ſilly worm; to live in the world as a Snail, to make long ſilver traces, and to be nothing elſe but froth; to have the back covered with Velvet like a Cuſhion, and the Belly ſtuffed with hay; to make oſtent of leaves, and verdure like a wood, and to be repleniſhed with Serpents! Is it poſſible, that a noble heart, when it hath no other ſuper-viſour, but its own conſcience, can ſuffer theſe ſhames? A gentile ſpirit ſaid to an old man, who cauſed his griſly hairs to be painted with the luſtre of green youth: Poor fool, although thou could'ſt deceive the whole world with thy hair, yet Death well knoweth they are gray. So when an Hypocrite ſhall happen to conceal his jugling from all thoſe, who accompany him, which indeed cannot be done (men now being endued with penetrating eyes) yet one cannot deceive the eye of his conſcience, quick-ſighted to pierce ſuch falſhoods with bright reflection. I ſay nothing of the ſhame, and ignominy, that muſt be undergone after it is diſcovered, and taken with the maner, like a cut-purſe: I ſpeak nothing of the racks, tortures, affrightments, and perplexities, in which they live, who deſire to entertain theſe ſeemings. A great wit hath well ſaid, that ſuch people are the oxen of Baal, who are cut for Sacrifice in little gobbets, but notwithſtanding receive not fire from Heaven; theſe miſerable creatures macerate, and kill themſelves, to ſacrifice themſelves to the appetites of the world, without ever taſting the conſolations of God, which they have renounced. Let us lay their pains apart, let us admit, that with theſe laborious endeavours they might always live cloaked, always hidden from the eyes of the world, yea even from the all-piercing eye of their own conſcience:

Scit te Proſerpina cæcum.

Stephanus Edonſis in Reg. 3. 18.

It is moſt manifeſt, and conſiderable for the ſecond reaſon, that it is impoſſible to deceive God, whoſe eye, repleniſhed with lightning flaſhes, tranſpaſſeth through the abyſſes, and maketh Hell it ſelf confeſs it hath not darkneſs enough to ſhadow it from his face. Now ſo it is, that God condemneth, reproveth, chaſtiſeth with the particular indignation of his heart this plaiſtered life, and therefore, as the Interpreters of the Scripture obſerve, he rejected the Swan, notwithſtanding the whiteneſs of her feathers, and the ſweetneſs of note, which is aſcribed to her; nor would he ever admit her in the number of his victimes, becauſe under pure white feathers ſhe hideth a black fleſh. For the ſame reaſon he never would have the Oſtrich, who hath onely the oſtentuous boaſts of wings, and no flight: ſo much he deteſteth apparence fruitleſs, and effectleſs. Firſt, or laſt he will (ſaith holy Job) take away the maſk, ſo that the life of Hypocrites ſhall be as the Spider's web in the judgment of God; they ſhall think they have ſped well, but even to have hidden themſelves: all ſhall be reſolved into nothing, to make them appear what they are, in a moſt ignominious nakedneſs. They now are Panthers, who have their skins ſpotted with mirrours, that ſearch out ſecret Fountains to waſh away the ordures, and impreſſions of their crimes, as it is related of this creature. But the day of God will come, when (as the Prophet Iſaiah ſaith) the Panther's waters ſhall wholly be dried, and ſoaked up; that is to ſay, as Ailredus interpreteth it, that all the counterfeitings, and diſſimulations of the world ſhall find no more water to whiten them. We all naturally fear the publication of our vices: ſo ſenſible we are in the touches of Honour.

2. Reaſon.

Lev. 11. 18. The Swan, and the Oſtrich rejected by God.

Job 18. 19.

Waters of Panthers. Iſaiah 15. Aquæ Nimrim ſic-cabuntur.

Thoſe poor Mileſian Maids, who, moved with enraged deſpair, ran to halters, and ſteepy precipices, could never be diverted from this fury, either by the ſweet admoniſhment of their Parents, or rigorous menaces of Judges: but when by decree the naked bodies of thoſe, who had violated the law of nature by this moſt wicked attempt, were caſt upon the dung-hill, the onely apprehenſion of nakedneſs, and of the nakedneſs of a body bereaved of ſenſe, ſtayed the courſe of theſe execrable frenzies. And, without ſpeaking of antient Hiſtories, William Biſhop of Lyons relateth, that a certain Damoſel painted, in an Age when ſimplicity was in great eſteem, as ſhe went along in a Proceſſion, behold by chance an Ape came out of a ſhop, who leaped on her ſhoulders, and took off her coif, and made a little deformity appear, covered under painting, and diſſimulation, whereby ſhe felt her ſelf over-whelmed with dolour, and confuſion. If the ſmall affronts, and diſgraces, which we receive in the world, have ſo much force, what will it be then, when the Sovereign Judg ſhall take away the ſcarf, and make a cauterized conſcience appear? What will it be, when with as many Torches, and burning Lights, as there then ſhall be of Angels, and of the elect by his ſide, he ſhall penetrate even to the bottom of a loſt Soul? Where then ſhall be his plaiſterings, where his diſſimulations, and hypocriſies in the abyſs of this confuſion? It is a thing, which we rather may meditate on in ſilence, then expreſs in words.

Trick of an Ape.

Upon theſe Conſiderations reſolve with your ſelves to build your ſalvation upon the firm rock of truth, and not on a vain reputation, upon the ſlippery moving ſands of humane apparences. Imitate that that good King, Father of St. Lewis, who bare a Sceptre made like an Obelisk in a Ring, with this Deviſe, Volo ſolidum perenne: as who ſhould ſay, all his intentions aimed at heaven, and eternity.

Typotius in Symbol.

Make a determinate purpoſe, as much as poſſibly you may, to avoid in your apparel, in your hair, in your words, in your actions, all ſorts of affectation, of hypocriſie, of folly, as things baſe, ſottiſh, ridiculous, and wicked, ever remembering this ſentence of St. Auguſtine: A great, and divine Virtue is to deceive no man: the laſt, and moſt miſchievous of all vices is to deceive the whole world.

Aug. lib. 83. Quæſt. Summa & divina virtus eſt neminem decipere: ultimum vitium eſt quemlibet decipere.

The ſixth OBSTACLE.

Ill-husbanding of Time.

A Notable Fable maketh the Spider, and the Silk-worm to ſpeak together, telling their fortune in a pretty pleaſing maner, and greatly repleniſhed with moral inſtruction. The poor Spider complaineth ſhe laboureth night, and day, to make her Webs, with ſo much fervour, and diligence, that ſhe unbowels her ſelf, pouring forth her ſubſtance, and ſtrength to accompliſh her work: yet notwithſtanding her endeavour ſo little proſpereth, as that, after ſhe hath brought this her Web to perfection, a ſilly ſervant cometh with a Broom, and in an inſtant undoes what ſhe could not produce perhaps ſcarcely in ten years. But if it happen ſhe eſcape from this perſecution, which ſeldom is ſeen in Great mens houſes, yet all the fruit ſhe may expect from ſo much toyl, is but to take ſome wretched Flie in her Web. Behold you not herein ſufficient cauſe to bewail her miſery? The Silk-worm quite contrary boaſteth her ſelf to be one of the moſt happy creatures, which lives on the face of the earth. For (ſaith he) I am ſought after as if I were a pretious Diamond, I am exported from foreign Countries, happy is he, who beſt can lodg, breed, entertain, and cheriſh me; men bend all their induſtry to ſerve my eaſefull repoſe, and commodities. If I travel, my pain is well beſtowed: but be it how you will (ſilly Spider) that you take Flies, I captivate Kings. The greateſt Monarchs of the earth are involved in my threeds; Queens, and great Ladies make of my works the entertainment of their beauties; and the Potentates, which will not depend upon any, are dignified by a little Worm. The four corners of the earth divide my labours with admiration; and not being able to go higher, although I reach not to Heaven, yet I behold the Altars glitter under the embelliſhments, which iſſue from my entrails. And verily there is great difference between the travel of the Spider, and pain of the Silk-worm. The induſtry of theſe two little creatures doth naturally figure unto us two ſorts of perſons, whereof the one laboureth for vanity, the other for verity. All men, coming into this life, enter thereinto as into a Shop of toil, which is as natural to them, as flight for Birds. A great man, after he had well conſidered this ſentence of Job, cauſed theſe words to be inſcribed upon his Tomb, well worthy of ponderation, that is to ſay: Man entereth into being by the gate of not being, as he, who is as ſoon in ſin, as in nature, his birth is a puniſhment, his life a travel, and his death a neceſſity.

A notable Fable.

Adamus de Sancto Victore.

A worthy Epitaph.

Conceptio culpa, naſci pœna, neceſſe mori.

And very well Tertullian obſerveth, that God the Creatour, cloathing man with skins after his fall, (which is the attire of ſlaves, and ſervitours, whom we ſend to delve in Mines) thereby would ſignifie to him, he ſhould enter into the world, as into a Mine, to labour, and dig, until he had found a Tomb. This pain then being neceſſarily reſolved upon, one of the moſt important points for direction of life is, to take a good emploiment, and well to beſtow your time, ſince through want of this good endeavour life is filled with a buſie ſluggiſhneſs, with unprofitable labours, with remorſe, with ſhame, which oftentimes draggeth after it an eternity of pain. It is one of the greateſt confuſions, which at this day predominateth in the lives, and actions of men of Quality. Some are overwhelmed with affairs, even from morning till night, and think upon every thing, but themſelves. Others roll in a lazineſs, full of moſt vain occupations, and never underſtand the principal buſineſs, which is the point of their ſalvation. We greatly fail either in knowledg, or courage, to handle one of the chief paſſages of our life, which is the expenſe of time; we, do as one in elder time ſaid: We labour in the main point, as if it were but an acceſſory, and we afterward take the acceſſory, as if it were the principal. All the petty trifles, which concern the eaſe, and accomodation of our bodies, have their regular time, and ſeldom are forgotten, drinking, eating, ſleeping, ſporting, exerciſe that pleaſeth, be it never ſo painfull, have their ſeaſon; the affair of ſalvation hath none at all, if it take not ſome ſmall time even by ſtealth. Behold how corruption is engendered, that may be remedied by the conſideration of two, or three reaſons, which I will propoſe unto you.

Two great obſtacles of ſalvation.

Athen. lib. 4. Ἔρσον ὡς παρεργον, παρεργον ὡς ἔργον.

First know, it is true what the Wiſe man ſaid: You oftentimes complain of divers neceſſities of life, one ſaith, he hath need of health, another of liberty, another of credit, another of favour, another of apparel, another of money: no man deploreth, that he hath need of time, which indeed is the moſt pretious merchandize. And yet notwithſtanding Zeno aſſured us, the thing, which man moſt wanted in this life, was Time. One cannot better approve the value, which is to be ſet upon any thing, then by ſhewing the rarity, and neceſſity of it. Time is not onely pretious, but abſolutely neceſſary. Then think whether you ought to hold it dear, or not. Time is very hard to be known, how difficult (think you) will it then be to poſſeſs it? All the brave ſpirits of the world have voluntarily put themſelves upon the torture, onely to diſcover what Time was; yet could they not ſo much as touch the wings thereof. Pythagoras ſaid, it was the Soul of the world; others, that it was Heaven; others, that it was Motion; others, the Meaſure of Motion. St. Auguſtine, a moſt admirable Wit, ſtruggleth with himſelf upon this Queſtion, as a Bird in a ſtring: He ſaith, he knoweth, and he knoweth not, what Time is. He knows enough to hold his peace, and knoweth not enough to ſpeak. I leave for you to think, if this ſpirit, all compoſed of fire, and lightning, could not know Time, how can you have it in your power? The Scripture compareth it to a moſt ſwift River, which cometh not, but to paſs along, and creepeth not, but to glide away. All mortals, little, and great, ſtand on the brink of this River, to fiſh for Time. But do you know with what inſtrument? With a Sive; which is the cauſe, that they hold nothing. One fiſheth ten years, another twenty, another thirty, another fourty, another fourſcore. Out alaſs! All hath paſſed through a Sive, there remaineth nothing for them; yea, even the little Infant, hanging on the Teat of his Nurſe, which he had ſucked but one day, as yet hath no more. There remains but a poor moment, which we hold as an Eel in our hands: at every turn it eſcapeth from us; one moment driveth another, as the wave of the Sea thruſteth forward the wave. You ſee, this Merchandize is very hard to be kept, and to recover ſuch a loſs is a thing humanly impoſſible. To Reaſons, and Remedies.

Senec. ep. 1. Quem mihi dabis, qui aliquod pretium tempori ponat, qui dies æſtimet, qui intelligat ſe quotidiè mori?

Nature the price of Time.

Ψυχὴ τῆς παντὸς.

Aug. Confeſſ. lib. 11. cap. 41. Quid eſt tempus, ſi nemo ex me quærat, ſcio: ſi quærenti explicare velim, neſcio.

Pſal. 71. 10. ubi Vulgata, Deus pleni. Hebr. aqua plena. River of Time.

Eſdræ 4. 3. 39.

meaſure

meaſure the wind, to weigh the flame, to call back a day paſſed, are three effects of like impoſſibility. God hath reſerved to himſelf the government of this great Dial of the world; he himſelf figureth out the hours, and will give this commiſſion to no man. If the Sun was ſtayed in the time of Joſhua, it was done, ſaith Saint Chryſoſtom, in reverence of the name of Jeſus, of whom this great Captain was the Figure.

Jam tum fumulata videbant Sidera venturum, præmiſſo nomine, Jeſum. Sedulius. Iſai. 38. 8. Stephanus.

If it recoiled back ten degrees in the time of Ezechias, it was to ſignifie the myſtery of the Incarnation, when the eternal Word abaſed himſelf under the nine Quires of Angels, even to the uniting himſelf to humane Nature, the tenth, and laſt of reaſonable creatures. This large Dial of Heaven is not touched, but for the great, and various motions of the world, and the principal myſteries of our Faith: to think ſuch a change ſhould be made for you, were a great folly. Take time while the Sun ſtriketh on your line; if you will put the hand of the Dial upon the hour of the preſent day, you ſhall not depend upon the expected approach of to morrow. See you not, if one rend a Garment, it is made up again; if a Jewel be loſt, it may be found again; if an Houſe be burnt, it is re-edified again, many times much fairer then ever it was. There is nothing, ſave time, but returneth; you ſhall ſooner find the Philoſopher's ſtone, then time loſt. All riches are but as chaff in compariſon of time. There is no worſe Thief, then he that ſtealeth from himſelf ſo unvaluable a Merchandize, either in doing ill, or in doing nothing.

Time irrecoverable.

Neceſſity of time.

The ſecond Reaſon, which makes this eſtimation of time ſo recommendable, is the neceſſity we have of it. King Antigonus ſpake wiſely, when he ſaid his War was the warfare of Time, as well as of Arms. And very properly may we ſay the ſame. All our Chriſtian warfare, all our Martial diſcipline, all our exploits conſiſt in laying hold of opportunity, and well-husbanding of Time. A little time well employed, which will be found at the day of our death, in our own hands, can put us in poſſeſſion of a happy eternity. If you have not time, well may you have Rivers of Gold, and Magazines of Pearls, but Heaven you ſhall never have.

Greg. Nazian. in Jambicis. Παντὸς ὑπερτίμιον νομίζω τὸν δὲ τὸν βίον. Merchandize in requeſt in the other world.

Saint Gregory Nazianzen doth ſagely tell us, that life is an open Fare for all the world to trade in. And verily it is an admirable Mart, where the Merchants, if they will be well adviſed, may barter a vale of tears for a Paradiſe of delicacies, Earth for Heaven, and a moment for eternity. All conſiſteth in well-uſing time; this is the onely Merchandize in requeſt in the other world, to which we go. Some infinitely labour to adorn themſelves with the Mire, and Durt of the Indies, to wit, with Gold, and Silver, which is as abſurd a folly, as if one, to climb to Heaven, ſhould make himſelf wings of a Scutle filled with earth. Others hunt after Glory, and honour of the world, which is but a meer counterfeit ſemblance, in compariſon of the happineſs of Saints; yet they, notwithſtanding, would carry it to Heaven; as if one ſhould undertake to bring by wagon a veſſel of ſtinking water an hundred leagues off, to make ſale of it, where ſtreams run of eternal Fountains. Will you know the Merchandize, which is of ſale in Heaven? Tribulation, for there is none: and Time, for there is nothing but eternity. Carry thither a little pain patiently born, a little time well employed, and behold, you become rich for ever.

Judg now, if time be ſo eſtimable, and neceſſary for your ſalvation, what value you ſhould ſet upon it, and whether it be not an intolerable thing to waſt it in fopperies, and trifles. Time is ill-husbanded by three ſorts of people. Some employ it in doing ill; others in doing nothing; the reſt in doing too much. In doing ill, the vitious; in doing nothing, the idle; in doing too much, the vain, and unhappy. All are, as it were, equal in loſing time, although unequal in the maner of loſing it, and in the reward for having loſt it. And, not to ſpeak here at all either of crimes, or negligences, (which are two dangerous Rocks for the Ship, which tranſporteth Time) ſome ſigh under a true lazineſs, but painfull, and ſtraitened; others are delighted with vanities, and meer follies; many are involved in buſineſs up to the elbow, and yet, becauſe they do not take their aim well (in that they do not travel for Heaven, and are wholly ignorant of the place, & path of the rendezvous) all their life is a moſt labourſom loitering. They make much ado, as little children about Butter-flies. They run up and down like Rats, who are infinitely buſie to carry rotten a Nut into their hole. They ſtrive, as Fiſhes in a Pond, to take the bit one from another. They wander backward, and forward, like Ants upon the body of a Tree. Others make fools of themſelves with meer Bables, and it is a wonder to behold the childiſhneſs, and Apiſh tricks of employments, which are found in the lives of men of eminent quality. See in the antient Hiſtories of Domitian, upon whoſe ſhoulders God had placed the burthen of a vaſt Empire, yet, laying aſide all other affairs, he every day reſerved ſome hours to himſelf, to ſtick Flies through with a Bodkin, and thereunto intended as to one of the moſt ſerious affairs of his Kingdom. Hartabus, King of the Hyrcans, caught Moles; Bias, King of the Lydians, ſtabbed Frogs; Æropus, King of the Macedonians, made Lanterns. Behold you not goodly employments for Kings?

Labor ſtultorum affliget eos, qui neſciunt in urbem pergere. Eccleſ. 10. Inconſultus illis vanusque curſus eſt, qualis formicis per arborem repentibus, qua in ſummum cacumen, deinde in imum, inanes agantur. Senec. cap. 12. De Tranq. The idle employment of ſome Great men. See Guevara.

Are not there (I pray) as very triflers to be found amongſt Chriſtian Nobility at this day? We ſee men even in this Age, who waſte all their time in combing their Hair, in waſhing their Beards, in ſtriving to have their Stockins ſprucely put on, to new-hatch their Swords, to draw on new Boots, to enquire for rich Garters, to make proviſion of Girdles, and Hangers, to cheapen Beaver-Hats, to buy Feathers, to trample up and down the Streets, to hold a Racket, to play at Dice, to Dance the Cinque-apace, to gourmandize a Banquet, to throw rotten Orenges at one another, to prattle with Women, to vant of that, which they have never done, to envie the happy, to contemn the miſerable, to breath perpetually out of one and the ſame mouth either calumny, or ſcoffs; never to utter a ſerious word, as if one had abjured all reaſon; and laſtly, never to ſpeak well, but when they intend to ſpeak ill. What an unfortunate, and travantly kind of life is this? When ſuch kind of men have ended their courſe, deſerve they not to have the Epitaph of an Ape inſcribed on their Tombs, ſince they ſervilely have thus betrayed their manhood?

Idleneſs the buſineſs of ſome Great men.

On the other ſide, we behold Women, who have no other Trade, but to think on new-faſhions for apparel, to buy Stuffs, to make thereof rich Petty-coats, and Gowns, to bargain for Jewels, and Pretious-ſtones, to raiſe their Chopinos higher, to look in their Glaſs above an hundred times in one day, to call a Councel upon one hair of their head, to have Angel-water, the powder of Cypreſs, to be ever learning ſome new invention of Impoſture to bear on their foreheads, which God himſelf hath conſigned with his own finger to be the ſeat of ſhamefacedneſs, to deviſe curioſities in their chambers, and to complain of all the world, to ſooth their own impatience, to brave it through the ſtreets in their Coaches, to roam up and down to Goſſipings, and Child-

Child-bed women, to tattle with spruce Carpet-knights, to search through impertinent curiosity into all kind of businesses, to know nothing, and to speak of all things, to deafen half the world with their chattering, and to hold the other in breath, and study to do them service, to bestow a fourth part of their life in cloathing, and attiring themselves, another in babling, another in dancing, and playing, the rest in sleeping; what remaineth for God?

Behold goodly husbanding of time! behold how the Exchequer of God is managed! and then who will be amazed to see, that a life spent in these goodly exercises, and employments, is repleniſhed with darkness, with confusion, with a sluggish, and lamentable forgetfulness of the life to come? The remedy for this disorder is to consider,

Remedies. I. How many damned souls do now groan in flames, which all the Oceans cannot extinguish, for having contemned time, which you yet enjoy at your ease. He, that could onely grant to them one little moment of these excellent days, which you prodigally waste, through what thorns, what fires, what ice would not they pass, to expiate the errours of their passed life? From what Sceptres, what Empires, what Diadems, would not they voluntarily, and freely despoil themselves, to purchase one hour of time, and employ it in the rigours of a most austere penance? Yet you suppose, it may be lawfull for you to live in this childish stupidity.

II. How many think you, at the very instant, when you read these lines, are there of souls newly dislodged from bodies, brought to the Tribunal of God, condemned to flames for this ill expense of time? What know you at how little a threed the sword of Justice hangeth over your heads? And you notwithstanding resemble Snails, which sing when their houses are on fire.

III. Take so much pain to avoid an eternal unhappiness, as to raise to your self a little treasure out of the thrift of time, by taking every day, be it never so little leisure, to retire your self within your self, to behold from whence you come, and whither you go, and what passeth within you; study in the Book of your Conscience, which must be laid open, and perhaps sooner then you think for.

IV. Prepare couragiously, by the advise of those, who guide your Conscience, a little Oeconomy of all your actions in the day; keep them strictly, as much as you may possible, and if you happen to lose time, do not like spend-thrifts, who lose, and know not what they lose; see why, and how you lose, that you may seasonably give remedy thereunto.

The seventh OBSTACLE.

Intemperance of Tongue.

THis super-abundance of time, and idleness, which ordinarily is amongst Courtiers, doth undoubtedly cause in them so violent an overlashing of tongue, that now a-days it swelleth like another deluge overflowing all mankind. Enagrius, a good Authour, cited by Melissa in the Bibliotheke of the Fathers, hath produced a passage very remarkable, to wit, that among Trees the Almond blossometh first of all, and is the first that is pinched with Frost; and amongst the parts of man the tongue first of all cometh forth to the field, and is the first surprised in the snares of Satan. If all those, who at this present might be taxed for their tongues, should lose the use thereof, the world would be repleniſhed with dumb men; but the evil Spirit handleth his business much otherwise then the Fowlers. These catch Birds to bereave them of liberty: he layeth hold on the tongue, to give it a false freedom to speak all things. Three sorts of tongues at this day are most powerfully predominant in the occasions of the World; the vain, the slanderous, and the scoffing.

Enagrius apud Melissam. The tongue compared to the Almond-tree.

The vain seemeth to me to have been mystically signified by the Prophet Isaiah under the Title of a feathered Cymbal. The Cymbal was an Instrument composed of thin plates of Brass, with certain small bars of Iron fastened, and cross-billitted in the plates, wherewith they made a great noise. Others think the Cymbals were Bels, which according to the opinion of some were consecrated to the service of the Church by Pope Sabinian. It is not at this day, that Bells are in request, but as for feathered Bells, they are things unheard of. And yet, notwithstanding, the tongue is not onely a Bell, according to the Allegorical interpretation of the words of the Prophet, but a feathered Bell. The Bell goeth not out of its Steeple; but the Tongue cannot contain it self in its Palate. She maketh her self wings by the help of feathers, and paper, and after endeavoureth to pass the Seas, and to bear fire very far into the world. A slight word, spoken merrily in the secret retirement of a closet, shall sometimes be told again an hundred leagues off, and shall enkindle in the hearts of many a fire able to put all into combustion. The tongue of the Cymbal, as it is a Cymbal, is not the worst, it offendeth more through complacence then malice. It is a tongue truly vain, which feedeth it self with a petty affectation of discourse, with slight Lies, with trifling flatteries, with prattle, and tattle. In this predicament we ordinarily place the tongues of indiscreet women. The Giants, after the inundation of waters, would build the Tower of Babel; but Women in the deluge of tongues raise the Turrets of Babble: through an excess of idleness, indiscretion, and curiosity. In the same rank are the tongues of an infinite number of effeminate Gallants, who waste all their time in courting women, complements, affectations, meer fopperies: had they no other ill in them, then never to pronounce a serious word, yet are they culpable enough; but lying, and flattery wait on them, as the shadow doth on the body. A great note of the corruption of this Age is the liberty of Lying, which reigneth even in the mouths of many men of Quality. It seemeth now a-days that to lie is no longer a vice, but a necessity of nature. The Sages termed Truth to be a Sea which is never moved, a Haven where no man suffereth ship-wrack, a Way which wearieth not, a Gate which never is shut against any: but at this present it is a Sea where few Merchants sail, a Haven little frequented, a Way which to many seemeth to be stopped up with thorns and briars, and a Gate which almost is never opened.

Isaiah 18. Va terræ. cymbalo alarum.

The tongue a feathered Bell.

The tongue of the cymbal.

Otiosæ, verbosæ, curiosæ, loquentes quæ non oportet. 1 Tim. 5. 13.

Verity.

It is said, Augustus Cæsar, after a long enquiry into all parts of his Empire, found but one man, who was accounted never to have told a Lie, for which cause he was deemed capable and worthy to be the Sacrificer in the Temple of Truth. If at this day the like Inquisition should be made, I much fear the Altar of Verity would rather be without a Priest, then the Shrine of Lies without Victims. Little Children, in their beginning, practise this Trade; the spirit of Imposture openeth the way unto them by the tongue, making them in Lies to find the key of all Vices. In speaking falsely one is so accustomed to lying, that he liveth therein, as in his proper element. It is practised with as much boldness, as a man would desire advantage to defend a just Verity: the ordinary proceeding of these counterfeit spirits will make us henceforth believe, that to aſſure a thing with ſo much confidence is to affirm it is falſe.

Lying the key of Vice.

make

Impertinent prattle.

Lies are moſt eſpecially every where predominant in prattlings, and flatteries, which in my opinion are come to the height of extremity, ſo exorbitant they are. And it is no wonder, ſince the ſpirits of men are ſo diſpoſed thereunto, that thoſe, which have loſt all the marks, and impreſſions of Virtue, will yet retain the tribute, which is praiſe. They ſee themſelves voluntarily to babble, and ſelf-love hath veiled their eyes with ſo groſs an ignorance, that they may do it with much impudence, and yet it ſeem modeſty.

Va, qui conſuunt pulvillos ſub omni cubito manûs.

The malediction, pronounced by the Prophet Ezechiel againſt thoſe, who have little pillows of all ſorts for the nice to lean upon, may now well be renewed; never hath there been ſo many flatteries ſeen.

Flatteryinebriateth Great men from their cradle.

The children of Great men are ſoothed by all kind of tongues, and made drunk with their praiſes, before they be throughly awakened, and ſeeing they are always bred in curioſity, it ſeemeth, when any truth is propoſed them, a Phenix is brought from the other world. Servile ſouls, which bend themſelves like the Fiſher's angling-line, ſeeing their preferment dependeth upon their impertinent prating, and that the Altars of this falſe greatneſs will be ſerved with ſuch ſmoak, ſpare it no more then one would water in a River. You ſhall find few, or none, that will tell the Ape he is an Ape; this liberty of ſpeech is extant in Hiſtories, but not at all in our maners. The Gout ſeeketh out the houſes of rich voluptuous men, and Flattery the manſions of the eminent: that is it, which the Wiſe-man would ſay in the Proverbs, according to the Original Tranſlation. The Hebrews literally underſtand it by the Apes, which Solomon cauſed to be tranſported by Sea; with thoſe Apes came Flatterers, and Buffoons to the Court of this great King, which was the beginning of his unhappineſs. Thoſe which flatter, and thoſe which willingly are flattered, are much of the nature of the Ape, and all this tattle of Court is indeed a meer Apiſhneſs. Behold, why that learned Prelate Faius, whoſe Manu-ſcripts have very lately been extracted out of Libraries, doth moſt natively repreſent this verity unto us under the veil of a Fiction!

Prov. 30. Simia manibus nititur, & movetur in deorſum Regis.

Apes in the Court of Solomon.

Faius in Manipulo.

A pretty tale of an Ape.

He feigneth two men, the one an extreme Flatterer, the other juſt, and a Truth-ſpeaker, came to lodg in the houſe of an old Ape, at that time encompaſſed with a plentifull race. The Ape asked of the Flatterer what opinion he had of him. This man, accommodating himſelf to the time, gave him many ſpecious praiſes, ſaying, he was a vermilion Roſe, and thoſe that environed him were the leaves; that he was a Sun, and thoſe that were about him were the rays; that he was as valiant as a Lion, and all his off-ſpring was a race of young Lions. Behold, ſaith the Ape, it is well, and commanded a preſent to be given him. When it came to the truth-ſpeaker's turn to ſay ſomewhat, he revolved with himſelf, that he could not tell a Lie, that his nature was always to be true, that if his companion had a reward for telling a Lie, by much more reaſon he ſhould be welcome delivering the Truth. He thereupon freely ſaid to him, he was an Ape, and all thoſe that attended him were Apes like himſelf; for which cauſe the Apes, provoked, aſſailed him fiercely with their teeth, and nails. Behold the condition of this Age! we cannot brook a truth, our ears being always ſtopped with perfumed words, entertained with falſe praiſes, and ſervile complacences. Truth findeth no admittance, and, if happily ſhe hit upon it, her words are thorns, they tear the skin. The moſt indiſſoluble friendſhips in appearance are diſſolved by a little freedom of a friend. Then it is nothing ſtrange, if prating, and intemperance of tongue be in ſuch force, ſince the ſoft temper of ſpirits of this Time cannot endure any the leaſt liberty of ſpeech. As we are exceſſive in praiſes, ſo we hold no meaſure in reprehenſion. Thoſe, who are abſolutely ſenſible of the touches of honour, and cannot tolerate a truth, think that all other are inſenſible: ſo prodigal they are of another man's fame. They cut, carve, chop with the tongue on every ſide, and you may find a Feaſt, where more raw Fleſh is devoured, then either boiled, or roſted. Calumny doth at this preſent reſemble the tail of the Scorpion, which either ſlingeth, or ever is ready to transfix; it hath never been ſeen more fiercely inflamed. It is the wound of Frogs deſcribed in Exodus. It was a great ſcourge to behold theſe ugly creatures iſſuing out of Nilus, to go crawling up and down the ſilken furnitures, and golden plate of Pharaoh, as well as over the poor cottages of Beggars. And a greater puniſhment it is at this day, to hear theſe ſlanderous tongues pour forth their venom upon all ſorts of perſons, and to aſſail as well the Miters, the Diadems, and Scarlet, as the ruſſet Coat. Every one ſheweth the ſtroaks of calumny, every one, deriding Oil, and Balm for his wounds, doth notwithſtanding covertly hold a ſharp Lancet to wound another's eſtimation. The honour of Magiſtrates, of Ladies, of young Virgins, many times moſt innocent, is not ſpared, moſt faithfull ſervitours are traduced by the wiles of calumny; men are bold to ſpeak any thing, ſince many are willing to believe all. Verily behold the greateſt malignity, that can be in the minds of men, which is, that they are pleaſed to diſſemble an evil; and that, which hath no foundation of verity, findeth colour, and countenance from the mouth of a Calumniatour. Two evil ſpirits ordinarily breath out Calumny: the one planteth himſelf in the tongue of the detractour, the other in the ears of the hearer. They are two ſundry winds, whereof the one cometh from the gate, the other from the window. When they toſs this Tennis-ball one to another, you ſee terrible ſport.

Calumny.

Et aſcenderunt Rana, operueruntque terram Ægypti.

Slander, the wound of Frogs.

Fabius Declamat. Peſſimum humanarum mentium malum eſt, quod ſemper avidius nefanda fingunt, & affirmationem ſumit ex homine quidquid non habet ex veritate.

Two Devils breath out Calumny.

After Calumny cometh likewiſe Scoffing, with immodeſt, and wicked words, which are alſo put into the mouths of little children to make them witty, and pleaſing. The little creatures do not yet know, whether they have a tongue, or no, and we perceive they already are initiated in the work of Satan. This ſpirit of ſcoffing, and impurity, which pleaſeth it ſelf with uncleanneſs of Language, is a harbenger of Atheiſm, that marketh him out a lodging; and as it is ſaid, that the Sea-Rat goeth before the Whale, in the ſame maner, groſs, and ſenſeleſs impiety, ſuch as it is, maketh uſe I know not of what kind of ſilly ſcoffing ſpirits, which are taken to be the wiſe of the world, under the colour that they can compoſe ſome bald Sonnet, whileſt they themſelves readily give the word when to laugh at it. Theſe are the curioſities, the entertainments, the Idols of meetings. Aaron, ſtriking the duſt with his rod, made Flies to ſpring up, the greateſt ſcourge of Egypt: I cannot tell who it is, that hath ſtirred the aſhes of Rabelais, nor who hath been verſed in this putrefaction: but by a manifeſt vengeance from Heaven we daily behold new vermine to ariſe, which endeavour to gnaw, and diſſipate all that which hath any piety, or fear of God in Chriſtianity.

Scoffing, the harbinger of Atheiſm.

Buffoons, the Flies of Egypt. Exod. 8. 27

Blind creatures, you know not the evil, and therefore you make no accompt to correct it: you find not what to reprehend therein, but God will find for what to deſtroy you. You have thorns in the middeſt

Auguſt. in Pſal. 99. Siquis forte propterea non cognoſit quia non advertit, advertat de cætero: atq; utinam inveniat quod advertat. Et Deus inveniat quod avertat. Sed tamen quia non quieſcunt naſci ſpina in malè exultantibus, advertamus jubilationem improbandam, offeramus Deo jubilationem coronandã. Remedies.

middeſt of your feaſts and recreations, which will pierce you even to the drawing of blood. Take away the ſolaces of a Pagan, and preſent to God the alacrity of Chriſtians; know you not, that the Graſhoppers of the Apocalyps have the viſage of a Virgin, and the tail of a Scorpion? All theſe taunts and ſcoffs have the ſeeming apparence of generoſity, but the poiſon is in the tail.

Behold in part the diſorders, which at this day proceed from three ſorts of tongues; the vain, the reproachfull, the ſcoffing; without ſpeaking at all of oaths, perjuries, blaſphemies, which have the language of Hell. What a deluge of corruption iſſueth from one ſmall member of man? Alaſs! what remedy is there for all this, it being one of the greateſt obſtacles of ſalvation, and Chriſtian perfection?

The miſchief is not onely in the tongue, it is in the heart, and thereto remedy muſt be applied, conſidering both the deformity, and puniſhment of the like vices. The vain tongue, which is practiſed in babble, lies, flatteries, and impertinent chatter, ordinarily proceedeth from a ſlight, ſhallow, idle ſpirit. As it is ſlight, it is full of foppery; as ſhallow, it is ſervilely ſubject to complacence; as idle, it ſeeketh employment in vanity, not being able to find it in virtue. This intemperance of tongue is an effect of ill-governed idleneſs, and there it is where the ſearing Iron muſt be applied to make it a ſerious ſoul, much pleaſed with entertainments worthy of a man, able to reſiſt idle toys, and to ſettle it in a firm poſture, in good employments, to the end it may have no leiſure to diffuſe it ſelf in vain ſuperfluities. The lips of the Bride (as St. Thomas notably obſerveth) are compared to carnation-Ribband, to inform us that the Ribband ſerves women to bind up their hair, and that diſcretion of lips ought to tie up our thoughts, leſt they be ſcattered in a thouſand follies of ſpeech. St. Ambroſe interpreting theſe words of the Wiſe-man, Sepi poſſeſſionem tuam ſpinis (which admoniſh to make an hedg of thorns about our Inheritance) ſaith: We have not any better poſſeſſion then our ſoul, no better gold then our heart, no better ſilver then our words; it is about this treaſure we ought to make our wall. Rivers are tributaries to the Ocean for all their drops of water, and you at the laſt judgment of God for every word. Is not this worthy of a little conſideration to ſtay a vain tongue?

Lips of the Spouſe. St. Thom. in Cant. 4. Eccleſ. 18. Sicut vitta coccinea labia tua.

Poſſeſſio tua mens tua eſt: aurum tuum cor tuum eſt: argentum tuum eloquium tuum eſt. Ambr. 1. Officior. cap. 2.

As for the reproachfull, the one proceedeth from a very ſtupid, and groſs inconſideration, from an ill liberty, from a dangerous cuſtom, which maketh that one ſometimes ſlandereth not purpoſely, and this muſt be corrected by prudence, and carefull obſervation: the other taketh birth from an enraged ſoul, full of gall and acrimony, which caſteth its froth out by the the tongue, finding torment and puniſhment in another's happineſs, and ſearching out its contentment in the diminution thereof: but it there encountereth a new torture, beholding its reproaches are as the foam of the Sea, which beateth on the foot of rocks, and flieth not to the ſteepy top. Great minds diſſipate Calumnies by the innocency of their life, as the cryſtal current of Rivers carry along the ſmall flying duſt. All the arrows of reproach return upon the Calumniatour, who oftentimes liveth in this world as a ſolitary Wolf, tormented with a thouſand mortal affrightments of a wicked Conſcience, which make him to begin his Hell in this world, and finiſh it in the other without end. For what mercy can there be for a Calumniatour, who dieth in obloquies? So many reproaches are ſo many man-ſlaughters, wherewith (all bloody) he goeth to the judgment of God to receive the reward of his wickedneſs. St. Clement witneſſeth, that this is the doctrine of St. Peter, who diſtinguiſheth two ſorts of homicides: The one of the hand, the other of the tongue; both puniſhable with one and the ſame pain. There is no other remedy but to take away brotherly hatred by charity, and ſeriouſly bridle this untamed tongue, untill it be maſtered.

From whence Calumny proceedeth.

Horrour of Calumny.

S. Clemens epiſt. 1. ad Jacob. Sunt homicida interfectores fratrum, & ſunt homicida detractores eorum.

As for the ſcoffing tongue, it proceedeth from a ridiculous ſoul, light, feeble, and languiſhing in the reliſhes of God; and if it further paſs on to mock at things ſacred, it is a bud of the ſame impiety. Such Goblins, and prattling Devils are not commonly cured by reaſon; their hearts are worm-eaten, and become rotten with infidelity; they are the Sons of Cham, (unbridled, and diſſolute creatures) which will fall into a thouſand diſaſters in this life, if they do not powerfully amend themſelves, and ſhall in the other world find a heap of anger and vengeance for puniſhment of their crimes. Their laughter is the crackling of thorns, or ſongs of Snails in the flames. Fly (O Noble men) ſuch plagues, and well remember what a great Perſon ſaid: That your tongue is as the incenſory of the Divinity. Uſe the matter ſo, that your words may be preſented to the throne of God, as the true perfume of Heaven.

Danger of Scoffing.

Tongue the incenſory of the Divinity.

The eighth OBSTACLE,

Curioſity in the reſentment of Affronts and Diſgraces.

AS men are allured by vain praiſes, and bath themſelves in flatteries as in Roſe-water, ſo are they extremely ſenſible of affronts, whether they are real diſgraces, or have no ſubſiſtence at all but in the imagination. One cannot touch this ſtring of point of Honour ſo ſlightly, but it will eccho forth ſome ſound. The leaſt word of diſdain raiſeth a ſtorm in the mind, a diſgrace is a clap of thunder, and one ſcornfull countenance of a Prince breedeth more fear and terrour then a Cannon. Theſe worldly reſpects cauſe a main impediment in the exerciſe of virtue, and a ſoul, which ſhall feed it ſelf with ſuch apprehenſions, ſhall always live in fetters. It is good to obſerve the cauſes and remedies thereof, to draw conſolation from thence.

Apprehenſion of Affronts.

You (O Noble men) apprehend injuries, obloquies, and diſgraces; from whence, ſuppoſe you, do theſe apprehenſions proceed? Of too much ſelicity ill-digeſted. You have a ſtomach of paper, which can concoct nothing, it is ſo inebriated with the taſtfull ſweetneſs of ſome never-ceaſing proſperities, that with the leaſt diſguſt it is overthrown: and yet, notwithſtanding, to live now a-days in the world, you muſt procure an Oſtriche's ſtomach, who ſwalloweth even Iron it ſelf.

Querelæ ſunt naſcentis animi, in quaſi feri delicati, & felices incipiunt.

From whence this niceneſs proceedeth.

Secondly, this proceedeth from a ſpirit proud, and elate. We obſerve that thoſe, who upon all occaſions are ready to give affronts, are moſt tender in receiving any. They cut a large thong out of another man's leather, but if you prick them never ſo little, you even pull their skin over their ears. It is the courſe, which was noted in the monſter of Nature, Caligula: He had a tongue unbridled to ſcoff indifferently at all kind of objects. If any man challenged him for it, he was enragedly offended.

Caligula a great Scoffer.

Thirdly, theſe affronts oft-times are ſuch as our fantaſies make them, if we help them not out with our opinions, their arrow entereth not to make an an affront. We muſt believe it to be ſuch, otherwiſe all injuries are but as ſtones caſt into the wind, which have no force. It is recounted, that Cornelius

Ferendarum contumeliarum impatiens, faciendarum cupidiſſimus.

a Senatour ſhed many tears in full Senate, when Corbalo called him bald Oſtrich. Seneca admired, that ſuch a man, who in all things elſe had ſhewed himſelf moſt couragiouſly oppoſite againſt other injuries, loſt his conſtancy for one ridiculous Saying, which might have been ſmothered in laughter, whence it firſt took birth; becauſe this blow was rather given him by his own imagination, then by the tongue of his enemy.

Senec. De Conſt. Struthiocamelus deridetur.

Fourthly, this niceneſs in the reſentment of injuries ordinarily taketh its being from a ſoft and effeminate ſpirit, which knoweth not what an affront is, and had great need to encounter ſome true and real thing, that it may no more become haughty with vain ſhadows. This is it, which moſt judiciouſly that great Oracle of Latine Philoſophy hath obſerved. For remedy to this obſtacle I will produce two very conſiderable things.

Nimio otio ingenio natura infirma, & muliebru inopia vera injuria laſcivientia.

Remedies.

The firſt is, That if a generous heart could once be perſwaded, that the moſt noble revenge, which might be drawn from affronts, were to ſcorn them, and that ſuch is the maner of all great ſpirits, he would make unto himſelf a buckler of Diamond againſt all theſe petty inferiour diſturbances. Now, I affirm all the greatneſs of a fair ſoul, fit to have heaven for a Theatre of its actions, ſhould reſolve to do good, and ſuffer ill: to know not onely how to tolerate an ingratitude, but how to faſten benefits. Saint Auguſtine upon the ninety third Pſalm proveth this verity unto us by a fine Induction, which he draweth from the Stars. "Injuries (ſaith he) are daily done "to the Stars. One ſaith, Behold the Star of Mer- "cury, behold Saturn: is it not then a great wrong "to theſe beautifull Stars, enchaſed by the hand of "God in the azure vault of the heavens, to put them "into the poſſeſſion of I know not what kind of pet-"ty pilferer, or of an old dotard, who is ſaid to have "devoured his own children? Theſe Stars, which "are as it were the eys of the Omnipotent, to be-"hold all that which paſſeth here below, are they "offended with the injuries, which men do them? "Have they ever turned out of the way for that? "Have they ever loſt one ſole ſtep of their regular "motion? No aſſuredly. So you (O Noble men) "whom God hath placed in the ſphere of greatneſs "to enlighten men, what importeth it you, if a per-"verſe and wayward people ſlander your reputati-"on? Never ſhall you be great, if you know not the "way of doing well, and ſuffering ill. Do like the "Sun, and Stars, ſhine, and glitter in the firmament "of ſanctity, and give detractious tongues leave in "the mean time to lick up duſt. Saint Cyprian, in the Treatiſe which he compoſed Of Patience, mounteth yet a little higher, and after Tertullian pertinently declareth, that Patience in injuries is a ray of Divinity, and the true virtue of Nobility. What patience it is in God, ſo many Ages, to have ſuffered Temples of Idols, erected to the contempt of his name? To make days and times ſtill to circumvolve, rivers to glide, winds to blow, Autumn to put on a ſaffron robe, Grapes to ripen, the Elements to ſerve, and hold total nature in breath, for a thouſand and a thouſand ſacrifices to hell? To caſt flowers from heaven with a bounteous hand upon contumacious heads, who well deſerve the ſtroke of the thunder-bolt? What patience is it in the Saviour of the world to behold the Sun eclipſed, all the Stars to put on mourning weeds, the whole frame of this Univerſe to be troubled both above, and beneath his Croſs and he in the mean time to remain affixed in the chair of patience without motion?

Auguſt. in Pſal. 93. Convitia ſunt ſtellis, cùm dicitur, illa ſtella Mercurii eſt, & illa Saturni: quid illa cùm audiunt tanta convitia? numquid moventur? numquid non exercent curſus ſuos? Sic & homo, qui in natione perverſa, & tortuoſa habet verbum Dei, ſicut luminare eſt fulgens in cœlo.

Cyprian. De Patientia. Eſt nobis cum Deo virtus communis, indè patientia incipit, indè claritas ejus, & diguitas caput ſumit.

Patience the nature of God.

This magnanimity in injuries is the true ſtamp with which God for his imitation impreſſeth all Noble and Great ſpirits. See (I pray you) what remedy King David uſed againſt the malevolent tongue of Shemei: he fled from an unnatural Son, and in flying fell into the violence of an enraged tongue, which darted againſt him ſhafts of fire, and transfixed him even to the heart. Behold his Captains ready to pull him down, like Maſtives. But David replied: No, I will that he live, and what know you, whether this be not a powerfull trial from the Divine Providence, who hath ſent this man for an exerciſe of virtue? My God, O that onely the odour of my ſacrifice might aſcend even to thy Altars! Saint Ambroſe admireth ſo much this greatneſs of courage, that he crieth out: O profound wiſdom! O bottomleſs patience! O what an invention it is, to ſwallow out miſchief, and endure another! David made as it were a plaiſter of the reproaches of Shemei, for the wound which his parricide Son fixed in his heart. If Great men govern thus, and you ſo much love greatneſs, why do you not rather imitate them, then play the ſilly Mouſe, ſeeking to bite that which toucheth you, and drenching your ſelves every time in a glaſs of water, engulph your ſelves with ſadneſs in the leaſt petty injury?

Admirable remedy of David. 2 Reg. 16.

Ambroſ. Apol. 1. de David, c. 6. O altitudo prudentiæ! O altitudo patientiæ! O deverandæ contumeliæ grande inventum! Ecce verborum contumelia parricidii levavit arumnam.

The ſecond thing is, always to have an aſſured retreat in your heart, and in the ſweetneſs of a good conſcience. When a diſgrace happeneth to you, you are like an unfeathered Bird, ſhamefac'd, and dejected, for that you have believed with confidence that all theſe loans of Fortune were your own. You are like a Jack-daw, trimmed up with the feathers of many Birds; you have moſt imprudently thought in your heart that all theſe garniſhments were of your own body, and have neglected to make true and natural wings for your ſelf. When the Birds come to peck at you, and take away their own feathers on all ſides, you then diſcover your ignominious nakedneſs; but had you preſerved the plumage, which Nature preſented to you, you had taken a ſtrong and confident flight, even to the Temple of repoſe, not caring for theſe borrowed feathers, nor all theſe ſilly ſcriches of theſe fluttering, and unruly Birds. What a goodly Theatre is a good conſcience? And what a beautifull Arcenal is it to have ſtill the Arms of virtue in a readineſs? A good man goeth out of theſe extrinſecal favours, and all this ſpecious train of fortune, as a fair Jewel, drawn out of a caſe. True it is, the caſe thereof may ſeem rich, and well adorned with mean and ſlight embroideries, but it ſelf is far more reſplendent then all that oſtent. Our eyes do not penetrate ſufficiently through this trim of the world's greatneſs. It is a golden veil, which may as well cover ſnow, as a coal; as ſoon as this caſe is taken away the radiance of this Jewel is beheld in the day's brightneſs, refulgently ſhining with the rays of a conſtant equality of ſpirit, of an invincible patience, and with an ineſtimable meekneſs of heart towards all the world. Happy night of diſgrace, thou haſt not darkned this fair Star, but rather made it appear ſuch as it was.

Retreat into the conſcience in affronts.

Greatneſs of an honeſt man.

One of the greateſt Wits, that ever was under heaven, the Emperour Antoninus, in the fourth Book which he wrote Of his own life, ſo much commendeth the retirement, which a wiſe man maketh within himſelf, that he aſſureth us, that in all the Palaces, Gardens, Orchards, Delicacies of all the Kings of the world, there is nothing ſo delightfull as the houſe of a good conſcience. There it is where man is involved in his little ſhell, and retiring himſelf out of the ſalt waters liveth with the dew of heaven; there it is where the ſoul, which was wholly ſcattered in ſo overwhelming a multitude of affairs, foldeth it ſelf ſelf within it ſelf; there it is, where it beginneth to ſuck in its own ſap; there it is, where it accommodateth, and prepareth its Hive, as a buſie Bee, and endeavoureth to gather its Hony; there it is, where it entereth into a new world, an intelligible world, a peaceable world, a world ſmiling with ſweet ſerenity of air, and radiant lights, as ſaith St. Cyprian. There it is, that we paſs into the ſociety of ſo many eminent, and admirable Perſonages, who have flouriſhed in the memory of all Ages, doing all the good they could, and receiving ill from the ungrateſull with a pleaſing countenance, no more troubling themſelves then doth the Sun to behold the clouds which he hath drawn out of the mire, and ſens of the earth, to make him a ſcarf of. He knoweth he ſhall ever have the upper hand and that they may take from him the aſpect of mortal eyes, but cannot deprive him of his own light. It is in this Temple of repoſe, where we behold all the Saints, as Eagles in a ſtorm, ſurcharged with ſufferings, but made invincible with the Arms of Patience. We behold one afflicted in the loſs of his goods, another in the death of his kindred, another in his own body, another in his reputation, another in all, whom tribulation tormenteth in all his members. All that is mortal ſhrinketh under injuries; but all theſe arrows go no further then to the ſuperficies of the skin, and touch not the conſtancy of a well-compoſed mind, which ſeeth them fall under his feet. O what greatneſs! O what felicity!

M. Aurel. Antonin. lib. 4. De vita ſua.

Delicious abode of the Soul.

Ibi aëris liquidi ſerena temperies per ſudum igneo colore rutilans.

Temple of repoſe.

Certain ambitious Kings have ſought the way to build an heaven on earth; as Coſroës King of Perſia, who cauſed a Palace to be built like a Heaven, which had the garniſhment of a Sun, of a Moon, and Stars artificially counterfeited: he alſo made below, rain to pour down, winds to blow, tempeſts to rage, he in this celeſtial Throne beheld radiant beams over his head, and all this noiſe and clamour under his feet. That, which this Monarch did for meer vanity, you may put in practice by a moſt ſolid verity. You may for the preſent, with the exerciſe of Prayer, the grace of Sacraments, and a generous contempt of all which is without you, raiſe a heavenly Temple of repoſe, and tranquillity, where you ſhall not fear the bitings of Calumny, nor the mutations of the world. A Pagan, amidſt the burning ruins of his City, unſheathed ſwords, blood, and maſſacres, when the Temple fell upon their Gods, and all was in confuſion, could ſay: "Behold me eſcaped from the ruins "of my houſe, from the fires which ſhined on all "ſides, I have found my way through blood, and "flames: I know not what is become of my Daughters, perhaps there is ſomewhat worſe put upon "them then the ſword or fire: behold me alone, deſpoiled of all my goods, and now become old, all "hoſtilities raging round about me. Hap what hap "may, I have whatſoever I at any time poſſeſſed: "for I never eſteemed any thing mine own but my "ſelf. Demand of rich men where their poſſeſſions "are? Of the voluptuous, where their loves? Of "the uſurers where their accompts? Of the ambitious, where their Court? All that is loſt to them, "becauſe they thought it their own, becauſe they "preſently ſought it in the aſhes of their City: As "for my ſelf, I will find all my poſſeſſions, and all "my delights in the peace of my heart. An Infidel to ſay, and to do all that, yet we, after ſo many precepts of the eternal Wiſdom, ſo many Sermons, ſo many exhortations, ſo many ſupports, ſo many helps, ſo many examples, ſo many promiſes, ſo many recompenſes, ſo many obligations, and ſo many neceſſities, which force us thereunto, ſtill to be curious, and not to be able to tolerate one ſilly diſgrace! May we not well ſay, we have great need of afflictions, which might a little inſtruct us to imitate the lives of Saints? For it is undoubted, we putrifie with long proſperities, as in a dead Sea, which produceth nothing. It is neceſſary, that God ſtrike, and then, as Jonathan, we ſhall open our eyes, and ſuck in Hony from the end of the rod which ſcourgeth us, when in the chaſtiſement of a father we ſhall find the conſolation of true children.

Brave words of Stilpho. Erepſi è ruinis domus, & incendiis undique relucentibus, per flammas, per ſanguinem fugi: filias meas quis caſus habeat, an pejor publico neſcio, ſolus, & ſenior, & hoſtilia circa me omnia videns, habeo quidquid mei habui, quia nil quidquam meum, niſi me, puto.

The ninth OBSTACLE,

Carnal Love.

IF at any time the powerfull and health-giving hand of the Angel Raphel were neceſſary in the world, not to cure the eyes with the Gall of a Fiſh, but to tie and bind up in the deſerts this looſe and wanton ſpirit of carnality, which the Scripture calleth Aſmodeus, it is principally in this Age, that we have great need thereof, wherein diſhoneſt and intemperate vice reigneth ſo prodigiouſly, that it ſeemeth not willing to make of the reſt of this whole Univerſe but one Element of Fire. Aſmodeus at this time triumpheth, and boaſteth, his Chariots covered with Laurel, to the weeping eyes of Chaſtity: his Horſes curvet, and bound without bridle, and with unſpeakable inſolence he daily tranſporteth an infinite number of ſouls to Hell. If you deſire to know the equipage of his deteſtable Chariot, St. Bernard will tell it you, and you in his Diſcourſe may obſerve the cauſes, which produce and cheriſh Luxury, that you may hereafter apply profitable and convenient remedies.

Triumph of Aſmodeus.

Bernard. Serm. 39. in Cantica de curribus Pharaonis.

The Chariot of Aſmodeus is a Chariot of fire, from whence on all ſides the ſparkles of concupiſcence flie to enflame unchaſte hearts. This is not a common fire, but a fire enkindled with the flames of Hell, the very image of that which devoureth damned ſouls, ceaſeleſly burning without diminution, giving nouriſhment to its ardours with its proper damages. The firſt wheel of the Chariot (ſaith this great Saint) is called Gourmandize; the ſecond, Titillation of the fleſh; the third, Exceſs in apparel; the fourth, Idleneſs: which undoubtedly are the four Vices, that ſerve as principal inſtruments to this loathſom Devil, and very well are termed the Wheels of his Chariot. It is ſaid the Chariot of War is moved with two arms, one of Iron, and the other of Silver; but this of Aſmodeus rolleth about the arms of Ceres, and Bacchus.

His chariot.

His wheels

Gourmandize is attended by the wanton pleaſures of the body: theſe pleaſures then, which ſhould be ſtifled with hair-ſhirts, and ſack-cloth, are involved in Linen, and Scarlet; in ſtead of ready ſhaking off theſe ſparkles, they are fomented, and waſted in a lazy and idle life. Behold how ſin paſſeth along. To this Chariot Horſes, and Coach-man are neceſſary. St. Bernard appointeth onely two, whereof one is called Proſperity, the other Abundance. From this time forward Aſmodeus becomes a much greater Lord, he augmenteth his train, harneſſing alſo two other Horſes, whereof the one is called Liberty, and the other Impudence. Proſperity, always ſmiling, doth nothing but daily breath out, and evaporate new delights. Abundance ſupplieth him with all which is needfull for the entertainment of this ravenous Beaſt, although ſhe cannot diſcharge all the expenſes thereof, ſo inſatiable ſhe is. The liberty of entertainments and converſation ceaſeth not perpetually to blow the fire. If there be any ſhread of the veil of ſhamefac'dneſs as yet hanging about the brows, impudence teareth it away. All this equipage is lead along by a wicked Coach-man, which is called The forgetfulneſs of God. Then good leiſure is had to run with full ſpeed into the bottomleſs abyſs.

His horſes.

His Coach-man. Sap. 4. Dei immemoratio, animarum inquinatio.

Of Inconſtancy lib. 2.

Certain brave ſpirits of the world, purſuing as it were this way of Saint Bernard, to figure out a ſpiritual thing by corporal repreſentations, have built the Palace of falſe love, (the plague, and frenzy of the ſoul) with admirable art. This Palace is all built on hopes: the ſtairs are of Ice, made in ſuch maner, that he, who moſt aſcendeth, moſt deſcendeth; the Halls, Chambers, and Ward-robes, are all furniſhed, and hanged with idleneſs, dreams, deſires, and inconſtancies; the Seats and Chairs are made of falſe contentments. It hath affliction, torment, and fraud, for Engineers; uncertainty, fear, falſe opinion, and diſtruſt for Guard. All this Court is compoſed of heartleſs, ſoft, and effeminate men, which are, and are not. His Chancellour, ſurmize; his Councellours, lying, and deceit; the Steward of his houſhold, ſuſpicion; his viands, apparences; his drink, forgetfulneſs; his Chamber-waiters, laughter, and babble; his muſick, ſighs, deſpairs, and revenges. Do you not behold a brave Prince? But without amuzing our ſelves with all theſe inventions of the brain, I ſay the greateſt obſtacle, which may be imagined, to ſeclude us from the happy acceſs to life eternal, is to reſign our heart as a prey into the power of this brutiſh paſſion. The reaſon is moſt evident, becauſe it is a true mark of reprobation, and we ſee by experience, the ſouls which addict themſelves to the ſin of the fleſh, not ſo much by frailty, as by profeſſion, become wholly carnal, ſtupid, beaſtly, and ordinarily paſs out of this life through the gate of ſome notable diſaſter. I will here produce two or three cauſes of the undoubted condemnation of this ſin, which ſeem to me very powerfull to imprint in the heart of man a perpetual averſion, as it were with a branding-iron of fire. The firſt is, that it is injurious to the incarnation of the Son of God. Conſider well what I ſay.

Court of Aſſuoleus.

Sin of the fleſh, a mark of reprobation.

Injurious to the Incarnation of the Word.

This myſtery of the incarnation, wherewith God put on our weakneſs, took ſervile fleſh, made himſelf our brother, tranſplanted our nature from a barren and curſed ſoil, into the delicious habitation of the Divinity, is ſo great, ſo majeſtical, ſo marvellous, that it enforceth ſilence and admiration in the four quarters of the world, adoration in Thrones, trembling in the Seraphims, bowing in the Heavens, darkneſs, terrour, and amazement in all Nature. Now, this myſtery being, as it is, in all its height, greatneſs, latitude, inexplicable profundity, is perſonably betrayed, and diſhonoured by the ſin of the fleſh. Wherefore? Becauſe, as St. Paul ſaith, other ſins make their ſallies out of the body, but this repoſeth, and ſubſiſteth in the body, in the ſame ſpecifical Nature, which God ſo puiſſantly, and highly hath exalted, that he therein hath confined his whole power and greatneſs, not being able to create any thing greater then Man-God.

Quò altius carnem attolleret non habuit. Auguſt. De prædeſtinat. Sanct. c. 15.

Judg what a ſacrilege it is to do a perſonal affront to the moſt immaculate, and moſt virginal fleſh of Jeſus, ſitting on the right hand of his Father Eternal, in the habiliments of glory; and yet carnal impurity would, if it might, carry thither the effects of its malice. Before the Incarnation of the Son of God the ſins of the fleſh were ſimply ſins, but after this ineffable union of the Divine Nature with the Humane they became Monſters. And you ſee likewiſe, that the holy Fathers call ſome by this name, and by other terms, full of execration.

Auguſt. De verbis Apoſt. Serm. 18. Parce in te Chriſto, cognoſce in te Chriſtum. Ἀλλοίωσις. Ancyr. Concil. Can. 17. Fury of Luſt. Tertul. De pudic.

The ſecond Reaſon, which much augmenteth the enormity of the ſacrilege is, that not onely it debaſeth a Nature, which God hath exalted even to God, but alſo engulpheth it in an action ſordid, blockiſh, brutiſh, reputed ſo unworthy, that the Scripture diſdaineth to name it. St. Epiphanius, ſearching out the cauſe why the Holy Text maketh no mention of the Genealogie of Melchiſedech, bringeth a reaſon from the Hebrews, which affirms this eminent man to be born of unchaſte Parents, as a roſe from thorns, and that the Scripture uſeth not to name ſuch men, in deteſtation of their ſin. And verily you ſee the practice hereof. In Geneſis, Noe abſtained from naming of Cham, though it were to curſe him; it ſeemeth this name of a Son, marked out by theſe deportments of filthy ſin, would defile the malediction it ſelf, if it had been pronounced. For the ſame reaſon the Tribe of Simeon is not numbered, when queſtion is made of bleſſing the Patriarchs in Deuteronomie; becauſe from this Line iſſued that wicked Prince, who ſinned with the Midianiteſs. In the New Teſtament, in the Genealogie of the Son of God, Bathſheba is not called by her own name, but by her husband's. Magdalen, in the time of her ſin, had no other name but of a Sinner. It ſeemeth Iſaiah hath truly propheſied of ſuch voluptuous people: The race of the wicked ſhall be buried in perpetual oblivion.

Epiphan. Hæreſ. 55. & 67.

Gene. 9. Maledictus Chanaan.

Deut. 33.

Num. 25. 6.

Eâque fuit Uriæ. Luc. 7. 37. Iſai. 14. 20. Non vocabitur in æternum nomen peſſimorum.

Some other Interpreters ſubtilizing this paſſage of the fourty eighth Pſalm, Iniquitas calcanei circumdabit me, ſay, Luxury was called The Sin of the heel, which was not improper: yet not for that reaſon, which ſome, in my opinion, have without ground invented, affirming there is a vein, which anſwereth to the heel, that ſerveth as a fiery match, and incentive to luſt: but becauſe this ſin is low, and debaſed amongſt other vices, as the heel under other parts of the body, and in reſpect it is tied to the heels, which is to ſay, that leaving high and elevated objects, onely worthy of the love of men, as are virtues, and graces, it applieth it ſelf to baſeneſs, and beggary, to a dung-hill covered with Snow, to a beauty paſſing away like a dream, and which hath no other character of its merit, but the judgment of a mad man. So the Pantofles of Judith bewitched the eyes of Holofernes. This Lady was beautifull as a Star, and adorned as a Temple, yet notwithſtanding this blind lover ſuffered himſelf to be inconſiderately ſurprized with the heels of a woman, to ſhew that luſt is baſe in all its objects, and pretenſes. Behold why ſome Sage Hebrews have written, that certain Infernal Spirits, remembring themſelves of their antient Nobility, abhor to tempt men with the ſin of Luxury, as a thing unworthy of their thoughts and induſtry, giving this commiſſion to ſome other more groſs Devils, and more terreſtrial. Alaſs! what ſhall we ſay, if we go about to plant upon the forehead of a Nature, honoured with the hypoſtatical union of the Word, a ſin, which maketh even the Devils themſelves to be aſhamed? May we not well ſay, If there be a mark in the world, which plainly diſcovereth a reprobate ſoul, it is this, ſeeing it is ſo impudently oppoſed to the venerable myſtery of man's redemption?

Luxury the ſin of the heel.

Judith 16. Sandalia rapuerunt oculos ejus.

The third reaſon, which makes us believe this diſhoneſt ſin hath great alliance with Hell, is, that it carrieth already the marks thereof in this world. What are they? Darkneſs, fire, ſtench, the worm, diſorder. Behold the principal liveries of Hell, all which are to be found in the ſin of Luxury! Darkneſs, becauſe it maketh the ſoul dark, groſs, clouded with black vapours of folly, which extinguiſh all the radiance of judgment, and very aptly it is ſaid of thoſe infamous fire-brands, who ſollicited the chaſte Suſanna, that they turned away their eyes, that they might not ſee the Sun. Saint Hierom hath very well reliſhed Hell of Love.

Daniel 13. Declinaverunt oculos ſuos, nè viderunt Solem. Hier. lib. adverſus Jovinian.

reliſhed this paſſage of Seneca: (a) Love and folly go hand in hand; it is a paſſion, which never lodgeth at the ſign of health; it turneth the ſpirit up-ſide down; it maketh man brutiſh, unprofitable to all, and in the end to love it ſelf.

(a) Amor inſania proximus, ſuâ & minimè conveniens animo ſoſpiti vitium, turbat conſilia, omnibus inutilem, ipſi noviſſimum amori facit.

The Fire of it.

Si digito attigero, incendam ſylvam ſimul omnē.

Fire. All thoſe unfortunate lovers ſpeak of nothing elſe but of their flames, they are always in fire like the Salamander, they perpetually have the Mount Ætna upon their ſhoulders: one of them ſaith he will do nothing but touch a Foreſt with his finger, thereby to burn & wholly waſte it. And verily it is a hell-fire, which hath gluttony for fewel, pride for flame, unclean words for ſparkles, infamy for ſmoke, ordure for aſhes, hell for center, as ſaith S. Hierom.

Noyſomneſs.

Noyſomneſs, and diſhoneſty are inſeparable companions of the ſin of the fleſh. The voluptuous cannot endure their like, and when paſſion hath caſt its fire, they are troubleſom and inſupportable to themſelves. Which well is witneſſed by the many naſty and ſhameful diſeaſes, which never had been known in the world, if they had not entered by the gate of this infamous ſenſuality.

Its Worm.

The worm. This ſin is no ſooner committed, but it hath its executioner attending thereon, it hath the worm of Damnation, which diveth and penetrateth even into the bottom of the heart of him that committeth it, and then eſpecially when he findeth as yet ſome reliques of a good conſcience remaining in his ſoul, remorſe to have loſt the incomparable treaſure of purity, perplexeth it perpetually. Concupiſcence of wicked love is full of anxiety, and ever in its ſatiety it finds repentance.

Appetitus fornicationis anxietas eſt, ſatietas pœnitentia.

The Diſorder of it.

Diſorder. You may as well tell the leaves of the Trees, the ſands of the Sea, and the ſtars in the Skie, as number the diſorders, which have vomited and ſtill overflow upon the face of the earth, by means of the ſin of Luxury. If there be poyſon to be diſſolved, love mingleth it. If ſwords be forged and fyled to transfix the ſides of innocent creatures, love hammereth and poliſheth them in his ſhop. If there be halters to be faſtened wherewith to ſtrangle, love weaveth and tyeth them. If there be precipices, love prepareth them. If there be maſſacres, love contrives them. If you go about to find little embryons, even in the mother's Womb, to be bereaved of the life, which they have not as yet taſted, love is the Authour and Actour of theſe abominable councils. All the miſchief, and crimes, which have in former Ages been perpetrated, love hath done them and daily invented them.

It hath from all times puſhed and ſhouldered good order out of the world. It hath been the Butt and Aim of all the vengeances of God. It hath been ſtrucken with fire and brimſtone from Heaven, ſwallowed in the entrails of the Earth, drenched in the waters of a general Deluge. Yet it eſcapeth, yet it perpetually armeth, yet it walloweth it ſelf in blood and ſlaughter, yet it holdeth the ſword of juſtice ever perpendicular over the head, and in concluſion it is eſteemed but as a ſport. Is not all this of power ſufficient to make it be believed, that this filthy vice is an infallible mark of reprobation? Flie (O Noblemen) this fleſhly peſtilence of mankind, and never ſuffer it to exerciſe its tyranny over hearts conſecrated by the precious blood of the Lamb. All conſiſteth in flying far from the occaſions thereof. If you love danger, you ſhall periſh therein. If you had the beſt intentions, which did ever bud in the hearts of Saints, yet if you ſeek out occaſions of doing ill, they become crooked, and diſtracted. Nature being, as now it is, corrupted, the ignorance of vice better ſerves our turn, then all the precepts of virtue. Our affections attend on our knowledg, the abſence of objects maketh us to forget all our moſt enflamed deſires. To live in luſt and idleneſs, to have our eys always in purſuit, unchaſte Books in our hands, to hear Comedies, and impure Stage-plays, to have gluttonous diſcourſe in our mouth, to frequent Buffoons, and looſe livers, to converſe familiarly with Women; theſe are not the inſtruments of Chaſtity: it is rather to put Oil into the flame, and then to complain of much heat.

Remedies.

Petrach, in his books againſt Vanity, giveth remedy to the wounds, which ſeem to have been inflicted in the time of his Loves. Love creepeth into idleneſs; handle the matter ſo, that he may always find you buſied. Love is pleaſed with curioſity of attire, give him hair-cloth. He is entertained with feaſts, ſubdue him with auſterity. He will fall upon ſome object, ſcatter, and confound him. He laboureth to find out a looſe, and unbridled ſpirit, hold yours extended upon ſome good affair. He requireth liberty, private places, night, darkneſs; let him have witneſſes, and enlighten him on every ſide. He will be governed by fantaſie; keep him dutifull, both by admonitions, and menaces. St. Cyprian found nothing more powerful to conquer a temptation of diſhoneſt wantonneſs, then to turn the other ſide of the Medal; and as this ſin hath two faces, ſo not to ſtay upon that which looketh amiable, and attractive to deceive us, but to behold that, which under a black veil ſheweth it ſelf to be penſive, ſad, ſhamefac'd, deſperate, and full of confuſion. The great Picus Mirandula ſaid, the moſt part of men yielded to temptation, becauſe they never taſted the ſweetneſs of glory, which is drawn from the victory over a ſin. Above all, it is behovefull to uſe the adviſe of a wiſe Arabian, who repreſented to himſelf perpetually, over his head, an eye which enlightened him, an ear which heard him, a hand which meaſured out all his deportments, and demeanours. The exerciſe of the preſence of God joyned with Prayer, frequentation of Sacraments, often invocation of the Mother of Purity, and the Angels, Guardians of Chaſtity, daily blunt a thouſand, and a thouſand arrows, ſhot againſt the hearts of brave, and undaunted Chriſtian Champions. Add hereunto, that it is good to live in a ceaſeleſs diſtruſt of one's ſelf, which is the mother of ſafety: that you may not fall into the fire, it is good to avoid the ſmoak, not to truſt one's ſelf too much to thoſe petty dalliances, which under pretext of innocency ſteal in with the more liberty. Mother of Pearls produce ſometimes windy bunches for true and native Pearls; and the will, through complacence of paſſion ill-digeſted, in ſtead of good love, bringeth forth ſilly abortions of amities, which are nothing but flaſhes, and wilde fantaſies, yet ſuch as may notwithſtanding diſpoſe an empty ſoul to ſome ſiniſter affections.

Petrarch. lib. 1. 2. cap. 23. De remediis. Occupatio, labor, & incultior habitus, & victus aſperior, & ſeceſſus, inque unum aliquid jugis intentio; adhæc teſtis charus, & verendus, frequens admonitio, dulces minæ, & ſi quando res exigat, aſpera.

Cyprian. De bono pudor. Ante oculos obverſatur deformis atque dejectus peccati pudor, nihil corpori liceat, ubi videndum eſt corporis vitium. Cogitetur quàm honeſtum ſit vicisſe dedecus, quàm inhoneſtum victum eſſe à dedecore.

The tenth OBSTACLE,

Exceſs in Diet and Apparel.

Terreſtrial Paradiſe, the chamber of Juſtice. Gen. 3. 19. In ſudore vultus tui veſceris pane.

THe world was as yet in her Cradle, and man was no more then born, when God making a Palace of Juſtice, of terreſtrial Paradiſe, pronounced againſt him the ſentence of labour and pain, and afterward wrote it as with his finger in the ſweat of his brow: Thou ſhalt eat thy bread with the ſweat of thy brow. Noblemen perpetually appeal from this ſentence, as if they were not men; it ſeemeth labour is not for them. Let Nature hold to the chain and labour thoſe groſſer bodies, which are moulded of the clay of Adam: they have forſooth bodies compoſed of I know not what kind of ſtarry matter, matter, which never muſt ſweat, nor take pains, but in a dance. What a folly it is? Ought not he to be diſſolved into ſweat, ſince he is to be reduced into aſhes? He cannot free himſelf from the ſentence of death, and why ſhall he decline pains-taking, ſeeing it proceeded from one and the ſame mouth in the ſame time, and upon one and the ſame ſubject? But behold the reaſon, which is, that to ſatisfie the ſentence of labour ſureties are found: the houſes of rich men are filled with Officers, and Servants, who take pains in their Fields, prune their Vines, carry Corn to the Mil, who go even into the Ocean to Fiſh for Habits and Attires for them, and moſt times live within four fingers of death, to give them means to flow in delicacies. Onely death it is, that taketh no ſuretie. For which cauſe man dieth in his own perſon, and laboureth by deputie. If death would a little give way, no Great man would die but by Attorney. Out alas! O the juſtice of God, how equally doſt thou ſtill hold the Ballance! They, that would not here labour as man, thou makeſt them take pain like infernal Spirits, thou diſſolveſt the ſweat of poor Peſants in the conſolation of their ſouls, and thou ſeaſoneſt the delights of rich men with care, melancholy, dolour, jealouſie, envy, anxiety, terrours, and remorſe, which are able to make them ſweat blood.

Noblemen appeal from the ſentence of labour.

Were there no other proof, this manifeſtly enough declareth to us how odious this curioſitie of Great men is to the Divine Majeſty, and how puniſhable, ſince its own delights are changed into chaſtiſements. Yet, notwithſtanding, I will produce ſome reaſons, that the unworthineſs of this wicked exceſs may punctually be touched with the finger, which now adays overfloweth the whole face of the earth.

Remedies and reaſons againſt Exceſs.

First I ſay, it is extreamly unreaſonable to be deſirous to live in the world with reaſon, againſt all reaſon; to endeavour to put a reaſonable creature into a condition of life, were it of neceſſity muſt bely the law of God, and its proper nature. O Noblemen, God would that you enter into the world like other men, as into a vale of tears, and you will arrive there as in a garden of delicacies. He would that you come thither, as to the mines to dig; and you go thither as to a Dicing-houſe to play. He would that you make paſſage into a ſervile fleſh to obey; and you will command. Is not this a ſin againſt Nature? To come into the world, is to come upon a Croſs; to be man, is to ſtretch out the Hands and Feet to be Crucified. The firſt bed, that an Infant maketh coming from his mother's Womb, is on the Croſs. He is as ſoon in a Croſs, as in Nature, and ſuffereth this puniſhment for no other cauſe, but for that he is born a man.

Droſs of Nature. Nemo impunè naſcitur: omnis vita ſupplicium eſt.

The Purple chamber of Empetors. Anna Comnena lib. 6. Luitprand. De rebus Europ. Cyprian. De Patient. Procellas mundi, quas ingreditur, ſtatim ſuo ploratu & gemitu rudi anima teſtatur.

The Emperours of Conſtantinople had in their Palace a ſecret chamber, which they called the Purple, in which theEmpereſſes for a ceremonious formality were brought to bed, and delivered, thinking by this means to aboliſh the acerbities, which are as it were affixed to our condition. But theſe petty Porphyrogennites (ſo theſe children of Emperours were called, becauſe they were born in Scarlet) were notwithſtanding born with a Croſs, and ſaluted life as others with tears, and groans. The children of Kings come all into the world through this gate of miſeries, they are born, as with a Diadem on their foreheads, and yet fail not to be Natures little priſoners. It is accompted a goodly thing to give them gilded Cradles, and ſilken Swathing-bands. This is to adorn their Chains, but not to break them; they are as well captive in them, as heretofore the priſoners in India, who rotted in poverty, and calamity, even in golden Fetters. It is a Decree of Almighty God (O great-Ones) that you muſt be born with the croſs on your back, and you will cancel it; if this yet might be practiſed with ſome reaſonable evaſion, and mediocrity, it would ſeem more tolerable: but now a-days this exceſs is ſo enraged, that it will plant the Trophies of Pride and Voluptuouſneſs upon the calamities of mankind. What is not done upon tables? What is not done in apparel? Men cloath as if they were always to live, and eat as if they ſhould every day die. We prepare an Altar to a falſe Deity, which at this day with unſpeakable violence ſwayeth in the world. It is a brutiſh God (if you deſire to know him) for never had he an ounce of brain: A blind God, who hath no eyes to behold the miſeries of the earth: A deaf God, who hath no ears to hear the complaints of the afflicted: A truantly God, who hath no hands to take pains: An immoveable God, who hath no feet to travel on: An effeminate God, who hath no heart to undertake any good, nor courage to ſuffer ills: A gluttonous God, who gourmandizeth all: An unclean God, who polluteth all. This falſe God, according to the Apoſtle, is the belly. His Temple (ſaith Tertullian) is the lungs, his Altar the paunch; his Prieſt the cock; his holy Ghoſt the ſmoak of meat; his grace the ſauces; his propheſie, that which may not civilly be ſpoken. As he in his perſon is enormous, ſo is he no leſs prodigious in his tyranny. It is a wonder to ſee how he hath his Officers in every place. For him War is waged againſt the air, and clouds; Birds are diſ-neſtled from the Kingdom, which Nature hath allowed them: for him the face of the earth is turned into a ſhambles: for him Seas are ſounded; depths are plummeted, ſhip-wracking ſtorms, and direfull tempeſts are ferried over. Man willingly would penetrate heaven, and delve even to hell to find out new ſacrifices for this fleſhly and carnal God, and himſelf being alive, he is made the Sepulchre of ſo many maſſacres, that it is a miracle how one man can live, who daily burieth ſo many dead creatures in his intrails. All this hurly-burly, which emptieth the air, earth, and ſeas, is made for a ſtomach four fingers broad, for which a little bread and water would ſuffice in neceſſity, and in ſuperfluity the whole world is too little to ſatisfie. We know not what courſe to take to find out new curioſities for the palate. We ſuck up Oiſters alive, we ſeek out Muſhroms, we will know what taſt hath the fleſh of Tortoiſes, and Snails. Theſe poor little creatures had good cauſe to believe, that their meanneſs would enfranchize them: but ſottiſh and ſordid gluttony draweth a tribute from all; and I think their taſt will ſhortly be taken with Serpents, and Ravens.

Tyranny of the belly. Philip 2. Quorum Deus venter eſt, & gloria in confuſione ipſorum. Tertul. adverſ. Pſych. Deus tibi venter eſt, & pulmo Templum, & aquatiles altitudines, & ſacerdos coquus, & ſpiritus ſanctus nidor, & condimenta charismata, & ruſtica prophetia vetus eſt. Gourmandize.

But let us not onely accuſe the Belly; the Eyes devour more then it. They are delighted to behold Fiſhes to ſwim in a ſea of Sugar, to ſee Foreſts, Nets, hunting Birds, wilde Beaſts, Houſes, Caſtles, Fields, arms of Sugar; had licourouſneſs of taſt ſo much power as it hath little brain, it would make a world of Sugar, and then would diſſolve it, to be always ready to form new at his pleaſure. The Ears will hold their part in this conſort, and therefore they muſt be tickled with the moſt exquiſite muſick, both of voice, and all ſorts of inſtruments, which ſerve as wings, and chariots to immodeſty. Then come the dances of the Corybants, the friſks, capers, ballets, courtings, liberties, impudencies, and all ſorts of voluptuous pleaſures, which make the body diſſolve into all corruption. With what conſcience can a Chriſtian expect Paradiſe, living in this manner? Doth he think Hell hath no flames but for the rich glutton mentioned in the Goſpel; and that he purſuing the ſame ways ſhall be freed from the like punishments? Hell caſteth up ſuch people, who here waſte their life in delicacies, that they may no otherwiſe live then in the immortality of fire, of the worm of conſcience, and darkneſs.

Pleaſure.

rich

Ducunt in bonis dies ſuos, & in punctō ad inferna deſcendunt. Job 21. 13.

As concerning exceſs of apparel one cannot ſay too much, ſo much is this ſuperfluity, and ever ſhall the diſcourſe be unprofitable, the miſchief being ſo confirmed, and uncapable of remedie. Therein it is that women diſplay all the vanity of their ſex, all the induſtry of their ſpirit, (being curious and inventive enough in their own intereſts) and all the preſumption of their nature, which is but too ambitious, and, as ſaith Tertullian, there it is where they bear all the glory of their ſex. I ſpeak not of thoſe, who attire themſelves modeſtly, dutifully, and as it were neceſſarily for comely ornament; I ſpeak of thoſe miſerable ſacrifices of vanity, who ſtudie nothing elſe but to deck themſelves up beyond their condition, eſtate, and means, oftentimes with an ill intention, many times with the ſpoils of the poor. Masks of hypocriſie, who find no other employment in this life, but to counterfeit; no other deſire, but to ſeem what they are not. For verily, if you ſhould ſee all their Jewels and trinkets in one heap, you would ſay it were the pillage of a Citie. It is an admirable thing, that one little carkaſs ſhould drag ſo great a train along with it. They go adorned (ſaith the Scripture) as Temples, and certainly they are very like thoſe Temples of Egypt, which hid a Cat or Rat under golden Pavilions. Is not this a ſin inexcuſable before God, to make all the Elements take pains to cover a miſerable nakedneſs, which is nothing elſe but a meer ſcar of ſin? Is not this a great illuſion to bolſter out a dung-hill (which perhaps we muſt carry to morrow to a grave) as if it were to be erected upon Altars? Oh miſerable creatures, what have the worms to do, which ſhall gnaw your bodies, if your hair be of three or four Pariſhes, your eye-brows pulled with little pincers, your eyes diſguiſed, your cheeks put in a Vermilion tincture, your ſtench drowned in Muskie odours, your garments plaited, bumbaſted, looſe-hanged, ſurcharged with Pearls, Precious-ſtones, and Chains, to ſerve as ſnares to catch ſome foundered lovers? It is not the ſolid beauty of Objects, which allureth you, but a meer opinion: becauſe ſuch an one hath it, you therefore muſt needs have the like. If you were perſwaded, that the Fat or Dung of a Crocodile were fit to whiten the Skin, you then would go even to Nilus for it. And if one ſhould tell you, that two Flint-ſtones of the Moluccas would become your ears, and that already ſuch and ſuch did wear them, you would rather hazard the killing of your own Body, then deprive your ſelf of them.

Totam circumferunt in ſitu multitudinem.

Indignity of exceſs in apparel.

Sottiſh jealouſie of excels.

You ſee the unreaſonable proceeding of this ſuperfluity? But I ſay much more: It is cruel and injurious to God, and his Church. What rocky heart would not be cleft, and icy eye diſſolved into tears, if it did bend it ſelf to behold the exorbitancy of theſe wicked delights? To ſay, that three parts of Chriſtendom lived perpetually on Gall and Tears, were drenched in a forſaken, miſerable, and neceſsitous life, were covered with blood and oppreſsions, whilſt others glutted themſelves in ſuperfluity of palate-pleaſing Curioſities, even almoſt to burſting, never deigning ſo much as to ſet a foot on the ground, making their excrementitious ſpittings to ſwim in gold, beholding themſelves in the vain-glorious oſtent of their bravery, always wantonizing, ſtill ſportively dallying. Wo to the rich men of Sion, who put their truſt and confidence in the mountain of Samaria. Wo to the Great-ones, who make boaſt in the houſe of Iſrael, who drink delicate wine in their cellars, and live involved in the moſt exquiſite perfumes, without ever caring for the afflictions of the poor.

Riot cruel, and injurious to God and his Church.

Amos 6. Va, qui opulenti eſtis in Sion. & confidis in monte Samariæ: Optimates, capita populorum, ingredientes pompaticè domum Iſraël. Bibentes vinum in phialis, & optimo unguento delibuti, & nihil patiebantur ſuper contritione Joſeph.

I know the belly hath no ears, but I know not what mouth it may have to defend it ſelf at the judgment of Almighty God, when the hunger of ſo many needy penurious wretches, conſumed with want before your gate, ſhall accuſe you at the Tribunal of this formidable Judg. I know theſe Courtiers want not prattle enough, but I cannot imagine what they can anſwer before the Judgment of God, if the Angels ſhould come to drain theſe inordinate habits to make blood diſtil, and to ſpeak thoſe affrighting words of the Prophet Jeremie: Behold the blood and life of poor men, which I have found in the folds of thy garment. Judg what Chriſtianity this is; and what hope you may have of future life, living in theſe delicacies, ſtrucken with the thunders of ſo many maledictions. Ah, if you adored a God crowned with Roſes, or Pearls, it would be a matter nothing ſtrange; but to proſtrate one's ſelf daily before the * Crucifix, charged with nails and thorns, you living in ſuch exceſs and ſuperfluity in fleſh, diſſolved in ſoftneſs, how can that but be cruel? The Chriſtians of the Primitive Church were ſcrupulous to bear Coronets of flowers on their heads, according to the cuſtom of Feaſts, remembring their Maſter had carried thorns; and Clemens Alexandrinus judgeth, that to ſeek out ſuch effeminacy is a meer Mommery, and a manifeſt mockery of the venerable paſsion of the Son of God. With what eyes can you behold the Crucifix covered with blood and wounds, holding it honourable to bear Flowers, Rubies, and Diamonds, not for once, but to drench all your life, if it were poſsible, in the nice delicacies of the fleſh? How can one excuſe ſuch a maner of proceeding? By what mark would you be known for Chriſtians in the other world? The livery of Chriſtians is patience, and very well thoſe brave courages, which breed us to the Church by their blood, may bear for their arms, a hand cleaving Mountains with Fire, and Vineger, crowned with this Deviſe: No paſſage is ſhut from virtue. Verily theſe valorous Champions, ſparkling with the lightning rays of charity, lifted up their Chriſtian palms in the middeſt of hazards, and forced Heaven with a pious violence. Men were ſeen, who obtained as many Martyrdoms, as they endured torments, and who ſuffered more tortures then they had members; their bodies upon the wheels armed with ſharp Sciſſars; under iron Hooks, under burning Pincers, lying in pieces were many times gathered up by the faithful Chriſtians, and even then put into Tombs, themſelves ſurviving their own Funerals. In this ſtate they climbed upon the ſharp rocks of this painful way of heaven, carrying thither more wounds then members.

In alio tuis inventus eſt ſanguis pauperum.

* Hac & hujusmodi per tranſennam inſpicere ſat erit.

Clemens Alex. Pædag. lib. 1. cap. 10. Ἐνίοις φαν τῷ σεμνῷ τῶν Κυρίου παθῶν.

Virtuti nihil invium.

Virtue of the firſt Chriſtians.

Remorabantur in luce dentes, quorū membra pleni erant tumuli. Sanctus Zeno de Sancto Arcadio.

What anſwer you to this, you children of Saints? Your fore-fathers to purchaſe Paradiſe have wandered in Wilderneſſes, ſtrayed up and down Mountains and Caverns of the earth, cloathed with Goats-skins and Camels hair, and you now adays have no heart to any thing, but to the vain-glorious humour of bravery. Tell me not, that in caſe of perſecution you will be moſt faithful to God; I will anſwer that which Tertullian ſaid: I fear this neck ſnared with wreaths and ropes of Pearl and Emeralds: I fear the ſword of perſecution can finde no place there. Children of Saints, your Grand-fathers have heretofore paſſed ſo many Lents, lying upon hard boards, eating roots, living in infinite frugality, & now forſooth the leaſt Tertul. cap. 13. De cultu fœmin. Timeo cervicem, nè margaritarum & ſmaragdorū laqueis occupata locum ſpatha non det.

Faſt

Faſt ſtriketh you down. Of what complain you? Is it for that you ſtill ſwim not in ſugar, and therefore the Church is too hard to be ſerved? A thouſand Diſpenſations muſt be procured under falſe colours and ſurreptions. You cannot faſt, you cannot do that which you never had a will to do. What a ſhame is it (you children of Saints) your fathers and mothers to gain Paradiſe, although they lived in riches, as you perhaps do, put them under their feet to ſerve as ladder-ſteps to heaven, and you now a-days place them over your heads, to ſink your ſelves even into the abyſs. How would you then, that one ſhould know you in the other world? You ought to be aſhamed of the name which you bear, of your Baptiſm, of your profeſſion, you thereunto affording ſo little correſpondence. God hath made you for another end, and far otherwiſe; you no longer retain any mark, whereby you may be known.

Julius Firmicus De errore profanar. Relig. Erubeſcite, ô miſeri, ſummitatem, aliter vos Deus fecit: cum cohors veſtra ad Dei judicantis tribunal acceſſerit, nihil vobiſcum deferretis, quo Deus, qui vos fecit, agnoſcat.

What are you to do? I. To believe there is no Paradiſe for thoſe that will live in pleaſures, capital enemies of the Croſs of the Son of God.

II. If your birth have ranked you in an eminent ſtate, live therein, and entertain it, rather for a certain neceſsity of beſeeming comelineſs, then for the love of concupiſcence. Live therein as the Bee on honey, well obſerving your wings, be not entangled therewith: which is very hard to do.

III. Make not unneceſſary expenſes above your means. What a ſhame it is daily to behold Frogs deſirous to puff themſelves up like Buls, even till they burſt? No man can keep a mediocrity: man will extend his wings beyond his neſt; his retinue, table, apparel, preſents, all is exceſs, what one poureth forth on one ſide, muſt be ſpared on the other. To entertain great profuſeneſs great avarice is neceſſarily expedient, which cannot be maintained but by wretchedneſs, by rapines, by injuſtice, by oppreſsions, which abſolutely ſhut up the gate of ſalvation.

Non fruſtrà in nellis copia pennas habet apicula; neſtit enim haerentem.

Mortificationem Jeſu in corpore veſtro circumferentes; 2. Cor. 4.

IV. Bear ever about you in ſecret ſome mark of mortification of Jeſus Chriſt, as the Apoſtle appointeth: ſuffering ſome incommodity in cloathing, drinking, eating, ſleeping, and the like; diſdain not to exerciſe your ſelves in acts of humility, and love above all, the viſits and conſolation of the poor afflicted. This is it will ſave you.

The eleventh OBSTACLE,

Envie.

WE likewiſe find in an excellent little book, entituled the Apophthegms of the Hebrews and Arabians, a ſaying of thoſe antient Doctours of the Law, which with much moderation muſt be underſtood: To wit, that three ſorts of people ſhall never undergo the judgment of God, nor paſs through the flames of purgation. Firſt, perſons greatly neceſsitous: Secondly, thoſe who are in publike office: Thirdly the ill-married.

Perſons neceſsitous (ſaith this Authour) becauſe poverty and miſery are moſt ardent fires, which purge and cleanſe the ruſt of iniquity: Thoſe who are in publick office; for what need have they of judgment, ſince the whole world judgeth them? Thoſe that are ill-married, becauſe a bad wife is a portative Purgatory. Theſe words are ſpoken at random with too much extent and liberty. For it is moſt undoubted, that if theſe three kind of people live in integritie, and make profit of their burthens, it will be a wholſom means for them to eſcape the rigour of God's judgment; but abſolutely to exempt them from the juriſdiction of this ſovereign juſtice, is to ſpeak over-raſhly. They have much better hit the mark, who ſaid, that two ſorts of men anticipated their hell in this world, the lovers, and the envious: for in effect there is a hell of love, and a hell of envie. The hell of Love is for thoſe, who inordinately, exceſſively, and with full fruition of creatures, do love to the prejudice of the Creatour. Out alaſs! who can recount the ſhiverings, the feavers, the acceſſes of fire and ice, the gnawing worms, the biting vultures of theſe unfortunate ones, who, having ſhaken off the yoak of ſovereign beauty, have made themſelves ſlaves of a putrified body, the ſpoil whereof the Elements ſhall quickly ſhare? It ſeemeth the Prophet Eſay was deſirous to deſcribe their miſeries in theſe terms: Their ſouls ſhall be as a land of pitch, and brimſtone, perpetually boiling in their own paſsions, and ever ſmoaking with black vapours of a brutiſh ignorance. Yet notwithſtanding this hell of Love amongſt ſo many rigours hath ſometimes certain ſparkles of hope, a ſower-ſweet of pleaſures, which kindle themſelves like flying fires, and are waſted even in their birth; bubbles of water which are blown up, and cracked in a moment: but the hell of Envie is an admirable hell; for it is a voluntary hell, where nothing pleaſeth, and each thing tormenteth; a hell, which containeth fire in it, and affordeth no light; a hell, which always hath the worm preſent, and never the remedy; a hell, which ſuprizeth by the eyes, and diveth even into the heart; a hell, which inceſſantly devoureth, and never conſumeth; which hath miſchiefs without hopes, toils void of repoſe, and torments without mercy; which is as the common feaver of all the gall of this Univerſe, which exerciſeth rage and fury, which hath the wanneſs of death without dying, and the cares of a diſaſtrous life without life. To divert the hearts of men from it I can propoſe but two reaſons: the firſt ſhall diſcover the malignity, and the other the calamity therof.

Erit terra eorum in picem ardentem, nocte, & die non extinguetur, in ſempiternum aſcendit fumus ejus.

It is true, that all vices are ſteeped in the venom of malice, which ſhould be a powerful motive for thoſe to fly them, who naturally love goodneſs: but envie hath I know not what kind of particular influence, which maketh it infinitely odious, and execrable. St. Gregory Thaumaturgus ſaith, It is a waſp of Satan, which ſtingeth men as a gad-fly doth oxen. S. Baſil of Seleucia calleth it the mother of murthers, S. Cyprian the moth of ſouls, and S. Gregory Nyſſen a diſeaſe of nature, a poiſoned gall, the root of vices, the mother of death, and a voluntary Phthiſical conſumption. All the antient Fathers breath out fire & flames when they diſcourſe of it, and indeed never can they ſpeak enough of it. Beſides their authority, which is of great value, Reaſon herein is very potent. For we muſt needs affirm, that by how much the more a vice participateth of the nature of Devils, who are as it were the patrons of ſin, by ſo much the more it is a vice; and envy is of the ſame condition: for it is the ſin, by ſingularity of denomination, called the ſin of the Devil. As in heaven the firſt was the ſin of Pride, ſo the firſt on earth was that of Envy, committed by the ſpirit of impurity; and S. Auguſtine excellently ſaith, Envie is a vice meerly Diabolical, a ſin which defileth the Devils, and irrecoverably damneth them. It ſhall not be ſaid to Satan in the ſentence of his damnation, that he hath polluted the beds of men by his adulteries, that he hath taken the goods of other men by his rapines, that he hath ſeized on demeans & poſſeſſions, driving away the lawful owners, but that he hath envied the felicity of man. The ſame Authour ſaith on the Epiſtle to the Galatians, That this vice hath the property to pour into the heart of men

Gregor. Thaum. Ὄφις ἐκ διαβόλου πνεῦμα κακὸν τὸ φθονερὸν. Baſil. Seleuc. Ὁ τῆς φθόνου ματὴρ. Cyprian. De zelo. & livore. Greg. Nyſſ. in vita Moſis.

Sap. 2. Invidiâ Diaboli mors introivit in orbem terrarum. Aug. lib. 2. De doctr. Chriſtian. Homini ſtanti invidiſti.

Aug. in Epiſt. ad Galat. citatur in Gloſſa. In zelo invidiæ tota ſua viſcera ſerpens concutit, in hac imprimenda quaſi peſtem vomit.

men the Poiſon of the enemie. Yea ſo it is, that particularly the infernal Serpent, when he imprinteth the ſin of envy in the heart of man, doth turmoil his very bowels, and extremely ſtriveth, as it were, to vomit the blackeſt peſtilence, which Hell containeth.

Diſcourſe even with your ſelf, whether the envious be not tainted with a ſpecial malignity, ſince that, beyond all other ſinners, they tranſcendently ſuck in the breath of the Serpent. This black malice more eaſily diſcovereth it ſelf in this, then in all the other mortal ſins, which are verily great exorbitancies of Nature, but they ſeem to have ſome pretext, which mollifieth the evil. The thief robbeth for his profit, the carnal man ſeeketh out his unlawfull luſts to extinguiſh the fire of his paſſion, the covetous man ſaith he is upon good husbandry, the ambitious flattereth himſelf with the thirſt of honour, which hath heretofore born ſway upon Altars; and ſo of other ſins, their malice hath always ſome heat of paſſion, of apparence of good to excuſe them: but the envious, what can he propoſe but a cold malignity, a black cruelty, a will determinately ill without ſemblance of good? Yea, you ſhall find many, that are in infinite abundance, as Dogs couched on hay, who will not eat thereof, for it is not their cuſtome, nor are they willing other creatures, for whom God hath ordained it, ſhould come near it. Many there are, as Tantalus, ever in the middeſt of Fountains, yet drink not, and perpetually beholding him with a jealous eye, that would taſte thereof.

The Fable of the two envious men ſo celebrated is not feigned; we too much approve it in our manners. For it being permitted them to chooſe what each would ask, on this condition, that, his requeſt being allowed him, his companion's ſhare be doubled; the firſt, who was extremely covetous, had all his deſires fixed in the earneſt demand of gold and ſilver, but diſcourſing with himſelf, that by asking he ſhould do a pleaſure to another, this onely conſideration ſtayed him, and never would he afterward open his mouth to make ſuch a requeſt; the other made choiſe to loſe one of his own eyes, that his companion might have it doubled, and be deprived of both.

How many are there at this day in the world, who, embarked with their enemies in the ſame veſſel, care not to periſh, ſo that they dying may glut their eyes with the death of thoſe whom they hate: A moſt ſtrange malignity to forget the preſervation of one's own perſon, to which we are by Nature ſtreightly obliged, to ruin another. The eyes of Gorgons, the hiſſing of Serpents, the aſpect of Baſilisks, are nothing in compariſon of an enraged Courtier, when he beholdeth him to be carried on the wings of favour, whom he would gladly ſee utterly confounded without recovery. Do we not behold the eyes of a dog, when the fortune of another is envied, and the heart of a ſtag, when queſtion is made of the works of courage? Where are not men to be ſeen, who devour one another alive with miſchievous aſpects, and carry even on their foreheads the gall of their envenomed hearts? Where are not ſuch malign ſpirits to be found, who play at faſt and looſe, thruſting him in an inſtant down to the loweſt part of the wheel, who was at the top. At the Court all things moſt commonly fall ſhort, but malice, and envy. It is verily the extremity of miſery, when Great ones do with an open ear too much grace the deſignes of the envious, making themſelves as it were inſtruments of a furious Panther, for the ruin of the innocent. If we ought to ſtop our ears with wax among the ſongs of Sirens, here we have need to have them all of Diamond. What can the envious man expect from this Diabolical malice, but the reward of Cain, in the ſeparation from the ſight of God, and perpetual affrightments? O Cain, jealous Cain, Thou art amazed, that God regardeth not thy ſacrifice, and ſeeſt not, thou art divided, and ſevered within thy ſelf: I ſhall have ſomewhat to do with thy wicked ſacrifice. It is to much purpoſe to turn thy hand to an act of religion, and thy heart to envy. This which thou doeſt is not to appeaſe God, but to provoke him. It is to preſent him with ſacrifice in the one hand, and a ponyard in the other: ſaid S. Bernard.

Bern. Ser. 24. in Cant. Quid miraris, ô Cain, ſi non reſpicit ad te, qui ità diviſus es in te? Si manum devotioni, quid animum das livori? Non conciliat Deum tibi diſcors tecum: non placas, ſed peccas. Etſi necdùm fratricida, jam tamen fidei ida teneris.

And truly to touch the ſecond Reaſon, although the Diveliſh malice of this vice cannot gain conqueſt over hearts to divert them, yet ought the calamity it draweth along with it to beget in our ſouls a perpetual horrour thereof. This ſin is no ſooner born, but it hath its torments and executioners attending. All that which may be truly called miſerable cometh to us from Envy, and the hatred of our neighbour. Firſt it bereaveth us of an infinite number of bleſſings, which we might enjoy by the means of charity. Nothing is ſo rich as the love of God; all beauties, all riches, all poſſeſſions are tributary thereunto. Yea, love in loving, I know not by what kind of powerful Alchimy, draweth all to itſelf, changeth all into itſelf, and maketh the whole world its own. This is the diſcourſe, which S. Auguſtine made of it. O prodigie! Will you know an effectual means how to become in a ſhort time rich, wiſe, fortunate, and holy? You have nothing to do, but to love. Virginity pleaſeth you, and have you it not? Love it in your brother, and ſiſter, to whom God hath granted it, it is yours. This man hath more knowledg then you, and you perhaps more patience then he; love his knowledg, and he your patience, and you both ſhall be contented. Another is more watchful then you, and you faſt better then he; love his watchfulneſs, and let him love your faſting, and then behold you ſhall become watchfull, and abſtinent. That, which I ſay of virginity, patience, knowledg, induſtry, and abſtinence is alſo to be underſtood of all other bleſsings, which we by loving make our own. Such was the exerciſe of(*) David, who taſted the good of another as peculiar to himſelf: he ſanctified himſelf in all Saints, he inſtructed himſelf in all the Sages; he enriched himſelf in all the rich, he participated with all the juſt. Behold you not here the admirable Philoſophy of Love?

Aug. libro quinquag. Homiliarũ Homiliâ 15. tom. 10. Congaude illi, cui Deus gratiam aliquam donavit, tua eſt. Habet ille fortè virginitatẽ, ama illam, tua eſt. Tu habes fortè majorem patientiam, dilige te, & ſua eſt. Ille poteſt ſatis vigilare, ſi non invideat, tuum eſt ſtudium ejus. Tu fortè poteſ amplius jejunare, amet te, ſuum eſt jejunium; quia tu per charitatem in illo es, & ipſe in te eſt.

This being true, as it is moſt evident, conſider the evils, and diſaſters, which proceed from Envy. So many bleſſings, as the Sun daily diſcovereth to you in ſo infinite numbers of creatures, may by loving be yours, and in not loving every happineſs, each proſperity of your neighbour is an iron Lance in your ſide, a Thorn in your heart, and a Nail in your eye. Have we ſo few misfortunes in the world, that we muſt ſeek them in the proſperity of others? The earth vomiteth up miſeries, which dayly draw Tears from our eyes, Sighs from our hearts, and Compaſſion from our moſt obdurate ſouls: yet not content therewith, inſtead of ſearching out ſome lenitive for our wounds in union, and charity, we envy our neighbour, thereby bereaving our ſelves of all comforts, and deep drenching us in all the miſeries of the world. For what evil is comparable to that of envy; to be perpetually like a wretched Owl, not able to endure the day-light of another's proſperity; to be as a ravenous Vulture, who flyeth from ſweet ſavours, and ſearcheth out Carion, to imitate the Fly, which delighteth among Wounds, and Ulcers? What a life is it to run up and down taxing the imperfections of your brethren, and never to open an eye to the ſplendour of their virtue? What a life is it to make the evil of another your good, to have his proſperity your executioner, his glory your puniſhment, ever to bear an ill diſpoſition in your breaſt, to carry tallons, nails, and ſharp combs of Iron in your own proper entrails, and never to end your ſin, to make thereby your torments immortal? This is it, which the eloquent S. Cyprian ſpake in theſe terms. Although through envy ſome profit or parcel of good might be drawn from the ſubject envied, by extenuating the honour, or good of a neighbour, with ſome benefit applicable to ones ſelf, yet God oftentimes permitteth, that by the means of envy the glory of thoſe, who are ſo maligned, is made more illuſtrious. So the brothers of Joſeph, in being deſirous to make him a ſlave, gave him opportunity to become a Lord over all Egypt. So the envy of Saul, when he leaſt thought of it, ſet the Crown on David's head, and affording him matter of affliction gave him occaſion of triumph. So Maximinian the Tyrant through the jealouſie of the honour attributed to Conſtantine contributed all that, which a deſperate envy could invent, and a great virtue ſurmount. He firſt made him General of an army, which he ſent againſt the Sarmatians (a people extremely furious) ſuppoſing he there ſhould loſe his life. The young Prince went thither, and returned victorious, leading along with him the Barbarian King enchained. It is added hereunto, that this direful Prince, excited by a moſt ardent frenzy in his return from this battle, engaged him in a perillous encounter with a Lyon, which he purpoſely had cauſed to be let looſe upon him: but Conſtantine, victorious over Lyons, as well as men, ſlew this fell beaſt with his own hands, and impreſſed an incomparable opinion in the minds of his Souldiers, which eaſily gave him paſſage to the Throne by the ſame degrees, which were prepared for his ruin. We muſt have an Euryſthens to make up an Hercules. Envy many times layeth the firſt ſtone of the Temple of Virtue, ſhe beareth puſillanimity on her forehead, and the condemnation of her impotency in heart, to ſerve as a Trophy of courage, and a badge of valour.

(*) Tarticeps ſum omnium timentium te. Pſal. 118. 63. Ex alieno bono, quæ ſi diligeretis, veſtra faceretis bona; non diligendo, veſtra facitis mala. Gregor. in Paſtorali.

Qualis eſt anima tua in malitia proprium bona convertere alima, illuſtrium proſperitate torqueri, aliorum gloriam pœnam ſuam facere, & velut quoſdam pectori ſuo carnifices admovere, qui ſe inteſtinis cruciatibus lacerent, & ſecreta cordis malevolentia unguis poſſent? Cyprian. De zelo, & livore.

What courſe do you then think to take for concluſion, both you who envy, and you who are maligned. If envy be a Diabolical vice, and a Hell of calamity, why do you not aſſume to you the bowels of a charity truly Chriſtian, to love the gifts of God himſelf in your enemies? Firſt accuſtom your ſelves to be contented with your eſtate, and that condition of life, which God hath allotted you. For from thence ſpringeth the envy, whereby each one thinketh the field of his neighbour more fertile then his own: each one beholdeth with a jealous eye all above him, and hath no ſight to contemplate what is under him. Every one would change that which he is, into that which he cannot be, but by miſchief, or injuſtice. The Ox in the Fable ſaith, if he were an horſe well-furniſhed, and capariſoned as that glorious beaſt (who doeth nothing but prance, or curvet in a field, or ſtreet) he would work wonders: none ſhould be more able, nor fit to draw a Coach then he; to go into the Wars none ſhould be found more couragious then he: but behold him perpetually in the Wain under the hand of a Paiſant, what means hath he to do any brave thing? Yet, admit you ſhould lay Foot-cloaths, and rich habiliments on him, he would ever be an Ox. Why do you diſturb your ſelf about the change of your condition, and not rather ſay: My God, thou guideſt Lives, Eſtates, and Conditions; it is a Muſick, which thou compoſeſt of many accords; it is a Table of many Colours; it is a Body of many Members: why ſhould I make a falſe Harmony, an extravagant Colour, or a prodigious Member? It ſufficeth me to be a party in this Muſick, this Table, this Body: ſet me high, ſet me low, let me be white, let me be black, make me head, make me foot. My God, it is in thee to give me my part, and in me to play it well. Why ſhould I kick againſt the ſpur like a jade? Why, being but a miſerable earthen pot, ſhould I argue againſt my Potter? If the man, whom I envie, meriteth this good fortune, I wrong thy juſtice to malign him, and if he deſerve it not, is he not more worthy of compaſſion then envie, ſince all his greatneſs will ſerve him but for a burthen in this life, and a condemnation in the other. If all make for me in loving, why ſhould I through want of love deprive my ſelf of ſo great a power, which of all things is the moſt eaſie? Why ſhould I create a Hell in my ſelf, where thou haſt a purpoſe to erect a Paradiſe.

You who are maligned, to oppoſe envie render your ſelves truly virtuous, know there are no ſhadows without light, nor envie without ſome gift of God. If the Fagot ſmoaks when it beginneth to burn, when the flame ſhall have gotten the upper-hand, there will be no ſmoak at all. Natural Philoſophers obſerve, that the Rain-bow in the Heavens is not eaſily formed at noon-tide in the ſcorching days of Summer, becauſe the Sun, vigorous in his exaltation, diſſipateth, waſteth, and diſpelleth the Clouds. When you ſhall be mounted to the higheſt pitch of heroick virtue, envie ſhall neither have Bowe, nor Arrow to aſſail you; all ſhall ſtoop to your eminence, and calumny it ſelf ſhall crack, when Truth ſhall dart reſplendent flaſhes into all eyes. Vinegar is ſaid to be uſed for pretious ſtones, which have their fire frozen over, and their luſtre eclipſed: you muſt have a little touch of acerbity to enlighten your valour. The Moon ſeemeth for a time to darken the Sun when it is eclipſed, and yet ſhe daily rendereth the tribute of her light. Envie, which maketh a ſhew to eclipſe you, will make your praiſes multiply by its ſlanders, your repoſe by its battles, and your crowns by your humiliation. No man accompteth it ſtrange, that Cantharides fix themſelves upon Roſes, they no leſs are Roſes for being blaſted by this petty Catterpiller. It is well known, they are not ſatisfied but with the faireſt flowers; you have nothing to do but to ſhake them off, and thereby enjoy the odour of the beauty of the Queen of beauties.

Fear not to be deſpiſed, becauſe you are envied, if you do not before-hand debaſe your ſelf to envie through imbecillity of heart. Nay, rather the moſt envied will be ſought out for a mark of an eminent virtue. The envious will be the more diſſipated, envie will be trampled under foot, and merit crowned by the hand of Juſtice.

The twelfth OBSTACLE.

Ambition, and Avarice.

AFter ſo many rocks, after ſo many counter-buffs, & perils, behold the ſhelf of ſhip-wrack, Ambition, which is a furious avarice to be able to do all, and to have all. It is an itch, which great men bear upon them from their mother's womb, to ſtir up in them a perpetual ſcratching; an itch, the malignity whereof oftentimes turneth their brain even to the making of Heaven to bow under the rules of the earth. Amongſt the difficult queſtions, which the Angel propos'd to the Prophet Eſdras, one was to weigh the fire, and the other to meaſure the wind, the laſt to number the veins of the abyss. Ambition is a devouring fire, who can poize it? It is a wind, who can fathom it? It is an abyss, who is able to recount the sources and issues thereof? A wise man saith very well, that the middle of the earth hath bin found, the depth of the sea hath bin sounded, the height of the Riphean hills hath bin measured, the remotest limits of the hollow caverns of Caucasus have bin discovered, the head-spring of Nilus hath not escaped, onely in the heart of man we cannot find the bounds of the desire of commanding. This passion is no longer a mean folly, it is arrived to the height of rage, the evil is so great it is unknown. Man is so far from discovering the remedy, that he as it were despaireth of health. It is enough, if some lenitive may be applyed. That great wit Hippocrates wished a consultation of all the Physicians of the world, to advise upon the means how to cure covetousness. It is now above two thousand years ago since he had this desire, after him a thousand and a thousand Philosophers have imployed their endeavour to recover this pestilent fever, all have lost their labour therein, the evil increasing in the multitude of remedies, the sick men are all frantick: when the wind of ambition hath raised them to the height of the wheel, they will never descend but by a precipice. It is a most particular favour of God, if it happen, that an ambitious man doth once open his eys to know himself, to measure himself, to put limits upon his desires, and yet notwithstanding the motives and obligations which he hath thereunto are most manifest, as I will make it appear in the sequel of this discourse.

Ambition an itch.

Angelical Enigmas. Eſdræ 4.

Desire of Hippocrates. Hippocrates Epist. ad Abderit.

First, the Scripture, speaking of ambition, calleth it a foreign vice. Pride in man is not in its element, it alwaies seeketh height, and man is even lowness it self. What is man, if we consider him in his own nature without the assistance of grace, but an excrement of impurity in his conception, a silly creature in his birth, a bag and sponge of ordures in his life, a bait for worms in his death? The soul is in the body, as in a Chariot of Glass: The days are the Couriers, which perpetually run upon a full gallop: The four wheels are vanity, weakness, inconstancy, misery: The way is of ice; the goal is death; and the end oftentimes is a precipice. The pleasures thereof (as saith Plato) are winged, and wholly armed with pricks and stings, to leave in flying a sharp point in the heart, the dolour and discontents thereof drench it in a cup full of Gall, and its feet are of lead, never to forsake it. Can then such a creature be possessed with ambition, such a dung-hill nourish pride? All that we behold both above and beneath, on the right, on the left hand, in this great house of Nature, serves as a lesson of humility for us. Heaven, which circumvolveth over our heads, enamel'd with Stars, created in a higher place than we; the Earth, which we tread under our feet, which serveth us for a nurse, afterwards for a sepulchre; the little Air we breath, without which we cannot live; the Water, which in its wonder hath swallowed up wisdom, and afterwards the bodies of the most knowing men of the earth, as we read of Aristotle: beasts, whose spoils we carry about us; our body, which according to account hath for its portion about three thousand diseases; our soul, which knoweth not what shal become of her, and which cannot tell whether she shall serve as an immortal fewel to those devouring flames that have no limits but eternity, or no: All preach to us our baseness, all thunder out the terror and affrightments of God's judgments; and amongst so many subjects of humility you (O Noblemen) have leisure to puff up your selves, and to fill your minds with the gentle breathing blasts of imaginary honour. At the least, if needs you must elevate your selves, if you of necessity must take a great deal of state upon you, choose the best way: but (insensible as you are) what do you take upon you, becoming ambitious? the life of a slave, the life of Cain. This is the second consideration which I propose, of power sufficient to instruct a soul, that will give never so little predominance to reason. We all naturally love liberty, and suppose, that to be of one's self, is an inestimable good.

Reasons and remedies. Psal. 18. 14. Ab alienis parce servo tuo. Ambition a foreign vice. A singular description of man.

All the world teacheth us the lesson of humility.

Ambition the life of a slave.

Inæstimabile bonum est suum esse. Senec. ep. 67.

Now the most captive Gally-slaves are not greater bond-men then the ambitious. The slave hath a chain, & a captain who proudly insulteth over him; an ambitious man hath as many fetters as he hath appetites, as many servitudes as pretensions, as many slaveries as manners of ambition. His Captain is his unguided passion, which tyrannizeth over him day and night with all possible cruelty. The slave practiseth and tameth himself in his own condition: the ambitious is always savage, he always flyeth before himself, and never overtaketh himself, to enter into himself. He is in no place, because he would be every where, and yet notwithstanding he is tormented every where, his fever burneth him where he is not. The slave freeth himself with money, the ambitious man findeth gyves of gold and silver. The slave findeth no chain so streight, but that it sometimes giveth him leave to sing; the ambitious is never free out of himself: there are nothing but objects of frenzie, fire-brands of concupiscence; and within himself there is not any thing but worms, flames, and executioners. The slave findeth at least liberty in death, and death which carryeth the key of all close coverts cometh lastly to unloose al the bands of his servitude; an ambitious soul, as soon as it is parted from the body, is consorted with Devils in their tortures, as it imitated them very nearly in their passion. What a life, what a death is this? Find you any comparable, if not that of unfortunate Cain? The Scripture saith that he withdrawing himself from the sight of God did inhabit the land of instability: and Procopius thereto addeth an antient tradition, that he perpetually saw certain spectres with swords of fire, which brought horrible affrightments upon him. Is the ambitious man better used? Is not he perpetually separated from the face of God, seeing (as saith S. Hierom) man is divided from the Divinity, not by the degrees of body, but of soul, which are the affections? And how much more the soul is scattered in the waste emptiness of ambition, which is indeed a meer vanity, so much more it strayeth from this sovereign Majesty, which is the onely verity. Is it not in the Kingdom of inconstancy? In every place where he setteth his feet, there is nothing but slippery Ice, or downfal. The saying of the Prophet is accomplished in his person: Let their way be made dark and slippery, and the Angel of our Lord persecute them. Behold all the most lamentable extremities, which may be imagined in a voyage; ever to go upon Ice, and theron to walk in the obscure darkness of the night, and to have behind you in the rear a Sergeant, who hasteneth you forward; and all this is found in the life of the ambitious. What passage is not slippery in the favours of the world, all which are feathered and full of mutable conditions? What darkness is there in a wretched creature, who hath no pity at all of himself, who maketh a liberty of his fetters, honour of his ignominy, and trophies of his torments? What Sergeant is more troublesom? What spectres, & what swords of fire more terrible then the pricks of this enraged passion, which is as much, and as violently forceth man, as a Bull goared with a goad rusheth

The life of Cain. Gen. 4. 16. Hebr. אֶרֶץ נוֹד Procop. in Genes.

Hier. Epist. ad Damas. Peccantes recedunt à Deo affectuum non locorum spatiis.

Psal. 34. 6. Fiat via illorum tenebræ, & lubricum, & Angelus Domini persequens eos. Extreme disaster.

rusheth through some headlong precipice? Where is it, that the ambitious man can find place of stability, and centre of repose? If he be in quest of honour, (and when is he not?) behold him in a whirl-pool, in fire; behold him in the severish accesses of heat, and cold, which afford him no intermission. Admit, he obtain what he pretendeth unto, no sooner is he engaged in one way, but his feet itch to transfer him to another. If he be put upon terms of repulse, behold him drenched in desperate and furious Envie, which maketh him die as many deaths, as there are others more happy then himself. Verily, the wheel of Ixion is a silly Fable in comparison of the tortures of the ambitious. That was a sport, which Heliogabalus did, when he took his Courtiers, and commanded them to be tied, and trussed fast to a great wheel, and then rolled, and turned them up and down in the water, taking infinite pleasure to see them sometime aloft, sometime below, sometime to taste the sweetness of the air, and sometime to be deeply plunged in the water, where of necessity they drank more then enough. Ambitious men daily act the same play, but they personate it Tragically: their life is wholly composed of leaps, bounds, and skips; they are the very reeds, the very shuttle-cocks of inconstancy, they are meer wind-blown baloons, which are tossed this way and that way, sometime with the foot, sometime with the hand. They are enforced upon all occasions to bear the fool's bable, and they miserable have drunk with so long and deep draughts of the water of forgetfulness, that they cannot awaken themselves from their drunkenness, until death come to close up their eyes.

Envie.

The wheel of Heliogabalus. Lampridius in Heliogab.

Were it not a thousand times better to plant Coleworts, and roast Chesnuts, then to live amongst so many servile complacences unworthy of a noble spirit, so many frustrated pretensions, so many illusions, so many scornfull repulses, so many hopes, which crack like a cloud, and raise a tempestuous storm, where shade, and sweet refreshment is expected? It is a wonder to behold men to betray their reason to court the Fortunes of Great men, to bereave themselves of comfort, repose, and liberty, to be surprized in a Mill full of skreaking noises, in a confused turmoil of difficult and thorny affairs, poorly to beg a little favour, which perpetually escapeth them, and oftentimes breaks as a glass in the beauty of its lustre. Petrarch, well acquainted with these considerations, spake these most remarkable words: "Miserable "ambitious men, every one hath so much trouble to "spin the web of his own affairs, and to bring them "to a good end, and thou with much chearfulness of "heart pryest into other mens business, yea, into the "affairs of Great men, whom it is impossible to "please without perpetual servitude, nor displease "without most evident danger. After you began to "serve others, you ceased to live to your self: life, "virtue, renown, repose, safeguard, all is lost to thee. "Great men love none but such, who forsake all to "make themselves slaves to their passions.

Captivity of charges.

Petrarch. Dialog. 47. lib. 1. De remediis. Sua negotia gerere laboriosum, quid censeas alitena, præcipuè potentium, quibus placuisse perpetua servitus est, displicuisse discrimen? Ex quo ambitioni servire cœpisti, tibi vivere desiisti. Volu tibi est anima, virtus, fama, quies, otium, securitas. Vix diligunt Reges, nisi qui, omnibus negletis se eorum libidini servum fecit.

What sweats of death, saith Mounsieur D'Ancre, never to have one hour of rest, to be enforced to give audiences, troublesom, tumultuous, and clamorous; to hear and receive suits, and unjust supplications; to be embroiled in affairs, repleniished with knots and thorns; to make Manual Signatures devoid of conscience, that you may not displease a Great man; to grant unlawfull Decrees, wicked Commissions, attended by infamous executions?

Although the pretensions of ambition were a whole world, can they deserve to be purchased with the prejudice of conscience? What would it avail man to be absolutely Lord of the whole Universe for a time, and a sacrifice of Hell for ever? But that, which maketh the madness of ambitious men much more ridiculous, and deplorable, is, that they all their life-time take pains for wind, for smoak, for nothing. The world useth them as Laban did poor Jacob: after he had been roasted, congeled, afflicted, hammered on all sides, he thought to have a fair Rachel, and found a blear-ey'd wench by his side. Every day a thousand fair promises, a thousand hopes, a thousand fansies, and no effect. This fair Rachel, this pretended honour, after so many services cometh not; disgrace, much more ugly then was Lea, is to be found in the same bed of repose.

The ambitious travel for Rachel, and find Lea.

It oftentimes happeneth, the greatest men, who have passed some thirty, some fourty years, to build a Fortune with a thousand disturbances, a thousand indignities, find, they must part with this world, and that they have heaped up nothing but a poor title to make a fragment of an Epitaph on their Tomb: that is it, which the Latine Philosopher bravely pronounced. Yet are these the most fortunate. Others, without ever setting foot into pretended greatness, fall piece-meal into ruin. They are tragical Stage-plays, where the successes of the ambitious may be read both in sacred, and profane Histories. An Haman hanged on a gibber fifty cubits high, to be beheld afar off, and on a gibber, which he had prepared for a man, whom he deigned not to rank amongst the number of his slaves. An Absalom, after he had disturbed the Court of his father, found snares in the hairs of his own head to entangle him (as it is said) to a fatal tree, and die transfixed with the sharp points of three Lances. An Abimelech, after he had made his enraged ambition float in the blood of threescore and ten of his own brethren, crushed under a Tyle, thrown from the hand of a woman. Nebuchadnezzar became a beast. Semiramis slain in a brutish passion by the hand of her own Son. Cæsar gored with many stabs of daggers in the Senate-house of Pompey, after he had caused golden mountains to be carried in triumph, finding no more land to conquer, he having gained so much, wanted five or six foot of ground to make him a Sepulchre. Another, who had taken for ensign a world, with the helm of a Ship, and his Motto, Hoc opus, shewing, that his ambitions transported him not to any lower pitch, then the world's conquest, found himself to be in a worse estate then if he had been a Swabber in a Ship. Another Favorite of Ptolomy, King of Egypt, mounted to so high a degree of honour, that he had but two discontentments in this life; the one, that he could grow no more, so great he was become; the other, that the King, with all his revenews, seemed to him too poor to add any encrease of riches. Few days after, this miserable creature was surprized by King Ptolemy courting a Mistress of his, for which contempt in that instant the Lady was enforced to drink poison, and the unfortunate Courtier was hanged before his own lodging. Another minion of the Emperour Constantius, after he had manag'd the affairs, wars, revenews, houshold, Person of the Emperour, was disgraced, and put to death, because he presented to his Master (at that time incensed with choler) a Pen, ill-made for writing, to sign certain Dispatches withall. Macrinus, a Hunter, a Fencer, a Scrivener, became an Oratour, then a Fiscal, next Pretour of the Palace, then Emperour, and lastly was massacred with his Son Diadumenus. Ablavius, most powerfull under Constantine, torn in pieces under Constantius as a Victim.

Quondam, cum in consummationē dignitatis per mille indignitates irrepsissent, misera subit cogitatio ipses laborasse in tumulum sepulchri. Senec. De brevit. vitæ cap. 19.

Tragical events. Ester.

2 Reg. 18.

Judic. 9.

Dan. 4.

Riarius apud Typotium. Euxenides. Guevar. Courtif. 26. 4.

Julius Capit.

Eunapius in Ædes.

What circumvolutions, what Comedies, what Tragedies, what Examples to those, who in this world have have no other aim but to become great, casting under foot all Laws, both Divine, and Humane? Out alass! It is said, that Cambyses, King of Persia, to teach Justice to a certain President of his, who newly then entered into Office, commanded him to cover the chair of Judicature with the skin of Sesammes his father, put to death, and flayed, because he had been an ill Judg. What should he do, being seated on this wofull Tribunal, upon the blood of his father, but become wise by a dreadfull experience? An infinite number of ambitious men are in Office, and Magistracy, mounted upon the ruins, and blood of their Predecessours, who have made most wicked, and deplorable trials, and have pursued the same ways, without fearing the like event.

Herodot. lib. 5.

Note.

Instructions.

I. Learn (O Noblemen) that all the greatness of the world cannot make you Great, if not by contempt of it. All therein is little, and yet to despise that little, is a great matter.

II. Know, that your Fortunes ought to be as the Halcyon's nest, which seemeth sowed to her body. Matters most aptly proportioned to our nature are the best. What face soever a man sets upon it, he is little. Much turmoil of government, and affairs, may well hinder him, but never make him happy.

Sixtus in Bibliotheca Patrum, Non est minimum in humana vita negligere minima.

III. You must use the honour, which God hath allotted you, as the coin of his coffers, for which you in his last judgment are accomptable, and must limit your pretenses and desires with mediocrity: otherwise you shall be as they, who wandered perpetually about the mountain of Sir, without ever arriving at the land of Promise.

Semper circumvenimus montem Sir, & nunquam ad terram promissionis perveniunt. Petrus Blesensis pag. 40.

Conclusion of the Second Book,

That the life of a bad Courtier is a perpetual obstacle to Virtue.

TO approve good by words, and pursue evil in effect: to condemn the world, and adore it: to desire heaven, and be fixed to the earth: to love one's self excessively, and live perpetually contrary to the better part of our self: to seek for peace, and live in an everlasting warfare: to lodg in one same heart, fire and ice, sickness and health, joy and sorrow, death and life: to command imperiously, and obey faintly: to be ever abroad, and never out of prison: to dream without sleep, and sleep without repose: to be divided to all the world, and never within one's self: to wish that which cannot be had, and contemn what is possessed: to seek after that which hath been despised, and hourly to change resolution: to exercise no piety but by constraint, nor reason but by fits: not to avoid one sin but by another, and to descend into the precipice with open eyes: to take up the buckler after the wound received, and to be cured by the overthrow of health: to slake thirst with salt water, and quench fire with sulphure: to have no constancy, but for evil, nor amity for any thing, but that which deserveth it not: to have sottish actions, and glorious pretexts; as much faith as the Ice, and assurance as the Wind: to be the slave of a thousand false Deities, and not to reflect on the true Divinity: to prefer the fetters and onious of Egypt, before the liberty and palms of the heavenly Sion: to leave Paradise, to follow the gardens of Tantalus, and those enchanted Islands, which recoil backward according to the proportion we think to approach them: to carry, under a smooth countenance, a heart spotted as the skin of a Panther: to join a voluptuous life to a penurious, avarice to prodigality, servitude to predominance, nobility to baseness, pride to misery, & envy to pity: to promise without faith, swear without regard, command without reason, appoint without order, affect without choise, hate without cause, walk without a path, and to live perpetually banished from one's self, so to become too much tied to one's self: This is the life of a Courtier, who hath alienated himself from the life of God. Add hereunto, that vice is commonly waited on with a most painfull life, wherein, if endeavour be not used to sanctifie it by virtue, there is found a Hell anticipated, where a Paradise is imagined.

Petrus Blesensis, Chancellour to the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, having some time attended in the Court of the King of England, recounteth the evils, he there found by experience, in a Letter, which he addressed to the Chaplains of the same Prince. There he complaineth, the Courtiers many times suffer for Hell all those pains, which St. Paul endured for Heaven: for they are exposed to dangers, both of sea, and land, rivers, and mountains, thieves, and false brothers, to fasting, and watching, to weariness, and to all the incommodities of humane life. Epist. 4.

He hath seen (he saith) bread and wine served up, which one could not put into their mouths without shutting their eyes, such loathing it enforced, and viands that killed men under the shew of nutriment. He hath known Lords draw their swords for a cabbin, which deserved not a battel among hogs. He hath seen a Prince, who delighted to be attended by Officers suddenly surprized, to whom he gave notice of his remove, when they had Physical drugs in their bellies, and made them oftentimes run themselves out of breath through forests, and darkness, and at other times, to pine away in expectation of all that which would but frustrate their hope. He hath seen harbingers troublesom before they received gifts, and most ungrateful after they had them, who made no scruple to put an honest man out of his lodging, and to pull him both from table and bed, that he might lie in the streets. He hath seen at Court Porters worse then Cerberus, with whom the memory of a benefit lasted not three days, and who took pleasure to make those stand in the durt and rain, that had obliged them.

Buffoons and Jesters found ever free passage: nothing but virtue & honesty had a wainscot face shewed them. Finally, all the plagues of Egypt dwelt there, frogs, flies, ulcers, rivers of blood, a land of iron, a heaven of brass: such a confusion of men & beasts, of affairs and concurrences, of game and quarrels, that this kind of life seemed to be a little figure of Hell.

I pass under silence what Lucian hath written of the misery of servitours, and officers of great men, in the treatise, which he to that purpose made for his friend Timocles. There you behold one not yet become an arrant gull, who thrusts him self forward to make a fortune in the house of a rich man; he beginneth to get the favour of some servants, who make mops and mews at him behind his back, when they have taken his gifts: he cloatheth himself in fashion, and puts on the livery of him, whose grace he seeketh, he multiplies his paces, & visits daily, never gaining one good countenance from my Lord, nor my Lady. In the end, if it once happen he be looked on, or spoken to, he is somewhat amazed, and maketh answer little to the purpose, which occasioneth laughter. One observeth his reverences, another casts an eye on his posture; another takes account of his words. He is found to be somewhat sottish, yet he is not out of hope, so that he may be favoured. Thereupon he must trot up and down the street, and employ his best friends to purchase his slavery. On the other part, inquisition is made into his life, as if they would choose him Governour of a Province, and in the end of the matter, it is found he is taken in but to keep a little dog. This is it, which happened to Theſmopolis the Stoick Philoſopher: for a Roman Lady that kept him in her houſe, after ſhe had called him aſide, and uſed much diſcourſe with him concerning his capacity, his virtue, and worth, ſhe reſolved to beſtow a great office on him, which was to take charge of her little Bitch that was ready to whelp.

of

When all obſtacles and oppoſitions are diſſolved, if one enter into the houſe of this Lord, he ſeemeth to paſs into Heaven, ſo unwillingly the golden yoke is put on, which murdereth him under the ſhew of enriching.

In the mean time the old ſervants look on this new-come gueſt, and if he be any thing lettered, or have ſome talents of wit, or ability, they fear leſt he ſhould grow too far into the good liking of the Maſter. Behold the cauſe, why they diſgrace him as much as they can, even to the framing of Hiſtories upon his genealogy, and life, which prove very prejudicial to him.

If bargain be to be made upon wages to be given him, they put into the liſt of account, the name, the quality, the titles of the houſe, and ſome ſuborned flatterer ſhall ſay, the ſervice he doth to ſo great a perſonage ought to be in the ſtead of recompenſe: yet notwithſtanding they ſpare not to amuze him upon the hope of great gratuities yearly given, of favours, and imaginary courteſies.

For this (ſaith he) he muſt paſs over bloody days, and reſtleſs nights, drop ſweats of death, live wretchedly, ſwallow affronts, praiſe all that which is blameworthy, and condemn what is laudable, flatter, lye, ſmile in looſing, and oft-times ſerve for a laughing-ſtock, as an ape tyed to his clog. He muſt bear coronets of flowers, and titles, like an old pillar of a tomb, and in effect have nothing, no, many times not ſo much as the wages bargained for, wherewith he cannot be payed, but by breaking all hope of payment.

To conclude, the Court reſembleth thoſe crafty Courtizans, who entertain witleſs Amoriſts with words, and never afford what they promiſe, until thoſe fall into the inability of giving, and theſe into diſtaſte of receiving.

That man is in ſome ſort excuſable, who takes pain to taſt ſome excellent viand: but to waſte one's ſelf with labour, and travel, to ſee another man feed, under the colour that he will afford us ſome part of that he enjoyeth, how can it be but ridiculous?

If you will have the Court in a piece of painting, repreſent unto your ſelf (ſaith he) a goodly golden Portal upon an inacceſſible mountain, all environed with precipices, where nothing is to be ſeen but arms and legs broken, but maimed and miſerable people; within riches ſitting, all of Gold, and very lovely: the Courtier beholdeth her with an eye full of admiration and aſtoniſhment. Hope, clothed in a party-coloured garment, goes before him, and taking him by the hand encourageth him to make his approach to this Divinity. Then followeth deceit, that delivers him over to ſervitude, ſervitude to travel, which perpetually toyleth him in an infinity of moſt painful labours. Travel, when it hath thorowly worn it out, gives him up to old age, already griſly pale, and invaded with many maladies. From thence ignominy ſeizeth on his perſon, and drageth him along againſt his will into deſpair, which is the cauſe hope flieth from him, and vaniſheth into ſmoke. Then he is no more ſuffered to paſs through the Golden Portal, by which he entered in, but through ſome wretched back-way Poſtern, that he may not behold the frightful ſpectacle of a poor decrepit old man, naked, gorbelled, and wan, who hideth his ſhame with one hand, and ſtrangleth himſelf with the other. He hath no better thing to meet withal at his going out, then repentance, which weeping waiteth on him in the way, the more to augment his miſery.

"Happy he, who, not being able to ſanctifie the "miſeries of the world, at the leaſt ſeeketh for a re- "treat in the ſweetneſs of repoſe.

THE THIRD BOOK,

Of the practice of VIRTUES.

The READER ſhall obſerve, this Book, being compoſed for a more familiar inſtruction, is the leſs inlarged in diſcourſes and allegations, but (as is moſt convenient) more knit and ſuccinct in precepts. I have purpoſely made it deciſive and in manner of Aphoriſms, as the Antients handled moral things, to make them the more compendious and profitable.

The firſt SECTION.

Devotion of Great Men.

Nazian. in Iamb. Ἄρρητον ἔργον χρήματος ἀπειλὴ λόγος.

IF more worth (ſaith S. Gregory Nazianzen) is a good dumb work, then an eloquent Oration without effect. A golden tongue, and a leaden heart, never matched together. It is nothing for one to have the Trumpet on his lip, who hath not the Torch in his hand, according to the example of thoſe brave Soldiers of Gedeon. The voice of great S. Athanaſius was a thunder-clap, and his life a lightning-flaſh, ſaith the forealledged Authour, becauſe words never thunder well, if examples enlighten not.

To

To what purpose is it to warble like a Lute, and to be deaf to the harmony thereof? To carry wherewith to shift and cleanse others, as the ass of the hot-house, and be himself perpetually bemyred, and slovenly? To buzz up and down like a drone, or humble-bee, and neither make hony, nor wax? All the Devotion of a soul truly Christian tendeth to practice, as the line to its centre. Our wisdom (said S. Cyprian) is a prudence of works, not of words, or paper. This is it, which hath given me occasion, having treated of Motives, Obstacles, and Remedies, which men of quality may have in the way of spiritual life, briefly to prepare a little practice of virtues, which more concerneth their condition, to behold them afterwards appear in the History of Courts, which I purpose to begin in this present Volumn.

Cyp. lib. De patientia. Philosophi factu, non verbis sumus: nec magna loquimur, sed vivimus.

It much importeth at the very first entrance, to make a good idea of Devotion, which many plaister over in their own manner, and attire with their passion, making that sometimes serve for vice, which beareth the sceptre of virtue. Some imagine devotion to be nothing but an ordinary practice of unseemly gestures, and motions, such as little puppets would make, if they were animated with some small quantity of quick-silver. Others make use of devotion, as Dionysius the Tyrant did of Philosophers, not that he loved them, but that folding himself in their cloaks, he thought he should be honoured by the people. So shall you finde sometimes in the world those, who for a vain interest of reputation will cloath themselves with the robe of false devotion, as if one should seek to shelter himself under a wet sack. I speak not here of devotion, which concerneth Religious men, nor that which is in the sweetness of contemplation, but I affirm the virtue of devotion, according to S. Thomas, is nought else but a prompt will to the service of God. Noblemen have cause to aspire thereunto.

True devotion of Great men. Sentite de Domino in bonitate. Sap. 1.

I. A good devotion in Great men is to have a great and faithfull feeling of the Majesty of God, not serving him with exteriour semblances, but sincerely, cordially, constantly, holding all the Maxims of state and condition under the rules of conscience; and disposing themselves rather to hazard all, then to lose God by one sole sin.

Note these points, and examine them often Anima irreverenti & infrenata nè tradas me. Eccl. 23.6.

II. A good devotion, to clip the wings of the covetousness of riches, and greatness: covetousness, which never findeth measure but in extremities, nor other period then a precipice. Take heed of a soul without bridle, without reverence.

III. A good devotion, not to reach at the goods of the Church by any false pretense, represented in the Court of Rome, by any black or covert deceits, sowed together with white thread, nor afterward to charge a man with titles, like an old Sepulchre, and hold to himself the Patrimony of Jesus Christ, therewith to fatten Dogs, and feed Hawks, or such other infamous creatures, which live on the sins of others. Finally, these goods are Eagle's feathers, which eat, and consume others: whilst a soul is lodged there, it remaineth in a bitterness replenished with gall, and in the perplexed intrications of sin.

In felle amaritudinis, & in obligatione iniquitatis Actor. 8. 2 Reg. 21. Væ, qui conjungis domum ad domum, & agrum agro copulatis usq; ad terminum loci. Nunquid habitabitis vos soli in medio terræ? Isaiah 5. 8.

IV A good devotion, not to encroach upon the possessions of your neighbour, nor enforce the good Naboth to sell his land for the accommodation and content of your Lordship, but, if he will leave it, to give him a good price, a reasonable rate, a full satisfaction. Wo to you (said Isaiah) who annex house to house, inheritance to inheritance, as far as the land stretcheth. Would you dwell alone in the midst of the earth?

V. A good devotion, in things, which one may rightfully exact, to be staid, just, temperate, not covetous, no Harpy, no tyrant, but to extend the bowels of compassion towards the poor, who are our flesh & blood, to open the eys, not to invent new impositions, that may draw the marrow from the people, but to take away, or lessen the old, that necessity requireth no more. Salvianus complaineth that in his time there were as many Tyrants as Lords & Courtiers. And that is the cause why God gave the Roman Empire as a prey to Barbarians, being Masters more mild then the covetousness of Great ones.

Dissolve colligationes impietatis, solve fasciculos deprimentes. Isaiah 58. 6.

Salvian. l. 5. De guber. Quot Curiales, tot Tyranni.

VI. A good devotion, to discharge his debts, and promises, and never suffer the wages of the poor hireling to ly hid in his Coffers.

Non morabitur opus mercenarii tui apud te usque ad manè. Lev. 19. 13.

VII. A good devotion, to attend publick charges, which you are to undergo, especially those that concern distribution of justice, with understanding, conscience, and diligence: understanding, to know the affairs; conscience, to handle them faithfully; diligence, not to draw out the expedition of causes in languishing delays, so prejudicial to the publick.

Diligite justitiam, qui judicatis terram. Sap. 1.

VIII. A good devotion, in banishing superfluity of apparel and tast, excesses, curiosities, houshold-vices: to cause modesty, frugality, employment, and virtue to reign; and to be the first himself to light the Torch to his family. You must necessarily expell delights; for their tenderness and excesses weaken and enervate all Religion.

Tertul. De cultu fœminar. Discutienda sunt delicia, quarum mollitie, & fluxu, fides virtus effœminari potest.

IX. A good devotion, to make choise of servants, to instruct, or make them honest, and to esteem no man faithful in your service, who is disloyal to God: Not to be desirous to keep a bad servant for one's own interest, though the whole house would be changed into Gold by his hands.

Attende tibi à pestifero, fabricat enim mala. Eccles. 11. 35.

X. A good devotion, to hinder disorders, and sins, which are committed in publick, when you have authority in your hands, without shewing your self insatiable to revenge your own proper injuries, and more cold then Ice in the quarrel of God. When a man hath the power in his hands to stay a sin, to permit it is to commit it. These are points of devotion, which we must hereafter more amply digest.

In cujus manu est ut prohibeat, jubet agi, si non prohibet admitti. Salvian. l. 7.

The second SECTION.

In what all Devotion and spiritual life consisteth.

YOu, who aspire to spiritual life, know there are three sorts of man in you alone, the Vegetal, Animal, and Intellectual; and that all your perfection consisteth in putting the Vegetal and Animal man under the feet of the Intellectual. A great number of men are now a days Vegetals, that is to say, who so live as if they had no other soul but the vegetative, as plants, and lead the very life of the mushrome. Others are Animal, who make their souls wholy evaporate in sensual love, in choler, rage, in brutishness. Few shall you find, who are Intellectual, who work with reason, and understanding. And behold, wherein consisteth our excellency and repose, to wit, in raising the Intellectual man, many times currishly trampled on under the feet of concupiscence, to his proper sphere, which is the knowledg and union with God.

Three sorts of man in us.

To arrive to this point, it is good to note a worthy doctrine of Hugo of S. Victor: to wit, that there is above us a creating Trinity, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; in us a created Trinity, understanding, memory, will; about us a dangerous Trinity, titillation, delectation, consent; under us an unhappy Trinity, into which we fall by sin, ignorance, weakness, impuritie.

Hugo Misc. 2. codic. l. 3. pag. 87. Notable doctrine of Hugo.

impuritie. Reason falleth into a triple ignorance, of good and evil, of true and false, of suteable and disproportionable. Memorie into three kinds of thoughts; affectionate, being such as concern sensuality; burthensom, as appertaining to the toils of life; idle, as all vain thoughts are. The Will suffereth it self to be surprized with three kinds of nets, which are concupiscence of flesh, concupiscence of eyes, and ambition of life.

A man reduced to this state resembleth King Nebuchadnezzar, who went out of his Throne to eat hay with brute beasts: so the miserable man, after he hath forsaken the seat of Reason, goeth into the stable with his bestial Passions. The true and onely means to free your self from such unhappiness, and to return to your first dignity, is to open your heart to the graces, and lights of the Holy Ghost, and to dispose your self to practice of virtues, which directly resist these three plagues of spiritual life, ignorance, weakness, impurity. These are the three monsters, which a spiritual man ought necessarily to subdue, that he afterward may enjoy an assured repose.

Now to the end you may the more perfectly understand the difference between the carnal and spiritual man, I will in this Discourse following set their Characters before your eyes.

The Character of the Carnal Man.

Drawn from Prosper lib. 3. De vita contempl. Secundùm suipsum vivere.

THis is a man, who liveth according to man, that is to say, according to himself, who applieth all to himself, and makes of himself his scope, his end, his Divinity. He goes whither he listeth; he converseth by humour and phantasie; he sleepeth when he will, and as much as he will; he eats, and drinks, and laughs, without rule, or measure; he speaks without discretion, or reservation. All that which is sweet to the smelling, soft in touching, pleasing to the eye, delicate to the tast, charming to the ear, seems to be created for him. He passionately seeks after it, and hath no other law in his passions, but the power of his brutishness, nor maketh any distinction of things permitted and prohibited in the licence of all pleasures.

A charitate sui conditoris & illustratoris resilit. Foràs in exteriora sic projicit. Sensatarum rerum imagines repræsentat.

All spiritual actions are hatefull to him: his soul, after it hath lost the good, for which we were made, wandereth at random in the vast emptiness of creatures, and issueth out by the gates of all the senses, to glut its concupiscence.

If it happen he be deprived the contentments he pursues (as oftentimes the Divine Providence frameth Obstacles enough against his depraved desires) he entertaineth himself with the Idea of his pleasures, that he may leave nothing in his soul untainted with corruption: he makes his Memorie guilty by the representation of his passed lust; he heareth without Voice, he smelleth without Odour, he tasteth without Relish, he sees without Colours, he toucheth without Body, and createth imaginarie Sins to gain real Torments.

Illa rudis est, illa dicacula, illa deformis, illa formosa.

All his pastime is onely among Dogs, Horses, curiosities of the Throat, or Love. All women, who have made any impression on his Thoughts, are perpetually remembred in his discourse: one in his opinion is fair, and another courteous; one is rude, and another wily; this is plain, and that painted: the head-dressing of one pleaseth, the chopin of the other: behaviour is graceful in this, discourse in the other.

In the end this immortal spirit is fixed to flesh, and sold to lust, to serve as an instrument for Devils in this life, and to afford fewel for the flames of Divine vengeance in the life to come.

The Character of the Spiritual Man.

Partly drawn from the same Prosper lib. 2. De vita contem. cap. 21. lib. 3. cap. 1. & lib. 1. cap. 12.

THe spiritual man is properly he, who treadeth in the paths, which the Saviour of the world traced out unto us by his example: who contemneth the prosperities, which JESUS CHRIST despised, who feareth not the adversities, which he most courageously hath endured, who freely teacheth what he taught, who doth what he did, who hopes what he promised, and followeth where he led the way.

This is he, who meditateth how to satisfie reason, not sensuality, who more willingly acteth that which may edifie then delight; who rebateth the point of carnal desires by spiritual pleasures; who subjecteth the flesh to the spirit; who preferreth the present time before the future; who will do all which he will according to the rules of the will of God. He never slandereth; he never despiseth any man but himself; he knows what it is to malign the prosperous, to persecute the miserable, to court the rich, to seek out his proper interests, to enlarge his estate by unjust practices, to sooth his senses, to content his curiosity, nor to entertain his pleasures.

He is neither puffed up with pride, nor precipitated by ambition, tickled by vain-glory, nor enflamed with desire of honour; not over-born with delights, not gnawn by hatred, not troubled with contentions, not terrified by force, nor softened by pleasure. Boldness makes him not impudent, iniquity unjust, obstinacy of heart untractable, inconstancy variable, rigour opinionative, fury witless, gourmandize curious, disobedience rebellious, vanity a vaunter, infidelity treacherous, easiness of nature fickle, cruelty harsh, perverseness jealous, revenge choleric, nor malignity injurious. His whole life is admirably interlaced between action and contemplation, which make on earth a figure of Angels ascending and descending, giving us in this life already a taste of the benefits, which we hope in the other.

Active life makes him profit in the world, Contemplative sheweth him the way how he may surmount the world. The one goes to it by degrees, the other flies to the top; the one makes him holy, the other perfect; the one causeth him to pardon injuries, the other placeth him beyond the sense of an injurie; the one teacheth him to mortifie passions, the other establisheth him in the empire over all passions; the one directeth him to cloath the nakedness of the poor, the other makes him to be despoiled of himself; the one unloosoth the setters of Prisoners by his hands, and the other enchaineth him to God; the one giveth succour to the afflicted by his means, and the other voluntarily makes him afflict himself in the imitation of the sufferings of JESUS CHRIST; the one hasteneth to a neighbour, and the other abideth in God; the one hath exercise, the other joy; the one conquereth, the other possesseth; the one knocketh at the door, the other entereth in; the one despiseth the world, the other enjoyeth God.

Finally, the spiritual man is a man covetous of eternity, prodigal of life, little careful of the present, certain of the future. A man, who seems no longer to have any commerce with the world, and who hath nothing so familiar as a life that is as it were buried in death, and who flieth above Sepulchres like an Angel, who holdeth not of the earth, but by the slender root of natural necessities, and already toucheth heaven with a finger. A man, who is as yet in flesh, though he hath made an eternal divorce with flesh, who is under-foot to all the world by humility, and above all the greatness thereof by contempt of it: who binds himself, to be at liberty; who crucifieth himself, to combat; who mortifieth himself, to be the more vigorous; who withereth, to flourish again; and daily dieth, that he may never die.

From whence our evils come.

(a) Oculis capti fodere cubilia talpæ. Virgil. Georg.

(b) Prima scelerum causa mortalibus ægris, Naturam nescire Dei. Silius lib. 4.

(c) Five rays of the Soul. Dignity of faith.

(d) Fides res est audax, atque improba, perveniens quò non pertingit intelligentia: ipsa ascendit super Cherubin, & volat super Seraphin, sinas alas habens. Aug. apud Guilelm. Lugdunens.

(e) Prov. 21.

(f) Et erat nubes tenebrosa, & illuminans noctem. Exod. 14. 20.

The third SECTION.

Of the first Monster, which the Spiritual man should resist, to wit, Ignorance, and of the practice of Virtues, by which it is subdued.

THe greater part of men have dexterity in delving the ground like Moles (a), and have no eyes to behold the Sun. Yet all evils proceed from ignorance, and the want of the knowledge of God. (b) This is the first Monster, which we must assault, the first Obstacle we must take away. And for this effect observe a wholsome doctrine, to wit, that God is the Sun of all the Intelligences, and that from this Sun five (c) rays of a lively and quickening light are diffused over the darkness of our understandings. These five rays are Faith, Understanding, Council, Wisdom, and Prudence. The first and most excellent light is Faith, because the other rays do well enlighten the soul in those operations, of which it is as it were the Fountain, but Faith alone raiseth him above himself to his beginning, which is God. (d) Faith is a virtue bold and urgent, which attains to that the Understanding cannot reach unto, mounteth above Cherubins, and flies above Seraphins, though they have six wings. A man without faith is as the Pilot, of whom it is spoken in the Proverbs (e) that fell asleep and lost his rudder. What virginity is to the body, the same is faith to the soul. It is the first-born of virtues, the begining of spiritual life, the life of the understanding, as charity is the life of the will, the pillar of the cloud (f) which hath two faces, faces: the one dark, becauſe it believeth the things, which are not apparent; the other lightſom, for that it believeth with an infallible aſſurance.

The fourth SECTION.

Practice of Faith.

What Faith is. Speranda-rum ſubſtantia re-rum, argu-mentum non apparentiũ. Hebr. 11. 1.

THat you may well practice the acts of Faith, you muſt know the Nature, Object, and Motive thereof. Faith (ſaith S. Paul) is the foundation of hope, and the proof of things not apparent. The foundation of hope, in regard all whatſoever we hope in matter of Religion is grounded upon Faith, as the ſtatue upon its baſis: the proof of things not apparent, becauſe it is an infallible argument of truths, whereof we have not as yet evident notice. S. Bernard addeth, that it is a firſt-taſt, certain, and voluntary, of truth yet not manifeſted. The Gold-Smith laboureth upon gold, ſilver, and pretious ſtones, as upon his proper object: and the object, which employeth faith, are the myſteries revealed unto us by God, and propoſed by his Church. Such myſteries ought to be believed for no other Motive, but for that God the eternal Truth hath revealed them. The arguments, which are drawn from the Propheſies, Miracles, numbers of Martyrs, purity of the Evangelical Law, from the correſpondency thereof with Reaſon, from the admirable ſucceſs and conſent of all the Myſteries, from the converſion of the world, from the means which the Church hath uſed to eſtabliſh it ſelf, from her firm conſtancy amidſt Perſecutions, from the wiſdom and ſanctity of the Profeſſours of our Law, and ſuch like things, which I have produced in the firſt Obſtacle of the ſecond Book, are moſt powerful Conſiderations to introduce us to faith, and to make eaſie and familiar to us the acts thereof: but they are not properly Motives of Faith. In the ſame manner, as the Soul draweth knowledg from ſenſe, and yet notwithſtanding is above ſenſe; ſo Faith, though ſhe ſerve her ſelf with theſe Conſiderations, which are able to command the moſt contumacious ſpirits, yet is ſhe admirable raiſed upon a more ſupereminent ſphere, and will abide no other touch but of the eternal Verity, which darteth a forcible lightning-flaſh into the ſoul, able to dazle, enlighten, and ſurprize the moſt proſperous liberty, that may be imagined. Thence the ſoul cometh to believe, not by humane diſcourſe, by Miracles, by Doctrine, by Sanctity, but becauſe God ſpeaketh inwardly unto it, and giveth it ſo powerful a touch, that ſhe judgeth infallible whatſoever is revealed and propoſed unto her by the Church. Behold to what point the good S. Elzear Count of Arian was arrived, when he ſaid he taſted matters of Faith with ſuch certainty and reſolution of underſtanding, that, when Monſieur Miron (held for a prodigie of knowledg in his time) and all the moſt famous Doctours would have perſwaded him the contrary of what he had embraced in the ſimplicity of his heart, all their ſubtilties could not be able to give the leaſt ſhock to his ſpirit. This admitted, the acts of Faith are Voluntaria quædam & certa præli-batio necdũ propalata veritatis. Bern. lib. De conſider.

Its object. S. Thom. 2. 2. q. 1.

How we ſhould believe.

How Faith works. A fine Compariſon.

Wherin Faith conſiſteth.

Touch-ſtone, to know whether one have Faith.

I. To ſubmit proper judgment to God with all ſimplicity, and humility of ſpirit, who ſpeaketh unto us by his Church, by Scriptures, by Traditions, by Councils, by Canons of the ſovereign Paſtours of the Church.

II. To believe firmly all the Articles of Faith, which are propoſed to us, as well thoſe concerning the Divinity, as the Humanity of our Saviour: thoſe, which concern the Sacraments, and Ceremonies, as thoſe, which appertain to the order and government of the Church.

III. Throughly to retain the ſummary of the Chriſtian doctrine, to inform your ſelf of the explication of every Article, not for curioſity, but duty. To read, repeat, meditate, ruminate them very often; to teach them to the ignorant in time of need: but above all to give direction to your family, that they may be inſtructed in thoſe things, which belong to the knowledg of their ſalvation. It is an inſupportable abuſe to ſee ſo many, who drag ſilk at their heels, and have Lynx's eyes in petty affairs, to be many times ſtupid and brutiſh in matter of Religion, and in the knowledg of God.

IV. To abhor all innovation, and liberty of ſpeech, which in any the leaſt degree ſtriketh at the antient practices of the Church.

Judicious notes of S. Ignatius concerning ſincere Faith. * Hac Auctoris σφάλματα notanda, non probanda.

*V. And therefore it is neceſſary, as our Father S. Ignatius hath obſerved, to praiſe and approve * Confeſſion, which is made to a Prieſt, and the frequent Communion of the faithful, interpreting the devotion of others in a good ſenſe.*

VI. To recommend the Sacrifice of the Maſs, to love, practice, perſwade others to the laudable cuſtom of being preſent the oft, as much as may be. To eſteem Church-muſick, Prayers, Canonical hours, Supplications, Proceſſions, and ſuch like.

VII. To praiſe the Orders of Religion, the vows of Poverty, Chaſtity, Obedience, works of Supererogation and Evangelical perfection, ever generally preferring Virginitie and Continency in diſcourſe before Marriage.

VIII. To eſteem of Reliques; to recommend the veneration and invocation of Saints; to be much affected to the ſervice of the moſt bleſſed Mother of God; to approve of Pilgrimages, which are orderly performed, Indulgences, and Jubilies, which the glorious King S. Lewis recommended to Philip his ſon in his laſt words.

IX. To have a religious opinion of the Abſtinences and Faſts inſtituted by the Church, and of the manner of Penances, and Mortifications, which religious and other devout perſons pioufly practice.

X. To maintain the commandments of the Church, and ordinances of Superiours, both by word, and example; and though their lives ſhould not be conformed to their doctrine, yet not to detract, nor murmure at their actions in publick, or private, thereby to alter in the people's belief the reverence and reſpect to their dignity: but (as much as ſhall be expedient) privately to admoniſh them of their defective carriages in their charges.

XI. Highly to eſteem the doctrine of ſacred Theologie, which is taught in Scholes, and to make accompt of the great Doctours, whom the Divine providence hath raiſed in this later Age valorouſly to oppoſe Hereſies.

XII. Not to inſiſt in ordinarie diſcourſes upon exaggerations, comparing men, who live in this Age, with the Apoſtles, Doctours, and Saints of antiquitie.

XIII. To fix our ſelves upon the reſolutions of the Church, that what our own peculiar reaſon would judg to be white, we to eſteem it black, when the Decrees of the Church it ſelf ſhall be ſo; always preferring the judgment of the Church before our private opinion, knowing that humane Reaſon, eſpecially in matters of Faith, may eaſily be deceived: but the Church, guided by the promiſed Spirit of truth, cannot err.

XIV. Not inconſiderately to be embroiled in the thorny Controverſies of Predeſtination: highly to commend Grace and Faith, but warily without prejudice of Free will, and Good-works.

XV. Not ſo to ſpeak of the love and mercie of God, that one may ſeem thereby to exclude the thoughts and conſiderations of fear and divine juſtice.

Behold the ordinary Rules to preſerve your ſelf in faith. If you now deſire to know how this virtue is purified and refined in man's heart, and in what conſiſteth the excellency of its acts, behold them here. You muſt carefully take heed of having onely a dead Faith without Charity, or Good-works, which S. Auguſtine calleth the Faith of the Devil. It is a night-glimmer, obſcure, and melancholy; but lively Faith is a true beam of the Sun. The acts of a ſtrong and lively Faith are Heroick acts of Faith. Matth. 8. Caſſius Longinus libro Περὶ ὕψους.

I. To have great and noble thoughts of God, as that brave Centurion, of whom it is ſpoken in S. Matthew, who ſuppoſed the Maladie, Health, Death, Life of his ſervant abſolutely depended upon one ſole word of our Saviour, and thought himſelf unworthy he ſhould enter into his houſe. Caſſius Longinus, a Pagan ſo learned, that he was called the Living Libraric, one day reading Geneſis could not ſufficiently admire the ſublime ſpeculations, which Moſes had of the Divinity, when he wrote of the world's Creation, and that God at the ſound of one ſole word made the great maſter-pieces of this Univerſe to riſe out of nothing; as Heaven, Earth, Water, the Sun, and Moon.

II. To believe with great simplicity, removed from all manner of curiosity, and nice inquisition. God would not the point of the knife should be lifted up on his Altar to cut it. So likewise the point of humane spirit must not be raised on the Altar of faith, nor the curtain drawn to enlighten the mysteries with the torch of Reason. St. Lewis was most perfect in this degree, who would not stir a foot to behold a miracle in confirmation of his belief.

Silvereus in cultrum tuũ super ea, pollinatur. Exod. 20. 25.

III. To believe with great fervour, esteeming nothing impossible to your faith, as did that simple shoo-maker, who under a King of the Tartars removed a Mountain in the sight of the whole world, by the fervour, and simplicity of his faith.

Paulus Venetus lib. 1. cap. 18. De reb. Orient.

IV. Not to stagger, nor be afflicted, when you ask any thing of God in your prayers, holding it undoubted, that it will be granted, if it be for the greater glory of the Sovereign Master, and your more advantageable profit. You must always hold your hands lifted up in some kind as Moses did, even to the setting of the Sun, to vanquish our Amalekites.

Exod. 17. 12.

V. To have a generous heart and full of confidence in adversities, not to admit distrust during the storm; but with firm footing to expect the consolation of heaven, even when we shall be in the shades of death, as said the Prophet.

VI. Little to prize temporal goods in comparison of eternal: to be ready to despoil one's self from all the pleasures and commodities of the world, if there be any danger of faith, as that brave Courtier Moses, who forsook the contentments of Pharaoh's Court, to be afflicted with his own people.

Hebr. 11. 24. &c.

VII. To give alms liberally, with a firm belief, that the hand of the poor is the Treasury of God.

VIII. To employ even life it self, as so many Martyrs have done, and to seal your faith with your own blood. This is the most heroical act; but yet it ought to be guided by discretion.

Now, to make easie the acts of Faith,

How acts of Faith may be made easie.

I. It is good oftentimes to consider how reasonable, glorious, and full of merit this act is. Reasonable, to submit the Creature to the Creatour; glorious, to see the Sovereign Lord so served, and honoured, that for the defence of one sole word but once pronounced by his mouth a thousand and a thousand good servants are ready to bestow their lives; full of merit, in as much as we give a free consent, voluntary, and pious, and not being enforced by manifest evidence.

II. To be often confounded in the weakness, and incapacity of our understanding, which is found so short in the knowledg of many petty things. There needeth no more but the foot of an Ant to slay it, and a glass of Water to draw it. What stupidity then is like this, to be desirous to make one's self over-wise, and to judge that impossible, which cannot be comprehended in matter of Religion?

III. To apply your mind to the consideration of motives, which may form in your spirit a probability of that, which is proposed unto you, as are those I have noted before, and which will give good enterances to the inspirations of God.

IV. To retire from the toyl of senses, which do nothing but disturb when you consult with them in things spiritual; and to raise your soul above flesh to be illuminated by the Sun of Intelligences.

V. To take away the Obstacles of all sorts of impurity, and namely of pride, and all disordinate affection.

VI. To strike at Heaven-gate with prayer, seeing faith cometh unto us from the treasures of the Father of light. Faith so planted, fortified, and manured by good works, illuminateth a soul. All the savage and cruel beasts, all the brutish passions, Chimæras, dreams, irresolutions, which went roaming up and down in this great Forest of confusions, amongst the shadows of night, are scattered so soon as this radiant Sun beginneth to dissipate darkness with his divine rays.

Hope.

Then is it, that a soul wholly clad with the clear lights of hope (which causeth it to expect the blessings of the other life) goeth on with a great and constant resolution, as one, who hath for support the infinite power of God, who is as faithful in his promises, as rich in rewards.

Behold how this monster ignorance is overthrown by the arms of light.

The fifth SECTION.

Of four other Rays, which serve to dissipate ignorance.

Beam of Understanding.

BEsides the torch of Faith, God also gives us the light of Understanding, of Counsel, Wisdom, and Prudence, which are as unvaluable riches, wholly replenishing the soul with splendour, as saith the Prophet Isaiah. The gift of Understanding doth free us from a certain brutishness, which is the cause that men, tying themselves only to external and sensible things, are perpetually out of themselves: at which time Understanding calls them back again, and makes them to re-enter into their house, to see the beginning, progress, and end of the life of man, from whence he cometh, whither he goeth, what will become of him.

Of Counsel.

Counsel enlightneth us in things doubtful, to take a good way.

Of Wisdom.

Wisdom puteth us out of an apprentiship, and draweth us from a certain childishness, which maketh men as little ones, and carnal, mutually entertaining themselves with temporal things. And the knowledg of God raiseth, and causeth them to turn their faces directly towards Eternity.

Of Prudence.

Prudence considereth good and evil, according to the quality, and quantity thereof. It examineth the circumstances of actions, and sheweth us what ought to be done in such a time, such a place, and such occasions.

The sixth SECTION.

Twelve fundamental Considerations of spiritual life, partly drawn from that worthy man John Picus Mirandula.

Note, that it is good often to meditate these Maxims, either one a day, or all together.

FRom the five rays explicated before proceed great and goodly lights, by direction of which a life wholly new is begun. John Picus of Mirandula, a great and remarkable man, held for a prodigie of wit, much tasting the content of spiritual life, enlightned by the rays of a wisdom absolutely celestial, establisheth twelve Considerations, which we ought continually to meditate on, for the practice of the knowledg of God.

1. Consideration, Nature, and Dignity of man.

I. The first, the Nature and Dignity of man, to wit, that the first and ceaseless endeavour of man should be of man himself; to see what he hath been, what he is, and what he shall be. What he hath been, nothing; what he is, a reasonable creature; what he shall be, a guest of Paradise, or of Hell, of an eternal felicity, or of an everlasting unhappiness.

Greatness of the Soul.

What he is according to Nature, a master-piece; where many prerogatives meet together; a body composed of a marvellous Architecture; a soul endowed with Understanding, Reason, Spirit, Judgment, Will, Memory, Imaginations, Opinions; a soul, which flieth in an instant from one Pole to the other, descendeth even to the center of the world, and mounteth to the top; which is found in an instant in a thousand several places. Which embraceth the whole world without touching it, which goeth, which glittereth, which shineth, which diggeth into all the treasures and Magazines of Nature, which findeth out all sorts of inventions, which inventeth Arts, which governeth Common-Wealths, which disposeth worlds. In the mean time she beholdeth about her self an infinite number of Dogs, that bark at her happiness, and endeavour to bite her on every side.

Love fooleth her, ambition turmoileth her, avarice

Tyranny of Passions.

rice rusteth her, and lust enflameth her, vain hopes sooth her, pleasures melt her, despair over-bears her, choler burns her, hatred filleth her with gall, envie gnaweth her, jealousie pricketh her, revenge enrageth her, cruelty maketh her savage, fear froiseth her, sorrow consumes her. This poor soul shut up in the body, as a bird of Paradise in a cage, is altogether amazed to see herself assailed by all this mutinous multitude, and though she have a sceptre in her hand to rule, she notwithstanding oft suffereth her self to be deceived, ravished, and dragged along into a miserable servitude.

From thence behold what man is through sin; vanity, weakness, inconstancy, miserie, malediction.

What he becometh by grace; a child of light, a terrestrial Angel, the son of a celestial Father by adoption, brother and co-heir of Jesus Christ, a vessel of election, the Temple of the Holy Ghost.

What he may arrive unto by glory; to be an inhabitant of Heaven, who shall see the stars under his feet, which he hath over his head, who shall be filled with the sight of God, his beginning, his end, his true, onely, and original happiness.

2. Benefits of God.

II. The benefits received from God considered in general, as those of creation, conservation, redemption, vocation, and in particular the gifts of the body, of the soul, of nature, of capacity, ability, industry, dexterity, wariness, nobility, offices, authority, means, credit, reputation, good success of affairs, and such like, which are given to us from Heaven, as instruments to work our salvation. And sometimes one of the greatest blessings is (that which few esteem a benefit) not to have all these advantages, which lead a haughty, weak, and worldly spirit even into an headlong precipice; but quite contrary, good disadvantages (in the opinion of the world) put him into the estimation of heavenly things. Man beholding what he hath been, what he is, what will become of him, from whence he proceedeth, whither he goeth, and how the union with God, his beginning is his Scope, Butt, and Aim; if he doth that which reason dictateth to him, he instantly takes a resolution neither to have vein, sinew, nor artery, which tendeth not to his end, to conquer his passions, and no longer to serve creatures, but so far forth as he shall know them profitable to lead him to his Creatour. Every creature speaketh these words to man: O man keep what is given to thee, expect what is promised thee, and avoid what is forbidden thee.

Serva commissum, expecta promissa, cave prohibita. S. Bernard. De gradibus humilitatis.

3. Passion of the Son of God.

III. The third consideration is the passion of the Son of God; a bottomless abyss of dolours, scorns, annihilations, love, mercy, wisdom, humility, patience, charity, the book of books, the science of sciences, the secret of secrets, the shop, where all good resolutions are forged, where all virtues are purified, where all knots of holy obligations are tied, the schole, where all Martyrs are made, all Confessours, all Saints. Our weakness, our faintness, come not but for want of beholding this table of excess. Who ever would open his mouth to complain of doing too much, of suffering too much, of being too much abased, too much despised, too much turmoiled, if he considered the life of God delivered over and abandoned for him to so painful labour, so horrible confusions, so insupportable torments? O my God, my wounded God! As long as I shall see thy wounds, I will never live without wound.

Nolo vivere sine vulnere, cùm te videam vulneratum. S. Bonav. in Stimul.

4. Example of Saints.

IV. The examples of all Saints, who have walked in the royal way of the cross. When we consider the progression of Christianity, and the succession of so many Ages, whereseever our consideration setteth foot, it findeth nothing but the blood of Martyrs, combats of Virgins, prayers, tears, fastings, sack-cloath, hair-cloath, persecutions, afflictions of so many Saints, who have, as it were, won Heaven by main force. Such have been found, who had heretofore filled Sepulchres with their members, torn with engins, and swords of persecution, and were yet alive to endure and suffer in their bodies, which had more wounds then parts of body to be tormented. It is not a shame to have the same name, the same Baptism, the same profession, and yet to be always desirous to tread on Roses? To be embarked in this great ship of Christianity with so many brave spirits, which even at this day hourly do wonders in the world, and to go under hatches to sleep in the bottom of the vessel, as needless outcasts, and the very scorns of reasonable Nature?

Remorabantur in luce detenti, quorum membris pleni erant tumuli. S. Zeno Homil. de Sanctis Arcadio.

5. Inward peace.

V. The peace of a good conscience (the inseparable companion of honest men) which sugareth all their tears, which seasoneth all their acerbities, which dissolveth all their sharpness; a perpetual banquet, a portative Theatre, a delicious torrent of inexplicable contentments, which begin in this world, and which many times are felt even in chains, prisons, and persecutions. What will it be when the consummation shall be made in the other world, when the curtain of the great Tabernacle shall be drawn, when we shall see God face to face, in a body impassible as an Angel, subtile as a ray of light, swift as the wings of thunder, radiant as the Sun, when he shall be seen amongst so goodly, and flourishing a company, in a Palace of inestimable glory, and when one shall lead no other life, but that of God, of the knowledg of God, of the love of God, as long as God shall be God? What will this life be, nay, what will this life not be, since all the goods thereof either are not, or are in such a life of lights, which place cannot comprehend; of voices, and harmonies, which time cannot take from us; of odours, which never are scattered: a feast, which never is finished; a blessing, which eternity well may give, but of which it never shall see an end?

Nescio quid erit, quod ista vita non erit, ubi lucet quod non capit locus, ubi sonat quod non rapit tempus, ubi olet quod non spargit flatus, ubi sapit quod non minuit edacitas, ubi haret quod non divellit asternitas. Augustin.

6. Condition of this life well described.

VI. It is to be considered on the other side the condition of this present life: A true dream, which hath the disturbances of sleep, but never the repose; a childish amuzement; a toyle of burthensom and ever-relapsing actions, where for one Rose a thousand thorns are found, for one ounce of hony a tun of gall, for blessings in apparance evils in substance. The most happie there count their years, and cannot reckon their griefs. The carriers of the greatest honours are there all of ice, and oftentimes are not bounded, but with headlong ruines. Its felicities are floating Islands, which always recoyl backward at that time when we think to touch them with our finger. They are the feasts of Heliogabalus, where there are many invitations, many ceremonies, many reverences, many services, and at the end thereof we find a table and banquet of wax, which melts before the fire, and from whence we return more hungry then we came. It is the enchanted egg of Oromazes, wherein this impostour vanted to have enclosed all the happiness of the world, and in breaking it there was found nothing but wind. All these pleasures flatter our senses with an impostur of false colours: why do we suffer those eyes to be taken in the snares of errours, which are given to us by heaven to behold the light, and not minister to lying? Yea, that, which greatly should distast us in this present life, is, we live in an Age stuffed with maladies, as old-age with indispositions. We live in a world

Lamprid. in Heliogab.

Omnia hæc conspectus nostro infidiosis coloribus lenocinatur: ut illa oculorum, attributa lumini, non applicetur erroris. S. Eucher. in Parænes.

greatly corrupted, of which may be ſaid, It is a monſter, whoſe underſtanding is a pit of darkneſs, reaſon, a ſhop of malice; will, a Hell; where a thouſand paſſions outragiouſly inſult over it. Its eyes are two conduit-pipes of fire, from whence flie ſparkles of concupiſcence; its tongue, an inſtrument of malediction; its viſage, a painted hypocriſie; its body, a ſpunge of ordures; its hands, the tallons of Harpies: and finally it ſeemeth to have no other faith but infidelity, no law but its paſſion, no other God but its own belly. What contentment can it be to live with ſuch a monſter.

7. Quality of worldly pleaſures.

VII. If there be pleaſures in life, they do nothing but a little ſlightly overflow the heart with a ſuperficial delectation: Sadneſs diveth into the bottom of our ſoul, and when it is there, you will ſay it hath feet of lead, never to forſake the place, but pleaſure doth ſooth us only in the outward parts of the ſkin, and all her ſweet waters run down with full ſpeed into the ſalt Sea. Behold wherefore S. Auguſtin ſaid, when any proſperity preſented it ſelf to his eyes, he durſt not touch it. He looked upon pleaſure as on a fleeting Bird, which ſeemeth as it were ready to be ſeized, and flyeth away as ſoon as ever ſhe ſees her ſelf almoſt ſurpriſed.

Aug. Conf. l. 6. cap. 5.

8. Their ſhortneſs.

VIII. Pleaſures are born in the ſenſes, and like abortives are conſumed in their birth: Their deſires are full of diſturbances: Their acceſs is of violent, forced, and turbulent agitations: Their ſatiety is farced with ſhame, and repentance: They paſs away after they have wearied the body, and leave it like a bunch of grapes, the juice whereof is extracted by the preſs, as ſaith S. Bernard: They hold it a goodly matter to extend their fulneſs: They muſt end with life, and it is a great hazard, if, during life it ſelf, they ſerve not their hoſt for an executioner. I ſee no greater pleaſure in the world, then the contempt of pleaſure.

Bern. Serm. 10. in Cantic. Nulla major voluptas, quàm voluptatis faſtidium. Tertul. de ſpect.

9. The end.

IX. Man, which waſteth his time in pleaſures, when they are ſlipped away much like waters engendred by a ſtorm, findeth himſelf abandoned as a pilgrim diſpoiled by a thief. So many golden harveſts which time preſented to him are paſſed, and the ruſt of a heavy age furniſheth him with nothing but thorns, ſorrows to have done ill, and inabilities of doing well: what then remains to be ſaid, but that, which the miſerable King ſaid, who gave his ſceptre for a glaſs of water: Alas! muſt I for ſo ſhort a pleaſure loſe a great Kingdom?

Lyſimachus.

10. Difficulty of penance.

X. Evil always beareth ſorrow behind it, but not true penance. It is a moſt particular favour of God, to have time to bemoan the ſins of our paſſed life, and to take occaſion by the fore-lock. Many are packed away into the other world without ever having thought of their paſſage, and ſuch ſuppoſe they ſhall have many tears at their death, who ſhall not have one good act of repentance. They bewail the ſins which forſake them, and not God whom they have loſt. True contrition is a hard piece of work. How can he merit it, who willingly hath ever demerited?

Facilius inveni, qui innocentiam ſervarent, quàm qui congruè pœnitentiam agerent. Ambr. l. de unica pœnitent. c. 10.

11. Death.

XI. In the mean time death cometh a pace; it expecteth us at all hours, in all places, and you cannot attend it one ſole minute, ſo much this thought diſpleaſeth you. The Decrees thereof are more clear, and perſpicuous, then if they were written with the beams of the Sun, and yet we cannot read them. His trumpet ſoundeth perpetually more intelligibly then thunder, and we underſtand it not. It is no wonder, that David in the 48. Pſalm calleth it an Enigma; every one beholdeth the Table, and few know the ſenſe of it. Notwithſtanding it is a Caſe concluded, we muſt take a long fare-well from all things, which appertain to life, that can be extended no further then life it ſelf: and it is a Caſe reſolved, that Serpents and Worms muſt be inherited in a houſe of darkneſs. It is a goodly leſſon, whoſoever can well learn it. To know it well once, it muſt every day be ſtudied. Nothing is ſeen every where but watches, clocks, and dials, ſome of gold, ſome of ſilver, and others enchaſed with precious ſtones. They advertiſe us of all the hours, but that which ſhould be our laſt: and ſince they cannot ſtrike that hour, we muſt make it ſound in our conſcience. At the very inſtant when you read this, a thouſand and a thouſand perhaps of ſouls, unlooſened from the body, are preſented before the Tribunal of God, what would you do, if you were preſently to bear them company? There is but one word: Timely deſpiſe in your body the things, of which you ſhall have no need out of your body.

Pſal. 48. 5. According to the Hebrew. הידת

Diodorus apud S. Max. ſerm. Omnia iſta contemnito, quibus ſolutus corpore non indigebit.

XII. Your ſoul ſhall go out, and of all the attendants of life ſhal have none but good and bad by her ſides. If ſhe be ſurprized in mortal ſin, hell ſhall be her ſhare; hell, the great lake of the anger of God; hell, the common-ſewer of all the ordures of the world; hell, the ſtore-houſe of eternal fire; hell, a depth without bottom, where there is no evil but we may expect, nor good which may be hoped.

12. What followeth death. Apoc. 14. Tertul. De anima c. 53. Hug. l. 4. De anima.

Behold the twelve Conſiderations, which this moſt worthy man uſed to direct himſelf in the courſe of a virtuous life; and they ſo far had prevailed upon his ſoul, that he reſolved after he had finiſhed certain works, which he then had in hand, to diſtribute all his goods among the poor, and go bare-foot thorough the Cities, Towns, and Villages, carrying a Crucifix in his hand, to preach the Croſs, and the bleſſings of the other life, employing his whole talent, which God had given him to his ſervice. But death prevented him.

The ſeventh SECTION.

Twelve Maxims of Wiſdom, which ariſe from the twelve precedent Conſiderations.

Often examine your life by theſe Maximes.

FRom theſe Conſiderations twelve goodly Maxims of wiſdom ariſe, greatly neceſſary for any, who would enjoy true happineſs.

1. Good value.

I. The firſt is, to give to every thing its eſtimation, ſince the beginning of our unhappineſs proceedeth from a falſe value, which we ſet upon creatures. It marvellouſly importeth to eſtimate every thing according to its worth. That good man Epictetus ſaid more then one would think, when he gave this advice: My friend, if thou loveſt a pot, remember thy ſelf to be a pot. For want of the knowledg of the price of what we love, we put God under the Altar, and vice above, to allow it the beſt part of the incenſe.

Μίμνησο ἂν χύτραν ἀγαπᾷς, ὅτι χύτρα εἶ.

2. Light of mind in the choiſe. Oſee. 12. Balance of Chanaan.

II. For this cauſe it is neceſſary daily to endeavour to enfranchize our ſelves from the opinions of the world, and to uſe, not the balance of wicked Chanaan, of whom the Scripture ſaith, Chanaan in manu ejus ſtatera doloſa, but the balance of Jeſus Chriſt, which is the Croſs. There we ought to weigh the pleaſing and the profitable, good and evil, ſowr and ſweet, time and eternity, and to proportion our judgments, reſolutions, deſigns, actions, proceedings, to this great balance, which cannot deceive us. And as we are exteriourly to reſiſt this torrent of popular opinions, ſo we interiourly have our paſſions, which we muſt neceſſarily extirpate, that we may give a judgment upon every thing with full liberty, otherwiſe they caſt chaff into our eyes, and ſo blind us.

3. To live a pilgrim.

III. To live here as a pilgrim of the world, diſ-arrayed

arrayed of all: to eſteem nothing our own, but our ſelves. All that which maketh us deſie, quarrel, conteſt, accuſe God and man, is, that we have thought our ſelves to be proprietaries of thoſe things, of which we have but onely the uſe. We muſt (ſaith Epictetus) take all the bleſſings and honours of the world as a paſſenger, who going out of a ſhip gathers cockle-ſhels upon the ſand, yet ever hath his eye upon the ſhip, to which he is engaged. Saint Chryſoſtom maketh ſuch account of this Maxim, that he ſaith, There is but one virtue in the world, that cauſeth all other virtues, which is, to carry one's ſelf as a pilgrim of this world, and a Citizen of Paradiſe.

Epict. Ench. c. 12.

4. Opinion of providence. Non fecit, & abiit.

IV. To have a very good opinion of the providence of God, who covereth as it were under the ſhadow of his royal mantle all creatures. S. Auguſtin ſaith, That God hath not made the world, afterward to leave it, like a Carabin, who hath ſhot off his piſtol. He governeth, and defendeth it, as the good nurſe, who driveth away the waſp from her infant's face, whilſt it ſecurely ſleepeth. He yieldeth himſelf accountable for all the hairs on our head. And doſt thou then ſaith S. Auguſtine fear to periſh, confiding in God? One hair, taken from thy head without thy knowledg, or feeling, ſhall not periſh; and ſhall thy ſoul be deſtroyed, which is the root of all thy thoughts, and of all thy underſtandings? If God ſo preſerve thy ſuperfluities, what will he do to thy treaſures? Truſt with confidence in the providence of God, if you deſire always to live content. If your life be a feaſt, the Divine providence is the Salt, which ſeaſoneth it. If that be a pilgrimage, this is the ſtaff. If that be a night, this is the break of day. If you will fight, it is a ſteely buckler. If you ſleep, it is a bed of repoſe. Our life is compoſed of three ſhadows, which are time paſt, time preſent, and the future. Will you have a good ſhare in them all, ſaid that admirable Emperour Marcus Aurelius? Diſpoſe time paſt to forgetfulneſs, the preſent to ſanctity, and juſtice, the future to providence.

Aug. hom. 14. t. 10. p. 108. Times ergo ne pereas, cujus capillus non peribit? Si ſic tua cuſtodiantur ſuperflua, in quanta ſecuritate eſt anima tua? Non perit capillus, quem cùm tondetur non ſentis, & perit anima, per quam ſentis?

Mar. Aur. Anton. l. 2. de vita ſua

5. To flie evil innovation.

V. To know the ways of this ſacred providence, we muſt take heed not to be too wiſe, like ſome arrogant and ſcattered ſpirits, who boaſt to wander and alienate themſelves from the way, which all Saints have held, and ſearching out new paths find every where illuſions, and precipices. All theſe lovers of innovation, and proper judgment, are Pharaoh's Counſellours, who have drunk in the cup of giddineſs.

Interrogare ſapientem dimidia ſapientia eſt. Homo ſapiens eſt quàm diu quærit ſapientiam: ubi putat ſe ad ejus culmen perveniſſe, deſipit.

There is likewiſe found a little book of Apophthegms, tranſlated out of Arabick into Latine by Druſius, which hath theſe remarkable words: To conſult with the wiſe, is to be already half-wiſe. A man is wiſe ſo long as he ſeeketh wiſdom, but when he ſuppoſeth he hath throughly attained it, then he becometh a fool.

6. An aſſured butt.

VI. To have an aſſured ſcope to aim at, not onely in general, which is to ſeek in all things the greateſt glory of God, and one's one ſalvation, but alſo in particular to make and propoſe to your ſelf a regular and well-pondered courſe of life. Some have ſo many affairs, that they have not leiſure either to live, or die, others have nothing to do, and are perpetually wandering, and as it were looking for the key of their houſe, and never entering into it. We muſt take in hand ſome employment, and moderate retirement, therein following the inſpiration of God, an intention pure to live in the place, which ſhall be moſt proper for us, to unite our ſelves to him according to our capacity, following withall the conſultation, which we ought to make with our own natural conſtitution, the direction of thoſe, who know, and govern us, provided they be diſintereſſed from their own paſſions. It is a buſineſs of no ſmall importance to have good ſucceſs herein. Some find without thinking thereof conditions, which ſeem made to their nature, as the neſt of the Halcyon is fit to his body. Others, for that they have made a falſe ſtep, are enforced to be the bridle all their life-time, if by patience they do not correct the defects of their carriage. Above all things it is convenient here to purifie your intentions, and if you muſt be embarked in the Court-life, not to come thither as a Janiſary, or a Mamaluck, to make a fortune, and do nothing elſe.

Vacation.

7. Solid piety.

VII. To embrace a true and ſolid piety, ſuch as our Fore-fathers have conſigned over to us in all ſimplicity, and ſuch as the Church inſtructeth us. Not to plaiſter, nor diſguiſe it for the accommodation of theſe petty ends: ſuch a practice is a great ambition, and cannot in concluſion avoid dreadful and dangerous accidents. You muſt ſerve God interiourly with great ſincerity of heart, and moſt pure thoughts of his Majeſty; exteriourly applying your ſelf to ordinary ſervices and ceremonies with moſt ſincere freedom, without ſuperſtitions, ſcruples, vanities, preſumptions, ſingularities. Behold (ſaith Syneſius) the baſis of the eſtate and total greatneſs of man.

Syneſius de regul. ad Arcad. Κρηπὶς ἀσφαλὴς, ἐφ' ἧς ἑδρύει τὸ ἄγαλμα ἔμπαλιν.

8. Honeſty.

VIII. To frame to your ſelf a ſoul, which is in a certain temper of integrity, conſiſting in well following the Light of Nature, and the touch of Heaven, which teacheth us we muſt do to another all that, which we would have others to do unto us, and not to offer to another what we diſlike in our ſelves. Behold the road-way of honeſty, which whoſoever forſaketh to become crafty, ever byaſſing to his pretended advantages, ſhall in the end of his accompt find himſelf deceived. That great forementioned Emperour Antoninus ſaith, the wiſdom of man conſiſteth in three points: well to behave himſelf towards God, which is done by Religion; with himſelf, which is done by mortification of his paſſion; and with men, which is effected by ſparing and tolerating them, every where doing good, and after he hath done good, to have his ears prepared to hear evil.

Antonin. l. 5. de vita ſua.

9. Government of pretenſions.

IX. To govern his deſires within the limits of his capacity, and modeſty. It is a great note of folly to attempt all things, and do nothing; to be turmoyled with the preſent, and to have always the throat of an enraged concupiſcence gaping after the time to come; to be vexed with himſelf, and not to be of power to repoſe within himſelf; to make the ſteps of honour the degrees of his ruin; to raiſe a fortune like a huge Coloſſus, to make it fall upon his own ſhoulders, and to leave no other witneſſes of his greatneſs, but the prints of his fall. It is a thing very difficult to have much, and impoſſible to have all: but it is ſo eaſie a matter to deſpiſe all, that it conſiſteth in nothing, but in a bare refuſal.

Senec. ep. 62. Contemnere omnia quivis poteſt, omnia habere nemo.

10. Tranquillity.

X. To procure ſuch an equality of ſpirit, ſo even, ſo regular, that he ſcarcely feel the approach of happineſs, and when it is loſt, not to make any ſhew of it. To behold the good of another as his own, and his own as an other man's. To hold riches, and honours, as a river that glideth to day for you, to morrow for an other. It is the nature thereof always to run gently; what wrong doth it to us? When proſperity laugheth on you, look back upon adverſity, which cometh in the rear, and remember you have ſeen tall ſhips loſt in the harbour, even as it were in jeſt. S. Auguſtine pleaſed to repeat that verſe of Virgil:

Auguſt. Ep. 113. & alibi.

Mène

Mène sali placidi vultum, fluctúsque quietos
Ignorare jubes?

Desirous thereby to signifie to us, that we should no more confide in the prosperities of the World, then to a still Sea, which in his over-great calm oftimes presageth the near-approaching tempest. Brave and valorous Captains heretofore made a Sacrifice to War in the midst of Peace; and in the midst of War dressed Altars to Peace: to declare, that in Good we should live in distrust of Ill, and in Evil in hope of Good; but in both, the one and the other, ever in equality. This verily is one of the Master-pieces of wisdom, which God imparteth to spirits greatly resigned, and who have passed through the most thin and slender searces.

11. Discretion in affairs.

XI. To behave one's self prudently in all kind of occasions, to examine the tenents and utmost bounds, the original, progress, end. Never to judge, till you have seen the bottom of the business, and therein to carry your self so, that if success cannot wait on your desires, you may not justly accuse either any crooked intention, or want of discretion. We are Masters of our Wils, but God hath reserved to himself the command over Events.

12. Meditation of death. Chrysost. hom. 2. in Epist. Pauli ad Coloss.

XII. To be alwaies ready to depart from hence chearfully, when death shall sound the retreat. Saint Chrysostom saith finely: This life is a Nest framed of straw, and morter; we are the little birds, shall we putrifie in the stench of this filthy Nest? If devotion hath made us wings, why are we slothful? Let us bravely mount and take that flight, which our Eagle tracked out unto us in the day of his Ascension. Remember, the quintessence of all wisdom is the meditation of death. It is a business we should learn all our life time, to exercise it once. The faults therein committed are irreparable, and the loss without recovery. This consisteth in three things, resignation, dis-engagement, and union. As for resignation, be not too faint-hearted, nor suffer your self to be called upon to pay a debt, which so many millions of men have discharged before you, and which so many millions shall likewise pay after you: shew to those who visit you, patience in your sickness, resolution at your last hour, and not to desire any thing but spiritual assistances.

As for your departure, go out of the world as the Chicken out of the shell.

1. Dispose of your temporal goods in time, by making a just, clear, and perspicuous Will. 2. Restore the goods of another. 3. Pay your debts as far as you can. 4. Lay open your Affairs. 5. Give pious Legacies to charge the Altars of mercy with the last Victims. 6. Reconcile your self; and above all things, beware you carry not with you too much confidence and inordinate affection into the other world. 7. Take order for the education of your children. 8. Dispose of Offices, if you have any, with an upright conscience. 9. Forget not the labors of your poor servants. After this dis-engagement, draw the curtain betwixt your self and all creatures. By a good Confession unite your self to your Creator, by the sacred Viaticum, extreme Unction, by acts of Faith, Hope, and Charity, by good suffrages of the Church, good admonitions, good purposes, good remembrances of the death of our Saviour, yielding your soul up upon a Crucifix, as a childe who sleepeth on the breast of his Nurse.

The eight SECTION,

The practice of Devotion, and Prayer.

ONe of the shortest waies to gain wisdom is to be devout. Devotion is, as it were, the flame and lightning-flash of charity; and it is properly a prompt and affectionate vivacity in things, which concern the service of God. It principally shineth in prayer, and in the exercise of the works of mercy. Prayer, as saith the great Saint Dionysius the Areopagite, is, as it were, a chain of silver, which from heaven hangeth downward to draw man up from earth, and unite him to God. It is the Mount Tabor, where an admirable transfiguration is made of the soul into God. It is the spirit, which speaketh to God, which poureth it self on God. In conclusion, it is coloured by God, even as Jacob's Ews did denote their burden to be of the same colour, of which those Wands were that they stedfastly beheld. It is it, which the Apostle pleased to say: Beholding the glory of God, we are transfigured into the same image, from brightness to brightness, as by the Spirit of God. Prayer is the Conduit of Grace. It is (as very well S. Ephraim hath said) the standard of our warfare, the conservation of our peace, the bridle of our impatience, the guardian of temperance, the seal of virginity, the advocate of offenders, the consolation of the afflicted, the sepulture of the dying. For the Just are buried in prayer, as the Phenix in perfumes. Prayer doth all. A Christian without prayer is a Bee without sting, who will neither make honey, nor wax. It is to little purpose to propose unto you the mysteries of Faith, and the maxims of Christian wisdom, if you use not meditation to ruminate them. It is as meat cast into a stomach without digestion, which will do more hurt then good, not of its own nature, but by your indisposition, which is bad. From hence proceed the desolations of the earth: from hence are derived so many falls, so many miseries, for that men apply not themselves to taste the things of God in prayer.

Volunta quadam prompta tradendi se ad ea, quæ pertinent ad Dei famulatum. S. Th. 2. 2. quæst. 82. S. Dionys. cap. 3. De Divinis nomin.

Prayer in Mount Tabor. Genes. 30.

Gloriam Domini speculantes in eandem imaginem transformamur, à claritate in claritatem, tanquam à Domini spiritu. 2 Corinth. 3. 18.

Praise of Prayer.

That which ought to incite us to this exercise is, first, the necessity, which is so great, that in matter of Spiritual life it is as requisite to pray, as in the Animal to breath. We are choaked with flesh and fat, and the flames of concupiscence, unless we upon all occasions open our mouths to take the gentle air of God.

Necessity of Prayer.

Os meum aperui, & attraxi spiritum.

Secondly, The pleasures we therein take, in process of time, is verily that, which the Prophet Isaiah calleth Sabbathum delicatum, the delicate Sabbath. As much as to say, the delicious repose of the soul. The corporal eye (as saith the learned Prelate William of Paris) maketh its repast upon the beauty of the fields, the flowers, the heavens, the stars, and on all the objects, which are found in this Universe. But the eye of contemplation by the means of prayer nourisheth it self with the excellency of God, and the perfections of Jesus.

Isai. 58. 38. Sabbatum delicatum. Pleasure. Sola, prima, ac luminosissima veritas cibus est nostri intellectus. Sola prima inundantissimáque bonitas esus nostri nobilis ac sublimis affectus.

Thirdly, The purity and perfection of the soul, which is derived from this exercise, ought to serve us as a special spur. "There it is (saith Albertus "Magnus) where we carry our mouths even to the "source and well-spring of virtue. There it is where "God is known, and knowing him that we love him, "and in loving him we search him, in searching him "we take pains, and in taking pains we finde him.

Perfection of the soul. Albert. cap. 27. De virtut.

In the fourth place, we have the example of our Saviour, who for our instruction spent the nights in prayer; the example of the Apostles, and all Saints, who have practised and recommended this exercise to us.

Pernoctans in oratione Dei. Luc. 6. 12.

The ninth SECTION.

The necessity of Confession.

MEn resemble Snails, every one carrieth his own house with him, a house wholly replenished nished with darkneſs, although it ever ſeem lightſom. A houſe, which hath neither door, nor window, though therein be a thouſand witneſſes, which ſee all that paſſeth with as many eyes as heaven hath ſtars: a houſe compoſed of labyrinths, yet cannot the Hoſt hide himſelf in it: a houſe, whereinto the ſun peepeth not, and yet may even the very leaſt Atoms be ſeen: a houſe, wherein there are perpetual pleadings, yet never any iſſue of proceſs, but with iſſue of life. Finally, a houſe, which hath two faces altogether different, the one called Hell, the other Paradiſe. In a word, this Houſe, whereof I ſpeak, is the Conſcience. It is full of darkneſs: for the thoughts of men are involved in ſuch a cloud of obſcurity, that neither the Devils, nor Angels themſelves ſee any thing therein: yet is it lightſom; for ever the eye of proper conſcience reflecteth thereon. There is no door, nor window, for all is very cloſe ſhut up: yet do a thouſand witneſſes fix their eyes thereon; for the Conſcience alone is called a thouſand witneſſes. It is compoſed of labyrinths, for there are all flexibilities, and ſubtle mazes. In this labyrinth the Hoſt cannot hide himſelf; for it is ever day-pierced by the eie of God, before whom, neither the Abyſs, nor Hell it ſelf hath darkneſs enough to hide it. The Sun peepeth not in there: for in effect its light, which diſplayeth all the objects of the world before our eyes, cannot diſcover the ſimpleſt of our thoughts: yet may the very leaſt Atoms be ſeen; for there is not any thing ſo ſubtle, which can free it ſelf from the eyes of God. They perpetually plead there: for every moment the Conſcience challengeth us even upon the leaſt ſins, and the iſſue of the proceſs concludeth not but with the end of life; becauſe at that very hour the deciſive ſentence of our eternity is given.

Nullus moleſtior oculus cuiq; ſuo. Bern. lib. 5. De conſiderat.

Putásne Deus è vicino ego ſum, & non Deus de longè? Hierem. 23

Aula Sathanæ, hortus deliciarum, & aureum reclinatorium. Bernard. de interiori domo.

In fine, this Houſe hath two faces, whereof the one is called Hell, to wit, the evil conſcience, and the other Paradiſe, that is the good and innocent, which we cannot throughly ſettle in this great corruption of the heart of man, but by a good confeſſion.

Ambr. in illud Revela Domino viam tuam.

Too much ſhade hurteth ſeeds, which begin to grow, darkneſs dulls them, and the eye of the Sun ſerves them as a Father. Aſſure your ſelf the buds of Virtue hold the ſame courſe: there muſt be day to bring them into the light, and he, who will hide his life, ſhall loſe all the fruit he may hope thereof. Confeſſion is the price of our immortality, the City of refuge given us by God: but, if it be once ill managed, it is not a confeſſion, but a double confuſion; for feigned miſery excludeth true mercy, nor did ever preſumption well accord with pity.

Idem.

Bernard. de interiori domo cap. 37.

Among the moſt eſpecial exerciſes of devotion are Confeſſion, Communion, Meditation, ſpiritual Lection, and the fruit we derive from the word of God. Concerning the practiſe of Confeſſion, we will only ſpeak with much brevity thereof, for at this preſent there are great ſtore of books, which teach this method. Hear a true obſervation made by Saint Auguſtine: That the beginning of our good works is the accuſation of our evil. If you deſire utterly to forſake the animal life, to ſubmit to the ſpiritual, put in the fore-front a good general confeſſion. Confeſſion, (ſaith S. Ambroſe) Is the price of our immortality: it is the tribute of Heaven, ſignified by the piece of Coyn, which S. Peter found in the mouth of a fiſh.

Auguſt. tract. 12. in Joan.

Gulielm. Pariſ. De Sacrament. Pœnitent. lib. 12.

Neceſſity ſeems to require it, for the reaſons which follow. Firſt, How many ſins are left by the way, how many by culpable ignorance, ſometimes through fear, and ſhame, and other reprehenſible manner? Secondly, What invalidities and nullities of confeſſion may happen, now by the defect of the Prieſt, who perhaps hath not ſufficient Juriſdiction, ſometime through your own indiſpoſition, who neither will have ſorrow, nor good purpoſe of amendment; and ſometime for other circumſtances? Thirdly, Who ſeeth not, that the foundation of a life truly Chriſtian is humility? And we know not how better to attain this Virtue, then by repreſenting to our ſelves, no longer by piece-meal, but wholly in groſs, the youth, follies, the ſlackneſs, negligences, infidelities, and impurities of our paſſed life. All that coming to pour it ſelf upon our conſideration, like a great Squadron, neceſſarily ſtirreth in us a great confuſion and dolour for our ingratitude. In the fourth place, We ordinarily ſee thoſe, who duly make this act unfolded and delivered in all its particulars, do come, as it were, out of the Furnace, ſparkling with radiant brightneſs, to form a life abſolutely new. You therein obſerve a conſcience moſt curious, intentions better rectified, actions more purified, a promptneſs better awakened for the ſervice of God, a modeſty more regular in proſperity, a heart more elevated in adverſity, a more generous contempt of the world. Briefly, although one ſhould reap but this only good, which is the peace and tranquillity of Conſcience, it would alwaies be a matter marvellouſly recommendable. And we know by experience, many conſciences, tormented with divers remorſes and ſcruples, have after a general confeſſion found themſelves wholly pacified, and have begun to breath a more benign air of the mercies of God. To proceed therein, it is good well to ſound your heart afore-hand, and to deſcend into the knowledge of your ſelf, which is a work of no ſmall importance.

Its utility.

The manner.

The tenth SECTION.

The Practiſe of Confeſſion.

THE heart of man is a little Abyſs, which ſeemeth neither to have bounds, bottom, nor ſhore. It is malicious and inſcrutable, ſaid the Prophet. The Hebrew readeth in the ſame place, that it is a Supplanter, who eſcapeth from us like an Eel, when we think to hold it, and oftentimes it overthrows us. The great S. Macarius aſſureth us it is a little veſſel, but full of Caverns, Labyrinths, Precipices, Lions, Serpents, and other venemous Beaſts. Moreover, ſelf-love, which oftentimes like a wicked watchman, placeth himſelf at the gate of our heart, will not ſuffer truth to approach. It maketh him think, it is too crude, dry, auſtere, old, wrinckled to be preſented to ſuch a Prince. In the mean time it relateth all things to the heart to its own advantage, and entertaineth it with a thouſand curioſities of conceits: it maketh all vices to be beheld therein in full proportion, and Virtue in eclipſe.

Heart of man. Pravum cor hominis & inſcrutabile. Hier. 17.

Macar. hom. 43.

Knowledg of one's ſelf very hard.

Self love.

This admitted, neceſſarily the aſſiſtance of God is to be implored in a very particular manner, to obtain the knowledge of our ſelves, and to labor therein courageouſly and ſtoutly, without flattering our ſelves. God threatneth in the Prophet, he will lay a heavy correction upon us, leaving us to our ſelves. It ſeemeth, we now have our heads turned backward, never to know what paſſeth in our hearts. But God in the day of judgment will turn it before, and, if we take not very good heed, to our confuſion. S. Auguſtine triumpheth upon this paſſage; That, which thou haſt put behind thee, I will place before thine eyes. Thou ſhalt ſee thy impurities, not to correct them, but to confound thee. Turn thy face, go behind thy ſelf, and ſet thy ſelf before thy ſelf.

Arguam te, & ſtatuam contra faciem tuam. Pſal. 49. Qua poſt dorſum poſuiſti ante faciem poſnam: videbis fœditatem tuam, non ut corrigas, ſed ut erubeſcas. Tolle te à tergo tuo, & conſtitue te ante te. Auguſt. in Pſal. 49.

The manner will be after an humble and ſerious invocation of the Holy Ghoſt, to call to mind all your life, according to the courſe and progreſs of

Ages,

Ages, remembring your self of the places, where you have made aboad, the persons, with whom you have conversed, the affairs, which you have handled, the sins, to which you have been most inclined, and which most afflict your conscience. Observing also (if it be possible) the number of those, which are most heinous, which if it cannot be done, do not search them out with pensiveness, and anxiety.

Multa D. Th. opusc. 64. de modo confitendi, & puritate conscientiæ.

The order, which ought to be observed, is to run through the Law, or the ten Commandments of God, and those of the Church, taking every one in his place. As upon the first Commandment to examine the sins of infidelity, of contempt of holy things, of impiety, sorceries, divinations, magick, dreams, superstitions, distrusts of the mercy of God, presumptions of one's own ability, languishment, coldness, hypocrisies, impurities, sacrileges in the service of God, speaking distinctly upon every word, wherein, and how, by what motive, and to what purpose.

II. Upon the second, unnecessary oaths, false oaths, blasphemies, execrations, profanation of things sacred, and words of Scripture.

III. Upon the third, the exercise of labour, traffick, of civil, and criminal justice, and other works forbidden on Sundaies.

The irreverence committed on this great day, in neglecting to hear the whole Mass, or some notable part thereof, and employing all your time in excess of tongue, dances, masks, follies, sensualities.

IV. Upon the fourth, contempt, hatred, distast, ingratitude, irreverence, disobedience towards father, and mother, kindred, and superiours, neglect towards your subjects, vassals, and houshold-servants.

V. Upon the fifth, the clamours, enmities, quarrels, violences, faithlesness, injustices, oppressions, poysonings, abortions, slaughters, malice, out-rages, cruelties committed against your neighbour: the ill usage of your own person, by perplexity, despair, or impatient desire of death.

VI. Upon the sixth, fornications, adulteries, incests, whoredoms, ravishments, secret marriages, sacrileges, self-softnesses, pollutions, ill use of marriage, and other infamous luxuries, which Tertullian termeth Monsters. Add all that, which attendeth on wantonness, as dishonest thoughts, unchast words, lascivious glancings, kisses, touches, books, pictures, Comedies, love-letters, dancings, masks, too free conversations with evident danger of sin, and sometime charms, love-potions, or other attractives, characters, and witch-crafts.

VII. Upon the seventh, thests, pilferies, robberies, connivence with thieves, falsification of Instruments, of letters, seals, wills, contracts, scedules, obligations false purchases, false buyings, false sales, false coyns, deceits, defraudations, surprizes, usurpations of the goods of the Church, simonies, usuries, delaies of reasonable payments, injustices, litigious wranglings, excessive expenses, foul play in game, cruelties toward the poor, and such like things.

VIII. Upon the eighth, false witnesses, and sollicitations thereof, calumnies, diffamatory libels, lies, impostures, hypocrisies, dissimulations, flatteries, treasons, confusion of your neighbour.

IX. Upon the ninth, enterprizes, and designs, contrary to marriage, by seducing the parties with words, signs, gestures, letters, gifts, attractions, with deliberate purpose and unbridled desire of sin.

X. Upon the tenth, disordinate thirsts of riches, principally to the prejudice of your neighbour.

Upon the commandments of the Church, the omissions of Mass, or notable negligences & distractions in hearing it on Feasts commanded. The sin against abstinence from meats and fasts appointed; against the use of Sacraments of Confession, and Communion; against the observations of times fit for marriage, against faith and sincerity in the payment of Tythes.

Amongst the sins against the law of God, and ordinances of the Church, are comprehended the seven sins, which we call mortal and capital. As against the first Commandment, the sin of pride, in the great opinion of your self, the obstinacy in your own judgment and will, the disobedience to Superiours, the ambition of honours, vanities, vaunts, follies. The sin of sloath, in slackness, ill expense of time, negligence, remisness of courage, pusillanimity. The sin of gluttony, in making a God of one's belly. The sin of avarice upon the seventh. The sin of wrath and envy upon the fifth. The sin of luxury upon the sixth. Behold an abundance of matter to be examined in a general Confession! All is proposed, which may have happened. I do not say, that we must rest upon every point scrupulously, to search into that which never hath been, and (as they say) shave an egg. Every one ought more particularly to descend into the vices of his own nature and profession: as Lords and Gentlemen to examine the sins of pride, tyranny, curiosities, delights, in looking after their pleasures, more then the profit of the publick, in exacting things not due, in usurping the pains, goods, sweat, blood of vassals, and, being men, to have served themselves with men in all prodigality. In neglecting the keeping of peace, and justice, the duty, charges, and reparation of places, to which they stand obliged. In giving estates, offices, benefices, to vitious and uncapable persons. In violating Ecclesiastical rites. In notably damnifying, for the pleasures of hunting and hawking, the fields and possessions of others. In stopping the course of justice by favour. In vexing, tormenting, imprisoning, condemning, through passion, without lawful proof. In over-lashing, in ambition, lust, bragging, excessive expenses, and such like things.

Particular sins.

Judges and Magistrates, of ignorance, malice, negligences, as being intruded into their places without capacity, by favour, and money. In behaving themselves carelesly, without serious study of that, which is their profession. In not soundly, seriously, and solidly examining processes, but contenting themselves with superficial notice. In giving sentence for money, and favour, and many times against men unheard, without order or form of justice. In going out of the circuit of their jurisdiction, to encroach upon the authority of others. In bearing themselves with pasion in affairs. In entertaining bad Officers, in prolonging processes by cautelous references, or affected lazines. In solliciting the wife and daughter, who plead, upon promise of favour. In exercising on festival daies acts of judicature without necesity. In neglecting the government, and weal-publick, for the accommodation of his own affairs. In tolerating scandalous sins against the honour of God.

Practice of ordinary confession.

Women, about their pomps, curiosities, excesses, dissolutions in apparel and dresings, pride, fierceness, boldness, impatience, quarrels, loves, jealousies, courtings, idleness, and so of the rest.

Thoughts of four sorts.

For those, who often confess in ordinary Confessions, it suffices to examine their thoughts, words, deeds, omissions. Of thoughts, some are burdensom, some affected, some bitter, some vain. The burdensom, as those, which proceed against faith, and honesty, to persons, who much are alienated from ill affections; and such thoughts ought rather to be despised, then examined. The affected, as those of complacence, placence, of curiositie, of our own commodity, and of some passion a little exorbitant towards creatures. The bitter, as those of suspicions, jealousies, disdains, aversions, choler. The vain, as those, which are brought forth at all moments, in the childishnes of a scattered uncollected heart, and flie therein as Birds do in the Air. It is as impossible, as unnecessary, to take an accompt of them. It is sufficient to confess in general, and to declare the habitudes, and dispositions of his heart.

Words, the Chariot of the Soul.

Words are the Interpreters of our Soul, and the Charriots, which carry our Senses, and Affections: some carry Rice, others Honey, the rest Vineger. They carry Rice, who are over-joyous, recreative, impertinent, idle, facetious. They carry Honey, who have petty affectations, courtships, lies, exaggerations, complacences, flatteries, soothings, boastings. And they bear Vineger, who are somewhat rude, fierce, disdainful, biting, riotous, and ill-spoken.

Works.

Deeds concern God, your Neighbour, and your Self. For that, which appertaineth to God, you must first accuse your self of defects in the exercises of Devotion, as Prayer, Vocal, Mental, Meditation, Examen, Spirtual reading, the Sacraments. For that, which appertaineth to your Neighbour, and your Self, you have four Horses in the Charriot of imperfection, which transport many of your actions, to wit, Vanity, Impatience, Curiosity, Negligence.

Vanity intrudeth it self into all parts, saith Cassianus: into apparel, going, speech, into watchings, prayers, into abstinencies, and fasts. It combateth in the middest of virtues, to triumph over virtues. It presenteth it self as well to the victorious, as to the assailant. Impatience, in so many contentions, and encounters, with your Neighbour, and if one have no other adversary, he strugleth with himself. Curiosity, in too much seeking his own commodities, and ease of body. Negligences in offices, in managing of affairs, and charges: omissions, as of good resolved purposes of prayer, and laudable actions, which one ought to do either by justice, or by charity, or by vow, or by rule, or by promise, or necessity. One may upon this choose seven or eight imperfections, which most molest him, to be therein short.

Behold (as it were) the matter of Confessions! For the form, to unfold one's self, no man should make strange, if some, for the comfort of their memory, having run over the abridgment, and summary of matter of Confession, do make an extract of that, which concerneth them, principally in general Confessions. The wisest of the Roman Emperours, Augustus, was so considerate, that, treating upon some affairs with his wife, he spake to her by writing, to avoid mistaking. Can a man take too much consideration in an affair of so great importance, which passeth with God?

Three sorts of Consciences.

When the principal points are marked out, they must be explicated in intelligible terms. There are some large consciences, who have nothing to say; some scrupulous, who desire to say all; and some reasonable, who proceed therein with mediocrity. To say he is a great sinner, that he hath broken all the branches of mortal sins, that he hath not served God so well as he should, and that if he have done such or such a thing, he asketh pardon, that is to say nothing. You must specifie, and descend to particulars, propose the act, deliver it with lawful and necessary circumstances, touch the motive without extravagancies, and the intention, which hath excited us to do it, and continuance of the sin, to represent the state of the soul to the life. Yet for all this you must not so much think upon this preparation, nor the means to unfold your self, that thereby the principal part of penance be neglected, which is Contrition.

Contrition.

This Contrition is a sorrow to have offended God, not principally for the deformity of sin, and the fear of punishment (for that is nothing but Attrition) but for that this sin is committed against God, infinitely good, and infinitely amiable; and for that one maketh a firm resolution to be confessed, and to preserve himself from sin in time to come. Behold the point of Contrition, which to attain, you must seriously and advisedly represent to your self the greatnes, goodnes, power, wisdom, justice, love, mercy, benefits of God, opposed to your malice, weaknes, baseness, ignorance, presumption, misery, ingratitude: and well-figure to your self the hostility of mortal sin, to obtain an eternal detestation against it. To consider how it ruineth riches, honours, credit, reputation, posterity, and Empires. That it soileth the glory of an innocent life, and leaveth a character of infamy. That it overthroweth bodie, health, good grace, that it openeth the gates of sudden & unexpected death. That it maketh man blind, dumb, deaf, wicked, senseles, stupid, savage, and many times furious, and enraged by the remorse of conscience. That it despoileth a soul of all the graces, beauties, excellencies, privileges, love, favour of God, hope of life, and salvation. That it killeth it, and rendeth it more cruelly then a Tiger, or Panther. That a life of God was needful to take away such a blemish, and that if a Soul be spotted at the hour of death, an eternity of flames cannot deliver it: and such like.

Hostility of sin.

In sins, which seem least, you shall always have great cause of Contrition, when the benefits of God shall be represented unto you, which he particularly and personally hath conferred upon us, opposed to our childishnes of heart, tepidity, slackness, infidelity, negligence, ingratitude. As for the proceeding to Confession; the Preparatives being well made, it is needful to choose a Confessour, who hath four qualities, jurisdiction, reputation, knowledg, discretion: and after you have confessed to him entirely, faithfully, sincerely, to accomplish the penance enjoyned you, with obedience, promptnes, and punctual diligence: afterward to take a new spirit, to resist temptations, and to busie your self in good works, with more courage then ever.

Proceeding in confession.

The eleventh SECTION.

The Practice of Examen.

Necessity of Examen.

THe practice of Confession is made more easie by the Examen of conscience, as well general, as particular. Think not too much is required of your profession, if there be speech used to you of the Examen of conscience. Not onely the Philosophers have made it, as Pythagoras, Seneca, Plutarch, but poor Barbarous Indians, by the relation of Apuleius, took an accompt every evening of the good and evil they had done each day. This is it, which is required of you. Prepare daily a little Consistory of Justice in your conscience; see what passeth within your self, acknowledg your defects, and amend them, to prevent the justice of God.

It is said, the eclipse of the Sun causeth the earthquake: and the eclipse of Reason, by ignorance of the interiour man, produceth great disorders in the soul. For the wicked spirit (saith Procopius upon the first of Kings) endeavoureth to use us, as did the Ammonites the Inhabitants of Jabes. They seek to pull out our right eye, and to bereave us of the sight of our selves, to bury us in great and deep confusions: but let us make use of all the lights, which God hath given us, to call reflections into the bottom of our thoughts. The Conscience is an admirable Tribunal, where Justice pleadeth, and Mercie sentenceth. All that which the one writes, the other blotteth out, putting, as it were, the point of the pen upon the heart of the Penitent.

Guliel. Parisiens. cap. 12. Sacr. Pœnit. In hoc Tribunali sedet Misericordia, assidet autem Justitia; ubi quidquid contra pœnitentem inscribit Justitia, totum delet Misericordia, acumen stili velut figens in corde pœnitentis.

* A good Interpreter of the Scripture relateth the Vision of a wise man, who on a day sought for the house of Conscience, and it seemed to him he beheld a Citie built with goodly Architecture beautified with five Gates, which had as many narrow Paths ending in one larger Way. Upon this way stood a Register, who took the names of all Passengers to record them. Beyond that he saw two Tribunes, attended by a great concourse of the common people, who governed the inferiour parts of the Citie: above was beheld a Cittadel, wherein a great Princess commanded, who had a Scepter in her hand, and Crown on her head.

* Delrio Sec. De Confessione.

By her side was a Ladie very antient, and venerable, who in one hand held a Torch with which she lighted this Queen, and in the other a Goad, wherewith she pricked her, if she governed not according to her direction.

The wise man, amazed, asked in his heart what all this Train meant, and he heard a voice within, which said unto him: Behold thy self, e're thou art a ware, arrived at the house of Conscience, which thou soughtest for. These five Gates thou seest, are the five Senses. The way where they all meet is Common Sense. All the people, which enter in by heaps, are the Objects of the creatures of the world, which first touch our Senses, before they pass into the Soul. This Register, who writeth down the names, is Imagination, that keeps record of all things. These two Tribunes are the two Appetites: the one is called the appetite of Concupiscence, which is ever in search after its desires; the other the appetite of Anger, extremely striving to strike at all obstacles, which oppose its good, either real, or pretended. This mass of people thou seest are the Passions, which make ill work in the inferiour parts of the Citie. This Princess in the Cittadel, with Crown, and Scepter, is Reason. The antient and venerable Ladie, by her side, is Conscience: she hath a Torch to shew the good way, and the Goad to prick those that wander. In a word, if thou desirest to know what Conscience is, it is A sovereign notice of good and ill, which God impresseth on our hearts, as with an hot iron, and is very hard to be taken off.

Diffamen rationis, spiritûs corrector, & pædagogus animæ. S. Thom. 1. p. q. 79.

Happy he, who often visiteth this interiour house God hath given him, & pondereth all his thoughts, his words, and actions, to adopt them to the measures of the eternal Law.

Parts.

You know a general Examen hath five parts: thanksgiving, invocation, discussion, petition, resolution. In thanksgiving we thank God principally for the benefits received that day. In invocation the light of Heaven is required to know our sins, and amend them. In discussion an accompt is asked of our soul, running through the hours of the day, of thoughts, words, works, and omissions. In petition pardon of our sins is implored. In the up-shot of all, good purposes are made to correct one's self by the assistance of grace. If you think to live in such purity, that you may find nothing more to examine, it is for want of light, or application of mind. Know there are six things ever to busie the most perfect in their Examen.

Six things in Examen to employ the most perfect.

The first, to ponder the roots of our defects, errours, imperfections. The second, to see the remedies, which may be given thereunto. The third, to distinguish true and solid virtues from those, which are no other then virtues in apparence. The fourth, to pick out in all our works the intentions, and motives, which transport us, and what the affections are, which at that time govern our soul. The fifth, to see what wanteth of perfection in good works, which we do, and how they may be performed with the most accomplishment. The sixth, to compare our gains, our losses, our encrease, our decrease in matter of virtue.

Particular Examen.

A particular Examen is made, when one undertaketh to wrastle with one vice alone, and to extirpate one sole imperfection. For he, that will sometime strike at them in gross, resembleth the Soldier of Sertorius, who tugged at an Horse's tail, by strength of arm to pull it quite away: another more wise pulled it off hair after hair, and so prevailed. The like happeneth in our vices, and defects. He must pull them away by little threds, who will effectually correct them. Wherefore, one riseth in the morning with a thought not to fall that day into such an imperfection, and to oppose it in every place, as some enemy, which one would vanquish. After Diner retiring himself apart, he doeth three things. The first, to ask an accompt of his soul of the relapses, which have been made into this imperfection. The second, to note the number, making so many pricks with a pen. The third, to purpose to arm himself for the rest of the day. After Supper the like exercise is made, and so one findeth out, from day to day, from week to week, from moneth to moneth, what profit is made. There is no imperfection so deeply rooted, which is not pulled away by the grace of God, you remaining in the constancy of such an exercise.

Plutar. in Sertor.

The twelfth SECTION.

The practice of Communion.

Communion without preparation, what it is.

ALl those, who dispose themselves to a life more Christian, know they have not a means more wholsom, nor effectual to acquire, and preserve the grace of God, then the Sacrament of the Altar, and for this cause it is fit both often and duely to have access thereunto. But a beautiful Looking-glass in a golden frame in the house of a Blind man; an excellent Lute in the chamber of the Deaf; a goodly Diamond in a truss of Straw; an Honey-comb in the throat of a dead Lyon, what availeth all this? The Blind-man seeth not, the Deaf heareth not, the Diamond sparkleth not, the Honey-comb nourisheth not. And what profiteth likewise the Blessed Sacrament in a faint, languishing, and indisposed Soul? Imagine according to that, which the learned Rupertus saith, that the Blessed Sacrament is the fountain of terrestrial Paradise, which watereth the whole Church with its delicious refreshings.

Eucharist, the foundation of Paradise.

Three sorts of Hearts.

All the Faithful draw from thence, but all come not with the same disposition. Some bring thither an heart of Paper, that is to say, a childish heart, which padleth in the water, and no whit profiteth. Others an heart like a sive, that lets all go through, and retaineth nothing but a little moysture. The rest an heart of a sponge, which is abundantly repleniſhed with the favours and mercies of God. If you desire to communicate fruitfully, make a Present to your celestial Spouse (who is pleased to feed among Lilies) of a Lily of six leaves. There are six remarkable qualities, which must be had to accomplish this exercise.

Lillie with six leaves to communicate.

cise. Two before Communicating, Desire, and Puritie: two in Communicating, Humility, and Charity: two after communicating, Thanksgiveing, and Renovation of the inward man by the oath of Fidelity.

Desire.

You must then endeavour from the eve of the day you are to receive, to make a Furnace of desires in your heart, that so you may say with the Prophet Jeremie: I feel in my heart a burning fire, which fixeth it self even in my bones, and the violence thereof is such, that I cannot bear it. Let us go to this sacred Table, as the thirsty Hart to the stream of Waters, as an hungry creature to a Feast, as the Bride-groom to the Wedding a thousand times desired, as the Covetous to a myne of Gold, as the Conqueror to Spoils. Is not there matter sufficient to serve as a spur to your desires, since there is our beginning, our Origine, our Treasure, our sovereign Good?

Jer. 20. 9. Factus est in corde meo quasi ignis exæstuans, clausus que in ossibus meis: & defeci, ferre non sustinens.

Tob. 10. 6. Omnia simul in te uno habentes non debuimus dimittere te.

The mother of young Tobie sighing said: My son, all our treasures, our riches, our honours, our contentments, our delights were in thy person, and therefore We ought never to be separated from thee. But it is verily in this subject we have true cause to speak these words. All is in the sacred Eucharist; the body, the blood, the soul, the life, the humanity, the divinity of Jesus Christ, all that which he hath derived from the Eternal Father, all that which he hath taken from our nature, he yieldeth us in this blessed Sacrament, and doeth as the Bee, who robbeth the flowers of his Master's garden, to restore all again in Honey. All the perfections, which our Lord hath conferred on his own Person, are seasoned to us in this high and majestical Mysterie, as in a Honey-comb. It is an extension of the incarnation of the Son of God. He was once hypostatically united to one sole man, but here he is united to all men, as often times as they receive him, by a visceral transfusion of himself, as one should melt one piece of wax within another (as saith S. Cyril.) And then who would not desire such an union of a Saviour so merciful with a sinner so miserable? Of a sovereign Physician with a sick man so remediless? Of a King so powerful with a vassal so wretched? Of a Father so benign with a son so refractory? May we not well say, that they, which tast not this celestial viand, have their rellishes much dulled with the leeks and onions of Egypt? May we not affirm, that they lead no other life, but of a mushrome? Ought we not all the night before to make our hearts sparkle in good desires & jaculatory praiers, when we go to the bed of our celestial Bride-groom?

Greatness of the Eucharist.

Endeavour then to awaken and cherish your desire with a thousand aspirations, and elevations of heart, and have always in your mouth some good words, which may be the pledges and earnest-penies of your intentions. Behold the first leaf of the Lily.

Second leaf of the Lily. Purity

The second is called Purity. I speak not of that, which concerneth the purging of mortal sins by confession, which is wholy necessary, and cannot be omitted without sacrilege: I speak of purity more subtile, and fine, which consisteth in faith, affections, and intentions. You ought first to have a singular faith, and a most worthy and serious understanding of the mysterie, not onely in believing what the Church teacheth us of this Sacrament, either of the reality of the pretious body of our Saviour, or of transubstantiation; but to believe it sincerely, clearly, firmly, without curiosity, restriction, or hesitation; not as those, who convinced, and as it were confounded with reason, do in some sort believe, and upon the least occasion repent in their faithless heart what they have believed, and make to themselves a faith floating, and racking up and down, like clouds under the breath of the winds. When you go to receive the Blessed Sacrament, you must do as Abraham did in his Sacrifice, hold the Bond-men, and Ass, which are your Senses, at the foot of the hill, and let your will, and understanding ascend, lightened with the torch of Faith, even to the height, to sink it self down into these resplendent nights of the wisdom of Heaven.

What ought to be the faith of a good communicant.

For purity of Intention, which is the character of our actions, I would have nothing side-ways, nor bearing upon any byas: I will not, that you communicate for some humane respect, some civil decencie, or to please those, whose favour you desire, nor for some trifling vanity, and sometimes hypocrisie, or other ends, and aims, which are far estranged from the ways of God. You must communicate with intention to unite your self to God, your beginning, to whiten and gild your self with his sights, to enkindle your self the more in his love, to retain the memory of that Sacrifice, which he offered on mount Calvarie, that is to say, of his most venerable Passion; to appease the anger of God for as many sins as are committed; to implore the assistance of Heaven for the necessities of the Church, as well for the living, as dead; to obtain for your self, and persons, of whom mention is made, some victory over temptations, some new virtues, some temporal grace, in as much as shall concern the spiritual state. Briefly, for thanksgiving for the benefits, which we receive from his Divine Majesty, both in general, and particular.

Intention.

Purity of affections consisteth principally in two points: to banish from your heart all animosities, revenges, quarrels, punctillioes, and readily to reconcile your self before you come to the Altar; the other is to free your self, not onely from affections dishoneſt, and unlawful, but also a little exorbitant, which one may have to any creature whatsoever. It is convenient, your heart be then as a Crystal-vial filled with clear water, wherein the least mote of uncleanness may be seen. It is to put Adonis in the crib of Beth-lehem (which heretofore the Infidels did) when we communicate still retaining impure Passions with a deliberate purpose.

Purity of affection.

Adonis in the crib of Beth-lehem.

Germanus Patriarch of Constantinople in his Theory saith, the Pix, which is the vessel, and resting-place, where the Blessed Sacrament is put, is called Ciborium, as one would say the Ark of lights, to teach us, that at the onely sight of this Sacrament we must dispel all thoughts of darkness, which have possessed our soul. And for the better obtaining this purity it is good to practice some devotions in the eve of receiving, as mortification of tongue by retirement, and silence, as abstinence, or some other exercise of humanity, or work of mercy. When the day cometh, run to this heavenly Manna in the morning: amuze not your self too much in decking and accommodating your body, nor in scattering and disordering your mind in vain cares and sollicitudes, but keep the vessel of your heart as a well-stopped pot, to pour it out at the table of your Spouse. It is at the instant of receiving, that you must imitate the Seraphins of the Prophet Isaiah, to hold all your wings still; but onely two, which are Humility, and Charity: these are the two wings, on which you ought to poize your self at your pleasure. First grounding all in reverence before the eyes of this ineffable Majesty, abasing your self even to the center of your nothing, treading underfoot all presumptions, vanities, follies, by a most perfect humility of spirit. Secondly, to stir up lively and ardent affections with all the endeavour of your heart, and, if that suffice not, offer all Germ. Patriarch. in Theoria.

Exod. 5.

What ought to be done on the day of Communion.

Third and fourth leaf of the Lily. Imitation of Seraphins. Isaiah 6. Moving wings.

to God in the Union of his onely Son, and merits of the most Blessed Virgin Mary.

To cherish the affections of these holy virtues, you must have your Prayers, Meditations, and considerations upon the Blessed Sacrament, well prepared, and digested with variety, that you may still hold your devotion in breath: as, Considerations for Communion.

Moses before the burning bush. Solve calceamentum de pedibus tuis: locus, in quo stas, terra sancta est. Exod. 3. 5. 4 Reg. 4. The Hostess of Elizeus. Unde mihi hoc, ut inveniram gratiam ante oculos tuos? & nôsse me dignareris peregrinam mulierem? Ruth. 2. 8, 9 Quæ est petitio tua, Esther, ut detur tibi? Et quid vis fieri? Etiàm dimidiam partem regni mei petieris, impetrabis. Esther. 7. 3. Mephibosheth. Et tu comedes panem in mensa mea semper. Quis ego sum servus tuus, quoniam respexisti super me, canem mortuum? 2 Sam. 9. 7, 8. Jonathan. 1 Sam. 14. 29.

I. To represent Moses in the Bush burning, siezed with an holy fire, who heard these words: Put off thy shoes, take away thy sensual affections, the land here is holy; yea it is the Holy of Holies. This is the noble fire, which enflameth Angels in Heaven, and pure Souls on Earth, which is enchased within the species of the Sacrament. What ought you then to do?

II. To represent unto your self, that your soul is as the Hostess of the Prophet Elizeus, the good Shunammite, who prepareth her heart as a lodging for the King of Prophets, thanksgiving as a table, humility for a seat, and charity for a candle lighted.

III. To represent to your self, that it is a Ruth, who accounted it a great favour to be esteemed by Boaz, and to have leave to glean in the Fields after his Harvest-men, and acknowledging with gratitude so small a benefit, she said with her face prostrated on the earth: From whence cometh this favour, which I have gained in your presence? From whence proceedeth, that you deign to know me, who am but a poor foreigner? What ought you to say?

IV. That it is as the humble Esther before Ahasuerus, and that it kisseth the golden Rod, and moreover that it understandeth these words: What is thy demand, Esther? Tell me, to the end it may be granted. What wouldst thou have me do? If thou askest me the moiety of my Kingdom, thou shalt have it. Answer, you would have nothing but the King, and that he alone sufficeth you.

V. That it is as Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan, to whom David spake these words: My meaning is, you shall eat at my table all the days of your life. What answered this little son of the King thereupon? Alas, Sir, who am I your poor servant, that you please to cast your eye upon me, a dead dog, such as I am?

VI. That it is as Jonathan, who, extremely tired, dipped the end of a wand, which he carried in his hand, into an Honey-comb, and lifted it to his lips, at that instant behold his eyes, before heavy and oppressed, became clear again, and his body re-assumed new and fresh vigour. There needeth but a little consideration to a well-composed spirit, both to cast it presently down by humility into the centre of nothing, and to raise it by love even above the Emperial Heaven. One may likewise every time he receiveth, prepare divers meditations to entertain himself more at large, either before or after the mystery.

Other Considerations.

I. As meditation upon the History, considering 1. The eating of the Lamb. 2. The washing of Feet. 3. The institution of the Blessed Sacrament.

II. The Names; as Eucharist, Communion, Sacrifice, Bread, Viaticum, and other such like: practising your self to search out the reason of every one, with application of spirit, to derive from thence things agreeable to the name, which one meditateth: as upon the name of Communion, the resolution of Peace, Concord, and Charity.

III. The Figures; as the Bread and Wine of Melchisedech, the Paschal Lamb, Manna, the Bread of Elias: meditating upon the Histories, and conformities, which they have with this Divine mysterie, and the fruits we ought to draw from thence.

IV. The Causes of the institution. 1. As to serve us for a memory of the Passion. 2. An incitement of love and charity. 3. For spiritual nourishment. 4. For Sacrifice. 5. For a pledg of beatitude: considering whether we answer to the intention of the Son of God in this action. After receiving you must rest upon the two last leaves of the Lily, which are thanksgiving, and renovation of spirit. You then must adore this great guest, whom you have in your heart, with all the powers of Heaven, and creatures of the earth, to play your part, as if you were a little string of the great Harp of the world. To offer to God the whole world as a votive-table hanged on his Altar, collected in the perfections of his only Son, who is wholly yours, being so freely given to you, so solemnly, so irrevocably, as he, whose Divinity, Soul, Life, Flesh, and Blood you have in this incomprehensible Sacrament. To give him thanks for the infinite riches he hath placed in this sacred humanity, which you enjoy, and for that he hath given you his Son for Father, Brother, Master, Leader, Redeemer; for the good he communicateth to all faithful people by the means of this inexhaustible Fountain of Grace, for the special favours he hath done to you and yours, for the natural talents with which he hath adorned you; and likewise for the various change of comforts, and discomforts, with which he hath enterlaced your life: briefly, for the present visit, which he hath made in the house of your heart, so ill prepared.

Fifth and sixth leaf of the Lily. What you are to do after Communion.

After adoration, and thanksgiving, followeth petition for the faithful and unfaithful, whose conversion we desire: For the Church, and all the Prelats, which govern it, namely him, whom he hath appointed to be our Pastour: For our person of the King, and all the Realm: For his kinred, friends, benefactours, living and dead. To ask for your self seven gifts, which an holy Virgin (by the relation of S. Bonaventure) daily begged of God. 1. Effectual grace to accomplish the law of Love. 2. To love all that God loveth. 3. To hate all he hateth. 4. Humility, Chastity, Obedience, Contempt of the world, Garnishment of all virtues. 5. That God would make his true Temple of our soul and body. 6. That he would give us his vision in beatitude. 7. That he may be divinely served in this place, where you receive the Blessed Sacrament, and in all the other parts of Christendom. To conclude, to make in the end a renewing of the Oath of fidelity, which we have sworn to our great Master, and to employ our time in his service with more diligence then ever. And since we are upon the Palm-tree, let us gather the fruits, which are spiritual food, strength against temptations, heavenly alacrity, light of understanding, flames of charity, union with God, augmentation of virtues, hope of glory, renovation in all our faculties and functions, and namely let us often stay upon some particular object of virtue, which we would ask of our guest in favour of this celestial visitation.

Bonavent. lib. 6. Med. cap. 3.

Fruits of Communion.

The thirteenth SECTION.

* The practice to hear Mass.

* Parcè hac, & in transcursu, tantùm deliberet Lector, ut canis è Nilo. Usque ad extremas imagines. Dionys. cap. 6. De Eccl. Hierarch.

TO hear Mass is verily one of the most serious actions of all spiritual life. Had one all the understanding and reverence of Angels to be present thereat, it would never be enough. Saint Dionys the Areopagite saith, that exactly to discharge this duty we must purifie our heart usque ad extremas imagines, so despoiling it, that it may be free from all imaginations, and humane representations: and that is it, which Saint Bonaventure hath more clearly expressed, principally speaking of Priests, who celebrate: That the time, when they ought to approach, is, when they feel themselves wholly changed,

An excellent saying of St. Bonaventure. Cùm fuerit totus alteratus, &

and

divinus effectus, it à ut nihil videas nisi Deum, tunc accede.

and become divine, in such sort that they behold not any thing but God. Philo the Bishop addeth, that the Sacrificers are as the ivory neck of the Spouse, which must serve as a chanel for the Holy Ghost to make his graces distil upon the rest of the members, that are present at this Sacrifice.

The first practice and most ordinary to hear Mass, for those who understand the words there spoken, is, to follow them with application of spirit, and to accompany the silence of the Priest with some meditations, or vocal prayers.

The second is, to stay one's self upon the signification of all the parts of the Mass. As at the Confiteor to represent in your self man banished from Paradise, miserable, suppliant, confessing, deploring his sin. At the Introite, the enflamed desires of all mankind expecting the Messias. At the Hymn of Angels, Glory be to God on high, the Nativity. At the Prayers, thanksgiving for such a benefit. At the Epistle, the Preaching of the Precursour S. John. At the Gospel, truth preached by the Saviour of the world: and so of the rest.

The third is, to divide the Mass into certain parcels; and behold a very considerable manner. Represent to your self five great things in the mystery of the Mass, from whence you ought to draw so many fruits. These five things are, Representation, Praise, Sacrifice, Instruction, Nourishment.

Five notable things in the mystery of the Mass.

Representation. Because the Mass is a perfect image of the life and passion of our Saviour, and therefore the first fruit you ought to gather from thence is, daily to imprint more lively in your heart the actions and passions of the Son of God, to conform your self thereunto.

1. Representation. Radicati & superadificati in ipso. Col. 2. 7.

Praise. So many words as are in the Mass aim at this purpose, to give praise unto God for this ineffable mystery of our Redemption; and to conform your self to this action, you ought to bend all the endeavour of your heart to praise God, whether it be by vocal or mental Prayer.

2. Praise.

3. Mass a Sacrifice.

Sacrifice. It is a most singular act of Religion, by which we reverence and adore God for the infinite glory of his sovereign Being. And the Mass is a true Sacrifice by eminency, where the life and blood of beasts is not offered, but the life of a Saviour, which is more worth then the life of all Angels and men. Cedrenus recounteth, that the Emperour Justinian caused an Altar to be made in the Church of Saint Sophia, wherein he used all sorts of metal, of precious stones, of the richest materials, which might be chosen out amongst all the magazins of nature, to incorporate all the beauties in the world in one sole Master-piece. And verily this Sacrifice is the prime work of God, in which he hath as it were locked up all that, which is great, or holy, in all the mysteries of our Religion. It was the custom daily to proportion the Sacrifices to the benefits of God. When in the old Law he gave the fat of the earth, they offered the first-fruits to him: but now that he hath granted to us the dew of Heaven so long expected, his onely Son, we must render to him his Son again; which is done in the Sacrifice of the Mass. And the fruit you should derive from this consideration is, at the elevation of the host, to offer Jesus Christ to God his Father by the ministery of the Priest: and to offer it, First, for a supreme and incomparable honour of the Divine Majesty. Secondly, for thanksgiving for all benefits received, and to be received. Thirdly, to obtain protection, direction, and prosperity in all your works. Besides offer up all your powers, faculties, functions, actions, in the union of the merits of Jesus.

Cedren. in Compend. Hist. Wonder of Justinian.

4. Instruction.

Instruction. Those, who understand the words of the Mass, may draw goodly instructions from reading the Epistle, the Gospel, the Collects. All in general teach us the virtues of honour and reverence towards the Divine Majesty, seeing this Sacrifice is celebrated with so many holy, sacred, and profoundly dutiful ceremonies. Of Gratitude, since God, being once offered in the bloody Sacrifice of the Cross, will also be daily presented to God his Father, in the title of gratitude: and that ought to awaken in us the memory of observing every benefit of God with some remarkable act of devotion. Of Charity towards our common Saviour, and towards our neighbour, since we see a life of God spent for our redemption, and all faithful people.

5. Nourishment.

Nourishment. The Eye liveth by light and colours, the Bee by dew, the Phœnix by the most thin and subtile vapours; and the Soul of the Faithful by the nourishment, which it receiveth in the Blessed Sacrament, which is purely spiritual. This nourishment is not onely derived from the Sacramental Communion by the real presence of the body of our Saviour; but also by the spiritual Communion, which is made, when in the Sacrifice of the Mass, at the time of the Priest his communicating, the same dispositions, apprehensions, and affections are entertained, as if really and actually one did receive. For this purpose it is fit to do three things. First, to excite anew in your self the acts of self-dislike, and contrition for your wretchedness, and imperfections. The second, to take spiritually the carbuncle of the Altar, not with the pincers of the Seraphin, but with acts of a most lively faith, a most resolved hope, and a charity most ardent, to open boldly the mouth of your heart, and pray our Saviour to enter in, as truly by the communication of his graces and favours (which are the rays of this Sun) as by the real imparting of his body and blood he gives himself to those that communicate. The third, to conclude all your actions with a most hearty thanksgiving.

Spiritual Communion.

The fourteenth SECTION.

Practice of Meditation.

OF four worlds, which are the Archetype, Intelligible, Celestial, and Elementary, Prayer imitateth the most perfect, being a true image of the Oeconomy of the holy Trinity, which, according to the Maxims of Divines, cannot pray to any (having no Superiour) yet affordeth a model for all prayers: for Prayer, as saith Tertullian, is composed of reason, words, and spirit: of Reason, as we may interpret by the relation it hath to the Father: of Words, as it is referred to the Word: of Spirit, by the direction it hath to the third Person. Now this principally agreeth with meditation. For it is that divine silence and delicious ravishment of the soul, which uniteth man to God, and finite essence to Infinite.

It is that Plenitude and that Tear spoken of in Exodus, according to an antient Translation. Plenitude, because it replenisheth the soul with the splendour of consolations, and sources, which distil from the Paradise of God. Tear, yea tear of myrrh; because it distilleth under the eyes of God, as doth the tree, which beareth myrrh, under the the rays of the Sun. It is a wonderful thing to behold this little shrub, which doth not perpetually expect to be cut with iron, that it may drop forth its pleasing liquor; but the Sun, reflecting on the branches thereof, becomes as it were a Mid-wife, and maketh it bring forth what is sought after: which caused an excellent Wit to say, that it drew life out of its blows, and made a dug of it wounds.

Exod. 22. 29.

Oh

Oh happy ſoul, that reſembleth this generous plant, and which, replete with pious deſires, holy affections, and ſincere intentions, produceth apprehenſions, and works a thouſand times more pretious then Myrrh, when in meditation the rays of Jeſus Chriſt (who is the true Sun of juſtice) ſtrike the heart!

Neceſſity and eaſineſs of Meditation.

The practice of Prayer conſiſteth in mental, vocal, and mixt. Mental is that, which is exerciſed in the heart; Vocal, which is formed in the mouth; Mixt participateth of both. Think it not to be a new thing, not ſevered from your profeſſion, to meditate. It were ſo, if one would make your brain ſerve as a Limbeck for ſubtile and extravagant raptures, diſguiſed in new words, and forms. But when one ſpeaketh of meditation, he adviſeth you to ponder and ruminate the points, and maxims, which concern your ſalvation, with all ſweetneſs, that fruit moſt agreeable to your condition may be derived from thence. The faintneſs, weakneſs, infidelity, ignorance, drineſs, which reigneth in your ſouls, cometh from no other ſource, but the want of conſideration. Take this worthy exerciſe couragiouſly in hand, and you ſhall feel your heart fattened with the unction of the Holy Ghoſt, and your ſoul of a wilderneſs to become a little Paradiſe of God. Be not affrighted hereat, as if it were a thing impoſſible for you: uſe a little method, and you ſhall find nothing more eaſie, and familiar. What have you ſo natural in vital life, as to breathe? And what more proper in the intellectual, then to think? Your ſoul hath no other operation; for Night and Day it is employed in this exercise. The Sun caſteth forth beams, and our ſoul thoughts. Gather together onely thoſe wandering thoughts, which are ſcattered amongſt ſo many objects, into your center, which is God: employ one part of the ſpirit, induſtrie, invention, diſcourſe, which you are endowed withall for the managing of worldly affairs: employ them (I ſay) in the work of your ſalvation, and you ſhall do wonders.

I undertake not here to raiſe you above the earth, nor in the beginning to plunge you into the ſeven degrees of contemplation, whereof S. Bonaventure ſpeaketh in the Treatiſe he compoſed hereof: I ſpeak not to you of fire, unction, extaſie, ſpeculation, taſt of repoſe, or glory; but I ſpeak that in few words, which you may read more at large in the works of ſo many worthy men, who have written upon that ſubject. Firſt know what Meditation is, ſecondly how it is ordered.

What you muſt underſtand to meditate well.

Definition of Meditation.

Meditation properly is a prayer of the heart, by which we humbly, attentively, and affectionately ſeek the truth, which concerns our ſalvation, thereby to guid us to the exercise of Chriſtian virtues. That you may meditate well, you muſt know the cauſes, degrees, matter, and form of meditation.

Cauſes.

The principal cauſe thereof is God, who infuſeth himſelf into our ſoul, to frame a good thought, as the Sun doth upon the earth to produce a flower. It is a goodly thing to have the ſpirit ſubtile and fruitful. It is to work without the Sun (ſaith Origen) to think to do any thing here without the grace of the Holy Ghoſt.

The firſt degree, which leadeth to good and ſerious Prayer, is a good life, and principally purity of heart, tranquillity of ſpirit, deſire to make your ſelf an inward man. Saint Auguſtine reciteth a ſaying of Porphyrius very remarkable, which he deriveth from the mouth of this perfidious man, as one ſhould pull a thing ſtoln out of a Thief's coffer: God, the Creatour and Father of this whole Univerſe, hath no need of our ſervice, but it is our good to ſerve him, and adore him, making of our life a perpetual Prayer, by a diligent enquiry of his perfections, and imitation of his virtues. Obſerve then, the firſt degree of good Prayer is good life.

Aug. lib. 9 De civit. Dei cap. 23. Deus omnium Pater nullius indiget, ſed voluit eſſe hæc, cum cum adoramus, ipſam unam precè ad eum facientes, per inquiſitionem & imitationem de ipſo.

The ſecond (as well this Authour hath noted) is the perquiſition, to wit, the ſearch of verities by thinking on the things meditated, which are the ſundry conſiderations ſuggeſted to us by the ſpirit in the exerciſe of meditation.

The third is the affection, which ſpringeth from theſe conſiderations. Our Underſtanding is the ſteel, and our Will the flint: as ſoon as they touch one another, we ſee the ſparks of holy affections to flie out. We muſt bray together the matters of Prayer, as Aromatick ſpices, with the diſcuſſion of our underſtanding, before we can extract good odours.

The fourth is the imitation and fruit of things we meditate on. It is the mark, at which our thoughts ſhould aim, otherwiſe, if one ſhould pretend nothing elſe but a vain buſineſs of the minde, it would be to as much purpoſe to drive away Butter-flies, as to meditate. Good meditation and good action ought to be entertained as two ſiſters, holding one another by the robe.

Matter of Meditation.

As for the matter of meditation, you muſt know that all meditations are drawn from three Books. The firſt and moſt inferiour is the Book of the great world, where one ſtudieth to come by knowledg of the creature to the Creatour. The ſecond is the Book of the little world, where man ſtudieth himſelf, his beginning, his end, qualities, habits, faculties, actions, functions, and the reſt.

Three Books of Meditation.

The third is the Book of the Heavenly Father, Jeſus Chriſt our Saviour, who verily is a gilded Book, limmed with the rays of the Divinity, imprinted with all the characters of ſanctity, and from thence an infinitie of matter is drawn, as thoſe of benefits, of four laſt things, of the life, death, and paſſion of Jeſus, and of all the other myſteries. You muſt digeſt every one in his time, according to the opportunity, taſt, and capacity of thoſe who meditate. Some appropriate meditations to every day of the week; others make their circuit according to the moneth; others follow the order of the myſteries, and life of our Saviour, as they are couched in ſo many Books written of theſe matters.

Practiſe and form contained in ſix Articles.

The practice and form of meditation conſiſteth in ſix things. The firſt, to divide the ſubject you would meditate on into certain points, according to the appointment of ſome Directour, or the help of a Book: as if you meditate upon the knowledg of ones ſelf, to take for the firſt point, what man is by nature. For the ſecond, what he is by ſin. For the third, what he may be by grace.

1. Article.

2. Article.

The ſecond, a little before the honour appointed for meditation, to call into memory the points, which you would meditate on.

3. Article.

The third, after you have implored the light and aſſiſtance of the Holy Ghoſt, that he would be pleaſed to direct this act to his glory, and that you have framed to your ſelf a lively thought of the preſence of God, and that actually you may meditate to ſelect the points, and articles propoſed, ſweetly, attentively, affectionately: and, not to want matter for every point, it is good to weigh the cauſes, the effects, the tenents, and utmoſt limits of the myſtery we meditate on.

Seven ways to dilate one's ſelf in meditating in abundance upon ſundry thoughts contained in this third Article.

As in the firſt point of the knowledg of your ſelf, What man is according to Nature? A reaſonable creature, intelligent, capable of the knowledg of God. Who made it? God himſelf. He would that his his Divine hands (saith S. Basil) should serve him as a womb. What are the Essential parts thereof? A soul, a body, an understanding, a memory, a will. What are the Accidentals? A general mass of so many little parcels, as have their names, and entertainments. O the powerful hand, which hath composed such a master-piece! Where was it made? In the Earth, and not in Heaven, to teach him humility. And to what end made? To praise God, and serve him, and to save himself in praise and serving him. Who hath concurred to its creation? God. Hath he made use of Angels? No: he would attribute the honour of such a work to himself. And how did he make it? He was not content with one single word, as in the Creation of the world, but he put his hand thereto, to shew it was a more supreme effect of his power. And when did he make him? After other creatures, to prepare the world for him, as a Cradle, as a Temple, as an Hall to banquet in, and such like things. You see these circumstances, who, what, where, what help, wherefore, when, and how, in every subject of what kind soever, will lead you along.

The second manner to dilate your self, when you meditate History, is, to represent the divers persons with their words, actions, and passions. As in the mysterie of the Resurrection, the Soldiers shivering for fear, the Person of our Saviour all enlightened with splendour, saying, Courage, I have overcome, all power is given to me in Heaven and Earth; I come to wipe away your Tears, to make your Faces bright-shining, to put you into possession of an eternal felicity, and such like things. On the other side, Magdalen, who seeketh her Master, and not content to behold the Angels, speaketh these words, which Origen prompteth her: All these goodly comforters are burthensom to me: I seek the Creatour, and therefore I cannot see any creature without anxiety. I seek not Angels, but him, who hath made both me, and Angels.

Onerosi sunt mihi omnes consolatores: quaro Creatorem, & ideò mihi gravis est ad videndū omnis creatura. Ego non quaro Angelos, sed eum, qui fecit me, & Angelos.

The third, to represent things to your self by certain Images, figures, and similitudes: as Hermas, cited in the Bibliothec of the Fathers, who, meditating on the joy of worldlings, imagined to himself a delicious Medow, enammeled all over with Flowers, where certain fat and plump Sheep cropped the grass, and skipped to and fro, with many jumps in the delights thereof: and in an instant this Medow became wast, plain, dry, lean, parched, and barren, and the same Sheep appeared starven, scabbie, and full of botches, a rude surly Sheepherd driving them to feed among thorns, and brambles. Afterward he applied all that to the voluptuous, and made to himself a perfect representation of their life, to avoid their unhappiness.

S. Gregory in his Hymns.

The fourth, to extend your self by comparing of one thing to another, as did Saint Gregory Nazianzen, meditating upon the love of God. "Tell me "confidently (O my soul) what thou desirest? For "I will please thee. Thou wouldest perhaps have "Gyges his enchanted ring to gain a kingdom. "Thou wouldest have all that which is in thy hand "chang'd into gold (the desire of the fabulous Mi- "das.) Thou wouldest covet Palaces stuffed with "gold, and silver, rich possessions, curiosities, "boundless honours. Poor distracted man, dost "thou not see, thy God is all that, and above all "that, and incomparably more then that? Thy "God is the true riches, the true glory, the true "repose, without him all thy blessings would be "curses, and with him all thy afflictions may be "turned into felicities.

The fifth, to make sometimes a Dialogue; God, and the intellectual creatures, sensible, and insensible enterchangeably speaking: as did S. Augustine, meditating upon the perfections of God. "He "went wheeling round about the world, and asked "in heaven, in earth, sea, and depths, addressing "himself to every one in particular, Are you God? "And these Creatures answered, No, those have "lyed, who Deified us. And after he had run all over the world, he entereth into himself, and saith to himself: Who art thou? From whence cometh this creature? My Lord, and my God, from whence, but from thee? By these ladder-steps he mounteth to the knowledg of his Creatour, and plungeth himself in the abysses.

Circuibam omnia quærens te, & propter omnia derelinquens me. Interrogavi terram, si esset Deus, & dixit mihi quòd non. Tu quis es? unde hoc tale animal? Domine Deus meus, unde nisi à te? Aug. Solil. 31.

The sixth, to make sometimes a gradation, ascending from degree to degree, as in meditating on these words of Saint John: God so loved the world, that he gave his onely-begotten Son. If God should onely appoint a bird to bring the news of thy salvation, would it not seem to thee to deserve many thanks? But what if a reasonable creature? What if a man endowed with all manner of excellencies? What if an Angel? What if an Archangel, a Cherubin, a Seraphin? What if all the Angels, and all the Blessed Spirits? But all these, in comparison of his Son, are but as a little drop of water to the vast Ocean. And he hath given thee his Son. O prodigie! O superabundance of love!

Sic Deus dilexit mundum, ut filium suum unigenitum daret. Joan. 3. 16.

The seventh, easie, and fruitful, is, to ponder that, which you meditate on, with application to your self, attentively considering the actions and words of our Saviour to form ours. To examine carefully your deportments, and see how often times they wander from this rule of perfection; to repeal them, to square them, to level them, as much as you can, according to the model, which is set before your eyes.

4 Article of the manner of Meditation. Lights.

After the discussion of every point, the Lights follow in the fourth place, which are Maxims, and conclusions drawn from the discourse we have made. As if we have meditated upon the knowledg of our selves, to derive this fruit from thence: "That we "have nothing of our selves, but ignorance, weak- "ness, vanity, misery. That we are wholly God's. "That it is a sacrilege to live for our selves. That "we cannot have a worse Master, then our own li- "berty, and scope: and such like things.

5. Article. Affections.

In the fifth place come the Affections, which are flaming transportations of the will, bent to pursue and embrace the good it acknowledgeth, as when S. Augustine, having meditated upon the knowledg of God, brake forth into these words: Alass! I have begun very late to love thee: a beauty ever antient, a beauty ever new. Too late have I begun. Thou wert within, and I sought for thee without, and have cast my self with such violence upon these created beauties, without knowledg of the Creatour, to defile, and deform my self daily more and more. To this it much availeth to have by heart many Versicles of the most pathetical Psalms, which serve as jaculatory prayers, and as it were enflamed arrows, to aim directly at the proposed mark.

Serò te amavi, pulchritudo tã antiqua, & tam nova: serò te amavi, & tu intus eras, & ego foris, & ibi te quærebam: & in ista formosa, quæ feceris, ego deformis irruebam. Aug. Solil. 11.

6. Article. Colloquies

For conclusion you have Colloquies, which are reverent and amorous discourses with God, by which we ask of him to flie the evil, or follow the good discovered in the meditation. And, of all that which I say, Discussion, Light, Affection, a Colloquy may be made upon every point, but more particularly at the end of the Prayer. And note, in every Prayer, especially in Colloquies, you must make acts of the praise of God, in adoring him with all the Heavenly host, and highly advancing his greatness, and excellencies. Of thanksgiving, in thanking him for for all benefits in general, but particularly for these most eminent in the subject we meditate. Of Petition, in asking some grace, or favour. Of Obsecration, in begging it by the force of holy things, and agreeable to the Divine Majesty. Of Oblation, in offering your soul, body, works, words, affections, and intentions; afterward shutting all up with the Pater Noster.

Another manner of Meditation, more plain, and profitable.

Behold briefly the practice of Meditation. If you yet desire one more plain, more facile, and greatly profitable, often practise this same. As the true meditation of a good man is (according to the Prophet) the Law of God, and the knowledg of one's self, meditate the summary of your Belief; as sometimes the Creed of the Apostles, sometimes the Pater Noster, sometimes the Commandments of God, sometimes the deadly sins, sometimes upon the powers of your soul, and sometimes your five natural Senses. The manner shall be thus. After you have chosen a place, and time proper, and a little sounded the retreat in your heart from temporal affairs:

First, invoke the grace of God to obtain light and knowledg upon the subject you are to meditate.

Secondly, if it be the Creed, run over every Article briefly, one after another, considering three things, what you ought to believe of this Article, what you ought to hope, what you ought to love: How you hitherto have believed it, hoped it, loved it: How you ought more firmly to believe it hereafter, to hope for it more confidently, to love it more ardently.

If it be the Pater Noster, meditate upon every Petition, what you ask of God, the manner how you ask it, and the disposition you afford to obtain it. If the Commandments of God; what every Commandment meaneth, how you have kept them, and the course you will presently hold, the better to observe them. If the powers of your Soul, and five Senses; the great gift of God, which is to have a good Understanding, a good Will, an happy Memory; to have the organs of Eys, Ears, and all the Senses well disposed for their several functions. How you have hitherto employed all these endowments, and how you will use them in time to come.

Thirdly, you shall make oblation of all that you are to God, and shall conclude with the Pater Noster, and Ave Maria.

Another way.

Another manner very sweet for those, who are much affected to holy Scripture, is mixed prayer, consisting in three things.

The first, to make prayer to obtain of God grace and direction in this action, as it hath been said above.

The second, to take the words of holy Scripture, as a Psalm, a Text of S. John, S. Paul, and such like things; to pronounce it affectionately, pondering, and ruminating the signification of each word, and resting thereon with sweetness, while our spirit furnisheth us with variety of considerations.

The third, to make some resolution upon all these good Considerations, to practice them in such and such actions of virtue. Lastly, to end the Meditation with some vocal Prayer.

The fifteenth SECTION.

Practice of vocal Prayer, spiritual Lection, and the Word of God.

Practice of Vocal Prayer three ways.

THe practice of vocal Prayer consisteth in three things; to observe whom we should pray unto, what we ought to pray for, and how to pray. For the first, we know what the Church teacheth us, how, next unto the Majesty of the most Blessed Trinity, incomparably raised above all creatures, * we pray to Angels, and Saints, who are (as it were) the rays of this great and incomprehensible Sun, from whom all glory reflecteth. Above all creatures we reverence the most holy Mother of God, who hath been as a burning mirror, in the which all the beams of the Divinity are united. Origen calleth her the treasure of the Trinity: Methodius, the living Altar: Saint Ignatius, a Celestial Prodigie: Saint Cyril, the Foundéress of the Church: Saint Fulgentius, the Repairer of Mankind: Proclus of Cyzike, the Paradise of the second Adam, the Shop of the great Union of two Natures: Saint Bernard, the Firmament above all Firmaments: Andrew of Crete, the Image of the first Archetype, and the Epitome of the incomprehensible excellencies of God.

To whom to pray.

* Pramonitus, pramonitus.

Praise of the Blessed Virgin.

All that may be said redoundeth to the glory of the workman, who made her, and advanced her with so many preeminences, yea, that alone affordeth us a singular confidence in her protection. The devotion towards this common Advocate of mankind is so sweet, so sensible, so full of consolation, that a man must have no soul not to relish it. Next, we honour those Angelical spirits, who enammel Heaven with their beauty, and shine as burning Lamps before the Altar of this great God of Hosts. We have a particular obligation to our holy Angel-Guardian, whom God hath deputed to our conservation, as a Celestial Centinel, that perpetually watcheth for us. We behold in Heaven, with the eys of faith, an infinite number of chosen souls, who read our necessities in the bosom of God, written with the pen of his will, and enlightened with the rays of their proper glory, who apply this knowledg to their beatified understanding. Behold the objects of our Devotion! As concerning that, which we ought to pray, and beg for, our great Master hath abridged it for us in our Lord's Prayer, a true Epitom of the celestial wisdom; as if one would comprehend all this great Universe in the round circuit of a Ring. From thence it is that all prayers are derived, as all waters flow from the Ocean.

Angels.

Lord's Prayer.

From the union of this excellent prayer with the Angelical Salutation the Rosary is composed; a prayer as singular, as familiar to the whole world, whether it be simply recited, or whether one proceed therein by the way of meditation upon the Mysteries, as many pious and devout Books do teach.

Rosary.

We have besides this, the Psalter of the Kingly Prophet, which operateth that in the Church, which the Sun doth in Heaven. It illuminateth, heateth, and makes fruitful all the good desires, and devotions of Christianity. Consequently there follow many well-digested Offices, many Collects, Letanies, Prayers, collected from holy Scriptures, and Fathers. You have a plentiful treasury of them compiled by Henry Kispenvigius, able to satisfie the most curious devotions. But all is not in multitude. The Breviaries, Hours, and Manuals of Devotion say enough. Those, who have obligation of saying some Office, ought seriously to think of the discharge of their consciences upon this point. But you, which have it not, it is reason, with the advise of your Spiritual Father, you task your selves upon some daily exercise seasoned with some variety, that every day you may repeat it with exact diligence: and moreover you have many jaculatory prayers drawn from the Psalms, or other Books, for all manner of necessities, as well spiritual, as temporal, and a list of the persons, as well living, as dead, for whom you are to pray.

Psalter.

Government of Vocal Prayer.

When you have the matter digested, it remaineth, your self add form thereunto, a serious attention, a pro-profound reverence, a fervent love. You muſt imagine with your ſelf, that with thoſe holy old men in the Apocalyps you ſtand before the Throne of God, with a Vial or Cup in the one hand, (which is your heart repleniſhed with holy thoughts, as with odoriferous Baſm) and an Harp in the other, which is the collection of ſo many notable prayers. Serve your ſelf well with this celeſtial Harp. Do not as one Neanthus, who, having inherited Orpheus his Harp, thought to do wonders, and played ſo ill, that Dogs, affrighted with his unſpeakable skreaking noiſe, tare him in pieces. It is not enough you have ſo many holy prayers, which ſound like the ſtring of God's Harp, conſigned to you by Jeſus Chriſt himſelf, and ſo many holy perſonages: you muſt uſe them well, leſt you find your puniſhment even in the ſacrifice of Propitiation. Take heed you ſacrifice not (as S. Gregory ſaith) the Calf without flower; which is, to make prayer with lips without application of heart.

The form.

Cup and Harp in prayer.

Neanthus. To uſe it well.

To ſacrifice the Calf without flour.

Remedies againſt diſtractions.

Four things will greatly ſerve you to reſiſt diſtractions, and drineſs, which happen in prayer. The firſt, Before prayer, and in the time of prayer, frame to your ſelf a lively and ſtrong Idea of the preſence of God, and when any diſtraction occurreth, recal your thoughts into their center by often renewing your intentions in the beginning of every part of prayer.

The ſecond, Not being charged with any Office by obligation, make a few vocal prayers, and ſtay upon every word the ſpace of a breathing-fit: in the mean time, pondering both the word which you pronounce, and the perſon to whom you ſpeak, and your baſeneſs and unworthineſs. This manner is very ſovereign and available to pray.

The third, To follow the counſel of Caſſiodorus, to take this vocal prayer, which you rehearſe, as if it were particularly made for you, or that it originally had born the very like ſprouting buds in your heart. So ought you to connaturalize it, and punctually eſpouſe all the affections, which the Author of this prayer had, when the Holy Ghoſt did dictate it unto him. You muſt rejoyce, bewail, hate, and love upon David's Harp, as by a certain divine inſpiration.

The fourth, Often to ask of God the gift of prayer, to offer him all your devotions in union with thoſe of our Saviour, and to chaſtiſe your neglects by ſome voluntary ſatisfaction. To water and moiſten your prayers, and retain them in full vigour, it is needful, that as you ſpeak to God in the exerciſe of prayer, he ſpeak to you in books, and by the mouth of Preachers. Wherefore make a reſolution to imploy daily ſome part of your time in the reading of ſome devout book, as well that, which containeth Precepts, as Examples. Go not, as it were, boot-haling, with an unſteady curioſity, which ſwalloweth all, and ever remaineth hungry: but fix your thoughts and affections upon that which you read, in ſuch ſort, that you may be imbrued and coloured with a firm tincture. Good books are as the Cave of Sibylla. Caſſius Longinus ſaith, the inhabitants of that Cave had a certain rapture of propheſie; and in often revolving the writings of Saints the ſpirit of Saints is acquired.

Good books the Cave of Sibylla. Spiritual readings, and Sermons.

And as for Sermons, take heed of that canker of worldly ſpirits, who hear Preachers, as Athenian Orators, or as one would a curious Lute-player, or a Comedy in the Burgundian-Hoſtery. If he, who preacheth to you have no other intention, but to pleaſe you, nor you any other purpoſe, but to ſooth your own curioſity; he hath wearied his Lungs, and you in the mean ſpace have had the itch in your Ears. The time will come, when he ſhall have the worm in his heart to gnaw him, and you the tingling in your ears for your puniſhment. The ſeller and the buyer ſhall be paid with the coyn of Reprobation. Who ſpeaketh not, and who heareth not, to do and become better, abuſeth a word ſigned with the blood of Jeſus Chriſt; the loſs whereof is moſt dangerous, and the account ineſtimable.

The ſixteenth SECTION.
Of the ſecond Combat of the Spiritual man againſt Weakneſs.

ALL that, on which I have before very largely diſcourſed, ſerves to diſſipate the darkneſs of ignorance, and to repleniſh a ſoul with the knowledge of God, with good Maxims, good deſires, and good purpoſes: and doubtleſs nothing would be found more eaſie and familiar then to do well, were it not temptations come athwart us, which are the Remoras, as it were, and hinderances of the ſoul. And therefore it is neceſſary to frame to your ſelf an undoubted courage, high, and reſolute, to reſiſt with an invincible hand, and to ſtrike at an infinite number of obſtacles, which preſent themſelves in all ſorts of occaſions, and which bring upon our ſouls acceſſes of fire and ice; fire of concupiſcence, ice of puſillanimity, to form in the end an abſolute inability of Virtue. This inability is vanquiſhed by the grace of God, and virtue of fortitude, which warranteth courage to undertake, and ſtrengtheneth it to bear what Reaſon dictateth. And although to undertake ſeem a thing very glorious, it is, notwithſtanding, the hardeſt task to endure a temptation, to oppoſe it with unmoved foot, to wraſtle with it, to trample on it, and in the end by Virtue to erect Trophies over it.

Temptations remoras in the Soul.

Sufferers more courragious, then Undertakers.

Saint Thomas very judiciouſly yieldeth the reaſons: 1. Becauſe he, who is aſſaulted, ſeemeth ever in worſe ſtate, then he that aſſaulteth: for encountering he alwaies preſuppoſeth himſelf to be ſtronger. Now it appeareth, he who undergoeth ſome brave action of courage is the Aſſailant, and he who withſtandeth a temptation is oppoſed, and ſometimes ſhaken without thinking thereof; which is far more troubleſom and hard, and therefore draweth after it much more reſolution, in caſe a good and generous reſiſtance be made againſt it. 2. The Aſſailant beholdeth the peril as future, and he who is tempted ſeeth the temptation even almoſt within his gates, in his heart, in his bowels. 3. The Aſſailant often diſchargeth his Piſtol like an Harcubuſier before he have leiſure to know the danger, and readily retireth: the other, who ſuffereth, burneth as with a gentle fire, and in the mean ſpace, if he be patient, he long time ſtayeth with a repoſed reſt, yet not ſtriking at all; which is a thing worthy of an eternal Crown. The Alexanders, the Ceſars, who flew like Eagles to the conqueſt of Worlds, oftentimes yieldeth themſelves up to the leaſt temptation. Their ſtrength was diſguiſed, not real.

S. Thomas. 2. q. 123.

The ſeventeenth SECTION.
The Arms againſt Temptation, contained in twelve Maxims.

THe means to reſiſt temptations is not to frame to your ſelf a ſpiritual inſenſibility, which feeleth nothing: it is hard to obtain it, ſo ſenſible Self-love is; and when one hath it, he rather is a ſtone, then a man. It is not to drive away one temptation by another, and to do one miſchief to be freed of another. For to purſue ſuch courſes, is like waſhing one's ſelf with ink. It is not to hide one from all kind of encounters, and never to do well for fear to have occaſion of a combate againſt ill: but to reſiſt it couragiouſly in that ſort as I will ſhew. That great fore-mentioned John Picus Mirandula hath collected twelve notable Maxims, the practice whereof is moſt profitable to enable your ſelf in ſpiritual combate againſt impotency.

The means to reſiſt Temptations.

1 Theſ. 3. 3. In hoc poſiti ſumus. Temptation our Trade.

I. Maxim. That you muſt be tempted, on what ſide ſoever it happen. It is our profeſſion, our trade, our continual exerciſe. The Eagle complaineth not of her wings, nor the Nightingale of her ſong, nor the Peacock of her tail, becauſe it is by kind: and it is as natural for man to be tempted, as for a bird to fly, ſing, to prune her feathers. If you forſake the way of ſpiritual life fearing to be tempted, and turn head to worldly contentments, hold it for an infallible verity, you therein ſhall be much more engaged; and which is worſe, without comfort, honour, merit, or recompenſe: you ſhall leave a Paper-Croſs, which, if you knew well how to manage, would load you no more then feathers do the bird; you will forſake it (ſay I) to take another hard, uneaſie, and bloody, which would inveſt you in the Confraternity of the bad Thief.

Sidon. Apol. li. 1. c. 2.

That great Prelate of France, Sidonius Apollinaris relateth, that a certain man called Maximus, being arrived at the height of honour, by unlawful, and indirect ways, much grieved from the firſt day, and breathing out a great ſigh, ſpake theſe words: O Damocles, I eſteem thee moſt happy to have been a King only the ſpace of a diner-time. It is now a whole day, that I have been ſo, and can no longer endure it.

A remarkable Speech of Maximus. Felicem te, Damocles, qui non uno longius prandio regni neceſſitatem tolerâviſti.

II. Remember that in the affairs of the world we fight a longer time, we travel more painfully, we reap more fruitleſly. The end of one toil is the beginning of another. In pains-taking there is no hope, but ever to labour. A temporal toil draweth after it an eternity of pain.

Travel of Worldlings.

III. Is it not a meer folly to believe a Paradiſe, an eternal life, a Jeſus Chriſt, who made unto himſelf a ladder of the Croſs to aſcend to the Throne of his Glory, and you in the mean-while to be deſirous to live here with arms a-croſs? To ſee the Maſter open the way of Heaven through ſo many thorns, and the ſervant not to be willing to tread but upon flowers? To ſee under an head, all waſted, and worn with ſuffering, delicate members, as one ſhould make to a Coloſſus of braſs feet of flax.

Indignity of Curioſity.

Greatneſs of Temptation. Conformity to Jeſus Chriſt.

IV. Were there no other fruit in Temptation, but the conformity, which we thereby have with Jeſus Chriſt, the Sovereign Wiſdom, it would be highly recompenſed. A brave Captain ſaid to a Souldier, who died with him: although thou hadſt been unknown all thy life-time, it is no ſmall honour for thee to die this day with thy Maſter. And who would not hold it for a great glory to have the Son of God for Captain, for Companion, for Spectator, for Theatre, for Guerdon, in all his afflictions, and tribulations? Who would not account it a great dignity to be daily crucified with him? To diſtend his hands, and arms upon the Croſs, in withholding them from violences, rapines, ruins, wherewith the ſpirit of lying tranſporteth us? To fetter your feet, and hinder them from running after the unbridled deſires of your heart? To make bitter your tongue in ſubduing the pleaſures of taſte? To cover your body with wounds, in ſuppreſſing the incitements of fleſh by an holy Mortification? To leſſen your ſelf by the contempt of honour, according to the example of him, who, being able always to walk upon the wings of Cherubins, would creep amongſt us like a little worm of the earth? What a glory were it to ſay what Saint Paul ſaid: I bear the marks of my Saviour Jeſus on my body?

Gal. 6. 17. Ego ſtigmata Domini Jeſu in corpore meo porto.

Diſtruſt of one's ſelf.

V. Not to confide in humane remedies, when you undertake to overcome a temptation. It is not a thing, which dependeth meerly upon us. It is neceſſary God go before, and we thereto contribute our free-will. If he watch not over our heads, it will be an hard matter for us to keep centinel. No creature is ſo feeble, as he, who holdeth himſelf for ſtrong, being only armed with his own confidence. Many good things are done in man, which man doeth not: and man doeth no good, which God doeth not. Who thinks to reſiſt temptations without his help, is like him who haſteneth to the wars, and ſtumbleth at the threſhold of his own door. And therefore an effectual means in this battel is to inſiſt much on prayer, eſpecially at the firſt enterance of a temptation.

Concilium Arauſicanum. Multa in homine bona fiunt, quæ non facit homo bona: nulla verò facit homo bona, quæ non Deus præſtet, ut faciat homo.

VI. When you have vanquiſhed a temptation, take very good heed you leave not your rank, and wholly ſlacken your courage, as if there were no more enemies to be oppoſed. As diſtruſt is the mother of ſafety, ſo overmuch ſecurity is the gate of peril. If your enemy ſtill roar up and down like a roaring lion, become you on the other ſide a watchful lion in the centinels of the God of Hoſts.

To ſtand always upon your guard. Super ſpeculam Domini ego ſto. Iſa. 21. 8.

To combate your Enemy.

VII. Content not your ſelf only to be beaten, but aſſail your enemy. When Satan lays a ſnare to entrap you, make it an inſtrument of merit. If he preſent a good work to you, which glittereth in the world, thereby to tempt you with pride, make a good work of it, and leave vanity, referring all to the greater honour of God.

VIII. When you are in combate, fight with alacrity, as if you already were certain of victory. Turn away the eye of your conſideration from what you ſuffer, and hold it perpetually fix'd upon the reward. A great unhappineſs, which maketh many to fall head-long into temptation, is, that they have their minds ſo ſtretched and bent upon the thought of pain, they cannot abide to behold the reward, which waiteth on them. When the fourty Martyrs were in the frozen lake, thirty nine of them looked back upon the future crown; and one of them unhappily thought of nothing but his puniſhment. All of them remained victorious, except this wretched creature: who, ſoyling the glory of his patience, came out of the pool to die preſently after in his infidelity. Do you not think, that which comforted our Saviour on the Croſs, in that bottomleſs abyſs of calumnies, and dolours, was a mirrour of glory, where he ſaw all his ſufferings in crowns? Behold the courſe which is to be held! To ſtay a little on the preſent, and reſt in a ſtrong apprehenſion of the future: and ever to have theſe words of S. Paul in your heart, A ſhort moment of our tribulation worketh in us an eternal weight of glory. Fight then with courage, as if it were the laſt temptation, which ſhould aſſail you, and be perſwaded, that herein is the extent of your Predeſtination. When you have overcome it, govern your ſelf like a man readily preſt to enter again into the liſts, and make one victory the degree for another.

What is the cauſe, that many yield.

Momentaneum & leve tribulationis noſtræ, æternum gloriæ pondus operatur in nobis. 2 Cor. 4. 17.

IX. Though you be valiant, brave not danger, tempt not temptation, caſting your ſelf into the occaſions thereof through preſumption of heart. He, that much affecteth hazard, inſtead of finding glory therein, ſhall trace out his own tomb.

Not to tempt Temptation.

X. A ſovereign Means to conquer temptations is ſeaſonably to diſcover the countenances of them, to open your heart freely to your Ghoſtly Father, to declare your thoughts, to know them well, to consider their nature, and to see the power they have over your soul. It ordinarily happeneth what the good Epictetus saith: It is not the thing, that troubleth us, it is our fantasie. How many temptations would be vanquished by slighting them, if one took but a little leisure to laugh at them? We make Elephants of Flies: and of little Dwarfs, who by stealth pinch us, we frame Giants. We resemble young children, who, for fear of a vizard, hide themselves with tears in their Nurses bosoms: but take away the mask, and give them it to handle, and they will make sport with it. How many things seem terrible, and impossible to us, which we finde ridiculous, and easie to overcome, if we never so little touch them with our finger? In temptations of pusillanimity it is good to represent to your self these false Giants as Dwarfs. But in that of Lust you must not despise any thing, rather lay hold of little threads, as if they would become huge cables. Both in the one, and the other, there is nothing to be done, but to dash these little Babylonians against the stones. Withstand beginnings, and suffer not your enemies to fortifie themselves to your disadvantage.

to

A Sovereign Means.

Sweetness of Victory of a Temptation.

XI. The stone of offence and scandal to many is, that they lively present to their imagination the sweetness of sin, and never consider the pleasure, which is derived from the victory over sin. As soon as man is plunged in the puddle thereof, behold a blushing soul, drenched in pensiveness, melancholy, and despair, whom a loathsom pleasure, which passeth away as a dream, furnisheth from a dream with an heap of scorns, sorrows, and confusions. But quite contrary, that soul, which hath resisted, findeth her self content, generous, advanced, satisfied with holy comforts, which come from the Paradise of God. Few men revolve this thought, which Saint Cyprian much recommendeth. Behold why the number of the damned is very great! and yet notwithstanding doth it not seem to you very reasonable, that man, who a thousand times hath yielded to temptation, should once in his life-time tast the sweetness, which is in the victory over a temptation, to rejoyce for ever? Many have been diverted from a great and manifest precipice, by considering these words: "Well, go to. To yield to sin, "what will be the end thereof? To purchase repent- "ance at so dear a rate? To render up a renown "of so many years, as a prey to the most unhappy "moment of pleasure? Where is the faith promised "to God? Let us at least seek out some place where "he is not. And where is he not? So many Stars, so "many Intelligences, wherewith the world is replenished, are so many eyes to behold thee. Himself "looketh into the bottom of thy conscience. Ask "leave of him, if thou wilt sin. But how ask, "and how obtain? Exercise a little patience, and "this temptation will vanish away as a cloud. Thou "goest about to commit a sin, the pardon whereof "is very uncertain: but, it is doubtless, through all "eternity, when thou hast committed it, God him- "self cannot make it to be undone.

XII. Think not you are the less acceptable to God, when he suffereth you to be tempted, yea with dishonest thoughts, which to chaste souls are extremely irksom. Alas, why? If S. Paul, that Cherubim, scorched with celestial ardours, who fixed his foot upon the front of the stars, if we follow the opinion of S. Ambrose, Theophylact, and Oecumenius, felt the stings of concupiscence in a flesh rapt to the third Heaven: think you, for having some good dispositions of well-doing, you ought to be freed from wars of Nature, which ever keep in humility your soul a little too indulgent to it self?

The eighteenth SECTION.

Remedies against Passions, and Temptations, which proceed from every Vice.

I.

TO consider, that Passion is a motion of the Sensual Appetite, which proceedeth from the imagination of good, or evil, with some agitation of the body.

II. That there are eleven Passions, six in the Appetite of Concupiscence: which are Love, Hatred, Desire, Aversion, Joy, Sadness. Five in the Appetite of Revenge: which are Hope, Despair, Boldness, Fear, Anger.

III. That there are two Means to vanquish all Passions: whereof the first is a Precaution of mind against the occasions, and vain apparences of all things of the world; and the second a serious Entertainment of the mind in better things, as Prayer, Study, Labour, Affairs: but, above all, you must beg of God the light, and strength of his holy Grace, which infinitely surpasseth all humane Remedies.

we have add some Preservatives against Passions, and the most ordinary Vices.

Against Carnal Love.

I. To consider the barrenness of wordly loves, which are the true Gardens of Adonis, wherein nothing is gathered but wretched flowers environed with many thorns.

II. To set a true estimate upon things, and not to be deceived with apparences.

III. To keep watch over your Senses, to avoid the opportunities and occasions of sin, and above all to have recourse unto God, upon the first impression of your thoughts.

IV. To free your self by main force from the presence of objects; to be delighted with serious purposes, and good employments.

V. To present to your self very often the defect, ingratitude, levity, inconstancy, and treachery of creatures, which we most servilely love.

Against Aversions, Hatreds, and Envies.

I. To esteem nothing great in this life, is the way to envy nothing.

II. To love only the great inheritance of the land of the living, which never becomes less by the many and several divisions made to those, who possess it.

III. To consider attentively the Motives, which excite us to love our neighbour; as the participation of the same nature, same life, same blood, and like profession, and such other reasons, which are as so many knots of amity.

IV. The wretched life of Cain to live in envy, troubles, disturbances, and rage of a distempered spirit, which causeth the immortality of its being to contribute to the eternity of its pains.

V. To behold how envy, ere it is aware, serveth many times to the advancement of those, who are envied.

Against Covetousness, worldly Hope, and Joy.

I. The disquiet of an hungry mind.

II. The unsatiableness of desires.

III. The wars and battels we must oft-times undergo to satisfie one sole desire.

IV. The dishonour of denial, insupportable to a generous soul.

V. The dependence and slavery we must endure, to please those, from whom we expect the accomplishment of our desires.

VI. The frailty in offending God through too much greediness of temporal things.

VII. The poor and short pleasure taken in things we most ardently desire.

VIII. That God many times affordeth us the accomplishment of our desires, as a punishment of our imperfections.

Against Sadness, and Despair.

There is an Holy sadness, as that we entertain upon the Passion of our Saviour, or for our sins; which is a gift of God, and not a punishment.

There is another Furious, which hath no ears, and which is rather cured by Miracles, then Precepts.

There is one Natural, which proceedeth from humour: and another Vitious, fostered by evil habits, and neglects of salvation.

I. Against this last, we must consider our desires, and affections, oft-times make up all our sadness, and that the true means to lessen the cares, which consume us, is to sweeten the sharp and ardent love, we bear towards worldly things.

II. The small accompt we make of God is the cause we many times are troubled at frivolous things, either distantly threatening us, or already happened. He, that would truly love this great God, who deserveth all the love both of Heaven, and Earth, should not suffer fear or sadness for any thing, but the loss of the love of God, which no man loseth, if he be not willing to forgo it.

III. Nought but tears of the Damned is remediless. He, that may be in the way of Paradise, should not make a kind of Hell on earth; and who may hope this great All, should never be sad for any thing.

Against evil Confidence.

I. That to be confident in evil things is to have a desperate instrument of one's own misery, which entertaineth all exorbitances of the heart, to make them the more punishable.

II. That there is no assured confidence against the power of God, which in an instant ruineth the posterity of the greatest Tyrants.

III. That the strongest things are wasted by the weakest. Lyons have been eaten up by Flies: and rust (though contemptible) consumes the hardest metals.

IV. That to be confident through presumption of strength is the high way to become ridiculous in enterprises, and unfortunate in all successes. We must not go about to soar to the Sun with the wings of a Rear-mouse, nor sail on the Ocean in the shell of a Tortoise.

Against Fear.

I. Neither to desire, nor love any thing inordinately, is the path-way to peace, where fear never harbours.

II. To have a strong charity towards God, and to love him fervently, with perswasion of his reciprocal love. This is the means to enter into a firm confidence. For what evil may we fear against us, when God is with us?

III. We many times fear evils, which are the sources of great blessings: some are not truly evils, other much less then we make them, and many will never happen. Why will you abide where you are not, and put your self on the rack in your imagination.

IV. He, who resolves to suffer all that God will have him, takes in hand a powerful remedy against all sorts of fears: for he, who is a Master over sorrow, commandeth terrour, since the evil present is much more troublesom, then the future.

V. There are natural fears much tied to flesh, unless they be vanquished, and sweetened by frequent custom with the things, which are feared, and conversation with men confident and courageous.

Against Anger.

I. To consider how it depriveth us of six things very pretious, to wit, of wisdom, justice, civility, concord, truth, and the splendour of the spirit of God.

II. How it suddenly transfigureth a man into a little monster.

III. How it is hurtful to the state of health, which we so tenderly love.

IV. That it abaseth the person surprized with it, and especially if he be in some eminency of life, and dignity.

V. That the effects thereof are cruel, the spoils pernicious, events shameful, and falls for the most part irrecoverable.

VI. The contentment to have kept back an evil word, which had destroyed a good affair.

VII. The abstinence from curiosities, and niceness of life, cutteth asunder the sinews of anger. The less curious a man is, the more humble he is; and the more humble, the less sensible is he of the crosses, which happen to things without us.

VIII. We must prevent occasions, and not afford them too much power over our hearts, in all those things, the loss whereof may trouble us.

IX. To eschew the occasions of places, of persons, recreations, and affairs, which use to disturb the peace of our minds.

X. If one feel himself inwardly moved, to bridle the tongue, that so the apprehensions of the heart may not break forth. To re-enter into your self.

To ask truce of your passion, stedfastly believing, that you shall pardon many offences, if you begin to understand before you grow angry.

Against Vanity.

I. To represent to one's self very often the extreme vanity of all worldly things.

II. The misery of present state, wherein all things invite us to Humility.

III. The vanity of Opinions, which afford us nothing but winde.

IV. The blindness, incapacity, inconstancy, perverseness of men's judgments, who often love, and admire all that, which is the most Vitious.

V. The frailty of honour, and reputation, which is sought by unlawfull ways.

VI. The tortures and torments of a vain spirit.

VII. The ostentation in good successes, the discouragement in bad.

VIII. The surprizal of his practices, and imperfections, which cannot be hidden from the most judicious.

IX. The Worm, which gnaweth all good works by the means of vanity, and the shameful deprivation of eternal comforts to attend the search of earthly smokes.

Against Gluttony.

I. Represent unto your self the miserable state of a soul brutish and bemired in flesh.

II. Hardness of heart.

III. The dulness of understanding.

IV. The infirmities of body.

V. Loss of goods.

VI. Disreputation.

VII. What an horrour it is to make of the members of Jesus Christ the members of an unclean Creature.

VIII. What indignity it is to adore and serve the belly as a bestial and base God.

IX. The great excess of sins, which proceed from this source.

X. The punishments of God upon the voluptuous.

Against Intemperance of Tongue.

I. To consider, that it is the Throne of Vain-glory.

II. An evident sign of ignorance.

III. The gate of slander.

IV. The harbinger of scoffing.

V. The architect of lying.

VI. The desolation of the spirit of Piety.

VII. The dissipation of the heart's safety.

VIII. The inseparable companion of Idleness, as saith S. John Climacus.

Against Sloth.

I. The indefatigable labour of all creatures in the world, both civil, and natural.

II. The facility of good works after grace given by Jesus Christ.

III. The anxiety of an inconstant and fleeting spirit.

IV. Shame, and contempt.

V. The confusion at the day of Judgment.

VI. The irrecoverable loss of time.

Of three Temptations, which hinder many in the way of Perfection: to wit, Shame of Well-doing, over-much Affection to some Creature, and Pensiveness in Well-doing.

The nineteenth SECTION.

Against the Shame of Well-doing.

MAny would quickly be in the way of a life truly Christian, having souls of an excellent temper, and pious relishes of God, but that they have one temptation: who would believe it? It is the shame of well-doing. Their souls are big with good desires, resembling the Eagle's stone, which ever hath another in it, and never brings it forth. So have they in their hearts (according to their own opinion) a good resolution seriously to embrace Devotion: but the fear of what men will say scattereth as many good thoughts, as the heart can conceive. What practice of remedies will you have against this pusillanimity, effeminate soul? Onely consider consider what you do, and if you be ashamed, it can be of nothing, but of your self.

Eagle's stone.

Unworthiness to be ashamed of wel-doing.

First I ask, Who maketh you blush in the service of your Spouse? Do you blush at his poverty? at his deformity? at his ignorance? Or, tell me, what decay have you observed in him to imprint a blushing Vermilion on your face? Poor? How can he be so, since he maketh all Rich? Deformed? How can he be so, since he is the original Beauty spred over all the creatures of the world? Ignorant? How can he be so, since he is the Eternal Wisdom? Tell me then, what have you to be ashamed of? Some will say, that you would seem to be virtuous, and devout. Do not so, but be so indeed. If you have not cause to blush for Heaven, why should you blush for Virtues, which are the daughters of Heaven? Behold what Sacrilege you commit. Shamefac'dness is made for Vices. It is the veil, wherewith Nature covereth them, when they endeavour to hide themselves, and you will shadow Virtues. Alas! the Martyrs have become red with blood to preserve Devotion, and you blush with shame to betray it. A feverish respect towards some creature, which passeth away in the turning of an hand, hindereth perhaps thirty or fourty years of virtue. O misery!

Number of the devout should settle you.

Secondly, What have you so much to excite, and drive you forward in well-doing? Think you your self to be at this present the onely creature in the world, which tasteth Devotion? A thousand and a thousand well-qualified have advanced the Standard of Piety. If the number of the bad authorize wickedness, why should not so goodly a Troop of honest men furnish us with confidence enough to vanquish one impious fantasie, which verily is nothing, nor hath any substance, but what your remisness affordeth it?

Doubt and childishness of this shame.

Then tell me in the third place, What is it you so much fear, to addict your self wholly to Devotion? The twinkling of an eye, a silly smile, a breath of words, which quickly passeth, and hurteth none? And behold why you forsake God. What is more easie to be overcome, then all that? A little silence answereth all. It is not required of you, you should oppose your arms against the violent stream of a torrent. Silence onely is demanded, and to hope well, which are the two easiest things in the world. Will you put a great affront upon a babler, who flouteth at your Devotions? Answer him not. All he saith is to put you into passion; your impatience pleaseth him, your silence confounds him. In the end he cannot say so much, but that you may hear much more. He hath but one mouth, and you have two ears. Let Michol revile, and persist you in dancing before the Ark, your patience shall stop all mouths, and in the end purchase all Crowns. But you fear you cannot persevere in the way of virtue, and that many changes may cast some aspersion of inconstancy upon you. You do well to fear your self, if you so much expect perseverance from your self. But if you look for it from God, ought you not to have more hope of his goodness, then fear from your own infirmities? You are not advised to make your Devotions eminent by some notable alteration, extraordinary in the exteriour, accompanied with ceremonious enforcements insupportable to your condition. No: but undertake a devotion sweet, facile, and conform to common use, which hath less of outward semblance, and more of inward worth: so shall you the better preserve it, and it shall be the more profitable for you.

Isai. 11. In silentio & spe erit fortitudo vestra.

2 Reg. 9.

What you should fear.

The twentieth SECTION.

Love of Creatures.

Adhering to Creatures marreth all.

After shame cometh likewise a snare much more dangerous, to wit, the love of creatures; Many souls seem already to poyze themselves, and soar into the Skie, but there is some little thread, wretched, and weak, which fettereth their feet. One cannot forsake such a lodging, another such an exercise, a third such a custom, a fourth such a company, which in the mean space dissolveth the course of his good purposes, maketh his heart become childish, and sometimes dull and stupid to the relishes of God. Amongst all encounters this is the most powerful, which proceedeth from the passion of Love, and sometimes among persons, who have their souls most pure: and such, as are in their own opinions far removed from this mischievous passion, yet are not without peril. If this should come like some other gross and carnal love, with an Arrow and Torch in hand, one might more easily defend himself; but it approacheth with a little Sting, subtile, slender, and as it were wholy Spiritual, that one cannot well perceive it in the beginning. It resembleth those little flying worms, which Phædon speaketh of, that unperceivably sting? When they have fixed their sting, we do not know they have stung us, untill we see some swelling rise upon the skin. So in such petty love-dalliances, we see not the Wound, nor Sting, we know not what we suffer, what we do, what we undertake, what we desire. One doth hardly know that he loves: notwithstanding the soul is puffed up, and goeth out of its limits, and is dissolved into an Ocean of disturbances; which are very prejudicial to purity. It were better to have as it were some kind of Leprousie, then such a passion: for that would infect but the body, but this diveth in the end even into the bottom of the soul, weaveth its web in the marrow, forrageth all over that which hath vigour in our inward parts, leaveth meagerness, and sterility, and maketh our heart like to those abortions of Pearls, which have been blasted with Lightning, having, instead of a bright substance, nothing else but an exteriour film.

Passion of Love.

Love is like to Insects.

Phædon. apud Senec. Ep. 49. Adeò tenuis illis & fallens in periculis vis est: tumor indicat morsum.

The danger thereof.

What shall one do in this case? It is a very easie matter to give a preservative, that may keep us from the blow, but it is very difficult to draw the soreness from the wound. You need sometime but the very wind of your hat to turn away a Thunder-clap, that it may not strike where it seems to be aimed; the Thunder maketh his claps as remedileſs as sudden and violent: even so this Passion in the beginning may be dispelled with a very little heed, and dexterity; but, when passage is made for it into the heart, it raiseth a tempest. But in conclusion, what means is there to stay it? It will be told you, you must have recourse to Prayer, to Meditation of the Cross, the day of Judgment, the invocation of the Blessed Virgin and Saints, the frequentation of Sacraments, Fasting, the austerities of Penance, and these are good remedies: yet you notwithstanding will say, what Prayer can one make, when he is ingulfed in a Passion, which perpetually buzzeth in his brain? Do (like Jonas) crie out of the Whale's belly, call from the bottom of the abyss with many jaculatory prayers. But to what use will austerities serve? the body is subdued, it is true; but yet passion remaineth still in the bottom of the soul. It nought importeth: the weakness of flesh by little and little cutteth the sinews of passions, which are inherent in the flesh. All this, you will say, is likewise feasible, provided provided I be not thereby ſeparated from the company of ſuch an one. And, behold the inconveniency I you will perpetually put oyl into the flame, and not have it burn.

Preservative.

Ordinary remedies.

Sovereign Remedies.

I. The moſt Sovereign Remedy is, what you leaſt deſire, though you make ſhew of deſiring health. All that, which cheriſheth the Malady, is the preſence of the object. Our paſſions reſemble ecchoes.

Paſſions are Ecchoes.

Do you not ſee, that ecchoes, the further you go from them, the leſs repercuſſion there is; they leſſening, and loſing themſelves in the air. This affection, that ſpeaketh ſo loud by reflection of the countenance, which you daily behold with ſo much contentment, will quickly vaniſh by a little abſence. But one day alone of ſeparation is an Age to you. Suffer this Age, and the time will come it ſhall not laſt an hour with you.

Folly of this Paſſion.

II. Verily, all well-conſidered, the play is not worth the candle. Muſt you inflict ſo many pains upon your bodies, ſo many torments on your mind, loſe ſo much time, make ſo many ill tongues talk, to pleaſe I know not what petty, wicked, and foundered deſire, which you know not what it is, nor to what it tendeth?

III. If you knew what you deſired, you would be aſhamed of your ſelf, you would have cauſe to be amazed, that ſo noble a ſpirit ſhould ſuffer it ſelf to be tranſported with ſuch follies. The notable Raymond Lullius, who paſſionately was enamoured of a Lady, wife, and honeſt, when, purpoſely to cure his frenzie, ſhe ſhewed him one of her breaſts eaten and gnawn through with a canker, and extremely hideous to behold: Stay, ſimple man (ſaid ſhe) behold what you loved; he, at that inſtant coming to himſelf, ſpake: "Alaſs! was it for this I loſt ſo many good "hours, that I burned, became entranced, that I paſ-"ſed through fire and water? All lovers would ſay the like, were the ſcarf taken from their eyes.

Cure of Raymond Lullius.

Want of Employment.

IV. It well appeareth you want ſome great affront, ſome real pains, ſome ſerious employment. It is the ſuperfluous exceſs of idleneſs, which diſſolveth your heart into theſe effeminacies. You were better have ſome miſchievous proceſs againſt you, then all theſe trifling entertainments. Frame ſome good employment to free your ſelf from a bad. Remember that, which was ſaid: When one hath no leiſure to live, he hath no leiſure to love.

Hier. ad Ruſtic. Vivere non licet, & fornicari licebit?

V. Repreſent to your ſelf, that a thouſand undaunted courages (for that they have twice or thrice reſiſted paſſion conſtantly) have found themſelves free, at liberty, in peace, and tranquillity of ſpirit, wholly admirable: and you, for want of a little reſolution, daily tumble, and involve your ſelf in your fetters. Make a little reſiſtance, caſt away (I pray) all theſe little urchins, which afflict you. Is an abſence ſo troubleſom, that to avoid it you muſt torture your body, vilifie your ſpirit, and yield your reputation up as a prey to ſlander? You ſhall no ſooner put the wedg into the block, but it ſhall be done; you ſhall have a ſoul victoriouſly elevated over paſſion, which ſhall rejoyce amidſt the trophies thereof.

Strength of Reaſon.

The one and twentieth SECTION.

Againſt Sadneſs.

HAve you never repreſented to your ſelf the poor Elias lying under the Juniper-tree, oppreſſed with melancholy, and ſaying to God with an affectionate heart: My God, it is enough; take my ſoul. I am no better then my fore-fathers? This paſſion often happeneth in perſons, who are entered into the liſt of a life more perfect. Anxiety croſſeth them, ſadneſs gnaweth them, melancholy afflicteth them, and Satan (willing ever to fiſh in a troubled water) ſerves himſelf with this diſturbance of mind, to make them return back again to the falſe pleaſures of the world. What remedy, what practice ſhall we confront this miſchief with? Let us uſe David's harp to charm this dangerous Devil of Saul. You are ſad, ſay you. It much concerneth you to ſound your heart, that you may know from whence this penſiveneſs proceedeth, and apply fit remedy thereunto. Sometime ſadneſs cometh from an indiſcrete zeal, when one will of his own accord undertake auſterities, neither ordered, nor digeſted by counſel. He cannot finde good ſucceſs, yet is aſhamed to go back again, which is the cauſe he is tormented between the hammer and the anvile. Sometime it proceedeth from a great immortification of paſſions, which at the enterance into a ſpiritual life (he beginning to pick quarrels with them) put themſelves into the field, aſſailing and turmoyling the mind. As it is ſaid, a little fiſh, called the Waſp of the ſea, in the Dog-days ſtingeth and diſquieteth the repoſe of other fiſhes. It is perhaps as yet in your ſoul neither day, nor night, winter, nor ſummer, cold, nor heat; but good and evil ſtruggle, who ſhall get the upper hand: and this war troubleth you. Sometime it proceedeth from a great tenderneſs of heart, and a paſſionate love of one's ſelf. It ſeemeth to a little Girl, who weepeth in the nook of a chamber, that the whole world is intereſſed in her ſorrow, and that every body ſhould bemone her. Nothing is like to her unhappineſs, her burdens are of lead, and all others are as light as feathers; or, if you weep not with her, ſhe becometh the more melancholy: and, if you do ſorrow with her, ſhe taketh an higher tone to deplore her grievances. There is many times much niceneſs in our ſorrows, and oftentimes our tears are nothing elſe but meer fopperies. From this ſelf-love proceedeth vanity, and complacence, which ſerve us with worm-wood to ſeaſon our morſels withal.

Sadneſs the ſtrate of Satan.

Cauſes of Sadneſs. Immortification.

Tears of Self-flatterers.

Self-love.

The man, who is over-much pleaſed with himſelf, neceſſarily diſpleaſeth many, and, to gain too great a friend within himſelf, he purchaſeth fundry enemies without himſelf. All things cannot happen to his wiſh: and as good ſucceſſes inebriate him with contentments, ſo evil torture, and immoderate contriſtate him. Briefly, bad melancholy often riſeth from a jealous and envious eye: the good hap of another is a ſtraw in his eye, which ever will trouble him, if charity bring not her helping hand. Behold here a lamentable miſchief! All the perfections of another are ours, when we love them in another: and when we hate them, they are thorns in our eys, which extremely torment us. Have we not pain enough within our ſelves, but we muſt plant croſſes in the proſperity of others? Sound your heart, and ſee whether your ſadneſs proceeds from one of theſe five ſources, or from many of them together. Take away the cauſe, by the favour of God's grace, by the help of your endeavour, courage, and reſolution, you ſhall have the effect, and enjoy a peaceable ſoul, like Heaven, ſmiling in a bright ſerenity.

Jealous eye.

Parum alicui eſt, ſi ipſe ſit felix, niſi alter fuerit infelix. Salvian. De gubern. Dei. lib. 5.

Reg. 3. 19.

My ſadneſs, ſay you, cometh not from this occaſion. Would to God it were ſo. You were already ſufficiently happy, if all I have ſaid were not of force to make you ſad. From whence cometh it then? From the accidents, which befall me on every ſide; and, if nothing happen to me, I am unquiet with mine own ſelf. If you think to live wholly without ſadneſs, you muſt frame a new world for your ſelf. Sadneſs is a bitter plant, which groweth in your your garden; you muſt know at one time or other what taſt it hath. To think wholly to free your ſelf is to make your ſelf a King in the Cards, and only to brave it in paper, like the antient Philoſophers, who had their Hands ſhorter then their Tongues. Our Saviour was contriſtated in the dolorous Garden, watered with bloody ſweats, to teach us, the perfection of a Chriſtian is not in being ſenſible of ſorrow, but to moderate the ſame with reſolution.

Sadneſs, a plant of our own growing.

Remedies. The beſt remedy is that, which Jeſus Chriſt hath ſhewed to us, to wit Prayer. It is a wonderful contentment to ſpeak to God, and to tell him your afflictions. Behold you not in a Garden-bed, how thoſe poor Tulips are ſhut up with melancholy under the ſhady coldneſs of the night? And you may well ſay, the Sun within his rays beareth the key to open them; for ſo ſoon as he riſeth, and courteth them a little with that eye, which exhilarateth total Nature, behold they unlooſe themſelves, dilate themſelves, and witneſs their joy for the arrival of this Planet. The like hapneth to your heart, it ſometimes long remaineth benummed and frozen for want of having recourſe to prayer. Learn a little to talk with God by jaculatory prayers. Learn to complain your ſelf to God, and to ſeek the remedies of your wounds in his mercies, and you will find a great lightning and alacrity.

The ſecond, To have a ſpiritual Father, or a diſcrete, and faithful friend, to whom one may unburden his conſcience with all confidence and ſecurity. The cloud, how dark or ſurcharged ſoever it be, in that proportion it emptieth it ſelf, cleareth: and the heart, unburdening its calamities in the ear of another, becometh more bright and luſtrous.

Thirdly, Some ſpiritual Fathers adviſe a diſcipline, to ſuppreſs interiour ſadneſs by exteriour ſorrow: but this remedy is not for all ſorts of men. Saint Hierom is a better Phyſician, who ordained for certain melancholy men, rather to uſe the fomentations of Hippocrates, then to afflict their bodies, and diſtil their brains in other practices. You muſt take very good heed you make not your ſelf a Timon, and hate men and life, entertaining your ſelf in hypochondriack humors, which throw a mind into the gulf of diſturbance. God willeth us to take moderate pleaſure in creatures, which he hath made for our content and eaſe, that we may enjoy them in time and place, every one according to his condition profeſſion, and rule of wiſdom. Syneſius ſaith, the Creator hath given the feeling of pleaſure to ſenſe to ſerve as an arreſt to the ſoul, and to hold it in good quarter with the body. Saint Thomas among the remedies of ſadneſs preſcribes ſleep, and bathing. The Scripture it ſelf counſelleth us to give wine and other fitting draughts for them to drink, who have their hearts oppreſſed with bitterneſs. If one think to make a great ſacrifice to God, reſting perpetually, ſtretched and involved in a penſive auſterity of ſpirit, as being deſirous to avoid all pleaſures of life, he deceiveth himſelf. It hath happened, that many running in their own opinion to Paradiſe by this path, according to peculiar fancy, have found themſelves on the borders of Hell.

Hier. ad Ruſticum. Hippocratis magis fomentis, quàm noſtris monitis indiget. Remedies of Hippocrates. Not to play the Timon.

φόβη ψυχῆς ἡδονή. Pleaſure laies hold of the ſoul. Somnus & balnea dolorem mitigant. S. Thom. 2. q. 38. Date ſiceram merentibus, & vinum iis, qui amaro ſunt animo. Prov. 13. 2.

Our life is a Muſick-book. Fourthly, To remember our life is a Muſick-book, ſeldom ſhall you find there many white Notes together in the ſame line; black are mixed among them, and all together make an excellent harmony. God gives us a Leſſon in a little book, which hath but two pages, the one is called Conſolation, the other Deſolation. It is fit for each of them to take its turn. In the day of Adverſity, think of proſperity: in the day of Proſperity, remember your ſelf of Adverſity. That great Prelate of Cyrenum ſaid, That the Divine Providence hath mingled our life, as one would do wine and water in a cup; ſome drink the pureſt, ſome the moſt compound, but all taſte a commixion.

Syneſ. in Hymne.

Fifthly, If you exactly compare our condition to that of an infinite number of miſerable creatures, who groan in ſo many tedious and diſaſtrous torments, you will finde your ſardle but a dew. But we have a certain malignity of ſpirit, which ever looks back on the good it hath not, to envy it, and never conſiders the evil, from whence it is freed, to render thanks to God. Behold ſome are in the bottom of a dungeon in fetters, others are bowed in painful labours from the riſing to the ſetting Sun, to get their bread. Some have the Megrim in their head, the Gout in their feet and hands, the Stone in their kidneys. Others are overwhelmed with buſineſs, loſs, misfortunes, ſtrange and portentous accidents, yet carry it out with courage. Your heart is nipped with a little ſadneſs, and behold you deſpair, what effeminacy of ſpirit is this? It is ſaid, Hares, ſeeing themſelves purſued on every ſide, had one day reſolved to drown themſelves, but coming to the brink of a river, and beholding frighted Frogs, who caſt themſelves at all adventure in the water to eſcape: Courage (ſaid they) we are not yet the moſt miſerable creatures of the world, behold thoſe, who are more fearful then we. Ah! how often ſhould we ſay the ſame, if we ſaw the miſeries of others.

Sixthly, Is it not a goodly thing to behold a man, who probably ſpeaking is in the favour of God, who is here nouriſhed with Sacraments, with Chriſt's body and blood, with the word of his Maſter; who liveth among ſo many helps and comforts, ſpiritual and temporal, who expecteth a reſurrection, a Paradiſe, a life eternally happy, and happily eternal, in ſo beautiful a ſociety of Saints, to frame penſiveneſs and ſcruples to himſelf of his own head, to afflict himſelf like a Pagan, or a damned ſoul, that hath no further hope? It is related, that God one day, to give an antipaſt of beatitude to an holy man turmoiled with ſundry cogitations, cauſed an unknown little bird to chant in his ear in ſo melodious a manner, that inſtantly his troubled ſpirit became clean and pure, and held him wrapt many years in the moſt taſtful delicacies may be imagined. O! if you often had ſtrong imaginations of Paradiſe, how your melancholy would melt, and diſſolve, as ſnow before the Sun-beams.

Unworthineſs of Sadneſs.

Laſtly, Sing ſpiritual Canticles, labour, employ your ſpirit without anxiety, and if needs you will weep, lament your imperfections, bewail the miſeries of the poor, ſorrow for your curioſity, lament the paſſion of your ſpouſe, grieve & ſigh at your impatience after this glory of Paradiſe, weep over the deluge on the earth, look back like a chaſt Dove on the Ark of your good father Noah, the father of repoſe and conſolation: then will I ſay of ſuch tears with S. Ambroſe; O the delicious tears, O the pleaſing complaints, which extinguiſh the fervours of our mind, and make our affections ſweetly to evaporate!

Noble tears. Dulces lacryma ſunt, ipſi fletus jucundi, quibus reſtringitur ardor animi, & quaſi relaxatus evaporat affectus.

The two and twentieth SECTION.

The third Combat of the Spiritual man againſt Impurity.

ALl impurity of life ariſeth from three ſources, (whereof S. John ſpeak) concupiſcence of the fleſh, concupiſcence of the eyes, and pride of life. Let us now ſee the practice of virtues, which oppoſe theſe three ſorts of impurities. Againſt concupiſcence science of the Flesh, Temperance, Chastity, Modesty do wage War: against the concupiscence of, Eyes, to wit, the unbridled desires of temporal Blessings; Povertie, Justice, Charity, Mercie, Gratitude: against pride of Life, Humility, Obedience, Magnanimity, Patience, Clemencie.

1 Joan. 2. Three ſources of impurity.

The three and twentieth SECTION.

Practice of Chastitie.

CHastity is a virtue, which represseth the impure lust of the flesh, a Celestial virtue, an Angelical virtue, which maketh Heaven and Angels descend upon the earth, and in this Kingdom of mortality planteth the image and titles of immortality. Clemens Alexandrinus maketh mention of certain Enchanted Mountains, at the foot whereof was heard a voice as of People preparing themselves for Battel; a little further, the Encounter and Conflict; and on the top, Songs and Triumphs. Behold (as it were) the condition of three sorts of Chastity. With some it beginneth with Labour, and Uncertainty; there is at the first Toil and resistance against Lust, but the even thereof is not known. With others it is become more manly, as being already practiced in Combats. With others it Triumpheth after a long habit, yet notwithstanding, whilest here on earth it abideth, it is never absolutely secured.

Clemens Alex. Stromat.

Three sorts of Chastity.

Acts.

The acts thereof are,

I. To renounce all unlawful Voluptuousnes of the flesh.

II. To abstain from Carnal acts, not onely those, which are unlawful, but sometime such as are permitted among married folk upon just occasion, or for some certain time, which is very ordinary; or perpetually, which is singular and remarkable in the lives of some Saints. So Martianus lived with his Wife Pulcheria, and Henry the Emperour with the Empereſs Chunegundis.

III. To repress all the desires and concupiscences of flesh, and if one have any feeling thereof, not to give consent thereunto.

IV. Never to stay at all upon thoughts and imaginations of things dishonest; but so soon as they present themselves, to chase them away, and extinguish them in your heart, no otherwise then you should quench a burning hot Iron in a Fountain.

V. To mortifie your Senses, which are most commonly the fore-runners of sin, and above all to restrain your Eyes, which, according to the opinion of S. Isidore, are as Dishes, wherein Luxury serveth up the Viands of Voluptuousnes. They are the Windows, the Allurements, the Snares, the Conduits of Love: it buddeth in the eyes, that it may at leasure blossome in the heart. And therefore it is fit to stand upon your guard with so subtile and vigorous a sence, which often filleth the soul with appetites, and flames. I do not say, that one should look upon nothing, and alwaies live as if the soul were buried alive in the flesh; but I affirm, you must divert your sight from objects, which dart a Sting into a mind sensible of such penetrations. As for the Ears, there is no doubt they may serve as handles for love, & that it hath taken many that way. An evil word hath fingers to incite the flesh. He who heareth it, and he that willingly speaketh it, is not innocent before God. Smelling blasteth Chastity, and Tast roughly assaulteth; but Kisses and unchast Touches cut her Throat.

Eyes.

Oculi patella luxuria. Isidor. apud S. Bern. tom. 1. serm. De luxuria. Salvian. lib. 3. De gubernat. Prov. 23. 33. Oculi tui videbunt extranea, & cor tuum loquetur perversa.

VI. To flie Idleness, reading of Love-books, Comedies, Stage-plays, immodest Pictures, Feasts, private Familiarities, loose Company, and all occasions of sin.

VII. To have in detestation even the shadows of Impurity. To speak, to proclaim in every place the praises of Chastity, and for this purpose to love Penance, Mortification of the Body, Labour, rough and harsh Apparel, Modesty, even to the seeming somewhat way-ward, the Sacrament of the Eucharist, the Meditation of the four last things, Devotion toward the most Blessed Virgin, and all that may conduce to the maintainance of honesty.

VIII. To remain firm in great and forcible Temptations is verily the Trophy of Chastity. Since (as Plato hath said) the triumph of Virtue is to have the power, not the will to sin. It was a notable act of Continencie in Charls the Eighth, ardently to love a Maiden endowed with an exquisite Beauty, to have her at his dispose, and yet to abstain for one sole word, which this poor creature spake to him, brought even into his chamber: for she, by chance perceiving the Picture of our Lady, cast her self at the King's feet, shewed him this Image, crying out with a face all bathed in Tears; Sir, I beseech you for this Virgin's sake preserve the honour of a silly maid. At this word spoken for a young King enkindled with Love, and absolute in power, to conquer the motions of Lust, is it not a matter, that meriteth much applause?

Chastity of Charls the Eighth. Lipsius in Monita Politic. lib. 2. cap. 17. exemplo 12. addit datos puellæ 500. aureos.

IX. To contemn great rewards, and high advancements of fortune, for the preservation of Chastity: as did that noble Lady, of whom John Moschus speaketh, who, seeing her Husband consume in perpetual Prison for Debt, not able any way to relieve him, was reduced to terms of extreme and miserable want, and besides pursued by a man of prime note, with all sorts of allurements, offers, and accommodations, which might shake and stagger an afflicted heart, and enforce her to condescend to a sin, which seemed to have necessity for a Patroness; she notwithstanding stood firm like a Rock, preferring Chastity poor and patient, before a rich and delicate dishonour. I could also nominate creatures as Pure, as Strong, adorned with most excellent natural parts, more Chaste, more Wise, more Fortunate then Lucrece, who with as much industry as courage, have refused powerful and passionate men, that sought them with such excessive benefits, as would have overwhelmed any inferiour Chastity. But they, not to commit one onely sin, covered under the Curtain of the Night, have despised Treasures, to guard another Jewel in an earthen Vessel, who for this act deserve to be raised above the Stars.

Johannes Moschus in Prato. A courageous Ladie.

X. To withdraw the Chastity of others from this sink, with liberal Alms, great labour, infinite incommodities: as that worthy Hermit Abraham did, of whom Surius speaketh, who, loaden with years & merits, went into a Brothel-house in disguised habit, to reduce a Niece of his, that went astray: as at this day many honest Matrons, worthy of eternal memory, spare nothing to gain poor abused Doves out of the Faulcon's tallons, and dedicate them to Altars, where soon after they work wonders in matter of Virtue.

Abraham the Hermite.

XI. To suffer in your body great Torments, yea death it self for the defence of Chastity, as many holy Virgins have done. As that Youth, reputed the son of a King of Nicomedia, who, fast tied on a Bed of Flowers, and woed by a Courtizane with intention to corrupt him, spit out his Tongue like a Dart of Fire and Blood in the face of this she-Wolf. A Tongue, which in dumb eloquence speaketh to all posterity, and proclaimeth the honour of chastity.

Hieron. in vita Pauli: & Sabel. lib. 5. cap. 6. Lingua silet, clamátque silens, loquitúrque pudorem, Sanguine quæ pinxit sola pudicitiam.

XII. To expose your self to great sufferings for the preservation of others Chastity: as that brave Didymus, a young beardless Gentleman, who beholding ing a poor Christian maid, named Theodora, thrown into a brothel, caused her to escape by giving her the habit of a man, and himself remained for pledg in the attires of a woman, expecting the fury of Executioners, who gave him the crown of Martyrdom. Saint Ambrose makes him speak to the maid to this effect: "Sister, I am come hither, as an Adul-"terer, and, if it please you, I will go out a Mar-"tyr: let us change habits, I pray you: we are, as "I perceive, both of one stature: my apparel very "well fitteth you, but yours will sit much better up-"on me, and both will agree in the service of Christ "Jesus. My attire shall make you a Virgin, and "yours me a Martyr. You shall be most fortunately "clothed, and I more happily despoyled. It was so done. Didymus was apprehended, and Theodora, understanding it, run back like a lioness amidst the swords to die with him.

A bold attempt of Didymus.

Ambr. lib. 2. De Virgin. Quasi adulter ingressus, si vis, Martyr egrediar. Vestimenta mutemus; conveniunt mihi tua, & mea tibi: sed utraque Christo. Tua vestis me verum militem facit, mea te virginem. Bene te vestieris, ego melius exuar.

The twenty fourth SECTION.

Practice of Temperance.

S. Thom. 2. 2. quæst. 141.

TEmperance, taken in general, is a Virtue, which represseth the Appetites of Concupiscence in things, that please the senses, especially of touch, and taste. The temperance of touching consisteth in chastity; that of tasting is properly abstinence, and sobriety. It is the first virtue, which God seems to have required of man from the world's infancy; the first tribute of Sanctity, and Innocency, which our first Parents could not leave without losing themselves, and all posterity. A virtue, which is the Horizon, that separateth vegetative man from the intellectual: a virtue, which raiseth us from the earth, and bringeth us near to heaven: a virtue, which makes a noble soul shine in a mortal body, as a torch of odoriferous wood in a Crystalline watch-tower. On the contrary, a body, surcharged with kitchin-repletion, holdeth the soul as one would a smoaking snuff of a candle in a greasie lantern.

Temperance, the first tribute of Sanctity.

The acts of this virtue are

Refection of body. S. Aug. Conf. l. 11. Hoc me docuisti, ut quemadmodum medicamenta, sic alimenta sumpturus accedam.

I. In refection, to have no other rule but necessity, no other aim but the glory of God, and entertainment of the body for the service of the soul. Saint Augustine, after his conversion, came to meals (as himself saith) as into an infirmary to take a medicine.

II. To take all the necessities of body, as the Egyptian dog doth the water of Nilus, running, thereby saving himself from superfluous excess. To take them, as the Soldiers of Gedeon drank at the fountain in the hollow palms of their hands, chearfully, not prostrating themselves on the ground; or as the Dove taketh grains of corn, pecking her meat up with her bill, and turning her eye to heaven.

III. To eat, and drink with all civility, decency, discretion; and seeing we must use this necessary trade of a beast, to do it at least like a man.

IV. To abstain from prohibited meats in times limited by the Church, exactly to observe Fasts devoutly ordained by the same authority, and practised by our Ancestors, not becoming nicely curious, nor repining at Lenten abstinencies. To prescribe also a law to your self of some Fasts of devotion upon certain days of the week, and especially Friday, as many noble Personages have done, and daily do. Galen, that great Physician, adviseth to make a fast from ten days to ten, in the manner of a Physical prescription, affirming it was an excellent Mean to defend one's self from great and dangerous Maladies.

Fast of Galen. Joann. Sarisb. l. 2. Polycr.

V. To be very sober in drinking, to take little wine, and mingle it well. Drunkenness (saith Saint Ambrose) is a superfluous creature in the world: it is the scorn of Nature; it is an old shoe soaked in water. A man is no longer a man, but a Bottle perpetually filled, and emptied: he lives like a Butt, which doth nothing but leak, and roul up and down; and when the head thereof is knocked out, you finde nothing there but lees, and dregs. Wine is a familiar, or spirit, which possesseth him, and is the milk of Venus, which nourisheth his concupiscence. All his life is an enterlude, and drunkenness his tomb. All men truly great are sober. It is utterly to degenerate from Nobility, to be addicted to this infamous Vice. You, who serve Kings, who are in their Royal seats as the Sun in the heavens, remember your selves, that heretofore in the Sacrifice of the Sun hony was offered, not wine.

S. Ambros. de Elia & Jejun. A Drunkard what.

Va qui potentes estis ad libendū I.

VI. To be very temperate in the quantity of viands: for it is a very great shame to make one's self, as it were, a living sepulchre of all sorts of butcheries, and build to your self a tomb of fat, with excess in eating, as did the wretched Dionysius, spoken of by Ælian, who had grooms of his chamber about his bed, ever ready, night and day, to prick him with needles, with distances between, lest his fat, conspiring with sleep, should suffocate him. On the other side, it is dangerous to destroy your stomach by scrupulous and extraordinary observations of your own inventing, which may put you into a course of providing pain for your self, and attendance for others.

Philostorus. lib. 12. Histor.

VII. Not to be so curious in the choice of delicate meats, but to take them indifferently, according to your quality, and profession. It may happen, that a Noble-man, feeding on a curious dish with sobriety, may observe temper, and another cracking his guts with beans fall into a nasty superfluity of gormandise. The virtue of Temperance is not so much in the matter, as the manner. It is written, that a great Roman Lord, being retired into the deserts of Egypt to attend contemplation, was one day visited by an Egyptian Monk, who had all his life-time been a gross Peasant bred among cows, and cattle, and had an iron stomach, which, in excessive quantity, devoured the most sordid and despicable meats. This man, much scandalized to see the Roman Monk feed on that, which seemed delicate to him, and to drink a little wine at his repast, for sook his Cell with small account of his host, and much presumption of his own temper, when the other, miraculously penetrating into his thoughts, reprehended him, and he at that time easily acknowledged himself very short of his perfection, whom he despised.

VIII. Not to have your mind employed on sauces, and kitchin-cookeries, as those lazy Sybarites, who made such account of a new kind of broth found out, that by an express law they permitted the author thereof to enjoy it alone one whole year, before the invention should be communicated to any other.

Shameful law of the Sybarites.

IX. Not to enlarge your thoughts upon viands with a greedines, and profusion of spirit, as if one would swallow the sea, and fishes therein, as Epicharmus writeth of a certain Gentle-man, who bowed his whole body in eating, crashed his teeth, made a noise with his chaps, blew his nose, rubbed his ears, made a certain sound in his throat, all his body went along with it. A true mediocrity of feeding is, to be neither too greedy, and gluttonous; nor too abstinent, or transported: but modest in your countenance, prompt to help, prudent to see what is done, and to prevent want in others. It would ill become a Noble-man so to abstract his spirits at the table

Strange greedines.

Notable distraction.

ble, as those good Religious men, of whom it is recorded in the history of the Anchorets of Egypt, that they took Capon for Cabbage: they were at Theophilus the Patriarch of Constantinople's table, and did eat like mad men, thinking they still had been in their Monastery. It happened the Bishop, carving to the eldest of them, gave him the wing of a Capon, & courteously said unto him; Father, eat hereof, doth not this Capon seem good meat to you? He coming, as it were, out of a trance: How, is this Capon then, Sir? I pray you pardon us: for we took it for Cabbage, else verily none of us had touched it.

X. Not to out-run the hours of repast through impatience: not to be so addicted to serve our curiosities, and delights, that thereby we leave not a good diner to do a good work. Is it not a shameful thing of one Huguccio, who lost two Towns (as Jovius relateth) for fear he should lose a good meal: so that it being at the same instant in his power to give order for a revolt, which was plotted, he rather chose to sit out his diner, and by this means forsook a fair opportunity?

Huguccio lost two Cities for a diner.

XI. To content one's self with a little upon occasion, as the young Theodosius, who thought he had made a good meal, when he had eaten certain sops of bread steeped in water, within the Cell of an Hermit: The wise Hebrews have a Proverb, which saith; Man is known by three things, by anger, by his purse, by his glass. It is a note of a well-mortified spirit, when complaints are never made of wants, that happen in service for the mouth.

Man known by three things.

XII. To speak willingly of sobriety, yea even in a feast, like the Persians; or from some other honest discourse, which may give refection to the soul, while the body taketh his: and beg perpetually of God to deliver us from the necessities of the body, and that he weaken in us these base concupiscences of the flesh, that we may preserve for him this his Tabernacle in all purity.

The five and twentieth SECTION.

Practise of Modesty.

Modesty is important.

MOdesty is a branch of temperance, a goodly and eminent virtue, which seemeth, as it were, to incorporate our soul, and make her visible in her actions, whose office is to guide the motions, gestures, words, mirth, habit, gate, and garb, and all that, which appertaineth to the exteriour ornament of the body.

Her Actions are

To speak, what.

I. To govern the Tongue, to speak truth in time and place, roundly and freely, without deceit, palliation, boasts, impostures, detractions.

II. Never to have a bitter and furious silence, prying into another's words, nor to use a tattle unmannerly, clamorous, and tiresome, catching the word out of another man's mouth, as little Chickens do, who snatch bits one from another: it was the comparison, which father Gontery of happy memory used.

III. Not to be magistral, with a counterfeited gravity, nor riotous, haughty, fierce, rude, no buffon, nor loud laugher: A fool (saith the Wiseman) crackleth in laughing, as thorns in the fire.

Tone of voice.

IV. Not to have your Tongue either of too high or low a tone, but moderate, distinct, in sweet, honest, ordinary, intelligible accents.

Countenance.

V. To have the composition of your countenance pleasing, gratious, modest, without crabbedness, or affectation: the carriage of your body native, comely, free from extraordinary gestures; not to have a giddy head, like a Linet, alwaies shaking, no wrinkled brow, nor crumpled nose, nor perplexed visage, nor eyes wandring, wanton, or proud.

Habit.

VI. The Apparel neither superfluous, fantastick, nor dissolute, without too much affecting new fashions; nor peremptorily, out of your own conceit, tying your self to the old: but to attend your own condition, and remain in the lists of the modesty, which is most practised by the wisest. Above all, let women beware they set not to sale to carnal eyes that nakedness of their breasts, which may serve for baits for sin. The Scripture saith, Whosoever shall cause sparkles of fire to fly into another man's corn, shall be accountable for all the dammage, which the flames shall make.

Means to acquire modesty.

VII. To acquire modesty, it is good to represent to your self often before your eyes our Saviour conversing upon earth, and to pray him, he will give us a soul pure, and radiant, like a star, which impresseth his rays upon the body, as the Sun on a cloud, in, and through all, to edifie our neigbour.

The six and twentieth SECTION.

Practise of Prudence and Carriage in Conversation.

Isidors. Uranoscope.

HAve you observed a fish in the natural history, which the Grecians call Uranoscopus, as one would say, The beholder of Heaven? This admirable creature, contrary to the nature of others, hath but one eye, which is, as it were, a vertical point, fixed directly in the top of his head, ever elevated, and perpetually open, to discover so many labyrinths of snares, and treacheries, as commonly are in the sea. Some will say, it is Tobias his fish, a notable creature, which not only contributeth his gall to illuminate the eys of the body, but his example to enlighten the eies of the mind. It is a true Hieroglyph of prudence, which telleth us, we should at this day converse in the world, as in a sea ful of monsters, tempests, rocks, perils, surprises; and that we must have the eye of prudence throughly awakened and purified, to preserve and maintain it among so many hazards. This prudence in a word (according to S. Bernard) is nothing else but the knowledge of good and evil, which sheweth how we should demean our selves, and the waies we should tread, in the course of our life, and affairs. It is one of the principal virtues, because all our actions depend on it. Yea, prudence holdeth them, as it were, insolded in the plaits of her Robe, and unsoldeth them according to place, time, persons, occasions; which to know, is to know all.

S. Bernard. Serm. De Vitiis.

Importance of Prudence.

It is said, a French King enquired one day of a man, who was held in great reputation of wisdom, after divers instructions to govern himself, & guide his Kingdom, this wise man took a fair large sheet of paper, and for an infinite number of Precepts, which others use to produce upon this subject, he only wrote this word, Modus, Measure or Mean; thereby inferring, that the whole mystery of our wisdom, and felicity, consisteth in doing things with grace, fashion, and measure, and that is it, which prudence teacheth. We speak not here in particular of the religious, œconomical, military, politick, monarchical, but in general of the direction of life in ordinary conversation: for that seemeth annexed to the virtue of modesty. Imagine to your self, that prudence, as antiquity hath presented it unto us in their Hieroglyphicks, is an hand enchased with eys, which hath five remarkable fingers, wherein all discrete actions are contained. These five fingers are memory, understanding, circumspection, fore-sight, execution; which is to say, that for the practise of this virtue

All wisdom reduced to one word.

Prudence an hand sprinkled with eyes.

Five fingers of Prudence.

I. A good memory is neceſſary, to remember things paſſed, as well what one hath read in books, as thoſe which are obſerved by proper experience; for that much conduceth to inform the judgment. And beſides, he that in all actions hath not memory, when there is occaſion to manage ſome affair, oftentimes findeth he hath not well called to mind all particulars; which putteth him into confuſion. Behold, why (as all men have not ſervants for memory, as had the Kings, the great men of Perſia, and Romans) it is neceſſary to have recourſe to regiſters, records, and table-books, to help your ſelf. Some are of ſo happy memory, that they go (as it is ſaid) to gather Mulberries without a Hook, to the Well without a Pitcher, into the Rain without a Cloak.

Underſtanding. II. To be intelligent and able to judge well: and for this purpoſe, he muſt endeavour to know the men, with whom he converſeth; their nature, humour, their capacity, intention, and proceeding, to penetrate affairs even to the marrow: not contenting himſelf with the outward bark, and ſuperficies. To conſider them in all ſenſes, all ſemblances. To put a tax upon things according to their worth, not to run into innovations, and cunning inventions, which diſguiſe objects. To take counſel of the moſt underſtanding, faithful, and diſ-intereſſed men, to condeſcend to good counſels by docility of ſpirit after they are well examined, ever to reſt upon that, which hath moſt honeſty, integrity, ſecurity.

Docibility.

Choice.

4 Rocks of prudence. III. In every deliberation which one makes upon any occaſion, to preſerve one's ſelf from four very dangerous Rocks, which are Paſſion, Precipitation, Self-conceit, and Vanity. Paſſion colloureth all buſineſſes with the tincture it hath taken. Precipitation goeth head-long downward into ruine. Self-conceit, not willing to forgo ſome hold, gnaweth, and conſumeth it ſelf. Vanity maketh all evaporate in ſmoak.

Circumſpection. IV. To have a great circumſpection, and conſideration, not to expoſe your ſelf but to good purpoſe. To do like that Sea-crevis, which hideth himſelf till he hath a ſhell over his head, and ſtriketh no man. To ſpy occaſions out, and mark how the little hedg-hog doth, into what quarter the wind changeth, to alter the entrance into his houſe. To ſtand alwaies upon your guard, to diſcover the ambuſhes, and obſtacles, which occur in affairs. To hold the trowel to build with one hand, and the ſword in the other to defend your ſelf. Well to obſerve theſe four Precepts; To have your face open, but your thoughts covered from ſo many wiles, which perplex our affairs: to be ſober in ſpeech: not lightly nor eaſily to confide in all men; nor, on the other ſide, to ſhew too much diffidence

Pagulus Junius.

Fore-ſight and vigilance. V. To be very vigilant in affairs, to fore-ſee what may happen in occaſions, and prompt to finde out means, which may forward the execution of a good deſign. You finde yet to this day in ſome old Medals for a Hieroglyphick of Prudence a Mulberry-tree having a Crane upon his branches, and on the ſtock thereof a Janus with two heads: to teach us, that one proceedeth in matter of prudence; firſt, by not precipitating, no more then the Mulberry, the wiſeſt of all trees, which is the laſt, that bloſſometh, to enjoy them with the more ſecurity, and thereby to avoid the pinching nips of froſt: in watching as the Crane doth, who abideth in an orderly centinel: in caſting the eye upon what is paſt, and fore-ſeeing the future, as this antient King of Italy, to whom for this cauſe is given a double face.

Hieroglyphick of Prudence.

Execution VI. To uſe dexterity, promptitude, and conſtancy in the execution of things well reſolved on; that is, the type and crown of Prudence. Many brave reſolutions are ſeen without fruit, or effect, which are like eggs full of wind: all is but a ſhadow and a meer illuſion of prudence. Seaſonable time muſt be taken; for, as Mithridates, one of the greateſt Captains of the world, ſaith, Occaſion is the mother of all affairs: and, time being well taken, you muſt execute warily, effectually, conſtantly. Ferdinand Duke of Bavare ſeems to have made a recapitulation of the principle actions of this virtue upon a piece of Coin, where was to be ſeen Prudence, like a wiſe Virgin, ſeated on the back of a Dolphin, and holding in her hand a balance, with this Motto in three words; Know, Chooſe, Execute quickly. The Virgin, bearing the enſigns of wiſdom, ſaid, you muſt know: the Balance, that you muſt ponder and elect with mature deliberation: the Dolphin with his agility, that you muſt ſet a ſeal upon your buſineſſes by a prompt execution.

Occaſio omnium gerendarum rerum mater.

A notable Medal.

Cognoſce, elige, matura.

VII. In the concluſion of the whole, the beſt wiſdom is to diſtruſt your own judgment, and to expect all from heaven, often asking of God not a wiſdom humane, crafty, and impious, which is condemned; but the wiſdom of Saints, which inveſteth us with the poſſeſſion of a true felicity. The thoughts of mortal men are fearful, and their providence uncertain. My God, who is able to know thy meaning, if thy ſelf give him not wiſdom? Behold the virtues, which guide the ſenſes, and converſation of man, againſt the diſorders of fleſh and blood, the chief plagues of nature. Let us now ſurvey thoſe, which oppoſe the ſecond impurity, to wit, Covetouſneſs.

True prudence.

Cogitationes mortalium timidæ, & incerta providentia noſtra. ſenſum autem tuum quis ſciet, niſi dederis ſapientiam? Sap. 9. 14. 17.

Of the Virtues, which oppoſe the ſecond Impurity, called Covetouſneſs; to wit, Poverty, Juſtice, Charity.

The ſeven and twentieth SECTION.

Poverty of rich men.

Three ſorts of poverty. THere are three ſorts of poverty; poverty of neceſſity, poverty by profeſſion, poverty of affection. Poverty of neceſſity is that of the wretched, a conſtrained, needy, and diſaſtrous poverty. Poverty by profeſſion is that of Religious, profeſſed by their firſt vow, which is meritorious, and glorious. Poverty of affection is an expropriation from the inordinate love of terrene goods.

We ſpeak not here to you (O Noble men) of the poverty of Rogues, which is infamous, nor of that of the Religious, which to you would be inſupportable, and to your condition unſuitable: but of the poverty of Affection, the practice whereof is neceſſary for you, if you deſire to be Citizens of Heaven. The practiſe is,

Practice of the poverty of affection. I. To acknowledge all the goods, and poſſeſſions you have, are borrowed, which you muſt infallibly reſtore, but when, you know not. You live here like birds, who are alwaies hanging in the air, where either fortune deſpoileth, or death moweth the Meadow, and then it never groweth again. It is a great ſtupidity of ſpirit, a great unthankfulneſs to God, if you account that to be yours, which you may daily loſe, and which in the end you ſhall forgo for ever. think not you have any thing yours, but your ſelf. If you love riches, put them in a place aſſured for eternity.

Auguſt. ep. ad Armentar. & Paulinam. Divitiæ ſi diliguntur, ibi ſervantur, ubi perire non poſſunt. 1. Tim. 6. 17.

II. If you be not poor, live in riches like the poor. Oftentimes place your ſelf, in thought, even in that ſtate you were born in from your mother's womb, or in that ſtate you muſt return unto in the earth. You then will have no cauſe to become proud of your riches, when you ſhall ſee your ſelf encom-

Non ſublime ſapere, & nec ſperare in incerto divitiarum passed with false feathers, fastened together with wax, which with the first rays of the other life will scatter, and fly away.

III. Never suffer gold and silver to predominate over you like a King, but hold them under obedience like a slave. All these things come from the earth, and are made for the use of an earthly body: what esteem can a soul make of them, unless she become terrestrial? If you regard necessity, you have but very little need of them; if your own sensual appetites, you shall never satisfie them. Leave concupiscence, and serve necessity.

IV. Live in such a manner, that, if you did know it to be purely and simply the will of God, you should from this day be despoil'd of all your wealth, and nothing left you but so much as would suffice to entertain life; you notwithstanding would shew this change to be acceptable to you, saying with holy Job; God hath given it to me, God hath taken it from me: his name be praised. Theodoret makes mention of a very rich man, a Persian by nation, and a Christian by profession, called Sames, from whom the King of Persia took all his plentiful possessions, depriving him of gold, silver, garments, stock, revenues, and retinue; and, not contenting himself with that, gave his wife and house to a servant of this holy man, further enforcing him to serve as a slave to this varlet, most ungrateful and barbarous to his good Master. Behold herein whither humane miseries may arrive. Notwithstanding Sames, a rock of constancy, was never a whit shaken, having this Maxim well imprinted in his heart; that For Accessories we must never lose the Principal.

Martyr of Poverty. Sames.

V. Govern your house in all frugality, and modesty: make the expenses, which you know to be necessary and agreeable to your estate, not as a possessor, but as a steward, and know you shall be accountable of the poor's portion before God. Apprehend not so much the future time, either for your self, or children, nor afflict your self for present or passed loss. Likewise when you have good success in your affairs, pass over it as a wary Bee over honey, not clamming your wings; according to the notable sentence of S. Augustine in his Epistle to Romanian. Living in this manner, although you have Crœsus his wealth, you shall live happily poor. It is said, that a great Pope with all the riches which he had, and daily distributed for supply of needy mankind, was thought to be poorer (and, as I may say, more expropriated) then a silly Hermit, who had nothing in his Cell but a Cat, he now being become a Master over his own affections.

Divitem te sentiant pauperes.

August. ad Roman. Ep. 113. Non frustrà in mellis copia pennas habet apicula, nescit enim habere rem.

The eight and twentieth SECTION.

Practice of Justice.

Necessity of Justice

THat, which the air is in the elementary world, the sun in the celestial, the soul in the intelligible, justice is the same in the civil. It is the air, which all afflicted desire to breathe; the sun, which dispelleth all clouds; the soul, which giveth life to all things. The unhappiness is, it is more found on the paper of Writers, then in the manners of the living. To be just is to be all that, which an honest man may be, since justice is to give every one what appertaineth to him.

Its Actions are

First Justice.

I. To subject within us the body to the soul, and the soul to God. For the first actions of injustice are to place Passions upon Altars, Reason in fetters, and not to search for the Kingdom of Heaven, but in the sway of our own private interests.

II. Concerning him, who sits in place of Magistracy, to have an ardent zeal for the maintenance of Laws, to bend all his endeavours, to apply all the forces of his mind and courage to authorize Justice, to strengthen his arm against the torrent of iniquities, and to put all his peculiar interests under the discharge of his imployments. He must have a great spirit to carry himself in that manner, and especially in a world of corruptions. A good and perfect Justicer, like unto Job, is a Phœnix. Ages as scarcely produce him: and when he dieth he contristates the whole world. Where shall you finde him, who can attribute to himself this rare commendation couched in the books of this worthy man? I am cloathed with justice as with a garment: I am adorned with righteousness as with a diadem. I have been an eye to the blind, a foot to the lame, a father of the poor, I brake the jaw-bones of the unjust man, and took the prey out of his teeth.

Justitiâ indutus sum, & vestivi me sicut vestimento, & diademate, judicio meo. Oculus fui cæco, & pes claudo. Pater eram pauperum, conterebam molas iniqui, & de dentibus illius auferebã prædam. Job. 29. 14, 15, 16, 17.

III. Not to know the favour either of parents, friends, flesh, or blood, when there is occasion of doing an act of justice; as Canutus King of Denmark did, who, after he had examined the process of twelve thieves, and condemned them, found one, who said, he was extracted of royal blood: It is reason (saith the King) some grace should be done to him, wherefore give him the highest Gibet. So the famous Zaleucus, to satisfie the law, pulled out one of his own eyes, and the other of his son. So Andronicus Comnenus caused publickly to set one of his Favourites on the Pillory, and commanded all those, who wrought mischief under the hope of his favour, either to leave injustice, or life. So the Emperour Justine suffered one of his greatest Minions to be apprehended at his own table, by the Provost, and thence dragged to execution.

Helmodi Chronicon. Admirable Justice without favour.

IV. To abhor those, who betray justice either for money, revenge, love, or any other passion as monsters of nature, murderers of mankind, to hold them anathematized with the great excommunication of nature. Not to admire their fortune, nor in any sort to participate in their riches, to become a companion in their crimes, holding this undoubted, that the fire of God's judgment will devour their Tabernacles, who practice these corruptions. In the form of an oath exhibited under the Emperour Justinian the Magistrates sware to maintain Religion, and justice, according to their power; and, in case of corruption, they wished upon themselves by way of execration the trembling of Cain, the leprosie of Gehezi, the lot of Judas, and all that which may astonish man.

Peremptorium est in principe vel auram adeo rare munerum, vel favorem quærere personarum. Cassiod. Ignis devorabit tabernacula eorum, qui munera accipiunt. Job 15. 34. Oath of Magistrates under Justinian.

V. To have ears alwaies open, and bowels of compassion, ready to hear the complaints of Widows, Orphans, Afflicted, and forlone people, who endure all the torments of the world to break through the press to manifest their miseries. The Emperour Trajan hath done many brave and eminent acts, but none of his atchievements were so resplendent, as the justice he readily afforded to a virtuous Widow. Her son had been slain, and she, not being able to obtain justice, had the courage to accost the Emperour in the midst of the City of Rome, amongst an infinite number of people, and flourishing Legions, which followed him to the wars he was then going to take in Valachia. At her request, Trajan, notwithstanding he was much pressed with the affairs of a most urgent war, alighted from his horse, heard her, comforted her, and did her justice. This afterward was represented on Trajan's pillar, as one of his greatest wonders. And it is said, he was highly commended and admired by S. Gregory the Great.

Notable act of Trajan.

VI. To

VI. To do good, and to execute Justice with expedition, not stretching the leather with the teeth, as said the good King Lewis the Twelfth, taxing the delays, references, and neglects of Judges. The Chronicle of Alexandria relateth an admirable passage of Theodorick King of the Romans, to whom a widow named Juvenalis made her complaint, that a suit of her's in Court was drawn at length for the space of three years, which might have been dispatched in few days. The King demanded, who were her Judges, she named them; they were sent unto, and commanded to give all the speedy expedition, that was possible, to this woman's cause: which they did, and in two days determined it to her good liking. Which done, Theodorick called them again: they, supposing it had been to applaud their excellent Justice now done, hastened thither full of joy. Being come, the King asked of them: How cometh it to pass, you have performed that in two days, which had not been done in three years? They answered: The recommendation of your Majesty made us finish it. How? replieth the King, When I put you into Office, did I not consign all Pleas, and Proceedings to you, and particularly those of widows? You deserve death, so to have spun out a business in length three years space, which required but two days dispatch. And at that instant commanded their heads to be cut off. The good Juvenalis was so strucken with admiration for such an act, that she came to the King to render thanks, and to offer candles to him as to an holy Saint. And would to God Theodorick had still persevered in such integrity.

Strange Act of Theodorick. Chron. Alexandrinũ.

VII. Not to be contented with conscience alone, but to have science also, well to examine matters, and to observe the forms of right: not to cause any body to be punished, or tormented by precipitation without sufficient proofs. It is a lamentable thing, when through a desperate haste an innocent is bereaved of that in a moment, which never can be again restored, although he should live an hundred years. But it is to be wickedly unjust, when that is also confirmed by malice, and cruelty, which was begun by mistaking: as happened to Piso, who rashly condemned a poor Soldier to death, wrongfully suspected of the murder of his living companion. As the innocent man had now his neck under the sword of his executioner, this Camerado of his, supposed to be slain by him, appeared living, and in health. The Centurion, who attended the execution, brought them both back again with much concourse of people, to present them to Piso. This furious Judg, enragedly ashamed of the first Sentence, which he over-hastily had given, commanded they should both be put to death, and that also the Centurion should be added to them: one, because he was already condemned, although guiltless; another, because he was thought to be dead; and the third, because he would preserve in the Judg wisdom, and innocency. This Barbarian shortly after paid for this fault, joyned with many others, by a marvellous turn of Fortune, and a most shameful death.

Mad cruelty of Piso. Senec. lib 1. De Ira, cap. 10.

VIII. To be more inclining always to mercy, then severity; yet notwithstanding well to take heed, lest this mercy degenerate into a softness very prejudicial to the maintainance of Justice. Also to visit prisons, to see what is fit to be done, and not suffer prisoners to consume in a tedious, and irksom misery without true cause of delay.

IX. To extend the hand, that honest men may maintained, protected, recompensed for services done to the Common-wealth; and Malefactours punished, and used according to their demerits: since reward and punishment (as Democritus said) are the two Divinities of Weals-publick, and the two Poles, on which the affairs of the world do move.

X. As for the Justice of particular men, it is to obey Laws and Magistrates, keep peace and concord among their neigbours, to wrong no man in his honour, body, goods, allies, reputation, nor any thing that appertaineth to another, either by word, deed, or by sign.

Justice of Particulars.

XI. To be true in words, loyal in promises, faithful in proceedings, to handle the affairs, which one manageth roundly, and freely, without dissimulation, deceit, treachery, to avoid usury, and all unjust gain, to pay debts, not to withold servants or hirelings wages, to be ready to satisfie those, whom one hath offended, often to beg of God, that in the day of his great Assizes we may appear in the robe of Justice, to expect with all confidence the benign breath of his mercies.

The twenty ninth SECTION.

Practice of Gratitude.

ONE of the noblest acts of Justice is the acknowledgment of a benefit. A Virtue very rare in this Age, where (as well Sir Thomas More said) Good turns are written in sand, and injuries, and revenges on marble. Saint Ambrose assureth us, it was not without mysterie young Toby took a Dog for the companion of his voyage: God would, he should learn acknowledgment of benefits in the nature of this creature, the hieroglyphick of gratitude.

Beneficia pulveri, si quid mali patimur marmori insculpimus. A singular Saying of Sir Thomas More. Amb. l. 6. Hexaē. c. 4. Tobie's Dog.

The acts of acknowledgment are,

I. Not to deny, dissemble, nor ever to forget a benefit, but to acknowledge it, retain it, praise, extol it, as the antient Hebrews did, who set marks on their arms, and ensigns at their gates, for the remembrance, and acknowledgment of a benefit received. It is a great shame to be ashamed to owe a benefit, and to avoid the sight of a benefactor, as if his presence upbraided either our ingratitude, or disability.

Gratitude of Hebrews. Joseph. Antiq. l. 4.

II. To be thankful, not only in the presence of the benefactour by some little vain ostentation of acknowledgment, but to publish it to others in time, and place, and to retain it as it were engraven in a respective memorie.

III. To recompense him according to power, not only in proportion, but superabundantly, which that it may be the better effected, to consider what is given to us, from whom, when, and how. A benefit is ever best accepted from a friendly, frank, and free hand, and many times from whom it is least expected, in a pressing necessitie. A benefit from an harsh man, given as it were frowardly, is a stony loaf of bread, which necessity enforceth us to take, not free-will. It is no gift, when that is given, which can no longer be withheld; as Emmanuel the Emperour, who, seeing his full coffers in the hands of the Persians, said to his Soldiers: Go take them, I give them to you. It is a negligent and remiss giving, when the extreme want of a poor man is expected: as the fountain of Narni, which never distilled its streams, but on the eve of a famin. A small courtesie seasonably done deserveth much, and that was the cause why King Agrippa made a poor servitour, named Thaumastus, the second person of his kingdom; for that he had given him a glass of fair water in his great necessity, when under Tiberius he was tied to a tree before the Palace of the Emperour, and endured a most ardent thirst.

Sordid Liberality of Emmanuel Comnenus.

Leander in Umbria.

Joseph. l. 18. Antiq. Thaumastus the second man in a Kingdom, for having given a glass of water.

IV. As it is not good to suffer a benefit to wax old, old, ſo it is not always expedient to recompenſe it ſo readily, as if we bear our obligation with impatience, and that we had an opinion this benefit came to us from a hand beſmeared with birdlime, with intention to graſp another. The beſt way is to let your obſervances creep into credit, in time, and place, with ſo much the more precaution, as they ought to have the leſs of oſtentation.

The thirtieth SECTION.

Practice of Charity.

Eminentiſſimum charismatum. S. Iren. l. 4. cap. 63. S. Maximus Oeconom. cent. 1. 38. 4 Reg 2. 9. Plenitudo legis, Charitas. Aug. tract. in epiſt. Joan. Dorotheus, 5. Bibliothec. PP. Doct. 6.

SAint Ireneus (as we have ſaid) calleth Charity a moſt excellent preſent from heaven, the top and Zenith of all virtues, gifts, and favours of God. Saint Maximus ſaith, it is the gate of the Sanctuary, which leadeth us aright to the viſion of the holy Trinitie. It is the double ſpirit, which Elizeus required, wherewith to love God, and our Neighbour. Behold the whole law! behold all perfection! You are not much to afflict your ſelf (ſaith S. Auguſtine) to become perfect. Love God, and then do what you will: for, if you deſire to know whether your love towards God be real, and not counterfeit, mark how you love your neighbour. By how much the lines draw nearer one to another, ſo much the more they approach to the center: by how much the nearer you approach to your neigbour in love, by ſo much the nearer you are to God.

The Actions of this Royal Virtue are

Acts of Charity.

I. To have an affectionate delight in God: for that he is God, all-wiſe, all-good, all-powerful, all-amiable, all-juſt, all-merciful; the original fountain of all wiſdom, goodneſs, power, beauty, juſtice, mercy. Moſt heartily to rejoyce, that he ſitteth in the throne of glory, as in an abyſs of ſplendor, adored without intermiſſion by all the celeſtial powers, by all the Saints, by all the exalted Spirits. To deſire, that all the creatures in the world might adore, and ſerve him, that all underſtandings were repleniſhed with the knowledg of him, all memories with his benefits, all wills with his love. Such was the affection of that good Frier Giles, companion to St. Francis, who was much moved in beholding the beauties of God, and afterwards wept bitterly, as he ſaid, love was not beloved enough.

Amor non amatur.

II. To be ſenſibly ſorrowful for the impieties, hereſies, infidelities, errors, ſins, diſſolutions, which have covered the face of the earth. To reſent the injuries done to God, as one would the rebukes of a good father, of a loving brother, or of ſome perſon moſt tenderly affectionate, as the apple of your eye.

Marvelous Zeal of a Lady.

It is an admirable thing to ſee in Scripture a poor Princeſs, daughter in-law of Heli, falling in travail upon the news brought her of the taking of the Ark of Covenant, and death of her husband, and neighbours; for her neither to think of father, brother, husband, no nor the pains of her child-bearing, nor to complain of any thing, but of the ſurpriſal of the Ark, and to have dying theſe words on her lips: Farewel the glory of Iſrael, ſince the Ark of God is taken away; what zeal is this in a woman? And now adays, one cannot loſe a grey-hound, a curtal jade, a bird, but all the houſe is filled with noiſe, and out-cries; whilſt for injuries done to God the hearts of men are very inſenſible.

Tranſlata eſt gloria de Iſraël, quia capta eſt Arca Dei. 1 Reg. 4 21.

III. To love all mortal men as creatures made to the image of God, but, above all, the Faithful, in the quality of perſons deſtined to the ſovereign beatitude: to wiſh them true bleſſings, as Juſtification, Grace, Virtues, ſpiritual Progreſſion, Glory. Moreover, to deſire they may be fortunate in riches, honour, credit, good ſucceſs in their affairs, if ſuch comforts may conduce to procure them beatitude.

IV. Never to deſpiſe, never to judge raſhly, never to interpret other mens actions in an ill ſenſe; but to compaſſionate their infirmities, bear their burdens, excuſe their weakneſſes, make up, and conſolidate the breaches of charity happened by their fault, to hate imperfections, and ever to love men, yea even your enemies: therein the touch-ſtone of true charity is known. The means to preſerve one from his enemies, is to pardon enemies, ſaid S. Auguſtine. One of the goodlieſt ſpectacles, able to attract Angels to the gates of heaven to behold it, is neither Theatres, Amphitheatres, Pyramids, nor Obelisks; but a man, who knoweth how to do well, and hear ill, and to vindicate himſelf from ill by doing well.

Diſce diligere inimicos cum, ſi vis cavere inimicum. Aug. in Pſal. 99.

Cardinal Petrus Damianus relateth, how he, being a Student at Faenza, one told him of an Act of Charity happened (as I believe) in his time, at the ſame place, of which he made more account, then of all the wonders of the world. It was a man, whoſe eyes another moſt traiterouſly had pulled out, and this accident had confined him in a Monaſtery, where he lived a pure, and unſpotted life, yielding all offices of charity according to the ability of his perſon. It fell out, this cruel creature, who had done this miſchievous act, ſickened of a languiſhing malady, and found himſelf enforced to be carried to that ſame place, where he was, whom he had bereaved of ſight. His heart ſaid within him, he would never endure him; but for revenge would put out his eyes. On the contrary, the blind man made earneſt ſuit to do this act of charity to him with all the moſt fervent endeavour, as if he had ſought ſome great fortune from the hand of a Prince. Behold he prevailed, he is deputed to the ſervice of the ſick man, and he dedicated to him all the functions of his body, except the eyes, which the other had pulled out. Notwithſtanding (ſaith the Cardinal) he wanted not eyes, having thoſe of ſupreme Charity, and Patience. You would ſay this good blind man was all eyes, all arms, all hands, all heart, to attend this ſick man; ſo much conſideration, vigour, diligence, and affection he uſed. And what ſhould they here ſay, who upon the leaſt affronts burn with a revengeful ſpirit?

An excellent Paſſage of Charity.

V. Not to have a lazy and languiſhing charity, which is only in idea: but to be diligent, cordial, ſtrict, not for particular ends, but the taintleſs Maxims of Virtue. It was a great folly in thoſe Philoſophers, called the Contemplators, who placed perfection in ſitting with arms a-croſs, without doing any act to aſsiſt in the ſociety of men. Witneſs the prime Prince among them, named Pyrrho, who beheld the ſtars, whilſt his companion Axaquus, falling into a ditch, cried out for help. They both were found, the one in this miſery deſpairing, and the other contemplating. It was ſaid to the Maſter: What do you here, my friend? Why endeavour you not to draw your companion out of this ditch? No other anſwer would he make: Let me alone. I meditate, how to become an honeſt man. And behold him a lazy truant, without any further ſearch in giving aid to this miſerable man. In the whole hiſtory of Pliny the beſt word is this: It is a Divinity for one man to do good to another, and behold the moſt aſſured way of eternal glory.

Laert. l. 6.

Stupidity of Pyrrho. Sinet meditor, ut bonus ſim. Plin. l. 2. Deus eſt mortali juvare mortalem, & hac ad æternam gloriam via.

VI. For this purpoſe you ought to know not only at your finger-ends, but to have both in heart, and hand, the works of mercy, ſpiritual, and corporal. You muſt diſpoſe your ſelf with eſpecial endeavour to alms-deeds. There is the ſchole of rich men, it is their leſſon, their Philoſophy, their heavenly Alchimy, their juſtification, their ſalvation, their glory. The practice of alms is not now to be required. It is easily found. There are as many ways of mercy, as there are miseries in mankind, which are every day exposed to our eyes: a thousandfold happy are they, who seriously bend themselves to comfort such, every one to the proportion of his power. How many brave, and noble spirits are industrious in that kind? Some (as the Emperour Titus) thought they had lost a day, wherein they had obliged no man. Others daily fed some poor creature, in whom they acknowledged the Person of Jesus Christ. Others went up and down into publick streets, to finde out the necessities of men, to relieve, and consolate them. Others humbled themselves continually to the services of the sick, and indigent. Others taught this practice to their little children, almost from the Nurse's breast; as soon as they began to stutter out words, they were made Orators for the poor. Others distributed their revenue in equal portions to Churches, needy persons, and for their own maintainance. Others gave the first-fruits of all their increase of profits. Others founded, and instituted a thousand excellent works of piety. Behold good life herein, fair hope, and generous charity. And is it not to be the scorn, and scandal of mankind to amass riches for worms, for moths, for children many times wicked, drunken, loose Libertines, who will play, and desport upon their Parents tombs? It were a notable Inscription, if one should put these words upon your Monument, which Valerius gave to one called Gillias:

Alms.

practice

Ista verò injustitia magna, ut ego at Dominus, & habeat, ande luxurietur filius tuus. August. De disciplina Christiana. Val. l. 4. c. 8.

QUOD GILLIAS POSSIDEBAT O, MNIUM QUASI COMMUNE PATRIMONIUM ERAT. HIC IPSIUS LIBERALITATIS PRÆCORDIA HABUIT, ET DOMUS EJUS QUASI QUÆDAM MUNIFICENTIÆ OFFICINA. What Gillias had, was the possession of all Mankind. This man had his heart, and intrails composed even of Charity it self: his House was a Shop of Bounty.

Of Virtues, that oppose the third Impurity, which is Pride of Life.

The thirty first SECTION.

The Practice of Humility, and Magnanimity.

TO say, that Noble-men, and Persons of quality have no need of the virtue of Humility, is to say that sick men have no need of health. Humility is the element and orb of Virtues. It is the gate of Christianity (saith S. Cyprian) and we ought not to think that man will be loyal to faith, who is unfaithful to the virtue of Jesus Christ, to wit, humility. It's necessary for all men, but especially Great ones, who are more roughly assaulted by the storms of pride: and if this virtue be a contempt of its own excellency, where shall you finde out this excellency to finde out the contempt thereof? Shall it be in mean, and inferiour spirits? They naturally are in their own way of baseness, but not therefore in the path of humility. The most exact humility is that, which hath more of honour, and less of the sense of honour, saith S. Bernard. The Stars are beheld in the bottom of a pit: and profound humility maketh the most radiant splendours appear in greatness. The sun dispelleth the grossest vapours, and draweth the thinnest, and subtile to himself: how much the more you lessen your self, so much the nearer you shall approach to the Sun of true glory. If you desire to practise this celestial virtue, behold the actions.

Primus Religionis intuitus. Cyprian. De Nativitate Christi. Humility of Great men. Magna virtus est humilitas honorata.

Acts. Pride of Nobility reprehensible.

I. Do not intoxicate your brain with a mad vanity of noble race, which causeth many to dig out, and disentomb their Grand-sires, as it were, from the ashes of old Troy: and, as Ausonius saith, in so carefully searching out uncertain parents, they many times give occasion to think they have none certain. Nobility is not to be blamed, since it is the happiness of good extraction; but to be vauntingly puffed up on this occasion, is a meer folly. He, that should revolve, and rifle the whole mass of mankind (saith Plato) should find there is no King, which cometh not from servitors; nor servitor, who cometh not from Kings.

Names of land.

II. Not to affect, nor seek after humane praises, flattery, complacence, ticklings of reputation, which inebriate all shallow brains. Nor through affectation to display a large list of titles and qualities. The time hath been, when men named lands; at this day lands denominate men. So many abject villages, boroughs, hamlets, brave it in paper, and set our memories on the rack to name one man, who should rather be named, and renowned for virtues, which are the inheritance of men. Our Ancestors, who raised their titles upon noble actions, were men of heaven; but now, when we so passionately seek to acquire names of the earth, we well thereby declare we are men of the earth.

Modesty in its exaltation.

III. When one is arrived by virtue to some fortune, and condition eminent, not at an instant to turn his brain, as with a voluntary drunkenness, and forget not only his poor parents, but himself also, affecting wry-mouths, crabbed looks, disdains, ill countenances, and much exteriour seeming, to blot out the memory of his extraction. The good Primislaus, being come from the fortune of a Peasant to the Soveraignty of Bohemia, caused his country-cassock, and high shoes to be kept in the Church, and yearly represented to him, to renew the memory of his blood, and thereby cherish his own humility. Pope Benedict the Eleventh, the son of a silly Peasant, his mother being brought unto him in a rich and sumptuous habit, with intention much to please him, turned his eyes away, and said, he could not acknowledg this woman for his mother. But she afterwards returning to him in her rustick attire, he acknowledged her, and yielded all the duties of a good son. Their hearts were deep in humility, and not of these petty spirits, who are ashamed of their beginning, and resemble those beasts, which think they are well hidden, if their heads be covered, shewing the rest of their bodies.

Humility of Primislaus, and Pope Benedict the 11.

IV. Neither to make your self Fierabras, nor the Knight of the burning sword, in matter of valour. Those, who most brave it in words, are found very short in performance. The world is full of Redomonts, who only are transported with arrogant and sudden furies, as Rabsaces in the Scripture; but few are found truly valourous. When Homer maketh his brave Captains march, he gives them silence for guide. Contrariwise, he maketh cowards to babble, and chatter like cranes. The one pass along like great rivers, letting their streams glide softly with silent majesty: the other do nothing else but murmur like little brooks. A sign of not being valiant at all is to strive to seem valiant.

Redomont.

Vanity of Beauty.

V. To boast the beauty of body is to have a great defect in the judgment, which is the beauty of the soul. It is verily a desperate vanity, when a Lady, under the colour, that some scribling Rimer hath given her the locks of Aurora, the eys of Venus, the port of Juno, the feet of Thetis, makes her self the Queen of Antioch, and glorifies her self many times with a beauty meerly imaginary. Queen Stratonica, wife of Seleucus, had not one hair upon her head, yet notwithstanding gave six hundred crowns to a Poet, who had celebrated her in his verse, and sung, that her hair had the tincture of the Marigold. I know not how this soothing flatterer meant meant it, but this Queen became very proud, which made her so much the more ridiculous. Although this Beauty were true, it is but white and Vermilion skin distended over a Carcase, which covereth many ordures: it is a Dung-hill blanched with Snow, an Idol of Fools, a Flower of the Field, which hath (as it were) for horizon the instant of its Birth. We may well give it the Epitaph of the Rose:

Ridiculous Pride of Queen Stratonica.

Mirabar celerem fugitivâ ætate ruinam, Et. dum nascuntur, consenuisse rosas.

Here lies the Rose in one day come
From the first Blossom to a Tomb.

VI. A much more notorious folly it also is to boast and brave it in Apparel, which are Plaisters of the scars of Sin, to wit, Nakedness; borrowed Feathers from all kinde of Birds, unpunished Thefts, witnesses of our Poverty, which causeth us to beg the assistance of all creatures to cover our shame. What an indignity is it to be desirous to brave it above one's State, Quality, or Port, and to arrive at this height, oft-times to bear the fat and marrow of the Poor in the plaits of Garments? Nay these many rapines are not sufficient to entertain this enraged Prodigality. Debts must grow, which cannot be discharged; Silk must be dragged at your heels, and a Sergeant ready behind you; to shew Gold, and hide Misery and Sin; to adorn a Body, as if it were a Temple of Egypt, with all possible splendour, and to lodg within it the soul of a Rat. What infamy is it to behold in a Banquet a Roman Lady, called Lollia Paulina, carry about her in Chains, Carcanets, and Pretious Stones, a Million of Gold; and her Father, who had despoiled all the Roman Provinces to cloath this onely Daughter, drink afterward Poyson, overwhelmed in the despair of his own affairs? Is not the Chamlet-Coat of the greatest of all our Kings S. Lewis, of power to confound all Courtiers of both sexes, who, having nothing worthy of praise in them, would dignifie themselves with Apparel, shewing they have like Peacocks a little Head, little Brain, beautifull Feathers, and a long Tail?

Habits.

Plin. lib. 9. cap. 35. Paulina bare about her a million of Gold.

VII. Not to be proud for Riches: for they are a River, which now this day pass along by your Lodging, and are no more yours, then the River of Seyne. Not to look with a surly face in great Fortunes, and Dignities, for it is a Vizard in a Comedie, which must presently be pulled off. Not to value your self highly for an happy memory; for it is, as it were, the Belly of the Soul, many times filled with much windiness: nor for wit; for it is often but thin, like the Spider's Web, fit to catch Flies, and nothing else: nor for the judgment, for much to confide therein is a dangerous Leprosie in the heart of man.

Superemi-nence of person.

Modesty.

VIII. To measure your self by your own rule, to know your own Ability, not overmuch to presume of your own Forces, not to undertake a great burthen, and shrink under the Weight of it. To speak little of your self, and of all that, which is your own, not to over-prize, nor deject your self, to do good without speaking of it, to obey the commandments of Superiours faithfully, readily, couragiously, to moderate desires, to love mediocrity in all things, to have a sweet, affable, and respective conversation.

Magnanimity.

IX. If you be truly humble, you will necessarily have the acts of Magnanimity, which are to undertake great things for the honour of God: for there is not any thing so potent as the humble man, who expecteth all his power from Heaven. To contemn the promises and menaces of Great-men, when they request or command you to do any injustice.

Arist. lib. 3. Ethic.

X. To drive from you with courage any Obstacles, which present themselves to divert you from a good work: to make little accompt of all the states and dignities of the world: to enter into it, stay in it, go out of it, ever with the same countenance. To take honour as a Tribute, which you are to put into the Coffers of God. To abide continually both in Adversity and Prosperity within your self. To recompense a benefit liberally, never to detract, to praise sparingly, beg seldom, admire nothing lightly, nor complain of any man. To hold rank among Great-men without Vanity, and to humble your self to inferiours through Charity. Not to undertake many things, but perform brave things. To hate flattery as a Plague, hypocrisie as a Poyson, complacence as a Mockery. To do and speak freely, what is reasonable. Not to remember injuries. To aim rather at true honour, then profit.

The thirty second SECTION.

Practice of Patience.

Praise of Patience.

BEhold that, which setteth a Seal upon all Virtues, Patience, ever the first in the List, and last in the Triumph. It is the crowned Pome-granate, which hangeth among the Bels in the lowest Bordure of the High-Priest's Robe of the old Law. It was a goodly thing to carry all the world on his Habit, all was imperfect without the Crown of Patience; she it is, which hath the Bell, to teach us, that all Virtues are very excellent, but it belongeth not to them to proclame Victory without patience and perseverance. Other Virtues are as those antient Painters, who subscribed at the foot of their Table, He painted, he made: but Patience may affix, I have made, I have perfected, since it giveth full accomplishment. It is the Schole of Christianity. So learned are we (saith S. Ambrose) as we have patience: so much do we participate with God, as we can suffer by his example. He hath taken a body to be able to suffer, and to make himself altogether the mirrour of sufferers, and the reward of those, who have patiently endured. If we suffer not to imitate him, our Soul is no longer ours: for it is the word of the Son of God, that we possess not this Soul but by the means of patience. If we leave it, we lose all. For the practice of this Virtue, I require not, you should be a Saint Macarius, who for having killed a Gnat, which stung him, went (as if he had committed a great act of impatience) for the space of six moneths, exposing his naked body to all the Flies, Gnats, and Wasps of the Wilderness, to be revenged on himself. This patience is not for your purpose, learn one more easie.

A notable Observation upon the habit of the High-Priest.

Ambr. super Proverb. Tantò quisque minus ostenditur doctus, quantò minùs ostenditur patiens.

Vita P. Patience of S. Macarius.

Patience of Great-men what.

I. That you a little bear with your self. All follie hath this property with it, that it is perpetually in disturbances, ever wearie of the present, and with open mouth gaping for the future. It leapeth like Quick-silver, it boundeth and skippeth from thought to thought, from purpose to purpose, from place to place, as the Stag from the Hillock to the Mountain, from the Mountain to the Hillock. And all that proceedeth from impatience of heart.

Acts.

First patience to endure one's self.

Take for the first act of patience, to reclame your self within your self, not to be still upon change, to rest with firm footing in the conditions, professions, employments, recreations, in which through duty you are engaged.

To spare men, and endure men.

II. To spare men (as saith the Emperour Antoninus) and suffer men. You would have men speak, laugh, go, and spit, even after your fashion, that is the way to please you. Superiours molest you, Equals trouble you, Inferiours can do nothing to content your Appetite: the noise of a Door, the winde of a Window, a Glass broken, a mess of Broth over-salted, a Fly in the kitchin negligently driven away by a Servant makes you enraged. You have more

more disturbances, then the winding Euripus hath waves. This proceedeth from the great weakness of your understanding, effeminacy of flesh, tenderness of education, custom of curiosity, sickness, and giddiness of spirit. If you do not seasonably prevent the mischief, and daily accustom your self to tolerate some inconvenience with sweetness, and patience; you will become a Monster in conversation, insupportable to all, and in conclusion, troublesom to your self. What an indignity is it, that a man full of rebellions against God, should desire, that men and beasts serve him according to all his humours? Some slight fellow will be so observed in punctо: and a thousand and a thousand Kings have endured a million of indiscretions of their servants with patience. Is is not said, that Philip the Second King of Spain, having written a Letter with his own hand, with much study and labour, to be sent to the Pope; when he asked for Sand to cast upon it, his Secretary half asleep, poured the Ink in the Standish upon it? This would have put you into a fury; and yet behold a man of this eminency! bare it without speaking one angry word to his servant.

Calumnies

III. From hence you shall learn to suffer calumnies and slanderous words, not raising a storm in your mind, about the interpretation of a doubtful word: not to frame differences about the leg of a flie. Not to be amazed at forged imputations, which trench even upon the Diadems of Kings, and Mitres of Popes. The Buckler wherewith you must resist them, is, Contempt, and Innocency. It is said, the Basilisk desirous to infect a Looking-glass, killeth himself by repercussion of vapours which proceed from his own body: and the Calumniator doth the like, when he meeteth with a pure unspotted life. It is a smooth glass, which slayeth him with his proper arms. Speak only these royal words of David, a King, and Prophet: My God, if thou suffer this persecution against me; at the least, I beg the sacrifice of my Patience may ascend to thy Altar in the odour of sweetness. S. Ambrose, as I have demonstrated before, hath observed, that this great man was so disposed to patience, that being persecuted by his son Absalom, and at the same time furiously pursued with the foul slanders of Shimei, he took the clamorous tongue of this Detractour to make it, as it were, an Antidote of it, and apply it to the sorrow he received from the parricide of an unnatural son.

Patience of David. Si Dominus initat adversum me, odoretur sacrificium meum. 1 Reg. 26. 19

Verborum contumelia parricidii levavit aerumnam.

Malady.

IV. Patiently to endure a malady. It is an hard matter in vehement pains, but that some out-cries and exclamations escape Nature. I know not what heart that Gentleman had, of whom the Table of Constancy speaketh; who played on a Lute when his leg was cut off with biting Saws, and burning Cauteries, without breathing forth one silly sigh. That is not exacted of you, but that you use some moderation; and above all, to have a soul resigned, principally in dolours, and small maladies, which give you leisure enough to re-enter into your self.

Heroick acts of patience.

V. Finally, To swim in a strong stream, you must fortifie your self against all humane accidents, as are the hurly-burlies of Fortune, (which in a moment thrust a man down to the bottom of the wheel) banishments, imprisonments, shipwracks, loss of goods, infamous accusations even of Innocency it self: crimes, calamities, death of friends, near kindred, fathers, mothers, brothers, children, and all that which hath sadness, and horrour in Nature. Our, alas! what lightnings, thunders, tempests on all sides? What traps, what snares? O man (miserable creature) drenched in the water of thy tears, which are more familiar to thee, then the sea and rivers to fishes; where wilt thou save thy self, if thou put not thy self under the shelter of patience? All is replenished with miseries, and to be desirous of exemption is a petty apostacy in Nature. Tribulation is the King's high-way, beaten, and tracked with the sacred steps of thy Master, and with a countless number of Saints, who all of them have made their afflictions the degrees of their glory. Behold thy Jesus, he is the brazen Serpent, planted in the wilderness of this world, which healeth all the bitings of our impatience. Behold Patience, it is the Salt of the Prophet Elizæus, which purifieth the polluted waters, and sweeteneth all the bitterness of life.

Patience the Sanctuary of Mortals.

The thirty third SECTION.

Practice of daily Actions.

ALl our Virtues are included in our Actions, and our Actions in the hours, the hours in the day, and the day in the month, the month in the year, and the year in the Ages. Every day is a brief table of our life, and the means to make one's self perfect quickly, is to perform all our daily actions with mature consideration and perfection. Behold a portraict, the lineaments whereof I have taken from a man endowed with great wisdom, religion, and integrity, whom I would willingly name, did I not fear to offend his humility, able to endure any thing but his own praises.

Every day a table of life.

Means of perfection.

I. It is a long time, since the Sun for your benefit hath dispersed the shadows of the night, that you may rejoyce at the sight of the great spectacle of the works of God; and yet your Curtains are still shut to entertain you in the dusky image of death. Get out of your bed, and think this goodly Star, which maketh you begin the career of this day, will this day run more then ten or twelve millions of leagues. And you, how many steps (I pray) will you set forward to draw near to Virtue? This indefatigable Harbinger is gone forth to score you out the lodging of a Tomb; so many minutes are so many points deducted of your life. Will not you follow the counsel of the Son of God, and do well whilst it is day? A great night will speedily involve you under its wings, wherein you shall no more have further means to travel.

Motive to pass the day well.

II. Take every day as a day in harvest: take it as a day of a Fair, or mart; take it as a day wherein you are to labour in the mines of gold; take it as a Ring, which you must engrave, adorn and embellish with your actions, to be in the evening offered up at the Altar of God.

Day pretious

III. Represent unto your self a notable consideration of S. Bernard, that your actions pass, as not passing: for every good work you do, is a grain of seed for life eternal. Say as did Xenxes, that Painter so renowned, Æternitati pingo, I paint for eternity.

To paint for eternity.

IV. Follow the counsel of S. Thomas; Do every action in the virtue of Jesus Christ, desiring to have all the good intentions and affections of the Church, Militant and Triumphant. Do it, as if thereon depended the praise of God, the good of the whole world, all your happiness; and as if it were to set a Seal on all your Works.

Counsel of S. Thomas.

S. Thom. De moribus divinis.

V. Begin from the evening the purpose of good works, which you are to perform the next day, what points you ought to meditate on, what vice you should resist, what virtue exercise, what affairs you are to handle, to make all appear in its proper time, with a well-matured providence. It is the thread of Ariadne, which guideth our actions in the great labyrinth of time; otherwise, all runneth to confusion.

To provide on the evening for the day to come.

Diligence in the Morning.

VI. Have so much curiosity in you, as sometime to know of what colour the day-break of morning is, outstrip the steps of light, according to the counsel of the Wise-man, to praise God. Take good heed, lest you imitate that hog Epicurus, who boasted, he had waxed old without ever beholding the Sun rising or setting. It is a good custom to rise in the morning, but very difficult to perswade women so, and all the Antipodes of nature, who change day into night, and night into day. That famous Apollonius, held in his time for an Oracle of the world, coming very early in the morning to Vespasian's gate, and finding him awake, conjectured thereupon that he was worthy to command an Empire, and said to one, who accompanied him: Undoubtely, this man will be Emperour, seeing he is so early a stirrer.

Ἀνὴρ ἄξιος. Three Parts of the Day.

VII. All that, which you are to dispose the day unto, is divided into three Parts, Devotion, Business, Recreation. Devotion must carry the torch, and open the door to all our actions.

Awaking.

VIII. Make account at your first awaking to give all the first fruits of your faculties, senses, and functions to the divine Majesty. Let the Memory presently put it self in mind, that it ought to do the work of God. Let the Understanding cast a consideration upon its Creator, like a flash of lightening. Let the Will be enkindled with his love. Let the Heart shoot forth some fiery shafts, some desires, and some affections wholly celestial. Let the Mouth and Tongue endeavour to pronounce some vocal prayer to the most holy Trinity. Let the Hands figure on the forehead and breast the Sign of the Cross, since they are lifted up to heaven. Let the Arms and Feet shake off the sluggishness of sleep, as S. Peter did the chains at the voice of the Angel. Behold a good beginning, how to offer one's self to God. The hair was pulled from the Victim, and put into the fire, before it was sacrificed; so must you draw away at your awaking those slighter actions, to give beginning to your Sacrifice.

IX. This Action should serve as a Preparative to another more long and serious devotion, which you are to make in your closet, when first you come out of your bed. If you have so gorgeous garments to put on, that necessarily you must bestow some notable time to dress you, it is a miserable servitude. Observe you not it should be done to render your tribute to God? Then cloath your self indifferently, as much as shall be necessary for comelineſs, and health. Afterward with bowed knees use five things, Adoration, Thanksgiving, Oblation, Contrition, and Petition.

Exercise of the Morning.

Five things to be practised.

Adoration in adoring God, prostrated on the earth, resounding like a little string of the world's great Harp, and offering to the Creator this whole universe, as a Votive-table hanged upon his Altar, wholly resigning your self to his will. For this act it is very expedient to use the Hymn of the three Children in the fornace, who called all creatures, as by a check-roul, to the praises of God.

Thanksgiving for all benefits in general, and particularly for that you have happily passed over this night. The Church furnisheth us with an excellent form of Thanksgiving in the Hymn Te Deum laudamus.

Oblation of your faculties, senses, functions, thoughts, words, works, and of all that you are, remembering the sentence of S. John Chrysostom, That The worst avarice is to defraud God of the oblation of your self. Offer to God the Father your Memory, to repleniſh it with profitable and good things, as a vessel of election; to the Son your Understanding, to enlighten it with eternal verities; to the Holy Ghost your Will, to heat it with his holy ardours: consign your body to the Blessed Virgin, to preserve it under the seal of purity.

Contrition, in general for all sins, and particularly for some vices, and imperfections, which most surcharge you, with a firm purpose to make war against them, and extirpate them with God's assistance.

Petition, not to offend God mortally, nor to fail with grace, light, and courage, to resist those sins, to which you are most inclined. To practise those virtues, which are most necessary for you. To be guided and governed this very day by the providence of God in all that may concern the weal of your soul, body, and things external. To participate in all the good works, which shall be done in the Christian world. To obtain new graces, and succours for the necessities of your neighbours, whom you then may represent, and this by the intercession of Saints, wherewith your prayer should be seasoned. It is then to very good purpose to spend some quarter of an hour at the least in reading some spiritual book, imagining it as a letter sent from God to you for direction of your actions.

Spiritual Lesson.

Cloathing.

X. When you put on your apparel, to acknowledg your great servitude, so to serve with much industry the most abject and brutish part of man. To think, you garnish a body, which even this very day may be a putrified rottenness. What time, and diligence had Jezabel used in the last day of her life to adorn and deck a body, that was trampled under the feet of horses, and gnawn by dogs some few hours after?

Mass must be heard at a due hour, in the manner before related: and that is a most especial act of devotion.

Mass.

Affairs.

XI. The second employment of the day is in the affairs, which one manageth, whether it be for the publick, or for your own particular, in the government of your family, or discharge of some Office. A good business is a good devotion; and nothing is so much to be feared as idleness, which is a very Ant-heap of sins. He, who taketh pains (said the antient Fathers of the desert) is tempted but by one Devil; he, that is idle, by them all. There is no person so noble, or eminent, that ought not to finde out some employment. If iron had the reason of understanding, it would tell you, it better loved to be used by much exercise, then to rust and consume in the corner of an house.

XII. In the practise of charges, offices, affairs, to use knowledg, conscience, dexterity, diligence. Knowledg, in learning that, which is profitable to be known for the discharge of duty, informing one's self of that, which cannot be guessed at, in hearing counsel, examining and weighing it with mature deliberation. Conscience, in administering all things with integrity according to laws, both divine and humane. Dexterity, in doing all things discretely, peaceably, with more fruit then noise. In such manner, that one shew not anxiety in affairs; but like that Prince, of whom in antient time one said, That in the most busie occupation he seemed ever to have the greatest vacation. Diligence, observing occasions well, and performing every thing in time, and place.

He, that hath never so little spirit, and good disposition, shall always finde wherein to employ himself, principally in the works of mercy, both spiritual, and temporal, amongst so many objects of our neighbour's miseries

Recreation.

XIII. Time of repast, recreations, sports, and visits should be very regular, for fear nature be not dis-dissolved in a lazy and bestial life, greatly unworthy of a noble heart. Away with gluttony, play, detraction, curiosity, scoffing, babling. Let the conversation be as a file to smooth and cleanse the spirit, and ever to adapt it to its proper functions.

Elevation of heart to God.

XIIII. One should not in affairs, recreations, retirements, omit at some times to elevate his heart to God by jaculatory prayers. Happy are they, who in every hour of the day do make unperceivably some little retrait in their hearts, casting their eys like a lightning-flash upon the hour past, and foreseeing the direction of the next. Above all, after diner it is fit to reenter into one's self, and to see the good order, which hath been given for the execution of the morning's good purposes.

Evening.

XV. In the evening before you go to bed, you are to use examen of conscience, Litanies, and other vocal Prayers, with the preparation of the meditation of the next day, happily to shut up the day with acts of Contrition, Faith, Hope, Charity, Prayers for the living and dead. Thereupon settle your self to sleep with some good thought, to the end, according to the Prophet, your night may be lightned with the beauties of God. If any interruption of sleep happen, mark it out with jaculatory prayers and elevations of heart, as antiently the Just did, who for this cause were called The crickets of the night. This doing, you shall lead a life repleniſhed with honour, repose, satisfaction towards your self, and shall each day advance one step forward to eternity.

The Marks, which amongst others may give you a good hope of your Predestination, are principally twelve. 1. A lively, simple, and firm Faith. 2. Purity of heart, which ordinarily is free from grievous sins. 3. Tribulation. 4. Clemency, and Mercy. 5. Poverty of spirit disengaged from earth. 6. Humility. 7. Charity towards your neighbour. 8. Frequentation of the Sacraments of Confession and Communion. 9. Love to the word of God. 10. Resignation of spirit to the Will of your Sovereign Master. 11. Some remarkable Act of virtue exercised by you upon occasion offered. 12. Devotion to our Blessed Lady: in honour of whom, you shall do well to observe daily three things. First, to present unto her an oblation every hour of the day of the Angelical salutation, when, at the striking of the clock, you recal your heart to your self. Secondly, to exercise some mortification of mind or body, by some motive of the imitation of her virtues. Thirdly, to give alms to her honor, either spiritual, or temporal.

This have I enlarged in a little Manual, called THE CHRISTIAN DIURNAL.

Instructions for the Married.

The thirty fourth SECTION.

Of the Misery of ill-governed Marriages, and to whom we may impute it.

Nyss. lib. de hom. c. 18. Damasc. lib. 2. De fide orthod. cap. 30.

THE great evils in ill-managed marriages, made S. Gregory Nyssen, and S. John Damascen say, wedlock had not been invented, but to serve as a Remedy for the wound of Concupiscence; and that, if the first Authors of mankind had remained in original Justice, the world would have been multiplyed in a manner wholly Angelical, rather then by the ordinary ways of marriage. Notwithstanding S. Augustine, and S. Thomas, who diligently looked into it, assure us, marriage was treated in the state of Innocency by natural ways, since Eve was created before sin, and given to man to serve as a companion for him in the world's propagation. But, if the Divine Providence would have pleased to have made choice of other means for this increase, he had created millions of men in the beginning of the world like unto Angels, and not one man alone, nor one sole woman, who were set in the front of all Nations, of purpose to produce them with that progress of time and succession, we therein observe. I pronounce, marriage had been without the ardours and disturbances of concupiscence, the pains of child-bearing, disloyalty, riots, and discontents: but rather entertained with a tender love of the man towards the woman, and a perfect obedience of the wife towards the husband, with a sweet education of children, free from poverty, loss, and all sorts of troubles. Christian Religion endeavoureth to recal wedlock to the purity of the first institution, whilst good liking accordeth with the commandments of God, and the immutable Laws of eternal Justice.

There is a most remarkable thing written of the Peach-tree, that, in Persia, which was the first and only place heretofore of its own growth, it was venemous and mortal; but, being carried and transported into other countreys, as Egypt, Greece, Italy, France, it wholly changed nature, and losing with the country its malignity, bare, and to this day beareth fruits relished with much tastefulness. The like is marriage, a strange plant, if you leave it in its Province, that is to say, within the limits of Nature, extremely passionate, and irregular; beware of poyson, and death: but, if you transplant it into the Evangelical Law, and manure it with order, continency, and that restriction, which the Law of God dictateth to you, you shall derive delectation and profit from it, for the solace and ornament of humane life. Nay we must affirm, the exorbitancies, which now reign in the world, and which draw so many miseries along with them, make married people very often feel most harsh conditions, and so render marriage a soyl as natural for cares, as it is barren for roses and violets.

Marriage now adays throughout the greatest part of the world is a posie of thorns, we know not where to lay hold of it: on what side soever it be touched, it pricketh the fingers. Marriage is the ivy of Jonah, exteriourly verdant with some apparance of chearfulness and delight; but the worm of grief and anxiety gnaws the root within. Marriage is the plant, which the Indians call the thorny bodkin: it is all over sprinkled with stars, and the rays of these stars are nothing else but prickles. Maidens take heed, one may think to gather a star, who shall finde a sharp thorn.

Marriage is the balm of Arabia, whereunto little Vipers hasten to make their nests: such an one sees the leaf, and sents the good odour, who perceives not the little Serpents of a thousand disturbances, which lie hidden there under.

Marriage is the Island of dreams, of which the Antients speak, where a thousand griefs are presented, covered at first with the veil of pleasure; you would swear, they were little Cupids, who say, Come to me young man, come to me: Come hither fair maid, come hither. They are entertained, they are courted, in an instant, they take off the mantle, and appear, as they are, with ugly countenances, and horrid shapes. Marriage is a stormy sea, where nothing is to be seen, but ruins, tempests, and shipwracks; one cries mercy, and another, help, save, if it be possible, and there are very few, who arrive at the haven without infinite hazard.

Nescis, quia Ismaël ad, qui recum ludit.

Marriage is a long pilgrimage, which findes but three hosteries: the first is called false Pleasure, the second Repentance, the third Calamity; and, if you go any farther, you shall meet with Despair.

The first difficulty there encountered is, that of a Free-man you become a Bond-slave, and the sweet liberty, which Nature impressed on the heart of all living creatures, is the first Trophey you must hang up over the Bridal bed: The wife (saith the Apostle) hath no power over her own body; that jurisdiction is reserved to the husband: nor can the husband reciprocally dispose of his own body; for it is in the power of the wife.

Mulier sui corporis potestatem non habet, sed vir: similiter vir sui corporis potestatem non habet, sed mulier. 1 Cor. 7. 4.

Nay, did she know into whose hands she consigned this pretious Treasure, it would be some comfort to say thus much at the least, If I be a Slave, I will choose a good Master. But thou silly Maid, who hast been so tenderly bred, and hatched up under the Wings of thy Parents as a chaste Dove, art put into the hands of an Husband, as into the tallons of a Faulcon. When he wooed thee as a Suitor, he made shew of much mildness, he was a Lamb, nay rather a Wolf in a Sheep-skin. No sooner was Marriage consummate, but the Mask was taken off, he shewed what he was, a Gamester, a man Cholerick, Base, Barbarous, and Tyrannical, that held this wretched Dove in his bloody claws, making her hourely vapour out her life through the sighs of her sorrows. Young man, who as yet art not fettered in the bands of Marriage, thou makest love to a Maid with infinite services, and for that purpose thou learnest to dance the Cinque-apace, thou cloathest thy self in Silk, and cuttest thy Beard in fashion, thou dost crisp and comb thee, thou dost curl thy Hair, and knowest not thou seekest for a Master. Thou thinkest thou hast found a Pretious stone, but thou meetest with a counterfeit: thou thinkest she is a Lamb, but she proves a Wolf, yea a Serpent, which beareth fire and flames: thou must take her at adventure, and such as she is must keep her. Oxen and Asses are tryed before they be bought (saith Saint Hierom) but Wives are taken without notice of their humour and deportment.

Nulla uxoris electio, sed qualiscunque veneris habenda. Hieron. contra Jovin.

Nay, which is worse, this poor Maid with huge sums purchaseth her slavery. Fathers and Mothers have sweat hard for the space of twenty or thirty years to amass a Portion: behold they have attired, decked, and adorned her like a Temple, and she is led out with the sound of Violins, as to the Galley, and many times thrown into the arms of an Husband, who wasteth all. And the Young man, to become a Slave, makes a thousand journeys, offereth a thousand supplications, a thousand thanksgivings, and as many salutations. Ah poor creatures! if you be weary of your liberty, are there no Prisons, Caverns, nor Chains more pleasing?

Galley-slaves, who toil at the Oar, hope after five years, after ten years, or some term prescribed them, to be discharged from bondage. The ill-Married are enforced to expect death for freedom from their Fetters; and there is not any Deity, to which they offer more Vows and Candles, then to Death, which is notwithstanding the terrible of terribles.

I give you leave to think, when two contrary humours meet, as Fire and Water, an holy man with a spiteful and an immodest Wife, or a noble Spouse with a wicked Husband, what an affliction it is. Saint Augustine relates, that certain Thieves, cruel and bloody, to torture Captives, resolved on an execrable Barbarism, which was, to joyn and straightly tie a live body with a dead, and so let the poor Patient expire amongst Ordures, and insupportable Stenches. It is the very like, when an Holy and Pious Wife meets with an Husband Impious, Wicked, and Unnatural: she, alive by Grace and Virtue, is joyned to a rotten Carrion, which intolerably tormenteth her: and, if she in such occasion exercise Patience, she gains so many Crowns, as there be hours in every day.

Let us pass further, and not here conceal some Roses of Marriage mingled among Thorns. If Beauty be therein, Jealousie doth easily slide into it; and doubtless it is more aimed at, and is more subject to be surprized by temptations. If there be Deformity, it much altereth the band of affections. If there be Riches, and ample Fortunes, they are exposed to much Embroylment, great Travel, and infinite Peril: for the strokes of Thunder ruin not any thing so often, as the tops of high Steeples. If there be Poverty, it is a misery intolerable. Are there Children? Wives, you know how dear they cost you. They, who are tortured on the Rack, suffer nothing in comparison of a poor creature, who is constrained to be delivered of her Fruit by a Travel extraordinary, hideous, painful, and oftentimes in seeking to give life to another, she there leaves her own. This sometime happeneth, because those Children come into the world laden with Benefices, Mitres, and Crosiers. Abuse preceeds Birth; they are Fathers before they are Children. It is not yet known whether they be Males or Females, and all the world sees, they already are charged with Eccleasiastical Livings. Mothers, you still bear them in your entrails; their fortunes, their accidents, their maladies, their deaths, through a reflection of Nature, imprint on your hearts all their passions, all their disasters: you are transfixed with as many Martyrdoms, as evils happen to your Children; nay, should all succeed prosperously, and according to the course of Nature, yet must you a second time produce them to Honours, Estates, and Fortunes. This pain perpetually ties you to the Rack: to have them upon your hand, and not wherewith to provide for them, is a very sensible sorrow, yet richly to endow them is to give them wherewithal to enkindle their Lust, entertain Disobedience, and cherish Vice. You think after your Travels they will afford you the like, who oftentimes prove Lewd, Ungrateful, and malicious Wretches, that waste the Wealth you amassed for them, as it were on your Tombs. Behold the slender scantling of the toyls and perplexities of Marriage, drawn from the Doctrine of holy Fathers! I wonder not at all, those antients in the Ceremonies of Marriage carried before the Bride a Torch made of Blackthorn, and never of any other wood; to testifie Wedlock was replenished with difficulties very thorny. Nor shall I any more admire their Custom, who in like manner caused the new Wife to touch Fire and Water. For, to say truly, she passeth through the boyling ardours of many Dolours, through the waters of infinite many afflictions, and many repeat that Versicle, when she hath met with some ease: I have passed through Fire and Water, and thou hast set me in repose and comfort.

Raram facit mixturam cum sapientia forma: & nihil est tutum, in quo totius populi vota suspirant. Molestum est possidere quod nullus habere vel amare dignatur. Pauperem alere, difficile est: divitem ferre, tormentum. Mulier, cum parit, tristitiam habet.

Ecce transivimus per ignem & aquam: & eduxisti nos in refrigerium. Psal. 65. 12.

Now, it is not sufficient to have expressed the inconveniencies of Marriage, if we also declare not the causes and remedies thereof: and this (Reader) is the reason, why I desire you to proceed in your attention. Men, who will always conclude to their own advantage, speaking of this matter, cast all upon women, and ordinarily affirm, we must not ask from whence the evils of Marriage come: it is enough to say, one cannot be Married without a Wife,

Wife, and that Woman is the source and seminary of all the miseries and disasters, which happen in this affair.

Behold a very slippery place! what shall we answer? It seems, that generally to condemn women, were to produce more testimonies of Passion, then marks of Judgment. They are the Mothers of men by Nature, Nurses by Charity, and (as it were) Hand-maids by Patience. It is the devout Sex, the Sex of Compassion and Pitie. They daily do many good things, they succour the necessities of the poor, they visit Hospitals, Prisons, the Sick; they replenish Churches, and edifie Families with examples of Piety; and can you then speak ill of them? Notwithstanding, as we are not to flatter them, so it is undoubted, that those, who have once resigned themselves to evil, and become Libertines in sin, are the cause of many ills, and practice much frailty in their Sex, and cunning in their Behaviour, to disturb Families, and the affairs of the world, if not guided by virtue. If we now will consult with the Antients, both Greek and Latine, they will tell us wonders; but let us hearken to Holy Scripture, and Fathers. First in Genesis (chap. ii.) where the creation of Woman is declared, it is said, that God caused a profound sleep to steal upon Adam, and that, he being asleep, he drew woman out of his side. These words are very considerable. What meaneth it, that God, before he made Woman, caused sleep to steal into the eyes of Adam? I will not here tell you, that some have Glossed, that he could not have admitted this production of Woman in any other manner: but I affirm with the Septuagint, this sleep was an extasie; with Saint Augustine, that it was a rapture; and with others, a trance of Spirit: for he then had need enough to fortifie himself with consideration, since Woman came into the world, who would bid him many battels. Poor Adam fell into an Apoplexy, into a Convulsion, into Swooning fits, as already feeling the cros Thwartings, Passions, and Afflictions, he should receive from Woman.

Immisit Deus soporem in Adam: cumque obdormivisset, tulit unam de costis ejus, & replevit carnem pro ea, & ædificavit Deus costam, quā tulerat, in mulierem. Adam, particeps Angelica curiæ, intravit in sanctuarium Dei. August. lib. 9. de Genes. ad lit.

הדרעה Aquila. Κατὰ φορὰν. Symmach. ἔκστασιν. Tertul. Accidentium Spiritus.

Moreover who can but admire the Phrase, which the Scripture useth in this Creation, where it is said Woman was built. Good God! What meaneth this? Thou already hadst erected so many goodly Buildings, Heaven and Earth, the high and low stations of the world; thou hadst created Adam with a plentiful concurrence of many parts: and yet the Scripture saith not, thou then didst build; but, when Woman was to be created, God built, God made his first piece of Architecture. And why? It is because Woman is a house, wherein the heart of man should inhabit, who is, alas! there but too often Captive? Or is it, that a Woman costs as much in making, as a fair House? To build an house you must have so much Sand, Lime, Stone, Timber, Iron-work, Manufactures, Hands, strokes of Hammers, Masons, Carpenters; and, to dress and attire a Woman, so many Coifs, Kerchiefs, Cawls, so many false Hairs, Paintings, Gowns, Petticoats, Chopins, Verdingals, Whale-bones; so many Carcanets, gold Chains, Jewels, Gems, Attendants, that a House were almost as soon built, as a Woman furnished.

What doth she, when she is built? Saint Augustine saith, she becomes the Scholar of a Serpent, the gate of Sin, the fountain of Errour, and the rust of Piety? Good God! What unhappiness is this? If from the side of man a flaming Dart or keen Sword had been drawn, they would have done less hurt, then an evil Woman; which I speak without prejudice of the Virtuous. The first Woman ungrateful towards God, a Traitoress to her Husband, a Murtheress of her race, made a bridg for Satan to pass into the world, and needs would lodg him in her heart, whom God had confined to the deep Pit of Hell.

Others, who have prostituted themselves to evil for these five thousand six hundred and thirty years, that the world hath circumvolved, have acted, upon this large Theatre of many forms, so many bloody Tragedies, that they make Histories to blush thereat. The daughters of Loth, the Thamars, Athaliahs, Jezabels, Vasthis, Helenas, Fredegundas approve it, and their ashes also incessantly produce others into the world, Work-mistresses of all mischief.

Alas, Mothers! Instruct your Daughters well whilst they are young, breed them up in the fear of God, frame them to duty, imprint on their tender hearts, as with a searing-Iron, the love of Chastity, modesty in their Behaviour, and devotion in their Souls.

And you, Young men, who suffer your selves to be cheated and deceived by impudent women, permitting them to bewitch you with Love-drinks, and wicked attractives, open your eyes, and behold the precipice before you, and then I doubt not you will abhor it. Trust not their familiar conversation, and dalliances; know they are full of danger, and that there is not any can resist them without the particular grace of God. Strength little availeth; the Sampsons sunk to the ground: Wisdom is to seek; the Solomons fell: Valour therein is short; the Davids found it: Sanctity is not free from their Batteries, the Elishaes were persecuted by women, and the John Baptists therein lost their heads: that venerable face, those eyes enflamed with heavenly rays, which won reverence from the wilde Beasts of the Desert, could not mollifie a female Dancer. That wise head, where the Maxims of eminent virtues resided, was taken from the shoulders of a Saint, carried in a dish to a Banquet by the Sacrilegious hands of a shameless woman. That tongue, from whence distilled a stream of Honey, was pricked and pierced with a Bodkin, wherewith the wretch used to curl her hair. Now, according to the counsel of Saint Chrysostome, take into your hands this bloody head, ask of it, O head, which should never die, who hath drenched thee into the wanness of death? Who hath bathed thee in this blood? Who hath put out thine eyes, the Torches of the elect, and Thunder-strokes of the wicked? Who hath layed an eternal silence on that Tongue, which first of all announced the Kingdom of Heaven? The love of women. Lions and Tigers reverenced me in Wildernesses, and Women massacred me in a King's Palace, women mingled my blood with wine, and made me as a pompous morsel of their Tragical Banquets.

Efficacissimum est genus ad capiendas animas, muliebre. Aug.

When I say this, I not onely accuse women, but Carnal men, who suffer themselves to be allured, and surprized with sottish love, and trampling under foot the honour of God, the presence of Heaven and Angels, the conjugal bed, and faith promised to their Wives, wallow themselves in execrable adulteries, which fill Families with Opprobrie, Confusion, and Tragedies; why say I Families? nay, Kingdomes, and Empires: and, if we will examine it, we shall finde the greatest part were turned topsie-turvie by foolish love.

O you that sigh, hearing speech of the furious disorders this unhappy sin brings into the world, I beseech you with Saint Paul, by the very bowels of our Lord's mercy, offer your bodies to God as an Hoast lively, holy, and acceptable to the Divinity; and you especially, who are in the state of Marriage, entertain your beds honourable and chaste, cement-

ed

ted with a perpetual knot of faith, love, and peace, that God may please thereon perpetually to shower down from on high his holy benedictions, and, after the course of this painful life, crown you with comforts in the glory of the Blessed.

The thirty fifth SECTION.

That the evils of Marriage ought not to be imputed to Sex, but Sin; and of the disorders committed in this Sacrament.

IF the unhappiness of Marriages proceeded only from women, we might necessarily conclude, they were alwaies unfortunate, as never being without a woman: but since experience daily teacheth, there are of them excellently governed, we must not impute to the condition of Sex that, which proceeds from the vice of depraved Nature. Though the Scripture condemn evil women, yet it bestoweth so great Elogies on the virtuous, that they are able to dazle calumny, and enlighten virtue. One while woman is called A lamp, which shineth on a holy candlestick. A title only given to persons eminent, as it was said of Saint John Baptist, He was a burning and resplendent lamp. The body of this lamp is the rib, created by the hand of a great Workman; the soul is the fire of it, virtue the light, grace the oyl, devotion the match and nourishment, and marriage the holy candlestick wherein to it is put. Another-while she is called a Sun: As a Sun (said the Wise-man) rising in the world from the palace of God. Whereby he would have us to understand, that a Mary should so neer approach to the Divinity, that she was to possess the highest place above Angels, Thrones, Virtues, and all Intelligences. Sometimes the same Scripture, to declare the rank, a virtuous woman holds in the world, presenteth unto us a balance; in one scale a woman, and in the other all the riches of the world, and a woman is the weightiest. A chast woman is a grace above all graces, admitting no comparison. And, besides Holy-writ, replenished with the virtues and remarkable acts of famous women, the Wise-man seems also to have undertaken as a task, the praise of women, in the Panegyrick of the one and thirtieth Chapter of the Proverbs. There he compareth woman to a ship carrying victual from a far distant country, desirous to signifie, that she is laden as much with virtues, as a ship with merchandize. Do you seek for devotion in her, a most estimable ornament of souls? Behold how the great Saint Augustine by singularity calleth this Sex, the devout Sex. Their first mother, as I told you, was created in terrestial Paradise, and they are perpetually at the gates of celestial Paradise, either praying, or hearkening to the word of God. Were there not women, who accompanied our Saviour with his holy Mother, in so many painful pilgrimages, succouring his necessities, according to their abilities? & it is not a prodigy, that on the day of that bloody & dolorous passion, which shook the pillars of heaven and made the Apostles fly, women were found, who followed the Son of God with heart, affection, presence, tears, sighs, even to the foot of the Cross: terrours of arms, fury of souldiers, earth rent in sunder with sorrow, and Heaven wholly covered with darkness, unable to force affrightment into these souls, to stop the current of their holy undertakings? Besides, they have done so many services to the Church, yea, so many wonders, that not only Cities, but whole Kingdoms, have many times been converted, and brought to the knowledge of God, by the means of women. Desire you prudence in them? Behold a poor Thekoaite, who treateth with King David of Absalom's reconciliation, with such dexterity, that she obtained whatsoever she asked. See in the history of Esther, how, by the treachery of Aman, swords were drawn out of scabbards, to be thrust into the throats of an infinite number of poor innocents, throughout all the Provinces of the Kingdom: at which time God raised a young captive, an Esther, who so well knew how to temper the spirit of this harsh and haughty King, that she made him open his ears to innocency, and shut them up from flattery and cruelty: withold the wings of thunder already shot over the heads of those poor Citizens, and turn them against the guilty. If you among them seek for justice, the history of the antient Gauls will shew you, that antiently they decided differences among people, and often staid arms ready to encounter, planting the Temple of peace in the midst of furies and liberty of arms. Yea, God himself for the government of his people was pleased to make use of a Debora, whom the Hebrews called by the name of a Bee, for her wisdom, valour, and industry.

You will perhaps think strength is wanting in this sex: Behold Judith, who consecrated her victorious hand to the defence of her country, and, slaying Holofernes, defeated a whole Army spread over Judea, and surging on every side like a furious deluge. And if you will thereunto add the histories of later times, see a sheepherdess, a simple maid, commonly called Jeanne Pucille, who opposed her self as a wall for the defence of this Kingdom against English Arms, with such military prowess, that she seemed to bear fire, blood, war, and victory in her hands.

Let us then no longer say, that woman is the seminary of evils happening in marriage; but rather that they are vices which proceed from both, when the husband and wife take the liberty of doing ill.

The first disorder is, that such matches are almost never made, but for covetousness. We do not well to call this an iron Age, it is all composed of gold and silver. Heretofore marriages were made for love, which caused them to be of a lasting condition, and to be indissoluble: but now adaies avarice alone predominateth. We thought love was the most powerful Archer of the world to transfix a heart; but avarice is found to confront him. Had a maid now all that, which fools use to couch in their writings, the brows of Juno, the eys of Venus, the hands of Minerva, and feet of Thetis: if she be not rich, were she Pandora her self, if she bring not where-withal to gild the hand of her husband, it is no match for him.

And from hence it comes, that marriage is not, as it were, marriage, but a mercinary traffick, a Fair, a market, where reasonable creatures are sold like bruit beasts. Antient laws testifie, that heretofore nothing was given with maids in marriage, but their apparel, mean enough, I warrant you: it was for men, who sought them, to endow them. This is practised still the new world, to wit, in China. It is a treasure there to have many daughters, men buy them with large sums of money, which they give to the parents, that breed them: now they purchase men, and with huge portions buy their bondage. This makes their parents hair to wax griesly, and impoverisheth families, which fear to be over-burdened with daughters; because one cannot be rid of them, nor drive them away, but with a rod of silver. So much this mischievous avarice, this feaver of the heart, this voluntary frenzy hath prevailed upon the spirits of these times. And, were the maids in this Lucerna splendens super candelabrum sanctum. Eccl. 26.21 Erat lucerna ardens & lucens. Joan. 5.35.

Sicut Sol orims mundo in altissimis Dei.

Gratia super gratiam omnis ponderatio non est digna continentis animæ.

Erat Debora pro Prophetis. Judic. 4.4. Tu gloria Hierusalem tu lætitia Israel, tu honorificentia populi nostri, quia fecisti viriliter. Judith 15. 12.

Si uxorari oportet, sit amor in causa. Hieron. in ep. ad Ruffin.

Oculos suos statuerunt declinare in terram.

this caſe ſuch as they ſhould be, ſeeing the covetouſneſs of men, they would rather reſolve to take God for an husband in the ſtate of virginity, then yield their bodies and riches up to an husband, who ſeeks after nothing leſs then themſelves. S. Hierom relateth an excellent paſſage of Martia, daughter of the great Cato, who ſaid, that among ſo many Gallants, as made love to her, there was not any fit for an husband. Say the like, Maidens: Avaunt mercenary husbands, who have the fever of money, marry them to the Mines of Peru, and not to virtuous Maids.

The ſecond evil I obſerve is Riot, which now adaies waſteth body, and goods, and becomes more inſatiable then Hell. It is asked, why avarice ſwayeth in Marriages, and wherefore husbands are ſo greedy of Portion? becauſe indeed they ſtand in need of it, to entertain the bravery and vanity of their wives Apparel. It is a prodigious thing to what height this folly is mounted. Lawyers are much troubled to reckon up all the attires and trinkets of women; what pain ſhall then the husband ſuffer to buy them?

O Woman! what makes thee ſo paſſionately to deſire theſe gauderies? Thy firſt mother, whoſe garments were cut out by the hands of God, was contented to be clothed with skins, and now Seas muſt be ſailed over, and the bounds of Elements broken, to ſeek out dreſſings for thee. Miſerable that thou art, who inordinately deckeſt thy ſelf, and for an ill purpoſe! Knoweſt thou not, thy garment is to thy body, as the plaiſter to the wound, or an Ivy-leaf to ſtop a Cautery? S. Iſidore ſaid, Before ſin Adam and Eve were clothed with light: O pretious Attire! The Sun will have no other mantle then his own rays, nor the Roſe any other robe then her ſcarlet; becauſe Nature hath ſufficiently adorned them. So Man, had he continued within the limits of Original juſtice, would not have wiſhed any garment but Innocency. Sin is come, which hath by reflection impreſſed an ugly ſcar both on ſoul and body; and needs muſt gold and ſilk be fought out to involve it. A man in former Ages was ſeen, who, having feet of wood, ſhod them with golden Pantofles. O miſerable and ridiculous vanity! Woman doth the like to cover her wretched body, which one of theſe daies muſt putrifie, and which hath received the wound of ſin and death. All the moſt exquiſite beauties of Nature muſt be drawn together; yea, marry, if it could afford any comfort and eaſe to the body: but you ſhall many times behold a young Gentle-woman groan, as at a torture, under the weight of her garments; yet ſhe for all this will have, and adore her own puniſhment. The great Chancellour of England, & glorious Martyr, Sir Thomas Moor, was he not pleaſantly diſpoſed, when he ſaid to one, who complained of heat: Ah ſilly creature! what wonder is it? Thou carrieſt upon thee Medows, Vine-yards, Mills, Manſions, and Iſlands, in the value of Jewels: how canſt thou poſſibly be cool? This was the cauſe why Tertullian complained before him: A little Cabinet makes ſhew of a large patrimony. Twenty three thouſand Crowns are diſburſed for one rope of Pearls. A woman's neck puts on Woods, and Iſlands, and her ears, wh ch are ſo curious, waſte ample Revenues.

But the matter moſt to be lamented is, that it often happens, the ſervile and unfortunate husband buys all this bravery at the charge of the poor, and if any perhaps wring theſe gorgeous garments, there will be ſome danger, the blood of the poor may diſtil from it.

Breviſſimis loculis patrimonium grande præfertur; uno lino ſeſtertium inſeritur; ſaltus & inſulas tenera cervix fert: graciles aurium cutes calendarium expendunt. Tertul. De habitu muliebri.

The third diſorder is the diſcord, which proceedeth from the ill government of men, from the obſtinacy of women, and jealouſie of both. And verily we may affirm the ſleight vanities of wives are much more tolerable then the diſorders of men. It it is no ordinary folly, but rather a rage and madneſs, to ſee a poor woman, full of children, groan under the heavy burden of an houſhold charge upon her hand, daily fading and withering away like a plant without juice or moiſture, to live on gall and tears; and in the mean time, a diſloyal husband to conſume in exceſs of diet and game (the inſtruments of Satan) that ſubſtance God gave him for the entertainment of his Family.

O ungrateful and unnatural wretch, who, to give way to thy paſſion, trampleſt under-foot the commandments of God, and honour of marriage! This money, which thy cruel hand ſo profuſely ſcatters in game, if thou wouldſt well underſtand, is the blood of this poor creature, which was ſo charily to thee recommended: it is the ſweat of her Parents labours, they are her proper entrails, which thou piece-meal teareſt in this fatal Dicing houſe. I do not ſay, thou art an Homicide: there is ſome difference between thee and a murderer. The murderer in an inſtant taketh away life and bodily pain both together: but thou, who liveſt in perpetual Riots, thou draweſt the vital parts from this afflicted Turtle one after another, which thou oughteſt to love as thy ſelf. Thou cutteſt the throat of thy family, of thy poor and unhappy children, who are thine own blood, which thou ſhouldſt fervently affect, hadſt thou not renounced Nature, and entertained the heart of a brute beaſt, for that of a man; what ſay I, a beaſt's heart? The Lamias have bared their breaſts, they have given ſuck to their young, and there is not any but the daughter of my people, Who is cruel as the Oſtrich of the Deſert.

Lamiæ nudaverunt mammas, lactaverunt catulos ſuos: filia populi mei crudelis ſicut ſtruthio in deſerto. Hier. Thren. 4. 3.

Knoweſt thou to whom S. Paul compares ſuch a man? To a Cannibal, to a Barbarian? No, he tells thee, he is worſe then an Infidel. If any one neglect his own, and namely, his domeſticks, he hath renounced faith, and is become worſe then a Pagan.

Si quis ſuorum, & maximè domeſticorum, curam non habet, fidem negavit, & eſt infideli deterior. 1 Tim. 5. 8.

On the other ſide, the obſtinacy of woman is an horſe hard in the mouth, head-ſtrong, untractable: and I can no longer wonder (ſaid one) that ſhe was made of a bone, ſince many times her head is ſo hard; which brings infinite trouble on a family. The Antients, dreſſing up the ſtatues of the Moon in humane ſhape, ſet on her ſhoulders the head of the Sun: to ſhew, a virtuous wife ſhould have no other will, nor other intentions nor glory, then the will, intentions, and glory of her husband, if they be reaſonable. It is the doctrine of S. Paul to the Epheſians; That wives ſhould be obedient to their husbands, as to Jeſus Chriſt himſelf, becauſe the husband is head of the wife, as Chriſt of this Church.

Mulieres viris ſuis ſubdita ſint ſicut Domino, quoniam vir caput eſt mulieris, ſicut Chriſtus caput eſt eccleſiæ. Epheſ 5. 23

But if ſhe withdraw and diſunite her ſelf from this ty of obedience, and inceſſantly vex her husband with her obſtinacy, this will be to him a martyrdom almoſt inſupportable. The rocks of Caucaſus are much gentler then a wicked woman: which verily you may ſee in the hiſtory of Job, to whom the evil Spirit granted a wife to be the accompliſhment of his afflictions. For this holy man, after the loſs of his large poſſeſſions, ſo ſtrange, ſo ſudden, ſo dreadful; after his poor children were murdered and undone, had for tomb the ruines of their own houſe; after he ſaw himſelf changed into a ſcurff, covered over with ulcers, and placed on a dung-hill before the eyes of a City, whereof he had been Lord, he then thought the rage of Satan was ſatisfied:

fied: but he made uſe for the laſt piece of battery of a ſpiteful and malicious woman, who ſeeing her huſband in this plight, ſaid unto him; Do you ſtill remain in your ſimplicity? Curſe God and die.

Adhuc permanes in ſimplicitate tua? Benedic Deo, & morere.

But amongſt all theſe diſorders, no influence is more malign then jealouſie, which cruelly tortures marriages, when it hath once bewitched the weak brain of man or woman, interpreting all the actions of each part in evil ſenſe. Why went ſhe to ſuch a place? Did ſhe not ſmile upon ſuch an one? Did ſhe not caſt a pleaſing glance upon ſuch an one? Why ſpake ſhe of ſuch an one? And why ſhewed ſhe compaſſion in ſuch a man's miſhap? Queſtionleſs ſhe loves him, her affections grow cold towards me. Behold the Idol of falſe Zeal, whereof the Prophet Ezechiel ſpeaketh at the entrance into the Temple of Jeruſalem.

Behold, how before the Temple of Marriage, which is holy and ſacred, man placeth the ſtatue of Jealouſie, and daily offers a thouſand ſacrifices of ſiniſter ſuſpicions, ill-digeſted fantaſies, purpoſes wicked and injurious, to the prejudice of one who is in heart both chaſte and modeſt.

A woman oftentimes is made loyal by thinking her loyal, and he who doubts faith well obſerved, puts himſelf in danger to ruine it by his ſuſpicion. There are ſome care not to forſake innocency, when they have loſt reputation, and when they entertain the opinion, that their actions are ill interpreted, they are in danger to do all ſorts of miſchief. It is far better to think well of an hundred faulty, then ill of one innocent. It is a notable myſtery to judge of hearts; nor is it any wonder that God reſerved it to himſelf. Beſides, as jealouſies are very prejudicial to wedlock, ſo they cauſe many Tales and matter of mirth to ariſe in a City replete with curious people, who many times fatten themſelves with the miſhaps of another: and it often happens, that from jeſting they draw men and ſwords in revenge to act horrible Tragedies. Happy they who know how to prevent by wiſdom all thoſe miſeries which may grow from malice and misfortune, or diſcretely correct by patience, what prudence cannot avoid.

The thirty ſixth SECTION.

Very profitable Inſtructions for the Married, drawn from the choice of Holy Fathers, and abbreviated in a ſhort Diſcourſe.

NOw will I deſcend to Inſtructions ſuitable to this ſubject, and let you know (O husbands and wives) you ſhould greatly take heed in all your deportments, as well in the beginning, middle, as the end. It very much importeth to begin with a good choice, and to enter with prudent conſideration, and ſtrong reſolution unto the Sacrament of Marriage: for that ought a long time to be deliberated, which is to be done but once for the whole life. What ſenſe is there to thruſt ſome forward upon marriage with a Fork, when they have no diſpoſition thereunto, and divert others who are more notably called to this kinde of life? What rigour of Parents, to tie young people by command to matches, from which they have infinite averſion? Is is not enough to have the contentment of ſage direction over a free-will, without uſurping a petty tyranny upon the functions of Nature? I do not tell you, you muſt readily obey all thoſe who marry by the eye, without calling reaſon to counſel, or having any other guide in a matter of ſo great importance, then the exorbitancy of their ſenſuality. But for my part, I hold it unfit to be violent by ſtriking at the reaſonable inclinations of children, for the accommodation of intereſt; otherwiſe, marriages are made without love, to create love afterwards without marriage. It is a ridiculous thing to put wedded couples into the Nuptial bed, without any foreknowledge, as if they had been brought thither in a ſack. So likewiſe ſhould you not draw theſe treaties at length, leſt they drag with them ſome diſorder, and waſte love before the beginning thereof. Love, which commenceth by fervours of a fire of Tow, very often endeth in Ice. Happy they who have the bleſſing of ſucceſs, and are favoured from above to make an equal alliance between good hap and virtue. It was a great ſimplicity amongſt thoſe Antients, who offered Sacrifices to Fortune, to make their beards grow handſomly, and not to crave the benediction of God in their marriages. Fathers and Mothers give riches (ſaid the Wiſe-man) but a wife wife is properly the gift of God. If one have matched ill, he muſt correct by prudence, what wants of felicity. Beware, O husbands, for in this kinde of life, which ſo ſtraitly ties you, you are accountable to God, to your ſelves, to your wives. To God you owe a ſincere conſcience, that you may ſerve him worthily in the vocation wherein he hath eſtabliſhed you to become a member of humane ſociety. Beware you haſten not to marriage, as to a duty of Nature, and not a Sacrament; if ſo, you wed like a Sarazin, not a Chriſtian. Thoſe, ſaith the Angel to Tobit, are in the power of the fiend Aſmodeus, who baniſh God from their hearts, and have no other intention in marriage, but to ſatisfie their brutiſhneſs. Obſerve marriage as an invention of Almighty God; to produce man on earth, and to make elect for heaven. Entertain it as a golden Mine, from which veſſels of Election are to be taken for the other world. Love your condition, and think you have a great privilege, ſince you are to afford Heirs to your houſes, Citizens to Cities, Religious to Monaſteries, and Angels to Paradiſe. Look upon God in the midſt between you both, ſince he perpetually beholdeth you: the nearer lines draw to the centre, the more they approach one to another: the nearer you are to God, the better ſhall you be united. If you build not the foundation of your houſe upon the fear of his Divine Majeſty, and ſincere devotion, you raiſe fortunes like a Coloſſus of glaſs, which will ſhiver in pieces over your head.

Domus & divitiæ dantur à parentibus: à Domino autem propriè uxor prudens. Prov. 19. 14

Tob. 6. 17.

After you have reſigned this your conſcience to God, you owe to your ſelf the government of your ſenſes and uſe of reaſon. And (as it appears) you are, O men, ſtrictly bound in marriage, the more to render your ſelves men, ſince God placeth you therein, to afford men to the Chriſtian Commonwealth. It is neceſſary you draw from the fountain of wiſdome, more wit, and more delight, ſince you are to make uſe of it to enlighten a wife and children, who depend on your direction.

As for the duty of both, I finde, if Marriage be a Lilly, it muſt have ſix leaves, which are Reſpect, Love, Loyalty, Support, Direction, and Help. It is fit Love begin by a certain Regard, which man and woman ſhould bear one to another all the time of their life. For the functions of this ſociety permitting a great familiarity, if it be not counterpoized with a chaſte reverence, ſoon degenerateth into contempt. The wives Reſpect ought to paſs even to obedience, which the Apoſtle S. Paul ſo punctually recommendeth to Chriſtians; and the husband's ſhould be mixed with a tenderneſs and moderation, to let him know, God drew woman out of his ſide, to make her her his companion; and not his ſlave.

Mulier collateralis viro. Gloſſ. in Gen.

It is good for the entertainment of this reſpect, that both of them accuſtom to conceive a good opinion of each other's abilities: for where there is diſeſteem, honour will hardly be found; becauſe it is tied to worth, as the ſhadow to the body. For this purpoſe they muſt endeavour to cover the defects they may have by nature, by other virtues in their power; and to perſevere in a belief of ſufficiency in each one's condition.

To this reſpect the Love is added, which ſhould be rendred, according to the precept of S. Paul, in the matter of conjugal duty. For it is an intolerable thing, and wherein God may be grievouſly offended, when a woman imagineth, that to be married is nothing elſe, but to have a Coach to her ſelf, to buy Stuffs according to her own fantaſie, to become brave, and have no regard to obligations eſſential amongſt the married. But we may truly affirm all love of ſenſe is very low, if it tend not to thoſe eternal ſources of amities, which diſtil from the Paradiſe of God, and learn to love by grace, and reaſon, that, which is is to be loved. God, to cement this love together, drew woman out of man (ſaith Tertullian) as ſome part of a liquor from the veſſel, which contained it: he made two of one, to put them both afterward into one. It is to tear each other's fleſh, and gnaw their bones, to waſte one another by diſcord, the moſt capital plague of marriage.

Tertul. lib. De reſur. carnis.

Holy Love is always accompanied with mutual Loyalty in any thing, which concerneth conjugal chaſtity, as being the knot of affections, and foundation of all the happineſs of the married. O wife, a ring is given you of a circular form, to teach, your loves are limited within the nuptial bed. The ring, which heretofore bare the ſeal of promiſe, to ſignifie your heart ought to be ſealed with charity, and cloſed up from all other pretenſions. Believe not thoſe make-bates, who tell you, good is of its own nature communicable, and that a fair wife is not for one alone, that chaſtity is a note of deformity, and that an husband, and a friend are not things incompatible. Theſe are not words, but hiſſes of the Serpent. Fear the leaſt blemiſhes of honour, and do not ſo much as caſt an eye upon the ſmoak of this coal, which now adays burneth ſo many unhappy ſouls. Love not to be woed, and courted by ſo many eys, and lips, nor to behold ſuch worldly pleaſures, to become pliant to others, or to attempt to afford love, and receive none back again. Out alas! theſe ſlight entertainments breed many acerbities. They are enchanted apples, which poiſon all, who taſte them. Men likewiſe remember, the beſt leſſons of loyalty, which your wife can learn, ſhe muſt derive from your example. Think not, becauſe you are a man, all things are permitted you, and that your ſex is a ſanctuary for your crime. If you be the head (ſaith S. Auſtin) move it that way, whither you would have the body follow. You are the more bound to conjugal chaſtity; becauſe you ought to be the moſt wiſe and ſtrong; becauſe you have the moſt employments to divert your temptations in the affairs of civil life: and laſtly, becauſe you have moſt liberty, and may make your evil moſt general by diſturbing many wedlocks, as it happeneth to reprobate and inordinate ſouls in this kind.

Caput ducat, corpus ſequatur. Auguſt. Serm. 49.

I add to Loyalty mutual bearing with defects, and imperfections, which is a ſingular virtue in marriage. For, we being in this world, as in a territory, where good and evil eaſily mix together, there is no plant, which hath not its worm, nor beauty, which ſuffereth not diminution. There are not any married couple ſo accompliſhed, who have not vices, defects, and imperfections, which who practiſe not to digeſt through Chriſtian Patience ſhall become not unlike a Sea-calf, ſaid to be always moody againſt his fellow. The Husband and the Wife are upon the river called Life in marriage, as in a boat: if there happen a leak, and it receive water, they muſt ſeek to ſtop it preſently, and, if you have nothing to put into it, rather ſet a foot upon it, then pierce round about it, to make the leak wider. A word, or indiſcrete action hath eſcaped, to what purpoſe is it to reproach or pick quarrels with a man, or woman, upon it on all occaſions? Rather uſe the ſpeedieſt remedies, you may, and, if none be at hand, bury it in ſilence.

Finally, know you enter into marriage for direction, and aſſiſtance; and, though direction be principally proper to man, notwithſtanding, it is a poor buſineſs to ſee a woman have neither care, nor government in her family, imagining ſhe, from morning till night, ſhould have no other employment, but to dreſs her ſelf, and many times to be attired, when divers think of unclothing to go to bed. It is a ſhameful thing to prattle all the day-long, and make a whole City trot upon her tongue, and yet be ignorant of what is done in her own houſe. A virtuous wife ſhould not only govern her family, but with wiſdom, and diſcretion, temper her husband's paſſions; and, if ſuch things eſcape him, redreſs them rather by love then power. If God heretofore cauſed a ſhe-aſs to ſpeak, to inſtruct a falſe Propher; why ſhould he not at a need draw a good word from the mouth of a diſcrete woman, to ſet man into a fair way. Know we not, that the laſt unhappineſs of Pilate was not to have believed his wife, much more enlightened by God then himſelf?

As for help, it is ſo neceſſary, that next after the comfort of poſterity marriage is conſtituted for that end. It is not enough to aſſiſt a mortal body in its infirmities, but, ſo much as one may, mutually to nurture a ſoul immortal; you muſt between you ſhare all your proſperities, and adverſities: I ſay, proſperities, to moderate them; and adverſities, to honour them: you muſt mutually ſtrive to lend a ſhoulder; and, if your burdens be weighty by the yoke of neceſſity, ſanctifie them by your patience. You muſt think it is a bleſſing even from God, to be choſen out to preſerve an husband, or a ſick wife, ſince this infirm creature is the Image of God, and your proper fleſh, to whom you render duties, which perhaps at this time ſeem thorns unto you, but ſhall one day be crowns, if you know how to make virtues of your neceſſities. Be not diſcouraged through puſillanimity, but do like the Dolphin, who raiſeth himſelf with much alacrity againſt the ſea-waves during the tempeſt. Underſtand you not the Holocauſt muſt burn from evening till morning? Burn in this fire of love and tribulation, expecting to ſee glory in the day-break to crown your perſeverance. Though God allot you no iſſue, yet no whit the leſs love your comfort: God oftentimes ſuffereth barrenneſs of body to afford fruitfulneſs of virtues.

The thirty ſeventh SECTION.

Inſtructions for Widows.

PErfect Widows are in the Church, as the Horizon of Marriage, and Religion; they participate of both conditions: when they be in the world, for the example of the world, for the goverment of their children and family; but they alſo have a ſhare in the life of the Religious, when they wholly diſpoſe their hearts to God.

We ſometimes ſee a bank of earth, which keepeth two Seas from intermixing; but, being taken away, thoſe two waters will paſs along together, and engulf themſelves one within another. O how often ſaid you, during the knot of marriage, that, if God once took away your husband, you would wholly be for him? Conjugal obligation, and affairs of the world was your bank, and your obſtacle; but now God hath taken it away, diſſolve your heart into his.

This is the paſſage, where you are expected: here it is, where proof ſhall be made of your conſtancy. When you have deplored the death of your husband as a wife, you muſt learn to bear it like a Saint. It is a wretched virtue not to know what elſe to do then bewail the dead, and be deſirous to derive glory from the peeviſhneſs of your ſorrow. If we could draw aſide the curtain of Heaven, to ſee the ſtate of ſouls already paſſed out of mortal bodies to the promiſed recompenſe of the faithful, how much we ſhould be aſhamed and confounded at the weakneſs of our tears: we ſhould ſee this great Eternity ſeated in a chair of Diamond, all ſparkling with ſtars and brightneſs, holding a flaming mirrour in its hand, at which time it would let us behold a goodly harmony of all the beatitudes, theſe glorious ſouls now enjoy, ſeparated from the contagion of our mortality: then, wiping away the tears from our eys, it would ſay to us with a voice repleniſhed with ſweetneſs, and majeſty, Why bewail you theſe kinred and friends, who live better then ever in my boſom, abſorpt in a torrent of eternal felicities?

An hundred, and an hundred-fold happy are the dead, who depart in the favour of God! Behold them for the time to come diſcharged from labours: Behold them freed of a thouſand, and a thouſand cares, fears, pains, paſſions, maladies, wants, ignominies, and all thoſe evils, which divide our miſerable life: Behold them folded within the arms of the Sovereign, where they reap the good works they ſowed on earth. You are much troubled, O widow, that this your Spouſe is at this preſent of the houſhold of God, and an inhabitant of his manſion, and a poſſeſſour of his glory. Have you ſo many tears to lament miſeries, that you waſte them in felicities? as if it were a great unhappineſs to paſs from the ſervitude of the ſlaves of the world, to the liberty, and joy of the children of God.

This is admirably well expreſſed in the 21. Chapter of Exodus, where God, at the going forth of Egypt, ſhewed himſelf to Moſes, Aaron, Nabal, Abiud, and all the moſt eminent of this Nation, having Sapphires for his foot-ſtool (which are ſtones of a celeſtial colour;) whereupon a learned Commentary, drawn from the Hebrew Interpreters, moſt divinely anſwereth, that God would ſay unto them: You have laboured in Egypt with much patience about morter, and tyles; and behold all your tyles turned into Sapphires, into heavenly ſtones, to build of them the foot-ſtool of your glory. This is it, which moſt Bleſſed Eternity ſaith to us concerning the dead, whom we deplore. It is not fit any longer to take pains with tyles, and morter; buſineſſes, cares, troubleſom affairs of the preſent life are paſt; there is not any thing but repoſe, peace, glory, and felicity. Behold that, which comforteth all ſolid and generous ſouls, with lively, fruitful, and eternal conſolations. Will you have a ſingular reſignation in the death of your kinred, which may daily happen, and fall out of neceſſity? Behold Saint Lewis, when news was brought him of the death of his mother Queen Blanch; he ſoon perceived by the countenance of the meſſengers, who were the Arch-Biſhop of Tyre, and his Confeſſor, they were ready to tell him ſomewhat able to afflict the heart of man, before they could open their mouths, Let us go (ſaith he) into my Oratory; (for it was the magazin, where this great King took up arms to combate againſt wordly diſaſters:) and, when they came thither, ſpeak now, what have you to ſay? Sir, God, who had a long time lent you your mother for the good of your perſon, and Kingdom, hath taken her out of the world for her own repoſe. At theſe words S. Lewis fell upon his knees before the Altar, and lifting up his hands to heaven, ſaid: O my God, I give thee thanks, thou haſt afforded me my dear mother whileſt it was thy will, and that now according to thy good pleaſure thou haſt taken her to thee. It is true, I loved her above all the creatures of the world, and ſhe well deſerved it; but ſince thou haſt bereaved me of her, thy Name be for ever bleſſed.

Conclude your tears, as he did, but never the reſolution of your widow-hood. It were to be wiſhed, a good vow might fix it with a nail of Adamant: but that ſhould be done with diſcretion; for, all in woman being frail, her tears can have no conſtancy. You may have read, in the Hiſtory of the unhappy Politician, the ſorrow of Glaphyra, the wife of Alexander, ſon of Herod, whom his Father moſt cruelly put to death to ſatisfie his Chimæraes, and ſuſpicions. Never woman more paſſionately reſented the death of her husband: her lamentations were yellings, her tears torrents, her words furies, her countenance deſpair, and life a little hell. There was no light to be ſeen after the eclipſe of her Sun, no world after her little world, nor life after the loſs of the moiety of her ſoul. In the mean ſpace ſome babler inſinuating hereupon, and ſaying, ſhe did ill to afflict her ſelf for a death, which could not but be happy, ſince it was free from the ſenſe of pain; and that for her ſelf (it was true) her loſs was unſpeakable, but the providence of God made it reparable by a ſecond wedlock, which would wipe away her tears, and that in her conſtancy the world approved all, but the reſolution ſhe took to remain for ever miſerable. She ſo much with time mollified her courage upon the like remonſtrances, that ſhe married the brother of her dead husband, and after him a third, the King of Mauritania. Joſephus relateth, that, the firſt night of her wedding, the ſoul of her husband appeared to her, and ſaid: Glaphyra, you have approved common bruit, which ſays, Women are light. Where are now your tears? Where your ſorrow? Where the vows you made me? Your words were full of promiſes, your promiſes of oaths, and your oaths of perjuries, and infidelity. For after my father's cruelty had violently pulled away this my immortal ſoul, which now ſpeaks to you, you laid aſide your great grief, which ſeemed would never have an end, and yielding your ſelf up to the importunities of ill-propoſed ſuits, you have admitted my brother into your bed, entertaining my memory, and aſhes, as if I had been but a ſhadow; and not content herewith, after his deceaſe you married the King of Mauritania; and behold you now have turned your wanneſs into vermilion, your tears into pearls, and ſorrow into gold, and ſcarlet. You are drenched in delights over head and ears, and take ſo much pleaſure among the living, that you forſake the memory of the dead. Now know, although you be ſo ungrateful towards me, I have not forgotten you; nor ſhall it be long before you be with me. The poor Queen was ſo terrified with this viſion, Joſeph. lib. 17. Antiq.

Vision, that she was quickly taken into the other world, leaving (saith the History) by the publication of this Apparition a notable proof of the immortality of our Souls.

Yet we do not forbid second Wedlocks: but all Widows are advertised, they must proceed with great discretion, and that, according to the Apostle's counsel, The greatest perfections rest in widow-hood. But above all, so use the matter, that this widow-hood be not idle, that your Children may finde you a true Mother, the Church a perpetual Votaress, Virgins a Protectrice, the Poor a charitable Nurse, Monasteries a good Friend, Orphans a Tutoress, the House one retired, Societies an example of good Odour, and God above all a faithful Servant. To encourage you to this resolution, you shall presently hear Saint Hierom speak, who used words to this effect in the Treatises he wrote unto two Widows.

You have learnt in marriage the troubles of marriage; God was pleased to give you this Schole to instruct you for widow-hood by your own experience. You have vomited up the choler, which surcharged your stomach, would you take it up again to bear it in your mouth? Would you return to the sauce from whence you went? Fear you the world may win, if you bring no children? Let it fail through virtue, rather then be supported by weakness. All those who are married have not children: and such as have, are many times enforced to curse their fruitfulness. To whom (say you) shall I leave all this wealth, since I am mortal? To God, who cannot dy: to Jesus, that you may make an heir of your own Master. Your father will be afflicted at it, but God glorified; your family mourn, but the Angels will rejoyce. Let your father do what he will with his riches: it is not to him to whom you owe your birth, but to Jesus, the Author of your regeneration.

Beware of those venomous Creatures, who seek their gain from another's charge, and who tell you, there is no sense, that a young woman should waste her youth in sad solitude, and neither taste the delight of children, nor reward of pleasure. If you have posterity, why desire you a second marriage? and if you have none, why fear you not a second sterility? If you be a Mother, you perhaps set over your children, not a nursing Father, but an Enemy; not a Parent, but a Tyrant. Needs must you forget your own children in the pursuits of your loves, and trick up your self in the defection from your Orphans, who as yet scarcely know how to lament or understand their own misery. Allege not here unto me Wealth, Affairs, and Services. No woman takes an husband, but to lie with an husband Otherwise, what a folly were it to resign up her chastity to multiply her riches. What will it be, when an husband shall persecute you, having your estate? What will it be, when you no longer shall be suffered to love the children by your first husband, and that you must hide your self from doing them any good, and hate them, to shew you have renounced the ashes of the dead? If you have children of a second Wedlock, be you never so good, you shall be a step-mother. If you spare ought from your Son-in-law, you will be cruel; and if by accident any ill befal him, it is you did it; if you deny him meat, you are ingrateful; and if you give him any, you have poisoned him.

It is time you bury to your self all these pleasures in the Tomb of your husband. Countersitting cannot make a fair accord with tears, nor doth grief permit the pomp of Attire. Meagerness and Fasts should be your Pearls, and Prayer your Perfumes. If a Queen of Carthage said heretofore of her husband; He, that espoused me in the first wedlock, took my heart and love with him; let him enjoy, let him possess them unto the grave. If she set Glass at so high a rate, what shall we do by Gold and Pearls? If a Pagan widow, in the law of Nature, condemned all the pleasures of marriage? what may be expected from a Christian Lady, who owes her chastity not only to a dead husband, but a living God, and with whom she ought to live and reign for ever? The reputation of Chastity is a most delicate Lily in the person of women: it is a very beautiful flower, but there needs no more then a little breath, a little bad air to corrupt it, when age bendeth towards vice, and that she hath the freedom of an husband's authority, whose shadow many times might serve as a Bulwark to Chastity. What doth a Widow in so great a Family, and amongst so many Servants, whom I would not have her to despise as Servants, but regard with some modesty, remembring with her self they are men? If the state and quality of her condition require a Retinue, let at the least some antient grave man be seen to bear sway, who by his good life may commend the honour of his Mistress. I know many of them, who having shut their door against strangers, have had an ill report raised by occasion of their Household-servants, who ministred matter of suspicion, either through excess of their bravery, or their gentile garb, and handsomness of proportion too lovely; either for their Age proper to wantonness, or the vanity of an haughty Spirit, or confidence in the favour of their Mistress.

All that by prudence should be prevented, which the world through malice may imagine. I desire not to set about you an Household-Steward so spruce, nor any Servant, who may savour of an effeminate Comedian; no wanton Musician (the true Instrument of Satan) to poyson your Ear with his warbling. Have nothing remiss, nothing which may smell of the Stage in your Family; but rather Quires of Widows, and Virgins, to be an honour to your Sex, and to serve as a recreation in your most innocent delights. Let the reading of godly Books never be laid aside, and let your prayers be so frequent, that they may serve as a Buckler to repel the fiery Arrows of evil thoughts, which ordinarily assail Youth. Let Virtue consummate the good, which Intemperance had prepared for it self. Redeem Virgins, to present them to the Chamber of the Spouse. Take care of Widows, to mingle them, as Violets, amongst Virgins, and Martyrs. It is a Garland you shall give to God for his crown of Thorns, wherein he bear the sins of the world.

It is very hard, and almost impossible, to cut away all the seeds of passion, which we may call Avant-passions, because Concupiscence soothes our Senses, and insinuateth it self very subtilely: but it is in the power of the will to dismiss, or entain them. The God of Nature said in the Gospel, Evil Thoughts, Homicides, Adulteries, Fornications, Thefts, false Witness-bearings, Blasphemies, proceeded from the heart. The spirit of man is more propending to evil then good, from the first cradle of Infancy; and in this battail of the Spirit and the Flesh, whereof the Apostle speaketh, our soul is almost wholly floating, and knows not to what part to incline. No man comes into the world without bringing Vice, and ill Inclinations with him; and he is the best, who hath the least evil, and can preserve a fair body amongst many Little Infirmities. Mat. 15. 19. Galat. 5. 1.

The Prophet, said, he was troubled, and that thereupon he held his peace. He tells you, one may be angry without sin, like Archytas the Tarentine, who said to his Servant, I would chastise thee, were I not angry; which sheweth, it was no sin, but a simple passion; for otherwise Anger puts not the Justice of God in execution. That, which is spoken of one passion, may be understood of another. It is proper to man to be moved with choler, and for a Christian to overcome choler. So the flesh desires carnal things, and by the itch thereof draweth the Soul to mortal pleasures: but it is your part to queneh the heat of lust by the love of Christ, and to conquer the flesh, when it seeks liberty, by the help of abstinence, in such sort, that in eating it may search for nourishment, not lust; and bear about the spirit of God, descending into it, with a firm and even pace. Every man may be subject to passions, which are common to Nature: we are of one and the same clay, of the same Element. Concupiscence may as well be found in Silk, as in Wool; it neither fears the Purple of Kings, nor contemns the poverty of Beggars. You were better to have the disease of Stomach, then will. Rather let the body obey, then the spirit; and if you must needs make a slippery step, do it rather with the foot, then modesty; not flattering your self before sin with pretense of a future penance, which is rather a remedy of misfortunes, then an ornament to Innocents: for you must ever defend your self from wounds, where sorrow serves for remedy. Psal. 76.

To MAIDS.

The thirty eighth SECTION.

The praises of Virginity, and the Modesty they ought to observe in their Carriage.

THE great S. Basil calleth Virginity The perfume of the living God: and I note from the thirtieth Chapter of Exodus, this perfume of God, which is spoken of, was composed of four Ingredients; to wit of Galbanum, Myrrh, Onyx, and Incense. Galbanum is the juice of an Aromatick herb, as white as Milk, & which, borrowing its name from Milk, figureth unto us the whiteness and purity of Virginity. Myrrh, it is Mortification. Onyx, a S. Basil. apud Metaphrast. λογῷ. Θυμίαμα Κυείας.

kind of little Oister, from whence issued a most odoriferous savour, signifies its Constancy: and Incense in flames, its Patience in tribulations. But as for Purity, I say, reasonable Nature hath engraven on the hearts of all Mortals, and namely, Maids, so particular a love of integrity, that Souls the most prostituted to sin have ever had some remorse and feeling of the honour they had forsaken.

Should I prove this by a passage of Scripture, or a Father, it were the less effectual; because it may be said, Chastity ought to be praised by such lips: I will evict this verity from the confession of a Pagan, to let you understand it is a voice of Nature. Behold a passage of Seneca, whom I have ever much admired! It is a wonder (saith he) that prostituted women still retain some modesty, and that those bodies, which seem not to be made but to serve as an object for publick uncleanness, have ever some veil for their unhappy patience. The infamous place it self is in some sort bashful. See the cause why there never hath been any people so loose, and exorbitant, which afforded not some honour to chastity, convinced by their own conscience. But we must likewise affirm, it was never known to be true purity, until the Standard be advanced by Jesus Christ, and his most blessed Mother.

Est aliqua etiam prostituta modestia, & illa corpora publico obiecta ludibrio aliquid, quo infelix patientia lateat, obtendunt; adeò impudens quoque verecundum est. Senec. Natural. quæstion. lat. c. 16.

We finde even among those, who lived in the law of Nature, some shadows of chastity. We have from the relation of Tertullian, that one Democritus voluntarily made himself blind by earnest looking on the Sun, that he might not behold the corporal beauty of women, shutting up two gates from love, to open a thousand to wisdom. But what chastity is this (I pray) since himself confesseth he did it not for any other purpose, but to be freed from the importunities of lust; seeking out therein his own peculiar ends, not the honour of the Creatour? A Christian Champion proceedeth much otherwise. He hath eys for the works of God, and none for concupiscence. He pulleth not out his eys to bereave himself of the spectacle of this Universe, but teareth from his heart all the roots of depraved thoughts, to prepare therein a Paradise to our Sovereign Lord and Master. He sees all, and desires nothing: and, although he touch at the sense of it, staies not in the consent. There is never a more undoubted triumph of chastity, then to deprive one's self of the instruments of evil. For, as very well Climachus saith; The dead are never crowned, nor any man justly praised for having the impotency of doing ill. We finde in antient Rome, Vestal Virgins, and in the City of Egea, and Temple of Delphos: we are not ignorant, that many have made profession of virginity: but what virginity? A virginity mingled with Idolatry, and secret impurities, loose liberty, and thoughts resigned to all kind of objects. Which caused Tertullian to say: (a) O goodly continency, which offers sacrifice to Hell.

Christianus uxori suæ soli masculus nascitur, animo adversus libidinem eorum est. Tertul. Apolog.

Νεκρὸς γὰρ οὐ στέφεται οὐδὲ νικᾷ ὁ μὴ ἀγωνισάμενος. Meliss. λογισ. (a) O constantiam Gehennæ sacerdotum! dialolus præcipit, & auditur; nihil apud eum refert aliis luxuriâ, aliis continentiâ occidere. Tertul. ad uxorem.

Virginity amongst Christians admitteth not one sole glance with deliberate consent; one dishonest thought, if voluntary. It reverenceth its secrets, and tells it not. Let us sin, none see us, there is nothing but darkness round about us, which cannot accuse us; our sins shall be letters sealed up from God. Nay, much otherwise; the eys of God are two flaming Torches more resplendent then the Sun it self, which will drench us in the Abyss: and for this cause we keep chaste our most secret thoughts. O excellent, and admirable purity! O the true juice of Galbanum! O the true tribute of Heaven!

Quis me videt? tenebræ circumdant me, quem vereor? dealborum meorum non commemorabitur Altissimus Eccl 23.26. Oculi Domini multò plus lucidi erunt super Solem, circumspicientes omnes vias hominum, & profundum abyssi.

Consider now the second Ingredient of the perfume of God, which is Myrrh; to wit, mortification of Senses. Where shall we finde throughout the whole Synagogue, and all antiquity, a Chastity preserved with so many austerities and mortifications, as in true Christianity? Saint Ambrose, in an Oration he made against Symmachus, mocketh at Vestal Virgins, who made a shew to embrace Virginity, living in superfluity and delights: which is, as if one would quench hot Embers with Oyl, or hope for beauty from the dawbing of a Coal. Mortification of appetites hath ever been esteemed by Saints as a Palissado of the delicious garden of Chastity, and formal reason proveth unto us, that, to cut off a vice subsisting in the flesh, necessarily the sinews of the flesh must be taken away. You may have as many fruits of honesty, as there are of it in terrestial Paradise: you may have an infinite number of Virtues, the ordinary companions of purity of body. If you destroy Mortification, the Serpent will enter into your Garden, and sting you.

Qui dissipat sepem, mordebit eum coluber. Eccl. 10.8.

O Maids, you infinitely betray the glory of your soul, when you think to preserve the treasure of purity in vanity, bravery, and curiosity, which have ever been accounted the nest of Immodesty. How can you imagine, that living in Banquets, pleasures, dissolute sports, among stage-plaies, love-pamphlets, and continual occasions of sin, you can keep to God the faith you promised him in your confessions. You deceive your self, you have betrayed your Bulwarks, and ruined your Ramparts; the Serpent will rush in upon you to suck your blood, and then will be a fit time indeed to cry out, Murder.

Quis misereatur incantatori à serpente percusso? Eccles. 12. 13.

You take delight to play with Aspicks, and then say, They have stung me, give me a remedy. Must you needs confide in Serpents? Must you needs approach so near to a creature untractable? With what Arms think you did the Church in its first beginning preserve this gift of Chastity, and raise it to such a degree, that it filled the world with astonishment, but by flight from occasions, but by rigours and austerities of life? What flames of sensuality did not they quench, who lived in Wildernesses, covered with skins, companions of brute beasts, feeding on roots pulled up with their nails, and steeped in the sweat of their fore-heads?

Circuierunt in melotis, in pellibus caprinis, egentes, angusti, afflicti; quibus dignus non erat mundus: in solitudinibus errantes, in montibus, & speluncis, & cavernis terræ. Hebr. 11. 37, 38.

All passed times have infinitely commended a Joseph, for leaving a cloak in his flight, in the hands of an unchaste Mistress: he forsook his own (saith S. Ambrose) as no longer accounting it his, since it was in the hands of an Adultereis, and thought a Garment, touched by the hands of an unchaste woman, was no longer for Joseph's wearing. If this act be laudable, what shall we say of those, who have not left a simple habit already polluted by an evil touch, but quite forsaken and abandoned, in their best health, their own bodies, although most chaste and innocent, to preserve purity of soul by an extraordinary mortification of flesh? What shall we say of a Christian Maid, of whom Isidore of Pelusium speaketh, who seeing her self sollicited by a young man, shaved her head close to the skin to cure another's love, depriving herself not of a coiff, not of a petticoat, or gown, but of an ornament, which is on woman's head, as flowers in medows? What shall we say of those, who to chastise a slight glance, rather curious, then unchaste, have put irons about their necks, that so they might perpetually look on the earth, as unworthy to behold Heaven? And what of others, who were threescore years without sight of any creature? Is not this properly to cast off, not a Cloak as Joseph, but the body, as if it were dead? Is not this to live Reliquit sua tanquam non sua, qua adultera suu manibus detinebat, & aliena judicavit, qua ab impudicitia poterant comprehendi. Ambros. de Joseph.

Isid. Pelus. lib. 2. Ep. 53

Accepimus ut refert Theodoretus & Menæa logia Græca.

Quid est dicere, Volo habere quod vincam, nisi volo habere quo peream? vide nè unde te putas habere triumphū æternum incurras opprobrium: inter omnia enim Christianorum pia certamina sola sunt dura prælia castitatis, ubi quotidiana pugna, & rara victoria. Auguſt. De vitanda familiaritate mulierum Tom. 9.

live in mortal fleſh as if he had it not? And can you think God hath ſold Virginity to ſuch, at the price of ſo many Travils and Mortifications, and will afford you it in pleaſures and continual converſation amongſt men, ſince where there is moſt battel, is moſt merit? What elſe is it to ſay, I will have wherewith to overcome, but that I will have wherewith to undo my ſelf? Be ware leſt you purchaſe an eternal ignominy, where you promiſe your ſelf a Triumph. For amongſt all the Battels of Chriſtian Religion none is more ſharp then that of Chaſtity, where the danger is daily, and the Victory very rare.

If you regard the third Ingredient of this Perfume, which is the Onyx, ſolid and permanent, the ſymbol of Conſtancy; where can you meet with a Virginity more bravely defended then among Chriſtians? For if conſtancy (as Saint Thomas teacheth) conſiſt in ſurmounting all difficulties and obſtacles, which offer to croſs a good affair, who hath overcome more innumerable in quantity, more ſharp in kind, more various in quality, then Virginity? Domeſtick enemies are ever moſt to be feared, and ſuch there are, who have torn Lions, that could not rend from their hearts the leaſt paſſion: but Virginity, how many times hath it within its own body extinguiſhed the flames of concupiſcence by couragious and magnanimous acts, as are thoſe, which we finde in the lives of ſo many Holy creatures? How often did ſome roul themſelves in Ice, and Snow; as Saint Francis? How often did others drag themſelves over Thorns, all torn and bloody; as Saint Bennet? How often did others fight againſt Fire with another Fire, taking in open hand the prime Element to vanquiſh the principal paſſion; as Saint Marcian? It ſeems to me, when I hear of theſe combates, I may apply a notable place of the ſeventy fourth Pſalm to them: Help, O my God, help; the earth of this mortal fleſh is all on fire, it is conſumed, if you aſſiſt not. What have you to fear, faithful Soul? anſwer the God of Hoſts. Be firm in your good purpoſe. It is I, who will ſtrengthen the Columns, and Foundation of the Earth: it is I, who will ſhiver in pieces the Bowes, Arrowes, Quivers, Bucklers, and Swords; yea all the temptations, and powers of Hell, oppoſed againſt thee. My God, thou madeſt it. O what peace I now finde in my heart, what great and Divine lights deſcend upon me from the eternal Mountaines!

Liquefacta eſt terra, ego confirmavi columnas ejus. Pſal. 74. 3. Confregi potentias, arcum, ſcutum, gladium, & bellum. Factus eſt in pace locus ejus. Illuminans tu mirabiliter de montibus æternis. Pſal. 75. 5. 2. 4.

Behold the Interiour combats, but if you regard the Exteriour, what violences, what warlike Engines have not been employed againſt Virginity? The teeth of Lions and Tigers were onely to be feared in Beaſts, yet they have been ſought out in Foreſts, and Wilderneſſes, to be encouraged againſt Virgins, and Virgins have vanquiſhed them. How many times hath a Lion been ſeen, let looſe againſt a ſilly Chriſtian Maid in an Amphitheatre, to lick her feet, and in ſight of fourſcore thouſand people adore his prey, taking upon him that courteſie, which in men was wanting? Coals, which caſt up devouring Flames, Frying-pans, boyling Cauldrons made their hair ſtand an end, who afar off beheld them without danger, yet Virgins felt them on their bodies, Virgins overcame them, Virgins ſtood free from hurt in the midſt of theſe horrours, ſinging the praiſes of God, and the Triumphs of Chaſtity. Wheels, armed with ſharp Irons to make bodies flie in pieces by gobbets, were the practiſes of Satan, never ſeen, heard, or thought on, yet being applied to the bodies of Virgins, Virgins blunted and rebated them with their tender and delicate fleſh.

Now, that none may object all this to be done by wily tricks of ecſtatick ſouls, and that there could not be a true conſtancy obſerved therein, which is onely ſeen, when there is a firm ſetling for ſome good ſpace in the exerciſe of a virtue, you find an infinite number of them, who waxed old in great combats, great afflictions, great auſterities, great flatterings, yet never left their reſolution. And to let others paſs under ſilence, who are innumerable, I will onely remember a Maid of Alexandria, endowed with an exquiſite Beauty, and ſued unto with all poſſible importunities, who hid her ſelf in a Sepulchre of the dead, and lived twelve years in a little Cell made to lodge ſuch, as had nothing to do with the world: ſhe being found in this manner, and asked what ſhe meant to do, made anſwer: I preſerve the treaſure of Chaſtity amongſt theſe dead Carcaſes, from whence I behold not the ſparkles of concupiſcence to flie. O my God, what conſtancy is this! what vigour of ſpirit! what Adamantine courage! and what may weak ſouls ſay to this, who yield at the firſt brunt, and ſeem to have nothing in the world more eaſie and familiar, then to loſe that, which can never be recovered.

O quàm pulchra eſt caſta generatio cum claritate? immortalis eſt enim memoria illius, &c. Et in perpetuum coronata triumphat, in coinquinatorum certamine præmium vincens. Sapient. 4. 1. 2.

Theſaurum caſtitatis ſervat inter arentes calvarias unda nulla flammas erumpit. Raderus.

To conclude, conſtancy being never conſummate without perſeverance to the laſt breath, behold the fourth Ingredient of the Perfume of God, which is Incenſe, and you ſhall ſee that as Incenſe is melted on Coals, ſo many have been diſſolved in Torments for the defence of Chaſtity. Some have preſently yielded up their Lives, others were burned with a ſlow Fire, delivering their bodies up to Flames, as freely as one would be deſpoiled of a Garment. Witneſs that Young man mentioned by S. Hierom, faſt tyed with Silken cords upon a Bed all ſtrewed over with Flowers, who, in ſuch poſture having nothing at liberty but his Tongue, ſpit it out all bloody in the face of a Lewd woman, who came to tempt him. Witneſs another Maid called Lucie, who lived a Virgin among many others, and whoſe exquiſite Beauty was ſought unto with vehement ſollicitations by a powerful Lord, who, having command and authority in his hands, ſent meſſengers of his fury to ſeize on this innocent Lamb; and whileſt they were at the gate menacing to kill her, and to ſet all on fire if this poor creature were not delivered into their hands, the Maid came forth. Who is there, Sirs, ſaid ſhe? What demand you? I beſeech you, tell me whether there be any thing in my power to purchaſe your Lord and Maſters love? Yea (anſwered they in a flouting manner) your eys have gained him, nor ever can he reſt till he enjoy them. Well, go to then (ſaith ſhe) onely ſuffer me to go to my Chamber, and I will give ſatisfaction in this point. The poor Maid, ſeeing herſelf between the Hammer and the Anvile, acted a thing at that time, which could never have been done without the particular revelation of God; ſhe ſpake to her eys, and ſaid: How my eys are you then guilty? I know the reſervedneſs and ſinplicity of your glances, nor have I in that kind any remorſe of conſcience. But howſoever it be, you appear to me not innocent enough; ſince you have kindled fire in the heart of a man, whoſe Hatred I have ever more eſteemed then his Love: Quench with your blood the flame you have raiſed. Whereupon with a hand piouſly cruel ſhe digged out her eys, and ſent the torn reliques embrewed in her blood to him, who ſought her, adding: Behold what you love! He ſeized with horrour, haſtened to hide himſelf in a Monaſtery, where he remained the reſt of his days to expiate his loves. O incomparable patience! I would go further, but ſhe ſtays me. For what can I ſpeak more, having ſaid this? Is it Raderus in Viridario.

not

not enough to shew Chastity can do little of it self, but that it dissolveth as Incense on the burning Coals of Charity? To give away the light of the day, the sweetest of all creatures; to give up her blood drop after drop; to give her torn eyes, so to avoid a sin, which faithless souls accompt but a sport! Infinite many pusillanimous people, justly chastised for their sins, cannot endure the least sting, but with complaint and murmur against God; they burn, but it is as Laurels, crackling in the Flames: but this Virgin in the sharpest rigours of a most sensible torment burnt sweetly, couragiously, silently. O what a Perfume of the living God is Virginity! If the smoak of the bodies of the Damned, and despairing Babylon, perpetually mount to Heaven in a Sacrifice of Vengeance, may we not affirm this delicious Perfume of Virginity will on the other side ascend as a Sacrifice of Honour, whilest there is Religion and Altars, Men and Angels? O Women, prodigal of a good irrecoverable! Ah wretched Maids! Ah young witless Women, that give for a momentary delight a treasure, for which the Church hath shed so much blood! Ah inexcusable Treachery, to give to a bold libertine what is taken from Jesus Christ! Ah Pusillanimity, to yield at the first shock, by delivering up a gift of God, for which so many Virgins have persisted under the teeth and paws of Lions, under the sharp Irons of tyrannical Wheels, in Cauldrons of scalding hot Oyl, in the tearing out their Eye-strings, in dislocation of their Bones, and Massacring their Bodies, yea even to the last breath of life.

Unhappy victime, made a prey to dishonour, what wilt thou answer to an Agnes, a Thecla, a Katharine, a Lucie, when they shall shew thee their Palms, their Blood and Wounds, more bright and radiant then the Stars in the Skie? And what will they say? Behold what we have suffered for a virtue, which thou hast so slightly valued, as to trample it under foot, and through a strange prostitution hast thrown into their eys, who required it not. O Mothers, breed your Daughters piously; and preserve them as Pledges charily recommended unto you by Almighty God. What a shame, what an ignominie, nay, what a fury, to behold maids now adays ill taught, bold amongst men as Souldiers, wanton as leaping Kids, and impudent as Sirens! Who hath ever sequestred shamefacedness from the soul, that did not separate modesty from the body? How can you accompt a gadding House-wife, a dancing Reveller, an idle Wanton to be modest, since the strongest Chastities have now adays much ado to defend themselves from calumnie? Snares are laid on every side, as well upon the Mountain, as the Valley. There is not a stone, whereon some Scorpion sleepeth not. Never was the lust of impudent men so enflamed, and yet you dally without fear, or danger. Hearken to the advise of S. Hierom, concerning the Instruction of Maids, with which I will conclude this discourse:

Hieron. ad Laetam.

Let a Maid, who ought to be the Temple of God, be so instructed, that she neither hear, nor speak any thing, which tendeth not to the fear of God. Let not impure speeches approach her ears. Let her be ignorant of worldly pleasures. Let her tongue in her tender years be seasoned with the praises of Jesus Christ. Let her banish young men from her company, who have any loose fashion in their behaviour, and let the maids themselves, who come amongst them, be alienated from worldly commerce, lest having been ill Disciples of sensuality, they thereby become the worse Mistresses. If she also learn to read, let her Letters be made of Box, or Ivory, and be all called by their names, that so they may be a recreation for her eys, to serve as instruments for her instruction. Let her in good time practice to write, and let her tender hand be guided on the Paper, to trace the Letters, which are shewed her. Let her have some reward for doing well; for in this her minority these slight ornaments prove to be an allurement to virtue. Let her have companions for emulation, and entertain a generous envy against their praise. Let her not be chidden, if she be of an heavy spirit, but encouraged by the help of commendation. Let her take delight to overcome, and be as loth to be vanquished. Heed must be taken, she hate not study, and travel, lest the bitterness she may conceive in her infancy, spread beyond her most innocent years. Let the first Letters she begins to call, compose some holy Names, to prepare her memory to Piety. Let her have a Governess grave and modest. Let her entertain her companions with serenity of countenance. Let her become affable and amiable to all the world. Accustom her not to wear Pendants in her ears, to Paint, to load her neck and head with Pearls. Change not the colour of her hair by Art, nor Frizzle, or Crisp her with Fire and Irons, lest it prove a prediction of infernal Flames. Take heed she be not touched with the Hammer, which now adays strikes all the world, to wit, Vanity. Let her not drink in the Cup of Babylon, which is Impurity. Beware she go not forth with Dinah, to see how the maids of the County are attired. Let her not be a Dancer, nor gawdy in Apparel. Poyson is not given but by rubbing the Goblet with Honey, nor doth Vice deceive us but under colour and pretext of Virtue.

Above all, let her see nothing either in Father, or Mother, the imitation whereof may make her guilty. Let her be disposed to the reading of good Books, and never appear in publick without the advise of her Mother. Let her not entertain some spruce young Amourist to cast wanton Glances; nor let her beay particular Affection towards any of her Servants, who may whisper in her ear, but cause them to speak aloud, that all the rest may hear. Let her orderly every day offer her Devotion to God; be very sober in her Deportment, and delighted with Works worthy of her condition. Let her be most obedient; nor ever so hardy as to see any, or undertake ought, without their leave, who govern her. Doing this, she shall save her soul, and edifie all the world.

To Fathers and Mothers.

The thirty ninth SECTION.

Concerning the Education, and Instruction of their Children.

O What a goodly Chain of gold is Charity, which with its many Links enchaineth the world! The more closely it shutteth, the more strength it affordeth, the more it tieth our hearts, the more it fasteneth our felicities. The first liberty of a reasonable creature is the thraldom of an honest love, wherein Fathers and Mothers have a great part; for their union floweth from the bowels of Nature, and none can falsifie it, who violate not the first Laws of the world. The Father loves the Son as a portion cut from himself, naturally the Son loves the Father; and so often as he wandereth from this love, he is like a Fish out of the Water. This was the conceit, which S. Ambrose had upon the passage of Genesis, Let the Waters bring forth Fish. Let the good Mother be the Water, and good Children the Fish, saith he. God once commanded the Water to bring forth Fish, and instantly it obeyed, and ever since for almost these six thousand years, that the world wheels about, the Water feedeth its Fishes without murmur, and the Fish never go out of the Water but by constraint. O man, who hast taught divisions between Father and Son, Mother and Daughter, thou shouldst be ashamed: entreat the Water to teach thee, and the Fish to shew thee thy lesson. It is a strange thing, the Patriarch Noe, justly provoked against an unnatural Son, who had revealed the nakedness of his Father, shooteth the Arrow of malediction, not against the head of the guilty Son, but his Children; he curseth not Cham, but Canaan; and if you ask why, Theodoret upon Genesis answereth, Noe would not curse him, whom God had blessed: for this had been to take off the seal of the Sovereign Master, and rase his Edicts. But S. Ambrose says very pertinently, that Noe, the more to punish his evil Son, curst him in his race: as if the wounds, which Fathers receive in the Producant aqua reptile. Genes. 1. 20

Quàm bona mater sit aqua, hinc considera, ô homo: docuisti altercationes parentum in filios, separationes, odia, offensam; disce ergò ab aqua, qua sit parentum & filiorum necessitudo.

Genes. 9. 25 Maledictus Chanaan, servus servorum erit.

the affliction of their children, were more ſenſible to them, then their proper and perſonal hurts. Take away the beam from the Sun, and he ſhines not; the ſtream from the Fountain, it drieth up; the member from the body, it putrifies; the ſon from the father, and he no longer is a ſon. This admitted and reſolved, we draw a neceſſary conſequence from the reciprocal love between two. And ſince we muſt hereafter ſpeak of the duty of ſons towards their parents; let us now purſue the courſe begun, and mention the duty of parents towards their children.

One would not at firſt perhaps believe what I ſay; but it is moſt undoubted, Parents are in ſome ſort more obliged to their children, then children to parents. For, who is more bound then he, who, by juſtice both divine, and humane, oweth moſt? Now, what owe children to their parents? The life they received, which they cannot render again, and therefore are not bound to it: well may they owe the honour, which falls upon themſelves; well, the helps and ſervices in caſe of neceſſity. But, the father, ſo ſoon as the infant hath ſet foot into being, is very ſtraightly obliged to provide him two things; Nouriſhment, and Inſtruction, according to capacity. Theſe are the two heads of this diſcourſe, wherein I purpoſe to ſhew (O Fathers, and Mothers) that you commit a great ſin, when you abandon your children, to become a prey of miſery, ignorance, and iniquity.

The Reaſons are evident: for firſt, you ſin againſt the grand law of Nature, written by God with a ſtyle of fire, not only on the hearts of all living creatures, but even on Plants, which is to cheriſh what they have produced. Grapes hang on the Vine, Fruits on the Tree, and take with time their juſt encreaſe from the juice and ſubſtance of the wood, which brings them forth. The Lamb knows his Damm among a thouſand to ſuck her, and ask the tribute of Nature. Eagles bear their young on their backs: Serpents throw themſelves many times into boyling Caldrons to ſave their eggs. The Pelican, as the report is, lets herſelf blood, to make a bath of it for her brood. And you in this Veſſel of the vaſt world, wherein all creatures row alike in this point according to the courſe of Nature, would you be an unprofitable burden? Deſerve not you to be baniſhed from all the parts of the earth, and not to enjoy any thing but fire, or nothing to ſettle on, ſince the one is barren, and the other devoureth all. Secondly, See you not, that, neglecting your children, you do like an Adulterer, not a Father? For what ſeeks the Adulterer, Poſterity? No, To afford a child to the world, ſervant to God, a citizen to the Common-wealth? No, to have a creature, who may ſerve for the exerciſe of his charity, to be an object of his providence, and an encouragement for his diligence? No. What pretends he then? Loathſom and lewd luſt. And what do you elſe, when after conſummation of marriage, and the birth of a ſon, you careleſly leave him, without providing for his neceſſities? Beſides, if (as ſaith Tertullian) it is to be an homicide anticated, to hinder the generation of man, what will it then be, when he is already born and regiſtred amongſt mortals, through remiſneſs and ſloth, to ſuffer him to die with hunger, cold, thirſt, and miſery? When wrinkles and grieſly hairs ſhall ſeize on your forehead; when old age ſhall bow your back, and neceſſity caſt you into calamity: with what face dare you crave help from that ſon, or daughter, whom you all the time of their life have neglected? Were it not well, all creatures made complaint over your aſhes?

Homicidii feſtinatio eſt prohibere naſci. Tertul. Apol.

This man will perhaps anſwer, As for my part, (God's name be praiſed) I have had a care of my children, they want nothing neceſſary for ſuſtentation of life. Is it enough to give them neceſſaries? But how do you give them? without love, and void of charity: as a ſtony loaf given and taken by conſtraint. Fathers, and Mothers, it is a ſtrange thing to ſee your odd proceedings: One loves the male, another the female; one the girls, another the boies: one this, becauſe he is noſed like himſelf; the other that, becauſe ſhe hath her eies, gate, and ſpeech. The father takes his Idol to his ſide, the mother hers; and in one and the ſame houſe ſet up Altar againſt Altar: If you ſtrike my little Deity, I will not ſpare yours; If you bring not incenſe to mine, I will overthrow yours. Childiſh and ridiculous people! to caſt affection on children through ſenſuality, paſſion, and fury, perpetually to fall out about children, to let them ſuck diſcord with their milk, from the example of thoſe who begot them: what is it elſe, but early to put a ſword into the hand of theſe little creatures; but to tear one another, and to cheriſh factions and partialities, before their eies be open to underſtand them?

Partiality of Parents

Let them look to it, who govern in ſuch manner, (ſaith the other) as for my ſelf, I take no other care then to breed my children well, and regard them all alike. What do you call breed them well? Behold another vice: ſome offend through negligence, others with too much indulgence. You term well-breeding the childe, to cram him up to the throat, and let him have all he asketh. Senſeleſs creature! ſee you not firſt, you do a great injury to God? He hath truſted a childe in your hand to be bred like a man, and you have made a lump of fleſh of it, a Bear's whelp, and think there is nothing to be done, but to lick it, that it may grow. Secondly, It is a baſe thing to ſay, the ſovereign Creatour having made you a Father, Maſter, Directour, and Governour, over this Infant, you ſhould forget the character God hath engraven on your face, and make your ſelf a ſlave of a gluttonous belly, and an irregular concupiſcence. Beſides, you put ſpurs to his vices, to make him run head-long into the precipice: you nooſe halters to ſtrangle him, you light torches to conſume him. For what good can be hoped, nay, what evil not expected from a childe bred up in pride and effeminacy? Hear Tertullian ſpeak; Take away the curioſities, and ſuperfluities. It is not the life of a Chriſtian. He hath renounced faith, who breedeth his children in riot. Is it not a goodly thing to ſee Hercules ſpin ſilk with thoſe hands, which were made to vanquiſh monſters? Know, God hath put us into the world to hew monſters more pernicious then Hydras, or Cerberus, and not to make Coronets of Roſes. You cannot breed your children in voluptuouſneſs, and not thereby render their ſouls ſoft and effeminate, which quite extinguiſheth the flame of a generous ſpirit: and yet you complain, that coming to the degrees of maturity, they are fit for nothing, but to live lazily, and pick quarrels. But it is no whit to be wondered at; it is the tincture you gave them from their moſt tender years. You have made them all their lifetime to dance to the tune of their own proper wills, light, fond, and childiſh; and now you would put the bridle over their necks, and make them lead a ſerious life. Know you not what happened to the horſes of the Sybarites, an effeminate kinde of people, who were ſo intoxicated and addicted to dances and balls, that not ſo much as their horſes but learnt to dance? In the mean time their enemies awakened wakened them, and ſo cloſely purſued them, that they were enforced to take arms for the defence of their lives. They drew into the field a brave ſquadron of Cavalry, the flower and ſtrength of the City: but a Fidler, ſeeing them approach mounted on theſe dancing horſes, promiſed their Adverſaries to deliver them into their hands, whileſt they were dancing: and inſtantly he began to ſtrike up his Violin, and the horſes to beſtir themſelves in dancing, to break all their ranks, and put the Army into diſorder; which ſhamefully made them become a prey to their enemies. Behold (O indulgent parents) what happeneth to your children! You have always bred them in ſottiſhneſs, ſports, and liberty, the fatal plagues of youth: when they muſt come to combate, to undertake ſome brave affair, ſome thing important for the good of their Country, for the honour of your houſe, for the advancement of themſelves, they ſtand eclipſed. Nay, perhaps it might be tolerable, to behold them benummed, and ſtupified in worldly affairs; but they are deaf, blind, and dumb in matters concerning God: ſo that, whilſt you ſeek to make great and powerful Lords of them, you (e're aware) have drawn the malediction of the Serpent upon them, and made them creep on their bellies; as much as to ſay, according to the interpretation of ſome Fathers, to ſpend their thoughts, ſtudy, and affection, upon the care and education of the body, to the prejudice of the Soul. Yet you would have thoſe creatures to be inſtructed in the law of God. How can it be? Do you not well know, that Moſes, ſeeing the Iſraelites dance with full bellies about the golden Calf, brake the Tables of the Law? If you demand the reaſon, S. Hierom will tell you, he knew the law of God was not for Sporters, Dancers, and Drunkards; and that in the kingdom of Intemperance an Eclipſe enſues, not only of the Divine Law, but of Nature alſo.

Diſcutienda ſunt delicia, quarum mollitie & fluxu fidei virtus effeminari ſolet. Tertul. De cultu fœmin.

Supra pectus tuum, & ventrem tuum gradieris.

Ἐπὶ τῇ στήθει, καὶ τῇ κοιλίᾳ, LXX Interpr. Geneſ. 3. 14

Sciebat Dei ſermonem non poſſe audire temulentos.

I come to the ſecond point, which is Inſtruction, ſo much recommended in Scripture. If you have children (ſaith the Wiſe-man) inſtruct them, and take great care of them from their childe-hood. You muſt think your children be as Temples of God, recommended unto you from the hand of God himſelf. It is an intolerable thing to have good Cooks, good Lackeys, good Grooms, good Horſe-boys, to ſerve the belly and ſtable: and a Father, who ſends his Son to Schole, many times ignorant, whether the Maſter be black, or white; good, or bad; milde, or harſh; religious, or wicked. If Kine, or Hogs, are to be driven into the fields, one is ſought out, who knows the buſineſs. But to train up a childe of a good family an idle fellow many times is truſted, who hath in him no talent at all, but malice and ignorance. Fathers, and Mothers, fear you not, God will ſay unto you; My houſe is forſaken, I freed it from evil Spirits, I with-drew it from the power of Divels, I purged, decked, and adorned it; I put it into your protection, I conſigned it into your hands: What have you done with it? Why have you polluted it, and why ſuffer you it ſtill to lie drenched in ordure? You have put the Lamb into the Wolf's keeping, you have given the Victim to the ſlaughter-man, you are the cauſe of his unhappineſs, you have twiſted the cord of his ruine, ſo ſoon almoſt as the web of his life. Fathers and Mothers do well, if they become as great Saints as are the Hermits of the Deſert: but, if they neglect their childe, they render themſelves guilty before God of one of the greateſt injuſtices in the world. The Scripture, in praiſing the great Patriarch Noe, doth not only ſay, he was a good man in his own perſon, but in his whole race, ſo far as his power extended.

Filli tibi ſunt, erudi illos, & cura illos à pueritia illorum. Prov. 7.

Noë vir juſtus, & perfectus in generationibus ſuis. Geneſ. 6. 9.

As much honour and glory as it is to leave a good Citizen to the Common-wealth; ſo much diſhonour and infamy it is, to afford it ungracious wretches to trouble its repoſe, diſ-unite peace, and embroil affairs. They are ſuch, of whom the Scripture ſpeaketh: They ſhall be nails in your eys, and lances in your ſides; and they ſhall oppoſe you in the land of your abode. Cruel Father that thou art, who, quite dead, and turned into aſhes, afflicteſt the Common-wealth by Children ill inſtructed, thou woundeſt and teareſt Chriſtianity. Were it not injuſtice, thinkeſt thou, to break up thy Tomb, and diſturb thy aſhes, for having voluntarily bred a little Viper for thy Country, to which thou art accomptable for thy life? And from hence it cometh to paſs, that Fathers, who have carried themſelves ſo negligently and perfidiouſly in their childrens inſtruction, are the firſt, who drink down the poyſon they mingled for others, over-whelmed with toyls, and miſeries, for the continual diſorders of theſe Extravagants. O how often they make complaint like the Eagle in the Emblem of Julian, when, ſtrucken by a mortal Arrow, partly framed out of her own wings, ſhe ſaid, Out alas, wretched bird that I am! muſt I breed feathers to ſerve as a ſwift Chariot to the ſteel, which transfixeth my body? Muſt I bring forth children to give me the ſtroke of death? What remedy then for this unhappineſs, which, creeping into the bowels of the moſt flouriſhing Monarchies, depopulates and deprives them of good ſubjects, and furniſheth them with the ſhadows of men? What remedy, but to obſerve three things in this matter? Firſt, To give a good tincture of Religion to your children, pious apprehenſions of God, and a filial fear of his judgments. Secondly, To manure them with Arts ſuitable to their underſtanding and condition, to ſettle them in the world upon ſome good employment, leſt, having nought to do, they become fit to act any evil. Thirdly, To accommodate them, as much as poſſibly and reaſonably may be, with exteriour moveables, called the bleſſings of Fortune, that neceſſity open not them the gate of iniquity; and then leave the reſt to the providence of God, whoſe eie is alwaies open over his work. Behold the courſe moſt fit to be obſerved! Piety goeth foremoſt: for, as the eloquent Prelate of Cyrenes ſaith, It is not only the foundation of houſes, but of whole Monarchies.

Erunt vobis clavi in oculis, & lancea in lateribus, & adverſabuntur vobis in terra habitationis veſtra. Num. 33.

Syneſ. ad Arcad.

Parents now adaies ſeek to do quite contrary, and ſet the cart before the horſe: they voluntarily imitate the ſtupidity of thoſe Egyptians, who prepared Altars to a Reer-mouſe, for no other reaſon, but that ſhe is weak-ſighted, and is a friend of the night. Now they preferred darkneſs before light, by right of Antiquity: but theſe do much worſe; for, putting Heaven and Earth into one balance, they ſet an eſtimate upon terrene things, to the vilifying and confuſion of celeſtial. Nay, there are Mothers to be found ſo malicious, as was one named Clotilda, not the Saint, but a mad-woman, who, being put to her choice, either to conſent, her ſons ſhould enter into a Monaſtery to become religious, or reſolve to ſee them loſe their lives. Kill, kill, ſaid ſhe, I had rather behold them dead, then Monks. How many are there now adays, who for a need would ſuffer their children to become Pages to Antichriſt, to make a fortune; at the leaſt, would well endure to ſee them preferred to honour in the great Turk's Court, with ſhipwrack of their Religion?

There

There are few Queen Blanches, either in courage or worth, who rather desired to behold her children in their grave, then in sin. They must now adays be either Cæsars, or nothing. None fear to put them into infamous houses, into scandalous places, to give them most wicked Teachers, to thrust them into snares, and scandals, under hope of some preferment. Nay, with how many travels, and services, crouchings, and crimes, do these miserable creatures purchase their chains? All cannot finde a fortune in Court. Warfare picks out those with a kinde of disdain, whom it entertains for labours, and hazards of life. Only Virtue shuts not the gate against any, yet it is daily despised.

Non omnes curia admittit: castra quos ad laborem & pericula recipiant, fastidiosè legunt; bona mens omnibus patet. Senec. Ep. 44.

Unfortunate Fathers and wretched Mothers, live on gall and tears, rise and go to bed with gnawing care, to set an ungrateful son on the top of Fortunes wheel, who quickly grows weary of them, and after their deaths, gluts himself with the delights, they with so much industry prepared for him; mindless of those who obliged him: Nay, far otherwise, he unfolds the Riots of his unbridled youth even upon their Tombs. God grant this evil may pass no further, and that the father and son do not one day reproach one another in the flames of Hell, that the one ministred matter of damnation, and the other gave accomplishment. William the learned Bishop of Lions relateth, that a young Hermit, retiring into a horrid wilderness to attend the exercise of penance, saw his father and brother, whom he had left in the world, embroiled in ill causes, at that time deceased and buried in everlasting fire, who made hideous complaints: the son questioning his father as authour of his ruine, by amassing unjust riches for him, and the father answering, the son was the source of all his calamities, since, to make him rich, he had spent his miserable life in perpetual anxiety, and now suffered eternal punishments in the other world, for loving a disloyal son more then Almighty God. Cursed blindness, to buy Tortures and Gibbets with afflictions and crosses! O Fathers, and Mothers, let your first care extend to those whom you begat, to teach them virtue rather by your example, then others instruction. These young creatures are your shadows, your ecchoes; they turn and winde themselves easily, to imitate those who gave them life, and from whom they hope both wealth and honour. Wo to the Father, and Mother, who make their children witnesses of their crimes, and not content to be evil, make their sin immortal in the immortality of their discent! An Infant, though but two years old, should be used with much regard, as if it were an Intelligence enchased in this little body. It is a great sacrilege to impress the first tincture of vice on those, who as yet rest in the innocency of baptism. The good Eleazar being advised to dissemble his Religion to save his life, or at least to make semblance of eating hogs-flesh, beholding round about him many youths, who expected the end of this combate, pronounced these worthy words couched in S. Ambrose: God forbid, I should serve for an incentive to the vices of these young people, who should rather be a pattern of wisdom. God forbid, I defile my gray hairs with this execration, and that Posterity may take notice, I opened the gate to impiety by my example. That is undoubted which Julius Firmicus spake: Nothing hath so much advanced the power of Satan, as the making of sinful gods. The young man looking on the statue of Jupiter soothed his own lust, and drew the nourishment of his sin even from Altars. So doth the Son, who beholds himself in the vices of his Father, and takes paternal authority for pledge of his wickedness. I leave you to think, if in Exodus 22. he, who unawares suffered a silly spark to fly into his neighbour's corn, be guilty of the fires hurt, as we heretofore told you, what will it be with a Father, who in his house shall enkindle the torch of iniquity to enflame his whole family? First then, lay the foundation of piety, and consequently finde employments for your children, lest they consume in idleness, which is the Seminary of all vices.

Guliel. de Lugdun. tract. De avarit. rubric. 11.

Nequaquam contingat mihi, ut sim senex incentivum juvenilis erroris, qui esse debet forma salutaris instituti. Ambros. l. 2. de Jacob.

Adulterio delectatus aliquis? Jovem respicit, & in de cupiditatis sua fomenta conspirit. Julius Firm. de error. profan.

Charlemain soon put his sons to exercises, and commanded his daughters to sow, or spin, that the gate might be shut up against lazy sluggishness of spirit, wherewith the soul suffers it self insensibly to slide into all sorts of corruptions. Yea, great discretion must be used in this point, not to enforce children to undertake Vocations wholly disproportionable to their humours and qualities, to make them thereby row all the rest of their life against the stream. Saint Basil in the Epistle to Eudoxius praiseth the Athenians, who tried the nature of their children, before they put them to any profession, proposing unto them sundry instruments of all kinde of Arts, and easily admitting that, to which they most inclined. As for accommodation, you must therein reasonably provide according to your estate, and not according to the extravagant Ideas of this insatiable Age. It is an admirable thing to see to what a height these offices and huge marriages are mounted; I think they will fly into the Kingdom of the Moon. The time hath been, when a man was thought rich, who had fifty Crowns of yearly rent. We finde when the marriages of the daughters of France exceeded not six thousand crowns paid down. Nay, which is more, daughters were bought, and now they purchase husbands with prodigious summs. This is it, which wasteth spirits, which renders instructions unprofitable, and throws all our evils into the despair of remedy. If you knew well how to order this matter, you would finde repose and facility in the rest of the government of youth: and when you have done that which belongs to you leave the rest in the hands of the Divine Providence, who well understands how to handle the web of our lives, and to apply every one to what is fittest for his salvation. If all I have said (O Fathers, and Mothers) be not sufficient to instruct and perswade you, I would draw hither out of the other world Hely the High-priest, severely punished by the revengeful hand of God, for negligences committed in the education of his children. He would cry aloud unto you; I am that Hely, heretofore the prime man amongst the people of God: that Hely, from whose lips passed so many brave Oracles: that Hely, who with the wink of an eie, made the people obedient: that Hely, who shined as a pharus in the Tabernacle of God; and in the mean space, for permitting youthful follies and indiscrete liberty to my children, see me become the object of the most enflamed anger of God, which may be imagined against one of my profession. Behold me, cast from the High-priesthood as a rotten member, my house everlastingly deprived of that honourable dignity, all my Posterity condemned to die under the scourge of God, and not any one of them ever to attain to man's estate: another enriched with my spoils, which my Nephews shall never see but to wither with grief, in consideration of the felicity of their rival: my two Sons sensual and voluptuous, slain in one day, my daughter-in-law dead in Childbed; but above all, through my sin, the Ark of God taken away by enemies, and dishonoured by Infidels: and lastly, my self buried under the ruines of my Country, as the last Victim of God's Justice. O Sovereign Creatour of Heaven, and Earth, how terrible thou art! nay, how just; nay, how severe, to chastise Parents for the sins of their Children! but how reasonable in this their punishment? Fathers, and Mothers fear: Fathers, and Mothers shake under the hand of the Omnipotent: Fathers, and Mothers be satified with your own sins, and carry not your childrens into the other world: instruct them so, that in their education you may finde the discharge of your consciences, they good doctrine, and you rest, and comfort, to have well-bred them.

The fourtieth SECTION.

Advice to Children, concerning the Duty they should render to their Fathers, and Mothers, contrary to the contumacy of irregular Youth.

Funiculus triplex difficilè rumpitur.

THe Wise-man said, It was an hard matter to break a triple Cord. A triple Law, Divine, Natural, and Civil, hath straightly bound Children to the honour, and duty, they ordinarily yield to Parents. He is forsaken of God, an enemy of Nature, and an Infringer of publick Tranquillity, who would be exempted.

First, I say, Nature distilleth with the Soul those amorous infusions of Amity, which Children have towards their Fathers, and Mothers. The Beam belongeth to its Sun, the River to its Fountain, the Branch to its Tree, and the Childe to his Progenitours. They are not Storks alone, who have taught us the law of reciprocal Love: Lions, though of nature untractable, of live savage, even in their roaring moods, which make Woods and Mountains tremble, give us a lesson of this Charity. Lions Whelps, whose paws itch, and blood boileth in their veins, go chearfully an hunting to seek out food for their Sire now worn with age. And Hunters have often observed an old Lion lying in the enterance of a Cave, and a young one to come laden with booty, putting it into the paws of the other, who expected it. He received the prey, making shew of a thousand thanks to his Whelp, which freely divided the prize according to the law of Nature. These inclinations are found even in Birds of rapine, who pull the prey one from another, to feed those with it, who begat them.

Albertus Magnus noteth, that Fowlers, seeking for Goshawks, found one in a vast Wilderness perched upon a tree, not offering to stir from them, but seeming wholly immovable. They wondering why this bird flew not away at the sight of men, as well as others of her kinde, perceived, she was weak, blinde, lame, and wasted with decrepit age: whereupon they hid themselves, expecting the coming of other Goshawks; when instantly, behold! two hastened thither laden with meat, which they pulled in pieces, and thrust into the beak of the poor old one. They made no doubt, but these were the young, who fed the Dam. O! what charms of Nature? nay rather, what providence of God? Is not he an Apostata to the great Law of the world, who violateth charity due to Fathers, and Mothers?

As for humane Laws, what have they in them more noble, or Religious, then the charitable offices of Children towards those, who begat them? If we believe the History of the Persians, there have been some found amongst them, who voluntarily made wounds on themselves to bury therein some part of the bodies of their Parents reduced to ashes? A matter truly very strange, and which confoundeth the ingratitude of children, who deign not to preserve the memory of their Fathers so much as in their hearts, much less their ashes on their bodies.

Aelian. De animal. l.16. c. 7.

Hath not Tertullian written, that certain people, called the Nasamones, through much reverence held their meeting over the Tombs of their Ancestours, as upon Oracles? Doth not Herodotus make mention of the Issedons, a people of Scythia, who enchase the heads of their deceased Ancestours in Gold, and reverence them as things sacred? And although there be in this action reprehensible superstition, yet it is much more tolerable then the Law of the Egyptians, who burnt Incense to Rats, and Crocodiles.

Tertul. De anima. c. 57

Herodot. l. 4.

On the other part, Nicolas Damascene assureth us, the Pisidians presented the first-fruits of all the Viands of a Feast to their Fathers, and Mothers, thinking it an unworthy thing to take refection without honour done to the Authours of life.

Nic. Damasc.

Yea, Plato passeth so far, as to call Parents ἀγάλματα, καὶ κειμήλια, as one would say, Houshold-Gods, the pledges of Religion, the reliques and choicest pieces of the houshold treasure. Solon would never establish the law against Parricides, saying, God forbid, a Monster should ever come into our Common-wealth. Against impossible crimes there needs no prohibition. Did not Romulus the like in the institution of his Common-wealth? He never inserted one word of the sin of Parricide, as if it had been a mere Chimera: and verily six hundred years passed in the City of Rome amongst Pagans, and not so much as the name thereof known. The first stained with this barbarous cruelty was one Lucius Ostius, detested afterwards through all Ages. Men not knowing what punishment to invent for this monstrous sin, it was said, such should be thrown into the water, shut up in a sack with an Ape, a Cock, and a Viper.

Plato, De Leg. 11.

Finaly, Aristotle, who is ever in Argumental discourses, will not make use of any for the honour of Parents: for saith he, That man, who doubteth of the honour of Gods, and Parents, let him be instructed, not with words, but sharp punishments.

Arist. 8. Top.

As for the Divine Law, what hath it more authentically recommended, then this band of Charity? What doth it inculcate with more respect, after the honour of God, then duty towards Parents? For whom are recompenses awarded, if not for the piety of Children? And for whom Menaces, but for their rebellion? Saint Thomas in his seventh little Treatise observeth, how in the Decalogue, after that which concerneth God, immediately followeth the precept of the honour due to the Authours of our life, for the resemblance they have to God. And Philo saith, this Commandment is the knot and ty of all the Law. Saint Augustine writing upon the passage of Saint Paul, God, from whom all fatherhood proceedeth, saith, That God is the Prince of all Fathers, & Fathers the Vicars of God, because they give Children (although with dependence on the Sovereign Cause) both Being, Education, and Instruction.

S. Thom. Op. 7.

Philo in vita Mosis.

A quo est omnis paternitas.

This duty of Children towards Parents being proved by the triple knot of the Law, Natural, Civil, and Divine: I will now enlarge upon the four parts thereof; which are, Love, Reverence, exteriour, and interiour, Obedience, and Succour. I say, Love; for what childe is there can hate his father, if he be not unnatural? How (O wicked son) can the hatred of a title so sacred, so sweet, ascend into thy heart, if thou art not become a Bankrupt in nature? If Tigers, and Lions had the like obligation, they would honour him: and thou persecutest him. Ah! but he is unreaſonable, troubleſom, and inſupportable. What wilt thou not ſay? He is thy father, and therefore to be ſupported. Behold the rock, whereon all the waves of paſſion ſhould crack aſunder. But I know not what Antipathy I have contrary to his nature, I cannot reliſh him. Muſt we talk of Nature, when there is queſtion of the God of Nature? Know you not what the excellent Martyr St. Juſtine ſaid, To live according to Nature, is to live like an Infidel? If your nature cannot agree with one, whom you are bound to love, you muſt bridle that ill nature, you muſt put Reaſon into command, and Paſſion into fetters. Tell not me, you have endeavoured to mollifie it, but finde it untractable. Rather ſay, you are refractary againſt the yoke, which Nature hath put over your neck from your mothers womb: for which cauſe, ſee whether in the judgment of prudent men, who may adviſe you, you yield him that duty, which God commandeth.

Juſtin. Ep. ad Zenam & Sereuam.

The ſecond part of your tribute is Reverence. For it is natural to fathers, and mothers, who by the light of Reaſon are Tenants of that honour, which both age, Nature, and the commandment of God hath put into their hands: and if any thing happen to the contrary, it galls their heart, and transfixeth them more ſenſibly then one can imagine. For which cauſe the Wiſe-man ſaid, Honour thy Father both in word, and deed with patience.

In opere & ſermone, & omni patientiâ, honora patrem tuum. Eccleſ. 35.

It is a malignity, and a moſt intolerable baſeneſs, to ſee children of poor, or indifferent extraction, advanced either by the gale of favour, or by their travel and induſtry, to ſome publick charge, who no ſooner have ſet foot therein, but their brains turn, and they ſcarcely acknowledge thoſe, who gave them life and breeding, which is the firſt moveable of all the wealth they either poſſeſs, or may hope. But yet far more barbarous are they, that deſpiſe their parents, who, heretofore rich and wealthy, are now deſpoiled even to nakedneſs, and drawn dry to the very marrow, to place them in Dignities. This is a tyranny, which deſerveth, that all the Ravens from the brooks, and lay-ſtals, ſhould fly with fury upon him to pick out the eys of this offender, who hath dared to contaminate himſelf with ſuch an attempt.

Ungrateful creature, thou art aſhamed of Nature, thou bluſheſt at the Divine Providence, what ſay I bluſh? nay, thou diſmembreſt it: a father, who is the Ornament of thy head, and happineſs of thy houſe, if thou knoweſt how to uſe him, reduced by thy inſenſibility, thy cruelty, into the condition of a ſervant, whileſt thou perhaps feedeſt dogs, hawks, or ſome fatal Harpies, worſe then dogs, or hawks. Where is thy brow, thy bluſhing, thy underſtanding? O, but he is poor. True, becauſe thou haſt deſpoiled him, becauſe thou haſt waſted him, becauſe he voluntarily made himſelf poor, to make thee rich.

Tell me, was it not an honour to King Agathocles, who, from being the ſon of a Potter, raiſed his fortune to a Throne: was it not (I ſay) an honour to mingle, on his Cup-boards, earthen veſſels with his rich pieces of gold and ſilver plate, that he might not belie his birth? Nay, ſo far was he from bluſhing, or from being aſhamed at it, that he made boaſt and a trophey of it. What then would he have done by his poor father, if he ſet ſuch a value upon the mean implements of his Cottage? And thou, wholly Chriſtian as thou art, canſt not behold without confuſion of thy countenance, what a great Captain, a great King, a great States-man, ſought to proclaim to all the world.

Contempt of the perſon of Fathers entereth ſometimes ſo far into their ſouls, as it hath tranſported them into horrible and tragick acts, Never have I read any thing upon this ſubject without more amazement, then that, mentioned in Juſtine, of a certain African, named Cartallus, who was by the people's conſent raiſed to an eminent degree of dignity; and caſually upon ſome ſolemn Embaſſage ſent into a place, where his father, with many other, was baniſhed. He, looking on himſelf at that time like a Peacock, glorioufly furniſhed out with the rich ornaments of his employment, thought it was not ſuitable to his honour, to admit that his father ſhould ſo much as ſee him. The unfortunate father became ſo enraged with this refuſal, and pride of his ſon, that inſtantly he raiſed a ſedition, and muſtering together a tumultuary Army of Exiles, he fell upon his ſon, although a Magiſtrate, took him, condemned him to death, preſently prepared an high Gibbet, and attired (as he was) in Gold and Scarlet, with a Crown on his head, cauſed him to be faſtened to this fatal Tree, for a ſtrange ſpectacle. What fury of deſpiſed Nature is this, and what butchery?

Let us paſs on to the third tribute, Obedience, which (as an Antient ſaid) is the mother of felicities: it is the firſt band of Families, and chief foundation of Monarchies. S. Gregory Nyſſen hath a notable Obſervation, ſaying, That Moſes of ſet purpoſe cauſed the Hebrews to wear Ear-rings, giving them thereby to underſtand, their beauty and grace was in the ear, to wit, in obedience: and verily in Exodus, the people beginning to revolt, their Ear-rings were taken from them, as from men unworthy of this privilege. That, which is expreſſed in Deuteronomy, is much more bloody and terrible, where the father and mother are permitted to bring forth a diſobedient and refractary ſon in publick, and upon their own depoſition to cauſe him to be ſtoned to death by the people. It ſeems this Law was well underſtood by a ſilly Peaſant (a Mardonian by Nation) named Rachones, (a) who, being the father of ſeven ſons, perceived the youngeſt of them played a little libertine, and unbridled Colt: what doth he to bring him back into the ſtable? Firſt, He endeavoured to cure him with fair words and reaſons; but, finding him to reject all manner of good counſel, he bound his hands behind him, carried him before a Magiſtrate, accuſed him, and requires he may be proceeded againſt, as a Delinquent againſt Nature. The Judges, who would not diſcontent this incenſed father, nor hazard the life of this young man, ſent them both to the King, who at that time was Artaxerxes: the good man went thither, reſolved to ſeek his ſon's death; where, pleading before the King with much fervour and forcible reaſons, Artaxerxes ſtood amazed at his courage. But how can you (my friend) ſaid he, endure to ſee your ſon die before your face? He being a Gardiner, 'As willingly ' (ſaid he) as I would pull away leaves from a rank ' Lettice, & not hurt the root. The King, perceiving this reſolution & zeal of juſtice in the poor man, of a Gardiner made him a Judge, and ſeverely threatened his ſon with death, if his carriage were not better.

Tollite in aures filiarum veſtrarum curibus, & aſferte ad me. Exod. 32. 2.

Filius noſter iſte protervus & contumax eſt, monitis noſtris audire contemnit, comeſſationibus vacat, luxuriæ, atque conviviis. Lapidibus eum obruat populus, & moriatur. Deut. 21. 20, 21.

(a) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 1.

See young man; behold, wicked ſon, who diſobeyeſt thy father, and mother, not in a ſlight matter or, of little importance, but in ſuch, as concerns thy life, ſafety, and reputation: ſee what thou maiſt expect from the juſtice of God, ſince that of men hath ſo much ſeverity in this point.

You dare diſpenſe with your ſelves in the Laws of Piety, and Religion, not ſhewing even on Feſtival days any more feeling of God then a beaſt; doth this ſeem tolerable? you haunt the company of Buffoons, wicked and wretched creatures, which waſte the means that are not yours, weaken your body, violate your reputation, and defile your ſoul, and is not this a crime ? You make reſolutions, and frame Chimeras, without adviſe either of father, or mother, you bring them into debt, you treat clandeſtine marriages, you thruſt thoſe alive into their graves, who gave you life; and can you think the vengeance of God will ever have leaden feet? Faithleſs and brutiſh as you are, how many Fathers for far leſs faults have inflicted ſeverities on their children, dreadful even to thoſe, who read them? Marcus Scaurus, in the Roman Hiſtory, ſent this meſſage to his ſon, who fled with the reſt of his Army defeated by the Cimbrians: Son, you are born of a father, who knows either to vanquiſh, or die: rather ſend me your bones, then return alive after the death of your honour. A father could not endure the flight of a ſort, which was very excuſable in a general defeat, becauſe it ſeemed to caſt ſome blemiſh upon his Family; and you, who ſurcharge your houſe with reproach, and confuſion, would you eſcape unpuniſhed? Another Father, Aulus Fulvius, underſtanding his ſon had ranked himſelf in the Faction of Catiline (a wicked wretch, who ſupported and debauched all the youth of Rome) cauſed him to be taken in the place, and condemned to death, and this young man, begging pardon with all manner of ſuppliant intreaties, had no other anſwer, but, 'Son, I 'begat you to make war upon Catiline in your 'Countrie's quarrel, not in Catiline's cauſe to aſſail 'your mother. And who can but wonder at another Torquatus, that had a ſon in great employments of the Empire, flouriſhing in honour, age, and reputation; who, being accuſed by the Embaſſadours of Macedonia to have ill-carried himſelf in their Province, when he had it in charge; this Father, with the Senate's permiſſion, would himſelf be Judg in the Son's cauſe, heard the accuſers two whole days together, confronted witneſſes, gave his ſon full ſcope to defend himſelf, and to produce all, that he could for his juſtification, in the end on the third day he pronounced ſentence: It having ſufficiently been proved unto me, that my ſon Syllanus hath ill acquitted his charge, and taken money from the allies of the Roman People, contrary to the command of Laws, and Honeſty, I declare him from this time forward unworthy both of the Common-wealth, and my houſe? The unfortunate ſon was ſo overwhelmed with melancholy upon this judgment given by his father, that the next night he killed himſelf; and the father, eſteeming him degenerate, would not ſo much as honour his funerals with his preſence. Good God, what ſeverity, what thunders, what lightnings againſt the diſobedience of ſons among Pagans! And you wicked ſons, in Chriſtianity, where the Law of Love ſhould oblige you to the duty, which I prove unto you, with an adamantine knot, do you think, all is permitted you? And you fathers, are not you moſt worthy of your unhappineſs, when you cheriſh by negligent and ſoft indulgence the diſobediences of your children, which you ſhould root up from their infancy, and not ſuffer them to grow, to the prejudice of your houſes, with ſo many bloody Tragedies, as are ſeen in the mournful theatre of the world's miſeries?

Fili, ſuſcipe ſenectam patris tui, & non contriſtes eum in vita ejus, & ſi defecerit ſenſus, veniam da, & non

Let us conclude upon the fourth duty of children, which is Succour: "Son, receive the old age of thy "father and mother in thy boſom: take heed, thou "do not contriſtate them in any kind: beware thou "ſcorneſt them not: if they chance to fall into any "debility of ſpirit, aſſiſt them with all thy might. It followeth, "The childe, which feareth God, never "fails either in the honour, or aid, he ſhould yield "to his parents: nay more, he ſhall ſerve them as a "Servant his Maſter. We need not here ſeek out examples in holy Scripture, or where the Law of Nature is handled; the more our proofs are taken from Infidels, who had nothing at all, but the light of reaſon, ſo much the more colour and weight they have. I will not make mention here of a Roman daughter (a) who fed her father from her own breaſts, condemned to die of hunger between four walls; you may ſufficiently ſee that often recorded in writing. Yea, under Peter of Caſtile there lived a man, that never ceaſed weeping until he were put to death inſtead of his father, who was to be executed. I ſpeak nothing now at all of that, but cannot omit an example recounted in the Bibliotheck of the great wit Photius, who telleth, on a time there happened in Sicily (as it hath often been ſeen) an eruption of Ætna, now called Mount-Gibel. It is a hideous thing, and the very image of Hell, to behold a mountain, which murmurs, burns, belches up flames, and throws out its fiery entrails, making all the world fly from it. It happened then, that, in this horrible and violent breach of flames, every one flying and carrying away all they had moſt pretious with them, two ſons, the one called Anapias, the other Amphinomus, careful of the wealth, and goods in their houſes, reflected on their father, and mother, both very old, who could not ſave themſelves from the fire by flight; and where ſhall we (ſaid they) finde a more precious treaſure then thoſe, who begat us? The one took his father on his ſhoulder, the other his mother, and ſo made paſſage through the flames. It is an admirable thing, that God in conſideration of this piety, though Pagan, did a miracle: for the monuments of all Antiquity witneſs, the devouring flames ſtaid at this ſpectacle, and the fire roaſting and broyling all round about them, the way only, through which theſe two good ſons paſſed, was tapiſtred with freſh verdure, and called afterward by poſterity The Holy field in memory of this accident.

ſternas eum in tua virtute. Eccleſ. 3. 14, 15.

Qui timet Deum, honorat parentes, & quaſi Dominis ſerviet iis, quiſe genuerunt. Ib. 3.

(a) Fulgoſ. l. 5. c. 3.

What may we anſwer to this, what can we ſay, when the virtues even of Pagans dart lightening-flaſhes of honeſty and duty into our eys? What braſen or adamantine brow can covetous and caitiff ſons have, who, being rich and abounding in means, deny neceſſary things to thoſe, who brought them into the world, yea have the heart to ſee them ſtruggle with extreme miſery, whileſt they offer a ſacrifice of abomination to their burning avarice? Wicked ſon, wretched daughter, know you what you do, when you commit ſuch a crime? You hold the ſoul, blood, and life of your progenitors in your coffers, you burn them with a ſoft fire, you conſume them with a lingring, and ſhameful death; you are accomptable before God for what they ſuffer. And for whom is remorſe of conſcience? for whom infamy? for whom neceſſity? for whom puniſhments in the other life? but for ſuch, as in this manner abuſe a treaſure ſo recommended by God? Take heed (O children) take heed of breaking this triple cord of the Law Divine, Natural, and Civil, which indiſſolubly tie you to the exerciſe of that piety, which you have abjured. Take heed of irreverence, diſobedience, and ingratitude towards your parents, expect not only in the other life the unavoidable puniſhments of God's Juſtice againſt ſuch contumacy, but in this preſent life know you ſhall be meaſured with the ſame meaſure you afforded others. You know the Hiſtory of the miſerable Father dragged by the hair with the hand of his Son unto the threſhold of his his door, where seeing himself unworthily used, Hold son, saith he, it is enough: the Justice of God hath given me my due; I committed the like outrage heretofore against my Father, thy Grand-father, which thou at this instant actest upon me: I dragged him hither, and behold me hither haled; go no further. O Justice! O terrour! O dreadful spectacle! Great eye of God, which never sleepest over the crimes of mortals! O divine hand, which ever beares arms of vengeance hanging over the heads of rebellious children! How terrible thou art? who can but fear thee? who will not hereafter tremble at the apprehension of thy judgments?

Children, be pious, live in the duty you have vowed and resigned to your progenitors, and to all your superiours: live full of honour and glory in this world, live in expectation of palms and crowns, which you shall enjoy in the other world. And you likewise, fathers, and mothers, embrace charity towards your good children with all affection; and, if any forget their duty, and afterward stretch out hands humbly to your obedience, receive them into favour, exercise mercy towards them, as you desire should be done to you by God our common father. But, if you still groan under the ingratitude of wicked children, and the fear of future evils, wipe away your tears, sweeten your acerbities, season your bitterness with the comfort of a good conscience. When you have done all you can, and all you ought to do, leave the succes to God, and say unto him, My God, who hast seen the cause of my afflictions to proceed from my self, accept my good desires for the works of this evil childe, my sufferings in satisfaction, and my patience for sacrifice.

THE FOURTH BOOK, Of the Impiety of COURTS.

The Unhappy Politician.

HItherto having proposed the Motives, and Obstacles, that men of Quality finde in the way of Christian perfection, I have made a collection of the most wholesom Instructions, which may guide them to the wisdom of heaven. Consequently I purpose, according as time and leisure will permit, to write the History of the Holy Courts, pursuing the course, which I proposed in the Preface. But this Volume, being become big already in the Press, requireth nothing but the seal upon it. Behold the cause, why I have been willing to affix it thereon with two Books of grave and admirable Histories, which may serve as a scantling of the whole piece I intend. The scope of all this work is to declare a most worthy saying of S. Augustine, that Nothing is so miserable as the prosperity of the wicked, nothing so happy as true and solid piety.

To bring these two verities into their full lustre of light, as well by example, as precept, I have chosen two Courts very different. The one is the Court of Herod, the other of Theodosius the Younger. In the one, the disasters of impiety are beheld; in the other, the happiness of virtue. Verily, I have cast the eye of my consideration upon divers Histories, and have seen none, which may make great men more sensibly apprehend how those, who rule in Courts, and places of dignity by mere policy, and humane prudence, accommodating Religion to their own interest, are deceived, then the life and death of this unfortunate King of Judea. He had an infinite natural judgment, an admirable penetrating wit, a courage unspeakably dauntless. A man, who, derived from nothing, advanced his Fortune even to the Regal Throne, and established it amongst so many thorny affairs, as to make himself admired by the wisest of the world. But, because he built upon this Maxim of impiety, that Religion and Law must be made to serve our proper interests, he led a life full of crimes, and disturbances, concluded with the most disasterous death, that may be imagined. That also, which hath made me resolve upon this History (drawn from Josephus, with some other little Fragments, & Memorials, dilating it according to the talent of my stile, without using any other transcription) is, that, besides the unhappy Politician, you shall read therein Innocency persecuted in the life of a Lady, who hath been a true mirrour of Patience, and whom I purpose to propose as one of the greatest ornaments of our Holy Court. It is from hence I may truly gather a most beautifull Rose amongst the sharpest Thorns, shew the calmest serenity in the roughest storms, and seek the Hony-comb in the Lion's throat: since I in Herod's Court endeavour to find out the patient, and chaste Mariamne, the true Table of innocency, unworthily used.

Mariamne, Wife of Herod, the Picture of Patience.

The sufferance of this poor Queen would deserve to be consecrated with a pen of Adamant in the Temple of Eternity, since she is able to dazle the eys of the most hardy, to repleniſh the mouths of the most eloquent, and ravish the minds of those, who admire no vulgar things. God, who ever raiseth the glory of his Elect as it were upon the depth of the greatest miseries, seeing the soul of this Princes amongst the most eminent and illustrious, thought he must give her a large field for encounter, to reap the richest palms of patience, and he gave her Herod, a bad husband, a barbarous persecutour, an infamous executioner: but ever more suitable to the patient Mariamne in the quality of a Persecutour, and an Hang-man, then in the office of an Husband. To conceive the strength of this anvil, we must know the force of the hammer, which beateth on it. To speak sufficiently of the singular virtue of this Queen, we must thereunto oppose the malice of Herod: we necessarily must behold how this disloyal man, holding his life, scepter, and crown from the house of Mariamne, for recompense thereof took from her, her scepter, crown, and life, after he had drawn her bowels out, causing her neareſt of kin kin to be put to death before her eyes, then casting her all bloody upon the Pile, where the bodies of her Parents and Brethren were burned, as the last sacrifice of his fury, yet never at all startling her invincible patience. Every man speaketh of Herod, as of a man of Mortar steeped in Blood, as of a Tyrant, who would murther Mercie it self; but every one knoweth not the wiles he used to possess himself both of the Queen Mariamne, and Sceptre of David, oppressing the one with all ingratitude, and governing the other with unspeakable mischief.

The estate of the Kingdom of Judea before Herod came to the Crown.

About some fiftie years before the Nativity of our Lord and Saviour, the Kingdom of Judea, which had subsisted, although amongst strange Eclipses, and horrible vicissitudes, from King David, almost a thousand years, after it had so many times tottered, and so often by many shocks and concussions been established, in the end found its total ruin and Tumb in the discord of two brothers. At that time

Hyrcanus.

Hyrcanus Reigned, a good man, but a bad King, who neither had Fortitude, Valour, nor Courage. He used as much remisness in his Charge, as he practised innocencie in his Manners. His overmuch easiness made him degenerate into a certain stupiditie, and, being unapt to do ill, he rendred himself capable to be an instrument of all kind of evils, by being too easie for the impressions of another. He, acknowledging his own weakness, freely resigned the dignity and burthen of rule to his Brother Aristobulus, a valiant and hardie man, who had little successe, and many enterprises.

Aristobulus

Antipater the Father of Herod affected the Kingdom of Judea.

In the mean time Palestine, during the inconstant wavering of this Royalty, was much courted by her Neighbours; but above all by Antipater, Father of Herod, an Idumean by Nation, an Arabian in manners: who, being Wealthy, Factious, able to overturn a large Empire by his subtil wiles, had for a long time a Plot upon the Kingdom of Judea. He well foresaw, it would be a matter very difficult for him to force a passage for his wicked ends, whilst this couragious Lion Aristobulus, bare sway, but were he dismounted, and Hyrcanus seated again in his Throne, all would be in his own power. What doth this Arabian then? He soweth in the souls and minds of the people seeds of revolt against Aristobulus, saying, They were very remiss, and disloyal, so to suffer Hyrcanus their lawful King to be dethroned, to whom Nature had granted Empire, to transfer the Kingdom to a mutinous and turbulent spirit, who quickly would with ill manage make them feel the ruin and desolation of all Palestine. That they had forsaken a King blame-worthy in nothing but in surplusage of goodness, to take another, who, having made entry into principality by the gate of infidelity, could not reign but in the disastrous misery of his Country. Although Hyrcanus should yield up his right, he were dispensable in this his modesty. The more unworthy he should esteem himself to rule, the more were his worth. The glory, which he endeavoured to decline in the undervaluing of his own person, would wait upon him even to his Tomb. Yea, should they object to him his great sweetness, and facility of nature, it were more suitable to the piety and gentleness of the Jews. If Doves were to chuse themselves a King, they would rather have a Stare, then a Sparrow-hawk.

This wily spirit by such like Remonstrances quickly found much credulity, partly in the minds of those who affected innovation, partly amongst such as were guided by justice; but all saw not how under the colour of publick good he sought to raise a Monarchie for himself, or his Heirs. He, thus having already put the Iron into the Fire, gained the heart and opinion of Hyrcanus by all kind of observances and testimonies of Amity, which was a matter not hard to do, this Prince suffering himself to be governed by those, who made shew of any the least affection towards him. Behold him now as Procuratour, Tutour, and Master of this flexible spirit, whom he so under pretext of friendship possessed, that the actions of Hyrcanus sought no other issue, no other extent, but as they were guided by the thought and counsels of Antipater. Notwithstanding, when he proposed to him to make War against his Brother, to repossess himself of the Royal Throne, he found his heart all of Ice, and was fain to use his best endeavour to enkindle him, by reason of the excessive coldness of Nature. In the end he one day plainly discovered to him, That this abrenunciation of rule, which he had transacted with his Brother, was a thing incompatible with his honour, and life. What eye would not be dissolved into tears, to behold him despicable, and wretched, whilest his Brother lived in all Superabundance, and Pomp? It were to confound the Laws of Nature, it were to authorise Tyranny, to say, that little Theeves should live in Fetters, and Aristobulus, who had usurped a Kingdom, sit in Silken Robes, and resplendently glitter in Diamonds. That a Kingdom was a short, which never was to be put off but with life. That they were tales of lazy Philosophers to affirm, that Diadems were tissued with Thorns, their Rubies and Diamonds never having pricked any man. The life, which Hyrcanus then lead, was good for a Religious Essean, but not for a King. To conclude, that the people desired with passion to see him reestablished in the Throne of his Ancestours. He plied the ear of the Prince with so many forcible words, that he already began to gain him: but yet found himself combated by two powerful reasons, the one was his Oath, by which he had renounced Principalitie, and the other his weakness. From the Oath Antipater absolved him, saying, he had sworn to a Sin, and that there was no obligation to execute it. For inability, he made overture unto him of Arabian succours, which he had in his power. So that finding him wavering upon this wicked passage, he cast into his soul black jealousies of his brother, as of him, who, after he had usurped his estate, would enterprise on his life, counterfeiting conspiracies framed against him with so much art, that Hyrcanus yielded himself up, and gave him an absolute commission to make War, or Peace, as best pleased him. This concluded, the apple of discord is cast, Antipater faileth not to solicite Arethas the Arabian King, who cometh with an huge Army to fall upon Palestine, not without Barbarous hostilities and lamentable dislocations, even to the near straightning of Aristobulus, and the holding him Besieged in Jerusalem, the capital City of his Kingdom.

Cunning of Antipater.

Pompey in Palestine.

But as the greatest Serpent devoureth the lesser, it happened about the time of these undertakings, the Romans, under the conduct of Pompey the Great, making their Eagles to glitter in Syria, and leading an Army of fire, before which the petty Kings were but as Chaff, forced the Arabian to retire into his Kingdom, they marching in all parts Victorious, and undertaking to give Law, Peace, and War to whom they pleased. The two Brothers fail not to seek the gracious favour of the Roman, every one in his own way, with their best endeavour, well seeing, that therein was the main of the business. Aristobulus as the more free, couragious, and royal, found in the very beginning most favour, having presented to the Roman, amongst other largesses, a golden Vine, one of the most curious Workmanships of the world, which was afterward seen to serve as an Ornament in the Capitol. In the end, behold the two Brothers contesting at the feet of Pompey, to plead, not for a Medow, or a Vine-yard, but for a Kingdom, little considering, that putting their fortune into the hand of a stranger, who had no other law but his own ambition under the shadow of Arbitration he would fix his Tallons. Antipater beholding from the beginning the Balance to bend towards Aristobulus, as unto him, from whom the Romans had most cause to hope readieſt ſervice for their pretenſes, ſpared not to diſgrace him, to lay aſperſions on him, to caſt the Romans into a diſtruſt of his ſpirit, and perpetually play the ſleeping dog before Pompey, in ſuch ſort, that Ariſtobulus, foreſeeing well, that this pernicious man, abuſing the name and weakneſs of his Brother, ſold them both to the Romans, ſtood upon his guard, having more animoſitie then ability to reſiſt the Army of a vaſt Empire. The poor Prince, ſhrinking under the burthen of ſuch an enterpriſe, is taken, put into Fetters, with two of Sons, and as many Daughters, and was lead to Rome to ſerve as a ſport in Pompey's Triumph. Ieruſalem is made tributary, the High-Prieſt's place given to Hyrcanus, and all authority in the hand of Antipater. It was a ſpectacle, which drew tears even from thoſe, who before loved not Ariſtobulus, to behold this unfortunate King in fetters, with the Princes his Sons, and thoſe much to be deplored Princeſſes, his Daughters, all heirs of their Father's miſeries, who left their Country, where they had flouriſhed with ſo much honour, to ſeek, amongſt tedious and irkſom Voyages both by Sea and Land, ſervitude, or death; which ever is the ordinary Vow, and Prayer of the wretched. Antipater as yet all bloody gathered the Palm of this victory, and eſtabliſheth his little Monarchy, which he along time had plotted. Hyrcanus reſembled an old Sepulchre, which retaineth nothing but a bare title; all was acted by him in apparence, and nothing for him in effect: the other entertained and courted the Romans with his money, gave Preſents, ſent, and received Embaſſadours, practiſed ſupports, gained correſpondencies, corrupted powers, ruined reſiſtances, which oppoſed his greatneſs, and made this poor High-Prieſt in all things to bear the ſeeming Scepter. Then, ſeeing him dayly become more weak then himſelf, to ſecure this ſtate upon his own Sons, he makes the eldeſt, to wit Phaſelus, Governour of Ieruſalem, and giveth to Herod his youngeſt the Tetrarchy of Galilee. Some time after, having ſucked down all the wind, which his ambition preſented to him, and not knowing what more to do, he drank a cup of Poyſon, which in a Banquet was offered to him by the ſlie cunning of Malicus his enemie. Behold the current of humane things! Theſe ſpirits, enragedly mad after greatneſs, which they purſue with all manner of toyl, and ſiniſter practiſes, are as thoſe little bubbles, that riſe on the water in time of Tempeſt; they encreaſe, and crack in a moment.

to

Ariſtobulus Priſoner. Ieruſalem tributary.

Antipater eſtabliſhed

Unhappy Politician.

Antipater being dead, his two Sons, Phaſelus and Herod, divide the ſucceſſion; each one holdeth firmly his ſhare, and ſtriveth to poſſeſs the heart of Hyrcanus, making him always perſonate his own part. Herod, as ſoon as he was in office, even in the life of his Father, being as yet but fifteen years of age, well diſcovered what he would be by his natural inclinations, which proceeded from him, as flaſhing ſtreaks from a Cloud, to be inſtantly turned into lightening. He had a malign ſpirit, crafty, ambitious even to fury, and whoſe fingers perpetually itched after blood and ſlaughter. And verily he defiled his tender years, and firſt beginning of Principality with effuſion of humane blood, falling not onely upon one called Ezechias, reputed a Pirate, but he alſo cut in pieces with him many Jews, without either warrant, or knowledg of the cauſe, which involved many innocents in this ruin. The Mother's of thoſe people maſſacred by young Herod went out of the Temple diſconſolate, with their hair diſhevel'd; requiring juſtice of Hyrcanus, who was no other then a mere Idol of Principality. Notwithſtanding, much importuned by the cries and lamentations of theſe weeping women, and incited by the Peers of his Kingdom, he ordained, that Herod ſhould appear before a Tribunal of Juſtice. In this action the young man ſufficiently ſhewed the boldneſs of his ſpirit, and fierceneſs of his courage. The other, who were accuſed, came to this Parliament of Judea altogether in mourning habit, he thither went as to a Feaſt, or a Theatre, waited on with a flouriſhing retinue, cloathed in Scarlet, frizled, perfumed, and beſides with the recommendations of the Romans, who ſent nothing but armed words, commanding the Judges to pardon without any other Proceſs. He, then being but fifteen years old, ſo amazed the Judges, and Adv[illegible] with his very faſhion, and countenance, tha[illegible] thoſe, who were prepared for long pleadings againſt him, there was not one to be found, that had the heart to mutter in his preſence. One of the Judges, called Sameas, an honeſt man and more hardie then the reſt, cried out aloud to King Hyrcanus there preſent, Sir, I wonder not, this young Lord cometh in ſuch equipage to this Bar; every one doth what he can for his own ſafeguard: but I admire, that you and your Council ſuffer him thus to proceed, as if he came hither not to be adjudged, but to murther the Judges: you preſently through favour will enfranchiſe him, but he one day by Juſtice will aſſail you. And verily of the whole Senate no one eſcaped, whom Herod, being come to the full manage of the Kingdom, put not to death, except him, who delivered his opinion with ſuch liberty. It is reported of Sameas, that, when afterward there was queſtion moved to receive Herod for King, the reſt conſtantly oppoſing it, he freely ſaid, he gave his voice to Herod; and ſome amazed thereat, Let it not ſeem ſtrange unto you (ſaith he.) God in his indignation will give unto you a bad King, and a worſe he cannot finde then Herod: he is the ſcourge you ſtand in need of, to chaſtiſe your infidelity. Hyrcanus then ſeeing the Judges animated by Sameas, more inclining to the balance of juſtice then mercy, cauſed him ſecretly to be ſhifted away. For he emboſomed him with love, and ſo hatched the Serpent's egg in his breaſt.

Liberty of a Judg.

Grave Speech.

Herod, nothing inferiour to his Father in policie, purſuing his plots and examples, inſeparably united himſelf to the Romans, gaining them with all manner of ſervices, and entertaining Hyrcanus to ſerve his turns, as a ſhadow, with all manner of complacence, and flattery. The Kingdom of Judea ſeemed as yet not to behold him but at diſtance, his brother Phaſelus, as the eldeſt, held the beſt part. Ariſtobulus, whom you have ſeen led in fetters to Rome, had alſo two ſons. The eldeſt of which was called Alexander, father of this chaſt Mariamne, whoſe patience we decipher. The other was Antigonus, with whom Herod had much occaſion. Of both he diſcharged himſelf in proceſs of time. For the unfortunate Alexander, ſucceſſour to the unhappineſs of his father Ariſtobulus, putting himſelf into the field, with ſuch troops, as he could maſs together in the diſaſter of his fortune, was in favour of Herod oppreſſed by the Romans. Antigonus, having eſcaped out of captivity, wherein he was held at Rome, with Ariſtobulus, his father, gave Herod matter enough to work on. For, putting himſelf into the Parthians power, he wrought ſo much with promiſes, and hopes, that they undertook to eſtabliſh him in his Royal Throne. And thereupon they arm both by Sea and Land, and handled the matter ſo by force and policie, that they ſtir up Hyrcanus and Phaſelus. Herod with much difficulty ſaved himſelf, and, though he had a courage of Steel, was ſo aſtoniſhed with this ſurpriſe, that it was a great chance, he had not Ended his life upon his ginning Herod.

Great revolution in the Kingdom of Judea.

his own ſword. Hyrcanus, unworthily uſed by the commandment of his Nephew Antigonus, had both his ears cut off, and thereby made for ever uncapable of the High-Prieſthood. Phaſelus, the Brother of Herod enraged with the turn of fortune, voluntarily knocked out his own brains againſt the ſide of a rock.

Herod, who always cleaved to the fortune of the Romans, as Ivy to a wall, ſeeing his affairs reduced to an extremity, imploreth their aſſiſtance, repreſenteth the outrages of Antigonus, the hoſtility of the Parthians, ſignifieth the ſervices of his father Antipater, promiſ[illegible]on his part all the world, and ſo handleth the m[illegible] that beyond his expectation he is declared Ki[illegible], and at that inſtant Antigonus, enemy of the people of Rome, as a Fugitive, and Ally of the Parthians. Herod purſueth him with might & main, aided by the Roman forces. The miſerable Antigonus, after a very long reſiſtance was impriſoned, becoming the very firſt of Kings, who, by commandment of Mark Anthony, was executed with a puniſhment moſt unfit for his quality, and condition, and among the Romans not uſual, leaving his head upon a ſcaffold in the City of Antioch, for no other cauſe, but for the defence of the inheritance of his Anceſtours. But Strabo ſaith, Mark Anthony could finde no other way to make Herod to be acknowledged for King, while there was yet any of the blood Royal left capable of rule. So much this people loved their natural King, and abhorred a Stranger.

Entry of Herod to the Crown.

After theſe ſlaughters, Herod mounteth to the top of the wheel, behold all the thorns (as he thinketh) pulled out of his feet, he now had nothing to grapple with, but an old man, an infant, and two women, the laſt remainder of the noble race of the Aſmodeans. Hyrcanus was the aged man, who in truth grew old among the thorns, and horrible changes, of his ſtate. He was as yet captive among the Parthians, but the King, although a Barbarian, had ſo much commiſeration of his ſo greatly afflicted goodneſs, that he permitted him to live with all free liberty in his City of Babylon. This poor Prince, who had paſſed his whole life void of ambition, bare the change of his fortune with great equality, and temper of mind. The Jews, who at that time inhabited in the Parthian's dominions, beholding him all wounded, diſfigured, wretched, abandoned, diſarrayed, did notwithſtanding honour him as their King with ſo much reſpect, and reverence, that he had almoſt found a Kingdom in Captivity. Herod, who ſaw, this man might ſerve as a colour for thoſe ſpirits, that would aim at him in the ſwinge of his affairs, as yet not well confirmed, diſpatcheth an expreſs Embaſſadour to the Parthian King, with many preſents, and letters, ſweetned with ſilken words, wherein he beſought him not to bereave him of the greateſt contentment he could poſſibly have in this world, which was to be grateful to thoſe, who had obliged him. Hyrcanus (ſaid he) was his Benefactour, his Protectour, his Father, and ſince God had given him ſome repoſe in his affairs, it was an unſpeakable comfort to him to ſhare the Scepter, greatneſs, and affluent content of Kings, with a friend ſo faithful, and worthy to be beloved. The King of Parthia, willing to gratifie King Herod, whom he beheld ſupported by the Roman Empire, the power whereof he more feared, then honoured the virtue, gave free leave to Hyrcanus to go whither he would; he put the buſineſs in conſultation with the prime Peers of his Country, who much diſſwaded him: but through the eaſineſs of his ſingular nature, which ever ſwallowed the bait without conſideration of the hook, he yielded himſelf to the diſſembled courteſies of Herod, and returned directly to Jeruſalem, where he was received with infinite demonſtrations of amity.

Behold the whole Regal family in the hands of this Tyrant! Hyrcanus had but one only daughter named Alexandra, a woman no whit of her Father's temper; for ſhe was extremely haughty, and had much ado with her ſelf to bite the bridle in this ſervitude. She was Mother of two Children, one Son, and one Daughter; the Son was the little Ariſtobulus, and the Daughter Mariamne married to Herod. Marriage of Mariamne to Herod.

Mariamne was accounted the moſt beautiful Princeſs of the earth; for Gellius, who went prying after all the beauties of the world, to make relation thereof to Mark Anthony, having well conſidered all the moſt exquiſite Maſter-pieces of Nature, when he beholdeth Mariamne in Paleſtine, he proteſteth, all other beauties were terreſtrial in compariſon of this, which ſeemed to have been compoſed amongſt the heavenly Orbs. This man ſaw nothing but the exteriour bark, and was rapt with admiration; but her form was not worthy eſteem in compariſon of the noble Qualities of her mind. She was a Grandchilde of the great Macchabees, well verſed in the Law of God, diſcrete, wiſe, ſtayed, circumſpect, courteous, chaſte as Suſanna, but, above all, couragious, and patient; who lived in Herod's Court, as Job on the dunghil. Never beauty and virtue were ſo diſgraced in any match. This creature, which had power to make ſo many brave Princes to ſigh for her, and who might have beheld ſo many obſequious ſervices done at her foot, hath now Herod for her Husband, who had nothing humane in him, but lineament, and figure. It was to match the Lamb with the Wolf, the Dove with the Faulcon, and to tie a living body, mouth to mouth, with the dead, to marry ſuch a Lady to ſo Prodigious a Monſter. But he, who already had power in his hand, paſſionately ſought her, as well for her incomparable beauty, as beſides for ever to eſtabliſh his ſtate, conſidering the alliance of this little creature, deſcended from ſo many Kings, would cover the obſcurity of his Houſe, and gain him more reputation among the Jews.

Macrobius, by Euphony Mariamne.

Hyrcanus, Grand-father to Mariamne, and Alexandra her Mother, ſeeing Herod was Maſter of his deſires, the Sceptre already in his hands, although by injuſtice, and tyranny, meaſuring all things by his fortune, not perſon, judged this way might be yet advantagious, and that his Wife might mollifie him, and make him favourable to the Royal blood. The generous Lady well foreſaw, that the putting her into Herod's hands was to caſt her into the Lion's jaws. But not to gainſay thoſe, to whom ſhe had been taught to ſacrifice her whole life, and to obey the Laws of neceſſity, ſhe underwent the yoke, fortifying her Royal heart againſt all the ſtormy tempeſts, which ſeemed already to menace her. Behold her married! Herod loveth her, as the Hunter Veniſon, for his appetite, and advantage; his love being not of power to make him loſe one ſilly grain of his ambition, or cruelty. This perverſe and violent ſpirit, who held the Kingdom, as a Wolf by the ears, ever wavering, yea even, in the ſecure ſafety of his affairs, endeavoured nothing, but to rid himſelf of thoſe, whoſe ſpoils he poſſeſſed, the reſpect of this good Queen being not able to ſweeten, or ſoften his ſavage humours. He well ſhewed, how little affection he bare towards her Allies, when it might any way import his pretended intereſt, Herod depreſſeth the Royal Stock.

eſt, even at that time, when there was queſtion to ſubſtitute an High-Prieſt in the place of Hyrcanus, who, having his ears cut off with much deformity, neceſſarily fell into the irregularity ordained by Law, which forbad him Altars. Herod daily ſaw the young Ariſtobulus in his Palace, Son of Alexandra, and ſole Brother of his Wife, a moſt accompliſhed Prince, to whom every one deſtined the Mitre. He ſets his eys a wandering, and finds out on the further ſide of Euphrates in the City of Babylon an unknown Jew, named Ananel, and createth him High-Prieſt. This was a pill, which Alexandra, the Mother of Ariſtobulus and Mariamne, could not ſwallow, yet thought fit to diſſemble it. She ſaw her houſe manifeſtly dejected, in that her ſon after ſo many obligations was diſpoſſeſſed of an honour, to which blood, nature, and the conſent of the whole world called him, to give it to a man of no value; ſhe could not ſo well digeſt her choler, but that ſhe thundered more loudly, then the miſery of the time and malice of Herod permitted.

Ariſtobulus the Brother of Mariamne put from the High-Prieſthood.

Mariamne, ſtill repoſing in the calmneſs of her noble ſpirit, declared to the King in her natural ſweetneſs, That 'He was the ſupport of her houſe 'greatly decayed, and at that time upon ſuch terms, 'that ſhe had no care to pretend to Sceptres, ſhe 'only deſired to breath her laſt in the world with 'honour. If he ſhould give a Mitre to her Brother 'Ariſtobulus, it were to make a creature, from 'whom he had no cauſe at all to fear, his Throne 'being throughly eſtabliſhed, and he being one, 'from whom reaſonably he might expect any thing, 'having the tender youth of this Prince as a ſoft 'piece of wax in his hands. This act would make 'him rule in hearts, as well as in Provinces, when 'he ſhould be known to be a Father, and a Protectour of a young Son of Hyrcanus, whoſe virtue he always had honoured. Briefly, that the 'honour, which ſhe had by matching with him, 'ſeemed not complete to her, whilſt ſhe ſaw her 'Allies kept from degrees, wherein he might eſtabliſh them without prejudice of his authority.

Prudence of Mariamne.

Herod ſuffered himſelf this time to be gained by the charming ſweetneſs of Mariamne, and, having deliberated the affair with his Councel, he reſolved to give the High-Prieſt's place to young Ariſtobulus his Brother-in-law: which was performed with much ceremony. He aſſembleth his friends in the Hall of his Palace, then ſending for Alexandra, he made in the preſence of them all a premeditated ſpeech, complaining of her, and ſaying, ſhe had a mutinous and turbulent ſpirit, which ſought nothing but to embroil the affairs, and take a Sceptre from him, which heaven had cauſed him to purchaſe with ſo much travel, and pain, to put it into the hands of an Infant, to the prejudice of the Queen her Daughter. Notwithſtanding that, forgetting all injuries, he could not neglect his own diſpoſition, which was to do good even to thoſe, that wiſhed him ill; in confirmation whereof he gave the High-Prieſthood to her Son, his purpoſe having never been other, and the ſubrogation of Ananel having not been made, but during the time of expectation of maturity in the tender age of an infant.

The young Ariſtobulus created High-Prieſt.

This ambitious Mother, according to her Sex, and indeed beyond her Sex, upon the offer of this High-Prieſt's place, was ſo ſenſibly tranſported with joy, that tears guſhed from her eys, and ſhe at that inſtant freely proteſted to Herod, that 'She had endeavoured all ſhe could poſſibly 'to keep the Mitre in the Royal Family, ſuppoſing 'it an unworthy thing to tranſfer it elſewhere: but 'as for the Kingdom, ſhe never had pretended 'thereunto, and that ſuch reſolutions ſhould never 'enter into her thoughts. Whenſoever it ſhould 'pleaſe Almighty God to call her out of the world, 'ſhe would die well ſatisfied, leaving her Son High-'Prieſt, and her Daughter Queen. As for the reſt, 'if ſhe had exceeded in ſome words, ſhe was excuſable as a paſſionate Mother towards a Son, who 'well deſerved to be beloved; a Mother-in-law of 'the King, to whom Kindred and Alliance permitted ſomewhat the more liberty; and a Daughter 'of a King to whom ſlavery was an hard morſel, and 'her ſtomach unable to digeſt it. But hereafter, ſince 'he uſed her ſo courteouſly, he ſhould have no 'cauſe to complain of her obedience. Hereupon 'they ſhook hands, and behold they are friends.

The ambitious woman.

But out alas! the amities of the world are like the felicities thereof. If the amities be deceitful, the felicities are tied to a rotten cable, or grounded upon the moving ſand. The poor Mother rejoyced for a little ſenſe-pleaſing flattery of her feveriſh ambition, and ſaw not, that her Son was not (to ſpeak really) the High-Prieſt, but a ſacrifice of the ſavageneſs of Herod. The diſcrete Mariamne, who by long obſervation had learned to hold proſperity as ſuſpected, ſuffered her heart not to be ſo diſſolved into joy, but that ſhe ſtood ſtill armed againſt the counter-buffs of Fortune.

Entrance of Ariſtobulus into the High-Prieſthood.

The Feaſt of the Tabernacles, greatly celebrated amongſt the Jews, being come, Ananel, after he had ſerved as an O in ciphering, is ſhamefully rejected; Ariſtobulus beginneth to exerciſe his charge. He was at that time but ſeventeen yeers of age, yet of a gallant ſtature, tall, and ſtrait as a Palm-tree, radiant as a Star, and very like his Siſter. When the people beheld him cloathed with the Pontifical habiliments, which were repleniſhed with Majeſty, and to go towards the Altar, and perform thoſe ceremonial Rites with ſo much gravity and comlineſs, he appeared as a new Sun, which brake out of the clouds, and came to gild the world before covered over with darkneſs. All the hearts of thoſe poor Hebrews, which ſo much had ſighed in the civil wars, freſhly bloomed, and newly opened themſelves, as Roſes at the benign, and gentle aſpect of this young Prelate. His excellent natural graces, enchaſed in the Majeſty of his robes, rendred an incredible luſtre, which dazeled the eys of all beholders. Some ſtedfaſtly beheld him, and became as ſtatues, yet ſhewing by their tears, their eys were not made of marble. Others ſpake to him with infinite dumb teſtimonies of a never-ſilent hearty affection. The reſt made reſentments of their hearts burſt forth from their lips, not being able to withhold acclamations too free and profuſe for the ſeaſon, but for their love excuſable. They remembred the virtue of the antient Macchabees, who had delivered them from Idolatry; they knew the wretched Hyrcanus was no other then a ſhadow following his own funerals! they retained the freſh memory of the Grand-father of this young High-Prieſt, Ariſtobulus the Great, who had been carried bound, and fettered to Rome, like a Gally-ſlave; they were not ignorant, how Alexander his Father, and Antigonus his Uncle, had loſt their lives by oppoſing the government of a ſtranger: this young Prince only remained free from ſo many ſhipwracks, and in the green tenderneſs of his Youth they ſaw all the hopes of their Country to bud and bloſſom. And as one is credulous to hear what he affecteth, they perſwaded themſelves, Herod, who at the beginning had demanded the Kingdom in the name of this young Ariſtobulus, would come to let go his hold, giving way to Juſtice: and for this cauſe, they with the more liberty enlarged themſelves in theſe applauſes. But poor creatures, they reckoned without their Hoſt. Herod having beheld this countenance in the people, inſtantly obſerved, that according to his own Maxims he had played the Clerk, and that this was not his ordinary manner of proceeding: entering at that time into a furious jealouſie, he maketh the High-prieſt, and his Mother, and Wife, to be ſo narrowly watched, that neither within, nor without the Palace they could ſtir a finger, but Herod was advertiſed of it. The prudent Mariamne amongſt theſe ſuſpicions lived ſtill in grace, ſweetening upon one ſide and other all Acerbities, as much as buſineſſes of that nature would permit. But her Mother Alexandra touched to the quick to behold her ſelf amongſt ſo many Spies, ſhe, who was ever deſirous to converſe and live with all royal liberty, reſolved to play at double, or quit, to break the gives of ſpecious ſervitude, or yield her neck to Herod's Sword, if it ſhould come to paſs, her calamity tranſported her into ſuch extremity. What doth ſhe? Cleopatra, that Queen, who had filled the world with her fame, was then in Egypt, and naturally hated Herod, as well for his barbarous diſpoſition, as for particular intereſts of her own perſon: for ſhe knew he much had intermeddled in her Affairs, and given Mark Anthony counſel to forſake her, yea, to kill her. This Tyrant was ſo accuſtomed to ſay, Kill, that he eaſily adviſed others to uſe the ſame Medicine, which was with him to his own maladies frequent. It is a ſtrange thing, that Cleopatra one day paſſing through Judea, he reſolved to ſend her into the other world, thinking therewith to gratifie Mark Anthony, but was diſſwaded by his friends, ſaying, it was too audacious to attempt, and able for ever to ruine his fortune. The deſign was never publiſhed; but Cleopatra had cauſe enough beſides to hate Herod, which much emboldened Alexandra to write to her in ſuch like terms.

Malice of Herod.

ALEXANDRA to the Queen CLEOPATRA Health.

Madam,

Letter of Alexandra to Cleopatra.

"SInce God hath given you leave to be born "the moſt accompliſhed Queen in all qualities, "it is fit your Greatneſs ſerve as a Sanctuary for "the Innocent, and an Altar for the Miſerable. The "wretched Alexandra, who hath much innocen"cy, void of ſupport, and too many calamities with"out comfort, caſteth her ſelf into the arms of "your Majeſty, not to give her a Sceptre, but to ſe"cure the life of her, and her Son, the moſt preti"ous pledge which remaineth of Heaven's benig"nity. Your Majeſty is not ignorant, that For"tune having made me the Daughter and Mother "of a King, Herod hath reduced me to the condi"tion of a Servant. I am not ambitious to recount "my ſufferings, which I had rather diſſemble: but "whatſoever a Slave can endure in a Gally, I bear "in a Kingdom, through the violence of a Son-in"law, who having ſtolen the Diadem from my "Children, would alſo deprive them of life. We "are perpetually among Spies, ſharp knives, and "black apprehenſions of death, which would leſs "hurt us, if it were more ſudden. Stretch out an "hand of aſſiſtance to the afflicted, and afford us "ſome petty nook in your Kingdom, till the ſtorm "be over-blown, and that we may ſee ſome ſpar"kles of hope to glimmer in our Affairs. Glory "thereby ſhall abide with you, and with us everla"ſting Gratitude.

Cleopatra having received theſe Letters, made a ready Anſwer, and invited her to haſten ſpeedily into Egypt with her Son; proteſting, ſhe ſhould eſteem it an unſpeakable Glory, to ſerve as a Sanctuary and refuge for the affliction of ſuch a Princeſs. Reſolution of departure is taken, but the execution is an hard task. The poor Io knows not how to withdraw her ſelf from this many-eyed Argus. In the end, as the wit of a woman is inventive, eſpecially in matters, that concern their proper intereſts: ſhe, without diſcovering ought to any one, no, not to her daughter Mariamne, fearing leſt her nature too milde ſhould adviſe her rather to reſt in the liſts of Patience, then to attempt waies ſo perilous. She, I ſay, only adviſing with her own paſſion in this buſineſs, cauſed two Biers to be made (a matter of ill preſage) to put her ſelf, and ſon into; thinking by this means to elude the diligence of the Guard, and ſo to be carried to the Sea, where a Ship attended her, and by this way ſave her life in the power of death. But by ill hap a ſervant of hers, named Æſop, who was one of thoſe, that were appointed to carry the Biers, going to viſit one called Sabbion, a friend to the houſe of Alexandra, let ſome words fall of the intention of his Miſtreſs, as thinking to have ſpoken to a faithful and ſecret friend of hers. The perfidious Sabbion had no ſooner wrung the worm out of this ſervant's Noſe; but he haſteth to open all to Herod, ſuppoſing it was a very fit opportunity to work his reconciliation; he having a long time been ſuſpected and accounted to be of Alexandra's faction. Herod after he heard this news, wanted not Spies, and Centinels. The poor Lady with her ſon is ſurpriſed upon the Biers, drawn out of the Sepulchre of the dead, to return to the living, aſhamed, and diſgraced, that her Comedy was no better acted; little conſidering, that after her perſonal part had failed, ſhe could nothing at all pretend to life. Herod notwithſtanding, whether he feared the great credit Cleopatra had, or whether he would not wholly affright Alexandra; thereby with the more facility to oppreſs her, contained himſelf in the ordinary diſſimulation of his own nature, without ſpeaking one ſole word unto her. Although very well in the face of this painted hypocriſie was ſeen, that the clouds were gathered together, to make a loud Thunder-crack, and raiſe an unreſiſtable tempeſt.

Enterpriſe of Alexandra.

The Caitiff, after he had given ſo many deaths in the horrour and affrightment of Arms, would inflict one, even (as it were in ſport) upon a fair Summers-day. Being at diner at the houſe of the miſerable Alexandra, feigning to have buried in deep oblivion all what was paſt, ſaith, That in favour of youth, he this day would play the young man, and invite the High-prieſt Ariſtobulus, his brother-in-law, to play at Tennis with him, or ſome other like exerciſe. The ſides were made, the emulation was enkindled; the young Prince hot, and eager, played not long, but he became all on a water: as at that time happened to many other Lords, and Gentlemen. Behold they all run to the Rivers, which were near this place of pleaſure where they dined.

Pitiful death of young Ariſtobulus.

Herod, who knew the cuſtom of Ariſtobulus, and well fore-ſaw he would not fail to caſt himſelf into theſe

these cold baths, suborneth base villains, who, under the shew of pastime, should force him to drink more then he would. All succeeded, as this traiterous wretch had premeditated. Aristobulus, seeing the other in the water, uncloathed himself quickly, and bare them company. There was no cause, why he should swim, sport, and dally upon this Element, ever dangerous, although less faithless then Herod. The poor Sacrifice skipped up and down, not knowing the unhappiness, which attended him. But the accursed Executioners remembered it well: for, spying their time in this fatal sport, they smothered the poor High-Priest under the waters, in the eighteenth year of his age, and the first of his High-Priesthood. This bright Sun, which rose with such splendour and applause, did set in the Waves, never to appear again, but with horrid wanness of death on his discoloured Visage.

Vanity and misery of the world.

Humane hopes, where are you? True dreams of the waking, aiery fantasies, fleeting fires, which shine not, but to extinguish your selves, and in being put out to bereave us of light, leaving us the evil savour and sorrow of losing it! This Prince so accomplished, that Nature seemed to have framed him to be the object of Thoughts, the love of Hearts, the admiration of Souls: this Prince, in whom was stored all the Glory of the Royal House of the Asmoneans: this Prince, who was to marry the Mitre with the Diadem, and raise all the hopes of a lost Race; behold him by a most treasonable practise smothered in the water, in an Age, in a Beauty, in an Innocency; which made this accident as full of pity, as it was unfurnished of remedies.

Sorrow upon his death.

Upon this News the whole City of Jerusalem was in as great a confusion, as if Nebuchadnezzar, returning from the other world, had been at the gates thereof: in every place there was nothing to be seen but tears, groans, horrour, astonishment, yellings, representations of death. You would have said, that every house bare their first-born to burial, as was seen heretofore to happen among the Egyptians. But above all, Alexandra the disconsolate Mother afflicted her self with uncurable sorrow: sometime she wept, prostrated on the body of her Son, and sought in his eclipsed eys, and dead lips, the remnant of her life. Sometimes she rowled her eys like a distracted Lunatick, calling for fire, swords, halters, and precipices, to finde in them the Catastrophe of life. The said Mariamne, although infinitely patient, had much ado to resist the impetuous violences of an incomparable sorrow. She loved this brother of hers most dearly, as her true Image, as the pledg-bearer of her heart, as the hope of her house, all rent in pieces. All confounded as she was, the good daughter reflected on the wound of her Mother, and staied near the corps of her brother, as if she had been the shadow of the same body. Then, turning her self to God, she said to him with an affectionate heart: 'My Singular resignation.

'God, behold me presently in that estate, wherein 'I have nothing more to stand in fear of, but your 'justice; nothing more to hope, but your mercy. 'He, for whom I feared, for whom I hoped, all 'that which one may fear, or hope in the revolu- 'tion of wordly Occurrences, is taken from me by 'a secret judgment of your Providence, ever to be 'adored by my obedient will, although not to be 'penetrated at all by the weakness of my thoughts. 'If I yet, among so many acerbities, suck some 'sweetness out of the world, in the presence of de- 'licious Objects, of which you have bereaved me, 'behold me wholly weaned; hereafter I will finde 'therein nothing but wormwood; to the end, that; 'renouncing the comforts of the earth, I may learn 'to taste those, which are proper to your children. Behold, how fair and reposed Souls draw honey from the rock, and convert all into merit, yea, even their tears. The impatient, like Alexandra, afflict themselves without comfort, torment themselves without remedy, and many times become desperate without remission.

Extreme hypocrisie of Herod.

What shall we say? Herod himself in this sad consort of sorrow would needs play his part. He maketh externally appear, in a dissembled hypocrisie, all the symptoms of a true sorrow. He detesteth play he accuseth Fortune, he complaineth Heaven had sinisterly envied him an object, on which he desired much to make all the love and respect appear, he bare to the Royal Blood, from whence he greatly derived his advancement. He most ceremoniously goeth to visit the Queen, and her Mother, and when he findeth them weeping about this dead body, scalding tears flowed from his eys, whether it were he had them at command, to make his dissimulation the more great, or whether he verily had at that time some resentment of grief; beholding on one side this little blossom so cruelly cropped under the Sythe of death, and so many celestial beauties, which had for limit and Horizon the instant of their birth: and on the other side, considering these poor Queens, drenched in a sea of sorrow, which had force to draw tears from rocks. This traiterous creature had yet some humanity in him: and I could well believe, that Nature had at this time wrung these tears by violence from his barbarous cruelty; notwithstanding he feigned willingness to stop his passion with manliness. Afterwards, turning himself to the Ladies, he said; 'He 'was not come so suddenly to wipe away their 'tears, which had but too much cause to be shed: as 'for himself, he had enough to do to command his 'own. Nature must be suffered to have her sway. 'Time must have his, and would apply a plaister to 'this sorrow. That he would perform, for the me- 'mory of the dead, whatsoever an only Son might 'expect from a passionate Father, and a puissant 'King; that hereafter he would be true Son of A- 'lexandra, true Husband, and true Brother of Ma- 'riamne; since God was pleased to redouble these 'obligations in him by the loss they had suffered.

Tyranny of revenge.

O the powerful tyranny of the appetite of revenge! Alexandra, whom one might have thought would burst into contumelies & reproches (as wel knowing Herod, what face soever he set upon the matter, was Authour and plotter of this death) held her self constantly in the degrees of dissimulation, not shewing to the King any discontent on her part, and all for the hope she had to be opportunely revenged in time & place. Herod retiring, thought he had acted his part well, free from any suspicion of offence, seeing Alexandra spake not a word, who heretofore too frequently accustomed to complain in far less occasions. To apply the last lenitive, he caused the Funerals of the dead to be celebrated with such pomp, and magnificence, that nothing could be added thereunto, as well in the order of the equipage, as in the curiosity of the perfumes, with which the body was embalmed, and the magnificent furnitures of Sepulchre. The most simple and ignorant supposed all this proceeded from a real and sincere affection: but the wisest said, they were the tears of the crocodile, that Herod could not cordially deplore his death, which had taken a straw out of his eie, and put him in full possession of the Kingdom of Judea. Alexandra, joining the passion of her sorrow to her resolution of revenge, immediately after the Obsequies faileth not to give notice to Queen Cleopatra of all that had passed, with so pathetical a Letter, that every word seemed to be steeped in tears of blood. Cleopatra, who was apt enough for these impressions, suddenly takes fire, and affecteth the affair with that ardour, she would her own cause, she rowseth up her whole Court, she storms, she perpetually filleth Mark Anthony's ears, crying out; it was a thing insupportable to see a stranger hold a Sceptre, to which he could pretend no right, to massacre the Heir with so much barbarous cruelty, to torment with servitude poor afflicted Queens, contrary to all equity, reason, and royalty of their birth. Anthony, who knew Herod to be his creature, and the work of his own hands, would not willingly understand these complaints. Notwithstanding, to please Cleopatra, he swore a great oath, he would examine the business in sending for Herod, and, if he were found culpable of such a villany, he would inflict an exemplar punishment upon him.

Herod accused.

Behold Herod cited to Laodicea, where Mark Anthony was to remain for a certain time, whither he was summoned to appear, and purge himself of the murther of Aristobulus, of which he was supposed to be the Authour. This was a clap of thunder to this disloyal wretch, which most powerfully awakened him, when he least thought of it, and put such terrours upon him, as are not to be imagined.

Herod's affrightment.

Upon one side he had before his eys the image of his offence, and the voice of blood, which rung in his ears; on the other side he saw all his fortune depended on Mark Anthony, who at that time handled nothing, but by the counsel of Cleopatra his mortal enemy, and whom he well knew to have an enterprize in hand upon the Kingdom of Judea for her advancement. But nothing so troubled his brain as a furious jealousie. For he imagined, that Anthony, a loose and wanton Prince, one that courted all the Princely beauties of the world, would do the like to his wife, whose picture he formerly had, and that; with the more ease to enjoy her, he would make him serve as a sacrifice for his fatal loves. This spirit of his was torn, and distracted on all sides, and in all objects discovered precipitation, and affrightment: one while he seemed to resolve to undergo a voluntary banishment, sometime he supposed death more suitable, otherwhile he framed to himself some purpose of resistance: but nothing appeared to him better then to delay, and draw the business out at length as long as he could.

Anthony, pressed with the voyage he undertook to war against the Parthians, sent instantly for him; delays and excuses thrust him further into suspicion. Necessarily he must go, or resolve to lose all. He taketh leave of his mother-in-law Alexandra, and Mariamne his wife, without seeming to be amazed, without complaint, without giving testimony of his discontent, as if he had a short journey of pleasure to make. Last of all, he had his own mother, and his sister Salome in Court, to whom he much recommended vigilancy over the deportments of those, whom he esteemed to have wrought him the mischief. Then drawing his Uncle Joseph aside, he spake these words to him: "Uncle, you know the occa"sion, that transporteth me to Laodicea, which truly
"is very difficult, seeing my innocency assaulted by "powerfull and secret malice, which would be so "much the more dreadfull, if it had as much effect
"as passion. But I hope to finde day-light through "the storm, and that you shall see me return tri"umphant over calumny through my integrity,
"as I have already raised Trophies over hostility
"by arms. If God shall otherwise dispose of me,
"it is a mere plot prepared against me for the beau"ty of my wife, on whom Mark Anthony may per"haps have some design, and this may be a cause to "shorten my days, and he thereby to get more li"berty for his unbridled passion. But I, for the pre"sent, conjure you, by the love, which I have born
"you, by my fortune which you reverence, by "blood, and nature; if happily you hear I am "otherwise used, then my quality, and innocency
"permit, never let the death of Herod be waited "on with the injury of his bed. Preserve the "Kingdom for your self, and your blood, and cause
"my wife instantly to take her leave of this world,
"to accompany me in the other. Kill her couragi-
"ously, lest another enjoy her after my death. If "the souls of the dead have any feeling of the affairs
"of the world, that shall serve me for a solace.

Horrid jealousie.

Joseph, much amazed at this maner of proceeding, doth notwithstanding promise him, he would perform all according to his will, if necessity so required; but that his fortune, ever powerfull, and invincible, made him conceive other hopes in all kinds. Thereupon he set forward on his way, carrying along with him the richest parcels of his treasure, to make a Present of them to those, whom he should most stand in need of, shewing in all things else, as much confidence in his countenance, as he hatched despair in his heart.

Great pleading against Herod.

When he was arrived at Laodicea, he found strange Informations prepared against him, which strongly charged him with the murther of Aristobulus. It was shewed to Mark Anthony, how Herod ever had a design upon the Sceptre of Judea, with a desperate, and enraged ambition: That nothing so much perplexed him, as to see Aristobulus alive, to whom he in conscience knew the Kingdom in such sort belonged, that himself durst not demand it of the Romans, but under the title of Regency, whilest the right Heir grew to maturity: That he had converted this Regency first into an Empire, afterwards into a Tyranny, removing, as much as he could, the Royal blood from Dignities, to advance men of no worth; witness Ananel, placed in the High-priesthood, of which Hyrcanus was despoiled; and that, which made him alter his resolution therein was, not good affection, but importunity, and evident danger of popular commotions, which, he well foresaw, rose upon this rejection of the blood Royal: That, Aristobulus being preferred to the High-priesthood, received with all alacrity, & applause of the people, he shewed this action to be most hatefull to him; being not sufficiently able to cover the fury of his envie under the ordinary mask of his hypocrisie: That after this time he had not ceased to persecute the dead Prince, and his mother, in such sort, that, finding no longer repose among the living, they were enforced to put themselves into the coffins of the dead, to be carried to the Sea, and from thence to be transported to Egypt: That he had caused them to be surprized in the act, and in sequel thereof had not afterward sought any thing more then to be rid of them: That the young Prince was drowned in the water, not alone, & separated from the rest, but manifestly smothered by the insolent youth of the houshold and bosom of Herod.

All this Proces (as was then said) was so evident, that; had it been written with the rays of the Sun, one could not wish more perspicuity. The voice of blood cried to Heaven, which the traiterous wretch could not stop. The picture of this poor Prince, which which had a little before his death been carried into Egypt, was presented with a singular admiration of his beauty: his Ghost was made to speak, which asked justice of Mark Anthony for having been so unworthily, so inhumanely murthered in the flower of his tender years, by the most horrid treason, that ever was perpetrated. The tears of the disconsolate mother were not omitted in her absence. Cleopatra made this whole Tragedie to be presented, the combate was much enkindled, and the battery was forcible. Herod, who wanted no eloquence in his own occasions, replieth with a countenance very lowly and modest:

Apologie of Herod full of craft.

Prince, and you, Sirs, who are of the Council, I hold the Sceptre of Judea, neither of Hyrcanus, nor Alexandra, never having had any purpose to flatter them for this end, yea much less to fear them. You know (Most Illustrious Anthony*) the Kingdom is in my hands; I hold it of you: from you all my greatness ariseth, and in you all my hopes are concluded. If you command, I am at this present ready, not onely to leave the Sceptre, but my life also, which never have I been desirous to preserve, but for your service. But it troubleth me, the way of death being open to all the world, the path of reputation, which is more dear to me then life, should be shut against my innocency. I am persecuted by women, and much I wonder, how the soul of Queen* Cleopatra, wholly celestial, can nourish so much spleen against a King, who never hath failed in any respect lawfully due to her merit. For Alexandra, it is not strange, that she raise such a storm against me; her fierce and haughty spirit hath always opposed my patience, endeavouring by all means to disparage my government, to pull a Crown from me, which a more puissant hand then her Ancestours hath placed on my head. What apparence is there, that being by the favour of the Romans a peaceable possessour of a Kingdom, the which even by the consent of my adversaries I sought not (so regular was my ambition) I should attempt an horrible crime, which cannot fall but into the minde of a monster? No man will be wicked in chearfulness of heart. The memory of the recompense, which man proposeth to himself, ever beareth the torch before the crime. To what purpose should I attempt upon the life of Aristobulus, to settle my affairs? They were already established: your gracious favour (most Noble Anthony*) hath afforded me more, then all their machinations can vanquish. But I perpetually have kept back the blood Royal from Dignities. What keeping back is it, when I have cherished them in my own bosom, as much as possible? Every one knows,* Hyrcanus, the prime man of this Royal family, being held as a Prisoner among the Parthians, I bent all my spirits, employed all my credit to have him set at liberty, and to procure his return to Court, where he now liveth in full tranquillity, enjoying all the privileges of Royalty, but the careful sollicitude of affairs. It is known, I have divided my Crown, and Bed with his grand-child Mariamne, making her both Queen of people, and wife of a King. I have given the High-Priesthood to her brother Aristobulus, of my meer, and free will, not enforced by any constraint (as being absolute in the manage of my own affairs) and if in ought I delayed him, it was because the minority of his age ran not equal with my affections: but in effect he hath been beheld High-Priest at eighteen years of age, which is a favour very extraordinary. Alexandra his mother, who maketh way to this business, hath ever had all the liberty of my Court, except the licence of ruining her self, which she passionately pursueth. For what reason had she to hide her self in a Coffin, and cause her self to be carried in the night as a dead body, to steal from my Court, and after she had wronged me in mine house, to traduce me among strangers? If she desired to make a voyage into Egypt, she needed to have spoken but one word, it had ben sufficient. But she pleaseth her self in counterfeiting a false peril in a real safety, to thrust into the danger of life those, who make her live in all reposed assurance. I, having discovered this practice, did not let fall one word of bitterness against her, desirous she should enjoy at her ease the sight of me as a spectacle of patience, and thinking all folly sufficiently punished with its own proper conscience. Certain time after, the death of this young Prince happened, which draweth tears of compassion from me (for I loved him) and much it troubled me, his mother perverted the sweetness of his excellent Nature, and cut more stuff out for his youth, then he was able to stitch together. He is dead, not in my house, but in the house of his mother; dead, by an accident, which no man could prevent; dead, sporting in the water, a faithless Element, where a thousand and a thousand have without any such purpose perished; dead, among the youth of the Court, with whom daily he sported himself. His own mere motion have him into the water. The bravery of his youth caused him to dally even in danger it self, without any possibility to divert him, and his own mishap hath drowned him. It is to tie me to hard conditions, if Alexandra will make me both accomptable for the youthfull levities of her Son, as if I were his Governour, and of the frail inconstancy of Elements, as if I were Lord of them.

This pernicious Spirit spake this with so much grace, and probability, that he gained many hearts. So much force had eloquence even in the hands of iniquity. Behold him now on the shore out of peril, remaining in Anthony's Court in all liberty, to attend the sentence of his justification. In the mean time, being (as he was) wise, and liberal in all occasions, by force of Presents he purchased the hearts of the chief, and made all the accusation of Cleopatra appear to be the passion of a woman ill-advised. Mark Anthony himself said to Cleopatra, she did ill to intermeddle so much with foreign Kingdoms, and that, if she took this course, she would raise enemies prejudicial to her estate. That, Herod being a King, it was not fit to use him like a Subject, and that it would be her happiness rather to have him a friend, then an enemy.

As these things were handled in Anthony's Court, the Queen Mariamne, and her mother Alexandra ceased not to be observed by the sollicitous diligence of the mother, and sister of Herod. Joseph his Uncle played the Goaler, and often visited Queen Mariamne, sometime to treat some affairs with her, sometime in the way of complement. This man began to burn like a Butterflie in the eys of this incomparable beauty, and much affected her, although he saw himself far off from all maner of hope. Notwithstanding, he found some contentment to have fixed his affection in so eminent a place. This passion made him foolish, and full of babble, having already rudeness enough of his own nature, which made him utter strange extravagancies. For one day, there being occasion to speak of Herod's affection to Mariamne his wife, Alexandra the mother mocked thereat in an exorbitant fashion, and indeed somewhat too bitter, according to her custom. Joseph, who was desirous to entertain the Queen in the good favor of his Master, were it out of folly, or drunkenness, said: "Madam, your mother Alexandra may tell you "what pleaseth her: but to give you a clear and "ample testimony of King Herod your husband his "love, know, that, in case he happen to be put to "death, he hath commanded me to kill you, not be-"ing able to abide in the other world without your "company. At these words the poor Ladies looked pale with horrour. Out alas thou frantick man! (said Alexandra in her heart) what wil he do living, if after death he intend to destroy those, who are yet alive?

An act of great stupidity in Joseph, Uncle of Herod.

In the mean time many bruits (the dreams of the credulous) were spread through Jerusalem, that Herod was dead, that Mark Anthony had caused him to be executed, he being convicted of the murther of Aristobulus; whether these rumours were divulged by Herod's enemies, or whether himself caused them to be secretly buzzed, to try the face and disposition of the times. The wise Mariamne seemed to believe nothing; Alexandra grew passionate, and bated like an Hawk on the pearch, entreating Joseph with all possible supplications, he would remove them from Court, and conduct them to the Court of Guard of the Roman Legions, disposing them into the hands of Colonel Julius, from thence to pass to Mark Anthony: for she vehemently desired this Prince might see her Daughter, perswading her self, that, so soon as he should behold her, he would be taken with her beauty, and do any thing in her favour. These intentions being oblique, were unhappy in the success, and all Alexandra's pursuits served her for no other purpose, but to vent her passion.

In

Return of Herod.

In the end, Herod returneth victorious, with authentick testimonies of his justification, and Anthony's amity; notwithstanding the endeavours of Cleopatra: God reserving this Parricide for a life like Cain, attended with a death most dreadful. His Mother and Sister failed not, presently upon his arrival, to serve him up a dish of their own dressing, and to tell him the design, which Alexandra had to put her self into the power of the Romans. Salome, envious against Mariamne even to fury, steeping her serpentine tongue in the gall of black slander, accused her of some secret familiarity with Joseph: whereupon Herod, who was extremely jealous, thought in that very instant to ruine her; and so drawing Mariamne aside, he demanded of her from whence this correspondence grew, which she had contracted with Joseph? The most chaste Queen, who never went out of the lists of patience, shewed her self both with eie, visage, countenance, and word, to be so penetrated with this cursed calumny; that well the traiterous wretch perceived, how far she was alienated from such thoughts: and verily being ashamed to have uttered such words, he asked pardon of her, bemoaning with scalding tears his credulity, giving her many thanks for her fidelity, and making a thousand protestations of an everlasting affection.

The good Lady, who was displeased to behold such hypocrisie, said covertly to him; That truly it was an argument of love to his wife, to desire her company in the other world. He, who understood by half a word, presently perceived what she would say, and entered into such desperate fury, that he seemed as a mad man, tearing his beard and hair off his head, and crying out, Joseph had betrayed him; and that it was apparent, he had great correspondence with Mariamne: otherwise so enormous bruitishness would never have escaped any man, as to reveal such a secret. Thereupon he commandeth Joseph should be killed in the place, to serve as a Victim at his return, not consenting to see him, nor hear one sole word of his justification. It was a great chance, he had not at that time finished the sacrifice of his intemperate cruelty, and that to satisfie his Chimerical humour, he had not put Mariamne to death. But the irrefragable proofs of her Innocency, and the impatient ardours of his love, withheld the stroke; only to make the sparkles of his choler fly further off, he discharged it upon Alexandra, shutting her up for a time, keeping her apart from the Queen her daughter; and doubtlesly resolving with himself, it was in her shop, where all these counsels, plotted for his ruine, were forged and filed.

Troublesom affairs of Herod.

Certain time after, Herod saw himself embarqued in other business, which he thought to be at least as perilous as the former. Mark Anthony, who always had lent his shoulders to underprop him, after he had for a long time stroven against the fortune of Augustus Cæsar, fell to the ground in the Actiack Battel, ending his hopes and life with a most mournful Catastrophe. This accident struck the Tyrant more then one would think, seeing his support ruined, his affairs, which he supposed to have been so well established, in one night dissolved, and that he had him for an enemy, who was in a fair way to become Emperour of the world. His friends and enemies judged him as a lost man. He, who already had escaped so many ship-wracks, despaireth not at all in this extremity; but resolves to seek out Cæsar, who was then at Rhodes, and prostrate himself at his feet. But, before he set a step forward, he did an act wholly barbarous and inhumane.

Most lamentable death of Hyrcanus.

Hyrcanus, the true and lawful King, who by his sweetness and facility had first raised Antipater, and afterwards saved Herod's life, seating him in the Regal Throne, to the prejudice of his own allies, was as yet alive, worn even with decrepitness: for he now was past eighty years of age. The Tyrant, fearing, lest he, being the only remainder of the blood royal, should again be re-established in the Throne, by the suppliant request of the people, who much affected his innocency; seeing him already upon the brink of his grave, threw him head-long into it, tearing out his soul with bruitish violence, which he was ready to yield up to Nature. Some held this was mere cruelty, without any colour of justice, wherewith this Diabolical Prince was wont to palliate his actions. Others write, that Hyrcanus's days were shortened upon this occasion.

Ambition of Alexandra causeth the death of her Father.

Alexandra, being not able to put off her ambition but with her skin, seeing Herod gone upon a voyage, from which it was likely he should never return, sollicites her father Hyrcanus, shews him the time is come, wherein God will yet again make his venerable age flourish in Royal Purple. The Tyrant is involved in snares, from which he can never free himself. Fortune knocketh at the gate of Hyrcanus, to restore the Diadem, which is due to him by birth-right, and taken away by tyranny. It only remaineth, that he a little help himself, and his good hap will accomplish the rest. Hyrcanus answereth her; 'Daughter, the time is come, wherein I should 'rather think of my Grave, then a Regal Throne. 'You know what opinion I had of Greatness, in an 'age, and condition, wherein rightfully I might cherish it. I voluntarily forsook it, preferring repose 'before all the Crowns of the world. Now that I 'am in the Haven, would you recall me into the 'storm? Daughter, leave such words: I have 'seen too many miseries, speak to me of my Grave, 'not of Sceptres.

Alexandra replied, That although, in his own person, he not at all pretended to life, nor to the fortune of the living; he notwithstanding ought not to neglect his blood, but permit justice to be done, and meddle with nothing, but by writing a word or two to Malichus the Lievtenant of Arabia, who would aid him with mony, and forces, as much as should be needful. In conclusion, he was bound to save both his daughter, and grand-childe, from the ravening teeth of this Tiger. She deafned his ears with so many reasons, that in the end he yielded, and treateth with Malichus, who should safe conduct him with a good troop of horse. The Letters are put into the hands of one, called Dositheus, a cosin of Joseph (whom Herod lately had caused to be massacred) to be with all safety delivered. But the perfidious wretch, betraying the blood of his allie, and the fortune of Hyrcanus, in stead of carrying the Letter faithfully to Malichus, delivered it into Herod's hands, who commandeth to require an answer, and bring it to him, thereby to discover the practice thereof, and understand the Arabian's purpose. He faileth not to promise Hyrcanus all assistance, inviting him with much earnestness to be with him as soon as possible. Herod having discovered the whole plot, sends for Hyrcanus, and asked, if he received not some Letters from Malichus? Yes, answered he; but they contain nothing but complement. The other demanded, Had you not some present with those letters? He confesseth, That verily Malichus had presented him with four horses to draw his Coach. Thereupon, without any other form of process, the tyrant made this venerable old man to be murdered, imbrewing the hoary hairs in the blood of him, who had been a Fosterer, a Father, a Protectour of him; yea, all. Then after he had imprisoned Alexandra, and Mariamne in a strong Fort, under the custody of Joseph his Treasurer, and Sohemus the Iturian, he goes directly to Rhodes, leaving the absolute charge of his Kingdom to his brother Pheroras.

in

Alexandra and Mariamne prisoners.

The History telleth not the sorrow of the Queen, and her Mother, for the death of Hyrcanus. It is probable, all was a long time concealed, as from such who were held in a straight Prison, and had conversation with no man. Alexandra gnawed her bridle of Impatience: Mariamne resisted the dull languishments of this Captivity with a generous constancy, and endeavoured to sweeten the discontents of her Mother. All her comfort was in God; for how could she speak, or think of any thing else? 'My God (said she) you steep all creatures for 'me in Wormwood: if I heretofore have loved 'them, and sucked some sweetness from the world; 'for an ounce of Honey, you have given me a 'pound of Gall. From the time I began to bear a 'Diadem on my head, I have felt nothing but 'Thorns: and Royalty hath been nothing to me 'but a specious slavery. My God, how long shall 'it continue? Shall we not behold that bright day 'to shine over our heads, which is perpetually in 'its Eastern rising; which may dry up our tears, 'and breaking the bands of our captivity, place us 'in Abraham's bosom, the liberty of the Elect?

These poor Ladies stayed there, perpetually pent up between horrid Walls, beholding nothing but Rocks, and savage Wildernesses, which to their sorrow seemed to resound compassion. They knew not in what state the world was, much less the affairs of Court. At every season the Goaler came to visite them, they expected nothing but news of their death. The Guard in the beginning shewed themselves severe in their countenances, and reserved in their words: all was full of horrour, affrightment, and melancholy silence. In the end (for there is no Iron but will be softened in the fire) Sohemus visiting them more oft, according to the Commission he had, felt fiery arrows fly from the eys of Mariamne, so sharp, that they transfixed his heart with compassion, judging it a hard thing to hold a Queen in captivity, who was able to enthral all hearts with so many supereminent excellencies, as Heaven had conferred upon her. He began to shew her a pleasing countenance, and Mariamne, seeing him one day in a good humour, took confidence therein to know some news of the other world. 'Sohemus, '(said this Lady to him) you now behold us in a 'most woful state, and much unworthy our quali- 'ties; but the day perhaps will come, the storm may 'blow over. Mischief and misery knock not al- 'waies at one and the same gate. You know who 'I am, and that in obliging me, you engage not an 'unable creature; much less, an ungrateful. Tell us 'in a word, to what end doth King Herod hold us 'here, and of what condition are the affairs of the 'times?

Mariamne conferreth with Sohemus.

Sohemus at these words, felt his heart assaulted with most violent counter-buffs: on the one side, he represented to himself the avengement of Herod, freshly exemplified in Joseph: on the other side, he was so touched with compassion of those words this noble Lady spake to him, that the Ice of his heart dissolved, and began already to evaporate through his eys. Mariamne finding him waver, spake boldly; 'Sohemus, It is a word which can no whit 'prejudice you, being stored up in deep silence, and 'which may much advantage us for the security of 'our Affairs.

Sohemus supposing, either that Herod never would return again in the quality of a King, or that he, being under the protection of Mariamne, might easily work his reconciliation, openeth his heart unto her, and said; 'Madam, I put my secrets and 'life into your hands: yea, I desire to die before 'ever I undertake to execute this barbarous com- 'mand which Herod hath imposed upon me, in case 'the Affairs he negotiateth at this time with Cæsar, 'succeed not according to his wish. And what is it? '(saith Mariamne to him.) Madam, I tremble on- 'ly to think of it; it is a matter, which concerneth 'your life. My friend (replieth the good Queen) 'it is his ordinary guise, he enjoyned his Uncle Jo- 'seph as much upon his first voyage. But is there no 'means to deliver us from this? Sohemus answereth, That Pheroras brother of Herod, had charge of the Kingdom, and he being a man extremely distrustful, ever had his eie upon sudden surprizals. 'Well then '(said this poor Princess) we must die: on what 'side soever I turn me, I behold nothing but the 'image of death, with which I am already grown 'acquainted. Sohemus comforted her with his best endeavour: but she then shutting up her tears from all earthly comfort, opened her heart to celestial contemplations, daily more and more purifying her soul both in the water of tears, and in the boiling Furnace of afflictions. O the Providence of God! That is true which the Scripture saith: Your ways are now in the abyss, and your paths on the waters. Who could discover such tracks, whilest this most chaste and Innocent Queen, amidsts the dark obscurity of a Prison, daily drowneth one part of her life in tears?

Herod, who was now embarqued, all bloody with massacre committed on the person of Hyrcanus, found the Sea, Winds, Men, and all his affairs successful. This Proteus, who made his wit comply with all accidents, seeing he could not conceal the service which he had done for Mark Anthony, ever playing the dog, sleeping under the feet of his fortune, resolved to colour and cloak them with the mantle of Virtue. He knew Augustus was a Prince born to goodness, generous, just; and that he endeavoured to make faithful servants in this change of affairs, which he began to undertake: he deceives him under the shadow of Virtue, with the colour of constancy, and pretext of fidelity. Behold! he presenteth himself to the Emperour, and speaks in these terms.

Arrival of Herod at Rhodes.

'O Great Augustus! behold here my Person, 'and Crown at your feet: it is good reason that 'all depend upon your Greatness, since God is plea- 'sed to put the Empire of this Universe into your 'hands. For mine own part I cannot deny what I 'have been, no more, then I will dissemble what I 'ought to be, and what I will be. I have hitherto 'been a great friend of Mark Anthony; it is true, 'and had he believed me, as he hath done Cleopa- 'tra his Mistress, you, Cæsar had felt how far I was 'your enemy, and he, how much I was his friend. 'But this miserable Prince cozened by this crea- 'ture, took money of me, and counsel of her, to 'destroy, in so doing, his fortune, and raise 'yours upon his own ruines. I have followed him 'even to the brink of the grave, and not fallen 'therein, since my death could nothing advance his 'service. He is in that state and condition, wherein I 'am able to render him nought but tears. To you '(O Cæsar) are due the services, which I tender 'with His speech to Augustus.

'with much heartiness, if you shall please to accept 'them, on this condition, that you enforce me not 'either to hear or speak evil of my old Master, 'whom being no longer able to serve, I notwith-'standing ought after death to love.

Augustus took pleasure in this liberty, and thought this man was made of the wood, whereof good servitours are composed; not seeing the subtilty of the Fox, who measured all according to his own interests. He then taketh the Crown, which Herod had laid at his feet, and set it on his head, saying: I desire you may live peaceably in your Territory; onely be faithfull to me, as you have been to Mark Anthony. Herod, after this so favourable access, ceased not to put himself forward into the grace of Augustus, by seeking out all occasions to procure it, and namely in the voyage the Emperour made into Egypt, wherein he perpetually attended him, and performed many singular offices. This business so prosperously dispatched, he triumphantly returneth into the City of Jerusalem, to the amazement of the whole world.

Accusation, and pitiful death of Mariamne.

Here it is, that the virtuous Mariamne endeth her career, to serve as a sacrifice in the lamentable triumphs of her Husband. Let us behold how this bright flame is extinguished, we shall from thence expect no evil odour; the good vapours of her life will wait upon her even to death. So soon as Herod was arrived in his capital City, he hasteneth to salute the Queen his wife, whom he had already caused to be set at liberty, being secure of his affairs, and was the first brought her the news of his happy success in this voyage. He was so puffed up with his prosperities, that he could not contain himself, and the love of so amiable an object (which he then beheld in his presence after so many dangers) did so unlooson his tongue in excess of vaunts, and superfluity of words, thinking he made himself very acceptable with such impertinencies. Mariamne much perplexed to hear him, and being free, and generous in all her actions, shewed not to take much pleasure in these his idle boastings, which Passion likewise made to appear somewhat childish. He thinking at the first this was nothing but a trifling humour of Melancholy, which would quickly vanish into smoak, flattered her the more with words, playing the wanton beyond his custom. Upon these dalliances the poor Lady sighed often, remembering her self of the secret commandment very lately given to Sohemus. He well saw by this her countenance, she was not content, and beginneth to enter into suspicion, that Sohemus had used the like intemperance of tongue, as Joseph. He at that time knew not what face to set upon it, so much was he turmoiled: love, anger, jealousie, suspicion, drew him with four Horses. He could not be angry, as he would, nor knew how to love what he affected. This proud spirit, unacquainted how to bow under any one, but to deceive him, was ashamed to behold himself dis-armed, and to become a counterfeit in amorous courtships, not so usual to his nature. He then, seeing this Mommery succeeded not, was the more afflicted, and thought it was time to brandish his sword. But love proved of more force then anger, and withheld the stroke. He retired, shaking his head, and muttering I know not what between his teeth; as cursing love, which made him mercifull in despite of his own disposition. Out alas! Can one finde out a more spitefull hatred then in women against women, when jealousie hath laid hold of their brain? Cypre, an Arabian by nation, mother of Herod, and Salome his sister, seeing him so passionate, ceased not to blow the Coal with their tongues, and enkindled him with many Calumnies, which the Tyrant partly believed, yet could not suddenly resolve to give the blow. He was long time debating with himself, without power to conclude any thing. In the end, an unhappy day comes, in which, about Noon, being retired into his Chamber, he sendeth for Mariamne, who instantly came thither: but, Conjugal Rites being required of her, she stuck in the refusal saying, The Law of Nature forbad her to company with a man, who had murthered her Father, and Brother: speaking of her Father Alexander, who by the pursuit of Herod, had been oppressed by the Romans, and of her brother Aristobulus so cruelly smothered. Here Josephus the Historian, after he had highly praised Mariamne, as a most chaste Queen, and truly endowed with an admirable Faith (for such are his words) taxeth her with a little disdain, which was (as he said) ingraffed in her nature; for that she rejected the dalliances of her husband. But he that will wel consider, how Herod had used her nearest of kin, most unworthily massacring them, and how, holding the Sceptre from her house, he used her not in the quality of a Queen, nor a Wife, but of a poor Sacrifice; which he caused to be shut up, commanding to murder her as often as he fel into any danger of his own life, for fear some other should enjoy her after his death, shall finde the Lady had most just cause to make him this answer. Herod notwithstanding, who would not afford such liberty, was so moved with these words, as it was a great chance he had not laid violent hands upon her; shewing, by his eys sparkling with anger, his shrill voice, and hands lifted up, he would proceed to force. And, as he stamped up and down, transported with rage, acting his anger like a Fencer, without Mariamne's reply to any one word, the perfidious Salome, thought it was now high time to strike her stroke. She sent a trusty Servant, whom she a long time had suborned, to cause him to depose a calumny as wicked, as ridiculous; to wit, that Mariamne, having a purpose to give Herod a love-drink, had addressed her self to him, who was Cup-bearer to the King, to corrupt him with many promises, to which he never had given ear. For the rest, he had such instruction given him; that, if perhaps Herod should ask, what this Potion was, he should answer without further difficulty, it was the Queen's invention: and that herein she only required the service of his hand.

Sottish love.

Strange mischief.

This wicked fellow entered into the Chamber in cold blood, and very seriously makes oath hereof: whereupon Herod, who was already enkindled, becoming more enflamed then ever; thought within himself he must no longer wonder, from whence these his impatiences of love proceeded. At that instant he caused an Eunuch to be laid hold on, one of the Queen's most truly servants; supposing nothing was done without his knowledge: he putteth him to the torture, causing him to be most cruelly tormented, of purpose, that his body, very feeble, not being able to endure the violence of tortures, and on the other side, having nothing to say against his good Lady, in whose conversation he had never perceived any thing, but Honour, and Virtue, should for a long time remain in very great perplexities. In the end, he let a word fall, saying, He had seen Sohemus talk a long while in secret with Queen Mariamne, as framing some Relation to her: and that after this very time he well perceived she was troubled. Herod had no sooner heard this word; It is enough, said he, take him from the torture, and let

Sohemus

Sohemus be called. Sohemus knew nothing what had passed, and lived in great contentment, having very lately obtained a good Government by the Queen's recommendations: he was wholly amazed, they laid hold upon him, and would enforce him to confess the discourse, which he had with Mariamne during this specious imprisonment. But he persisting in denial, is massacred in the place. Herod retired into his Cabinet, drinking in deep draughts the gall and poyson of his deadly choler, and contriving in his heart the fury, which he soon after was to shew in publick: for without giving any truce to his spirit, he assembled his Privy-Council, and sendeth for the Queen, who expected nothing less then such proceeding. This Monster, who always endeavoured to give colour of justice to his most exorbitant actions, beginneth a long speech, which he had prepared at leisure: and while every one was in horrour and silence, not knowing what would be the Catastrophe of the Tragedy, except the couragious Mariamne, who was armed with an invincible constancy against all Exigents, he speaketh unto them in such like words.

Death of Sohemus.

Oration of Herod against his Wife.

'SIRS, It seemeth God will counterpoize the 'prosperities of my state by the misfortunes of my 'house. I have found safety in winds and tempests, 'in so many painful Voyages as I have undertaken, so many thorny affairs which I have ended, to finde a storm in my own Palace. You are not ignorant how I have cherished the whole Family of Hyrcanus within my bosom, in a lamentable time, when it was in decay and confusion: for recompense whereof, as if I had hatched the eggs of a Serpent, I have got nothing but hisses and poyson. God knoweth how often I have dissembled, and how often I have cured my self by patience. Notwithstanding I cannot so harden my heart, but that it may be softened, and ever become penetrable to a new wound. Behold the Queen my wife, who following the steps of her Mother, is always ready to disquiet my repose. As soon as I was returned from the Voyage so full of danger, as you know, I brought her news of the happy success of my Affairs. She shewing the little account she made both of my state, and person; at that time heard me with so great disdain, that what endeavour of courtesie soever I used, never could I extort from her pride one good word. And afterward not contenting her self therewith, she proceeded to very bloody Injuries, which I love better to conceal, for the honour of your ears, and come to deeds. Behold one of my faithful servants, who testifieth, she would have suborned him to give me a love-potion, to wit, a poyson, of purpose to turn my brain, or take away the life which God reserveth for me to acknowledge the many good offices, which you all in general, and each one in particular have afforded me. Thus you see how I am returned, my head crowned with Laurel, honoured and courted by the prime men of the world, to serve as a sport for the malice, and a mark for the treachery of a woman, whom I cannot reclaim by the force of love, nor benefits, no more then if she were a Lioness. Consider what you ought to do, I deliver her into the hands of your justice, not willing to direct my self herein by my own advice, to the end Posterity may know, that my proper interests are ever seated beneath the truth

Herod speaking these words would seem less passionate, putting all tortures upon his natural disposition, pliable enough: but he notwithstanding so vehemently fretted, that all the Council knew well, he was in heat of choler, and that his purpose was no other but to ruine the poor Queen. She is summoned to answer at that instant, without an Advocate. The glorious Amazon, Grand-childe of the Machabees, and Inheritrix of their patience, being presented before this wicked Tribunal, 28 years before the coming of the Son of God, did then, what he afterward taught us most remarkably by his example. Never from her mouth was heard one syllable of impatience, never did she use one sole word of recrimination; and being able to declare to the Council a thousand and a thousand outrages, received by her self, and the persons of her neerest allies, she swalloweth all these bitternesses with a patience more then humane; only saith she, That as concerning the essential Article of this accusation, to wit;

Admirable modesty of the poor Queen.

'The love-potion which was objected against 'her, it was a thing in the judgment of all those, 'who would truly weigh it, very far from her 'thought: since she had always more feared King 'Herod's love then hatred. Lastly, That she made 'no reckoning of life, wherein she had suffered too 'much sorrow; yea, much less of the Court, from 'whence she never received any contentment: and 'that if they would oppress her by false testimonies, 'it was easie to gain Victory of one who made no 'resistance; more easie to take the Diadem from 'her head, and her head from her shoulders: but 'most hard to bereave her of the reputation of a 'Princess of honour, which she had of her Ancestours, and would carry to her Tomb.

The poor creature was like a silly sheep in the Lion's throat, or among the paws of many Wolves. They proceeded to sentence, all tended to baseness. It was supposed, the King was willing to be rid of her, and that sufficed. Never was any one to be found, who had the courage to plead the cause of this innocent Queen, or in any sort to mollifie the passion of Herod. All those consciences were oppressed either with crimes, or cowardise, from whence it came to pass, these false Judges did more for the Tyrant, then he desired: for they all resolved upon death. He himself was surprized with horrour, though he were wholly a bloody man, and commandeth she should be kept in a prison of the Palace, with delay of execution; thinking perhaps by that means to make her more pliant to his passion. But the enraged Salome, who had raised this storm, not willing to do any business to halves, approached to the King her brother, and shewed him such Birds were not to be kept in Cages; that his life and Crown thereby run into hazard: that already all tended to a revolt, and that if he delayed this execution, he hastened the ruine of himself and his whole state. Whereupon Herod let fall this word: Let her be taken away. And behold instantly an Officer dispatched to the good Queen, who brought her the news of the last hour of her life: saluting her with a low reverence, and saying, Madam, The King commandeth you must presently die. She without any disturbance said: Let us then go (my friend) it cannot be so soon for King Herod, but it will be as late for me. And speaking this word, she set forward, and went directly to the place of execution, without change of colour, having a sweet aspect, which drew tears from the whole world.

Invincible patience and very admirable.

To crown her patience, as she was ready to receive the stroke of death: Alexandra, her own Mother, the companion of her imprisonment, the Guardian of her thoughts, who had ever been one heart with her, betraying blood, Nature, and all

Piety, by a miſchievous trick of State, thereby avoiding the ſuſpicion of Herod, as conſenting to her Daughter's humour, came to charge her with moſt bloody injuries; and it was a great chance, ſhe had not taken this poor Lady by the hair, to drag her up and down the pavement: ſaying to her with the foam of boiling choler; That ſhe was wicked, and extremely proud, and well deſerved to die in that manner, by ſhewing her ſelf refractory to ſo good an Husband.

Barbarous act of Alexandra.

Behold verily the greateſt indignity, which could happen in ſuch an accident. There is no better honey, nor worſe ſting, then that of Bees: no better amities, nor greater injuries, then of Allies. The patient Mariamne only made her this anſwer: Mother, Let my Soul paſs in peace, which alrtady is upon my lips, and trouble not the repoſe of my death. And with a generous ſilence ſhutting her mouth up to further replies, and opening her heart to God, the only witneſs of her innocency, moſt unworthily uſed, ſtretched out her neck to the Executioner, to ſeal with her blood the laſt teſtimonies of her patience.

Heroick ſilence.

Joſephus ſpeaketh not expreſly enough of the puniſhment, ſhe doubtleſs being executed in the manner at that time ordinary, which was to behead Offenders of that quality. This day-break, which bare ſtill in the Rays thereof joy and refreſhment to the poor afflicted Souls, through the horrible confuſions of tyranny, was then extinct in her blood. Yea, the eys of all the ſtanders by, bathed in tears, beheld her in her Eclipſe, when that Forehead, full of Royal Majeſty, was ſeen couragiouſly to affront approaching death, which maketh the moſt confident to tremble; and when this Alabaſter Neck was ſtretched out, and bowed under the ſhining ſteel, to be ſeparated from this beautious body, a ſhivering horrour crept into the bones of all the Beholders, and there was no Rock ſo hard, which afforded not the water of tears, before ſhe poured out her blood. The head was ſeparated from the body, and the body from the ſoul: but the Soul never ſhall be divided from God, raiſing to death ſuch a Trophey of Patience. The limbs lay all cold and ſtiff extended on the place, and the voice of innocent blood, which already penetrated the Clouds to ask vengeance of God, was inſtantly heard, as you ſhall underſtand. Only I beſeech you ſtay to behold the Pourtraict and Elogy of the good Queen, by us here inſerted.

Moſt pitiful death.

What horrour.

MARIAMNE REGINA, MACCHABÆORUM STIRPE INCLYTA; HERODIS PESSIMI OMNIUM VIRI UXOR OPTIMA; FORMA CORPORIS SUPRA CÆTERAS EXIMIA, ANIMI ETIAM VIRTUTIBUS MAJOR, INTEGERRIMÆ PUDICITIÆ, ET INELUCTABILIS PATIENTIÆ FOEMINA, INIQUISSIMIS CALUMNIIS OPPRESSA, MARITI GLADIO REGIAS CERVICES DEDIT, ANNO ANTE CHRISTI NATALEM VIGESIMO OCTAVO.

Upon the PICTURE of MARIAMNE.

Fortune a heavenly Beauty did engage
To fell Husband, who, through boundleſs rage,
Practis'd fierce tyranny, and foul debate,
As well in Love, as in his Royal ſtate.

She

She liv'd on gall, upon the ſword ſhe dy'd,
Soon in the Lamb's blood to be purifi'd.
The Croſs ſo to prevent, in pains partake
With patient God, miſhaps thrice happy make:
Which after death immortalize her ſtory,
And from her body take leſs blood, then glory.

Thus from the world this holy Queen remov'd
Breaths forth affections to her God belov'd.
And her great Soul to Heav'n in ſilence rears, Purg'd in her flame, and waſhed with her tears.
Who bravely ſo both lives, and leaveth breath,
Makes of a dying life a living death.

Fury of Herod after the death of Mariamne.

THe diſloyal Husband, who ſo inhumanely had treated a Lady worthy of all Honour: as ſoon as ſhe rendered up her Soul, as if he had been ſtrucken by ſome inviſible Dart, cried out with grief, and ſaid, He had done an act worthy the wrath of God: then dreadfully howling, he ceaſeleſly invoked the Memory, and Name of the poor dead creature, to whom he by his ſorrows could not again reſtore, what had been taken from her by the ſword of the Executioner. Whereſoever he went, he ſtill was accompanied with the image of his Crime, ſtill tormented and aſſailed with black Furies, Monſters, and hideous ſights. He tried all ſorts of Feſtival Entertainments, Dancings, and Delights, to divert this ill; but it ſtill augmented, in ſuch ſort, that he was enforced to abandon all the affairs of his Kingdom, though he had been very eager and ardent in this employment: and became in the beginning thereof doltiſh, and dull, not knowing what he did; for often, in the time of diner, he ſpake to his ſervants, and commanded them to call the Queen, as if ſhe had been yet living: they ſlipped aſide without making anſwer, and the whole Court was drenched in terrour and ſilence. In the end not being able any longer to endure the walls of his Palace, as if they had upbraided him with his cruelty, he ran into the Foreſts like a mad man, where he got a ſtrange malady of the minde, and ſo horrible a frenzy, that the Phyſicians were to ſeek, ſaying freely, it was a blow from Heaven. God, who yet reſerved him for greater calamities, would not at that time take away his life. The wicked Mother Alexandra, who ſo outragiouſly had complained of her daughter upon the Scaffold, inſtantly died, taſting the bitterneſs of death, and loſing her glory. Laſt of all, followeth a Plague, which took away even many of Herod's Counſellours; and all that was nothing but the ſcourge of Heaven in avengement of this death ſo deplorable, and never ſufficiently lamented.

The Sons of Mariamne bred at Rome.

Mariamne of her chaſte Wedlock left two ſons to Herod, Alexander, and Ariſtobulus, who were very young, able to ſuffer much in time to come, but as then incapable of feeling their own miſeries. Herod, to take from them the ſenſe of this cruel Tragedy, and to raiſe them likewiſe, by the degrees of good Education, to the glory of his Sceptre, happily puts them aſide, and ſends them to Rome, to be bred in the Court of Auguſtus Cæſar, held at that time the Academy of Kings, and prime Schole of the world. Some years being paſſed, he had a deſire to make a Voyage into Italy to ſalute Cæſar, and by that opportunity ſee his Children, whom he found excellently trained, and ſo accompliſhed, that he purpoſed with the good leave of Cæſar to carry them back into Judæa, which he did. Theſe young Princes, returning into Jeruſalem with Herod, raviſhed all the people with admiration. They were of a gallant preſence, ſtraight, active, quick-ſpirited, couragious in the exerciſe of Arms, well-ſpoken, affable, as lovely, as the perſon of the Father was odious. Men looked on them, as one would upon the two Stars of Caſtor, and Pollux, after a ſtorm: they repleniſhed all with alacrity, and ſeemed already to win all hearts, to approve their Titles to the Crown. Thoſe notwithſtanding, who retained the memory of the uſage of poor Mariamne their Mother, could not abſtain from tears.

Calumny is plotted againſt them.

Pheroras brother of Herod, and Salome his ſiſter, who both had dipped their fingers in the blood of the innocent Queen, entered into affrightments and apprehenſions unſpeakable; ſeeing the blood they had ſhed ſhould one day ſway over their heads. Wherefore they began ſilently to calumniate them, and cauſed, by truſty inſtruments, many bruits to paſs into the ears of Herod; which intimated, That the Princes his ſons, in conſideration of their Mother's wrong, had a great averſion from the Father, and that they never ſeriouſly would affect him. Herod, who was yet in the heat of his affection, and could never be ſatisfied with beholding them, gave no credit to this calumny. But rather, ſeeing them now upon the confines of maturity, ſought to match them highly; plotting for Alexander the daughter of Archelaus, King of Cappadocia, named Glaphyra, which was aſſented unto: and for Ariſtobulus, he cauſed him to marry the daughter of Salome his Coſin-germain: ſo plaſtering over the domeſtick Enmities, which ever after found many Factions. Alexander and Ariſtobulus converſed together with great freedom, and uttered whatſoever they had upon their hearts; ſpeaking of the death of their Mother in ſuch manner, that they ſhewed a great reſentment thereof. Pheroras, and Salome, cloſe-biting, and watchful, ceaſed not to provoke them to ſpeech: and whatſoever they ſaid, either through vanity, or ſlight diſpoſition to anger, or in the liberty of ſecrecy, was inſtantly by a third perſon related to the ears of Herod. The ſubtile Salome holding ſtill a power upon her married daughter, who was a ſimple creature, put her upon the Rack, to tell her all, that her husband, and her brother-in-law had ſpoken in the privacy of their mutual converſation. She then recounted the words theſe poor Princes had through ſimplicity and bravery ſpoken, to wit, that Ariſtobulus vaunted himſelf, The Kingdom belonged to the children of Mariamne, as to the line of the true Queen: as for Herod's other ſons, who were ſpread abroad in very great number (for he had nine or ten Wives) that he might make Regiſters of them in ſome petty Towns, and that they ſhould do well to learn to write, and read. She added, that Alexander ſaid in boaſting, He was a better man then his Father; notwithſtanding, that converſing with him, and ſeeing him of a jealous humour, he reſtrained himſelf as in a ſcabbard, and durſt not diſcover himſelf, for fear he ſhould give him ſome ſuſpicion of his power. That hunting, or walking with Herod, he did, as it were, bow, and contract himſelf together, that he might not appear taller then his Father: that, if he were to ſhoot in a Bow, he purpoſely made himſelf unskiful, thereby to take all occaſion of envie from him. It was a notable act of wiſdom to do it, but a great folly of youth to breath out many words, as innocently ſpoken, as treacherouſly interpreted: and above all, an infinite ſimplicity to commit their ſecrets to a woman, whoſe heart is as fit to keep what it ought to conceal, as a Sieve to hold water.

When Pheroras and Salome had a long time filled the ears of Herod with theſe triſling reports, ſeeing the ſuſpicion began to take footing in his mind, and that the affection of a father cooled towards his children, they ſtruck the iron while it was hot, and wiſhed him ſeriouſly to take heed of his Sons, for they ſpake big, and had boldly ſaid, That all thoſe, who were embrewed in their mother's blood, ſhould not carry the puniſhment into the other world: for verily, as they were vexed upon the remembrance of the dead, ſuch like words had eſcaped them. Herod was much amazed at the liberty, and thought he muſt repreſs their boldneſs by ſome counterpoize. What doeth he? To humble the hearts of theſe Princes, he ſelecteth among his children one called Antipater, his Son by Doris, nothing noble, and who had ſhamefully been hunted out of the Court; he puteth this his Son, in the turning of an hand, upon the top of the wheel, not that he had a purpoſe to raiſe him, but to uſe him to counterbalance the children of Mariamne, reputing him an Inſtrument proper for this end. For certainly this Antipater was of a dark ſpirit, cloſe, and miſchievous, much of his Father Herod's diſpoſition, as it was preſently to be ſeen. When he was advanced, he reſolved fully not to deſcend but with loſs of life, and to hold that Kingdom, as well as others, by ſome notable trick. Behold why he played the Proteus, and changed himſelf into all forms to gain credit with Herod, who then began to like him very well; and he, the more to fortify himſelf, ſpared not under hand to aggravate the calumny againſt the children of Mariamne, and, after he had thrown the ſtone, withdrew his arm ſo cunningly, that it ſeemed he had not touched it: for he always was converſant with Alexander, and Ariſtobulus, with much reſpect, as with his Maſters; yea, when he made falſe tales to tickle the ears of his Father, then feigned he by a counterfeit modeſty to take their cauſe in hand, and defend them ſo diſcreetly for his own advantage, that thereby he caſt them further into ſuſpicion. King Herod judged, that, to countenance him, it were to good purpoſe to ſend him to Rome, which he did, allotting him a flouriſhing retinue, & an infinite number of recommendations. There it was, that he much embroiled buſineſſes, writing to his Father, That he had diſcovered at Rome ſtrange plots, that he ſhould take heed of his brothers, Alexander, and Ariſtobulus, that they had practiſed ill diſpoſitions in every place, that their purpoſe had no other aim, but to ſhorten his days, and diſpoſſeſs him of his Empire. This had ſo much the more colour, for that theſe miſerable Princes, galled with their repulſe, could not diſſemble their diſcontent; they ever caſting forth ſome words, which, gathered by the Spies of Pheroras, and Saleme, never fell to the ground.

The young Antipater, Son of Herod, exalted.

Herod ſighed to ſee, that, he having pacified all abroad, the fire ſhould kindle in his own houſe, and thereupon had ſome deſire to arreſt his Sons, but he would attempt nothing upon their perſons without Caſar's commmand, referring all to him, both for his ordinary complacence, and ſafegard of his own affairs. After he had revolved this affair with a thouſand anxieties in his heart, wherein he bare the chief extent of his counſels, he reſolved in his own perſon to carry his Sons to Rome, and accuſe them before Caſar. In the whole courſe of his long way from Paleſtine to Italy, he held himſelf cloſe, and reſerved, not making the leaſt diſguſt againſt his children appear, that he might not occaſion in them any ſuſpicion. Being arrived at Rome, he learned, Auguſtus Caſar was then in the City of Aquilea; without delay he went thither, conducting with him Alexander, and Ariſtobulus, who were received by the Emperour (who was as their Father) with all demonſtration of love. In the mean time this miſerable Father, ſpying his opportunity, demands day of Caſar for an audience, which he affirmed was of great conſequence; it was granted him, and he came at the time appointed, bringing theſe two poor delinquents, who doubted nothing, nor at that time ſought any thing but to laugh, and paſs their time with their antient acquaintance. When they were in the midſt of a brave aſſembly of Princes there preſent: Herod breathing out a great ſigh, ſaid:

Behold me, GREAT CÆSAR, an happy King by your favour, and an unfortunate father through the diſgrace of my houſe. If Nature had denied me children, Fortune ſhould ſee me without miſeries: all my diſaſters proceed from my own progeny. It much troubleth me, to defile your ears (worthy Cæſar*) with the recital of ſo great wickedneſs, but neceſſity, which hath no law, enforceth me, and your juſtice, which eſtabliſheth all laws, inviteth me. Behold my two unnatural ſons, who after they had received the honour to be bred at your feet, after they had obtained from me all the favours, which could be expected from a King, by your gracious Clemency ſufficiently powerful, and from a father of his own Nature moſt indulgent, betraying the glory of the education they had at your hands, and forgetting even the Nature and Blood they received from me, have attempted a crime, which I dare not name. I live too many years in their opinion, and too long enjoy a Kingdom, which with ſo much labour I purchaſed. I have opened to them the gate of Honour, that they may enter, after that natural death ſhall cloſe up mine eys: and they will paſs through by the portal of Parricide, preparing Ambuſhes for my life, to ſnatch away the ſpoil ſteeped in my blood. Behold I proſtrate them at your feet, not willing to retain any right in mine own diſpleaſure, neither of King, nor Father, but that which ſhall be decreed for me by your juſtice. Yet notwithſtanding (O Great* Cæſar*) I would beſeech you to beſtow upon my old age, which you have pleaſed ſo much to honour, ſome repoſe in my own houſe, and free me from the hands of theſe Parricides. So likewiſe I think it not expedient for children ſo ungrateful, who have trampled laws both Divine and Humane under foot, to live any longer, and ſtill to have the Sun in their eys, to ſerve as a witneſs and an upbraiding of their crime.*

Herod ſpake this with a marvellous vehemency, ſo that he put the whole aſſembly into an aſtoniſhment, and theſe poor young men, who had as much innocency, as ſimplicity, ſeeing themſelves charged on the ſudden with ſuch a tempeſt of words, made the apple of their eys to anſwer, and weep in good earneſt. They endeavoured to ſpeak, fearing, leſt their ſilence might make them culpable; but the more they ſtrove, ſo much the more the ſobs choaked up their words. Auguſtus Cæſar, who was a judicious and courteous Prince, ſaw well by this their aſpect, theſe young men had more miſhap then malice, and caſting a gracious eye upon them, Courage, my children, be confident (ſaith he:) anſwer at your leiſure, and be not troubled. All thoſe there preſent bare already much compaſſion towards them, and Herod ſhewed even by his countenance he was moved: ſo eloquent are the tears of Nature. Alexander, ſeeing the eys of the whole aſſembly very favourable, took heart, repreſſeth his ſighs, and being (as he was) eloquent ſpeaketh in theſe terms:

Apologie of Herod's ſon before Auguſtus.

MY LORD AND FATHER, Your Majeſty hath not brought us ſo far to the Altars of Mercy, to offer us up as a ſacrifice to Revenge: we are at the knees of Cæſar, as in the Temple of Clemency, whether being conducted by your Warrant, and command, it maketh us ſay, your words are ſharp, but proceedings moſt ſweet. If calumny had ſo altered your excellent Nature, as to make you take reſolution upon our lives, to the prejudice of our innocency, you might have done it in Paleſtine as a Father, and a King, the ſentence and execution were in your own hands. But God permit you to bring us to the Court of Auguſtus, not to leave the head, where the Crown was deſigned, but rather to return it back victorious, and free from ſlander. It is a very ſtrange thing to pretend the moſt enormous of crimes againſt perſons of our reputation, and quality, without ſaying wherefore, or how. Nothing is ſpoken of Letters, Poyſons, Complots, complots, Conſpiracies, Suborned ſervants: it is onely affirmed, we are Parricides, and proofs are pretermitted. If this be ſufficient, you ſhall have in the world no more innocency, but that, which calumny ſhall diſdain to fix her tooth in. Our enemies, who for many years have ſpun this web, never could alledg any other thing, but that we were old enough, and of ſufficient courage to do it, and that we might perform it in reveuge of the death of our mother Mariamne. As for the firſt reaſon, who ſeeth not how weak it is? If nothing but Age and Valour be neceſſary to perpetrate a Parricide, it is to fill the whole world with blood, to put all fathers into jealouſie, and all ſons into crime. For the ſecond, which concerneth our dead mother, ſhe left us in an age, wherein neither could we as yet bewail, nor feel her miſery. After we came out of our Childhood, we have not been willing to ſearch into your Counſels, to ſift out your reſolutions, the iſſue of them ought to make us not more audacious to undertake to do evil, but more ſtayed and adviſed to do good. We onely have afforded tears to her, not to bemone her death, for ſuch were unprofitable, but to ſatisfy our paſſion, ſeeing our enemies ceaſed not to diſturb the aſhes of her, whoſe blood they had ſhed. Father, if our tears, which proceed from ſo juſt a reſentment of nature, be in your Court accompted criminal, where ſhall we any more finde ſafety, but in your juſtice? Never in the ſo ſenſible apprehenſions hath any word of bitterneſs eſcaped us againſt you, but rather againſt thoſe, who abuſe your authority to the ruin of yours. We have no cauſe at all to hate your life, but to love it by ſo much the more, as you have judged us capable above the reſt of our brothers, to ſucceed to your Crown. Yet have ſet all the marks of Regality upon us, all the bleſſings we could have for, and to ask more would be to require liberty to overthrow us. To what end ſhould we ſeek by Parricide a Kingdom, which is purchaſed for us by your favour, that ſo Heaven, Earth, and Seas, conſpiring with Cæſar, might ſhut the gate againſt us, for which we ſhould be deſirous to make a key ſteeped in the blood of our father? Your Majeſty hath begot us, perhaps more unfortunate then now would be expedient for your eſtate, but never ſhall we be ſo ſottiſh, nor impious, as to do a miſchief, irrecoverably to undo us. Moſt honoured Father, ſuppreſs the ſuſpicion, which you have conceived, or, if you be pleaſed ſtil to retain it, we both will leave this life, of which we are not ſo fondly affectionate, that we would be willing to preſerve it to the diſpleaſure of him, that gave it.

This Oration, accompanied with the tears of this yong Prince, ſtruck all the ſtanders by with admiration, and as they were both beheld with lowly looks, expecting the Judge's ſentence, every one was enkindled with deſire to juſtifie them. Cæſar caſteth his eye on Herod to ſee his countenance, who ſhewed himſelf much moved with compaſſion, and could have been content never to have thought of ſuch an accuſation: for verily this action, in the apprehenſion of thoſe preſent, much hurt him, and cauſed his credulity to be condemned. Auguſtus, who would not confound them, pronounced, that undoubtedly his children had done ill to diſpleaſe him; but as for the pretended crime, he ſhould raze it out of his papers. Theſe young Princes were too well born and bred to proceed ſo far: there remained for them hereafter to live in good correſpondence, and renew this holy knot of Nature, which could not be diſſolved by ſo good a father, nor children ſo futurely hopeful. This ſaid, Herod embraced his ſons one after another, much weeping, which drew tears even from thoſe, who were not intereſſed in this affair. After all manner of complements were done, behold them upon return with their father and brother Antipater, who had cauſed all this goodly Tragedie to be played. Notwithſtanding, this wicked creature overwhelmed them with courteſies, and congratulation, as if he would make Bonefires of joy in his heart. Thus diſſimulation goeth along in Court, till ſuch time, that God taketh away the maſk.

Horrible malice.

Being return'd to Jeruſalem, one year was ſcarcely ſpent, but that calumny ſet new ſnares to entrap the innocency of theſe poor Princes. Pheroras reſolved to excite Alexander with jealouſie, telling him in great ſecret, Herod his father made too much of the beautious Glaphyra his wife, daughter of King Archelaus, ſuppoſing it was a powerful means to turmoil his ſpirit, and enkindle it with fury againſt the King his father, and this was to precipitate him into ruin. Theſe words upon the matter were moſt ſenſible to this generous heart, and then he began with a jealous eye to pry into Herod's actions, who, it is true, familiarly converſed every day with this Princeſs, endow'd with incomparable beauty, but in concluſion he obſerved no other thing in ſuch converſation, but loving entertainments of a Father-in-law towards a Son's wife, worthy to be cheriſhed for many excellent parts. Alexander notwithſtanding, after this advertiſement of Pheroras, turned this Honey into Poyſon, interpreting all in ill ſenſe, and was ſo tranſported, that one day entering into his father's chamber he diſcovered the jealouſie, and ſuſpicion, he had conceived, with ſighs and tears of rage. Herod found himſelf much troubled with this accident, and thinking it a thing unworthy his perſon to juſtifie himſelf to his Son, with many words to excuſe that which was not, he onely ſaid: My Son, who hath put this into thy head? The other replieth, he knew much of it himſelf, and Pheroras had confirmed it. Pheroras was inſtantly ſent for, and Herod, who oft-times uſed him as a ſervant, caſting a furious glance of his eys upon him, "Rake-hell (ſaith he) What haſt "thou ſaid to this yong Prince? It is not a word "thou haſt put into his ear, but a ſword into his "hand againſt his Father; for verily he would no "more endure a companion of his bed, then I in my "Kingdom. Ingratefull creature, ſhouldſt thou not "rather teare out thine own heart, then entertain "ſuch a thought of thy brother? Such crimes as "this never were in our houſe, nor ever will be, un"leſs thou bring them hither. Get hence, and let me "ſee thee no more. I ordain tortures for other de"linquents; but for thee, ſince thou art ſo wicked, I "leave thee to thine own conſcience, not being "able to finde a fitter Executioner.

Pheroras, who was not much aſtoniſhed with this noiſe, anſwereth, he knew nothing, but what Salome, who was there preſent, had told him, as indeed this came from her. But the ſubtile woman caſting out at that inſtant a loud complaint, and tearing her hair, ſaith: It was a lamentable thing, that ſhe of all the world ſhould be perſecuted for being onely faithfull to her brother. Herod knew not what to think, and ſighed in his heart, beholding the diſſentions of his houſe, and in the mean time ſaw not, that his own ill example was the influence of all theſe maledictions. He did nothing elſe to Pheroras, but ſequeſter him for a time: for, although he ſeemed much moved with anger, he was not exaſperated againſt any in good earneſt, but thoſe, whom he thought would practiſe againſt his State; and ſuch Pheroras appeared not to be, for he was a Libertine, who had married his own ſervant, attracted by dalliances, refuſing the Daughter of a King, and all his deſigns aimed at nothing but ſenſuality. It was thought, this was not ſufficient ſatisfaction in Pheroras for ſuch a crime, and that this might ſtill feed a diſtruſt between the Father and Son. Behold the cauſe why the pernicious Antipater, who ever was gracious with Herod, making uſe of this opportunity, beginneth his battel more furiouſly then ever, and having perceived ſome familiarity between Alexander and three Eunuchs, the moſt intimate of Herod's chamber, he underhand giveth notice, that the conſpiracy of Alexander againſt his father was now abſolutely contrived, and that the chief Eunuchs of the chamber, and privacy of Herod, had an hand therein. Behold them presently apprehended, and put to the torture: these bodies, corrupted with ease, and delicacy, feeling themselves so roughly racked, spake what they knew, and what they knew not, and in the end delivered nothing but boasts, and vain-glorious bravados of youth, which had escaped the mouth of Alexander, that is to say, "That those Eunuchs were "very fools to be so affected to this old man, who "caused his hair to be painted, like a spruce yonker. "He had done all well enough: his time was past, "theirs was coming, the Kingdom could not for-"sake them, having justice, force, and credit in their "hands, and so many valorous men, who would not "in time of necessity forsake them: and such like things, speaking nothing of that, which Antipater pretended, yet too much for a jealous spirit.

Antipater, Son of Herod, calumniateth his brothers.

privacy

It was a pitifull thing to behold, how this miserable Court was dis-membered. It was nothing but calumniations, threatenings, summons, distrusts, examinations, tortures. All men looked upon one another, and every one supposed, there was no other security, but in preventing his companion. A thousand sottish things were daily deposed, that were of no effect. There were found not past one, or two, who, extremely racked upon the torture, to free themselves, said, Alexander had dishonoured his Father at Rome, as much more inclining to amity with the Parthians then with the Romans; and as torments were incessantly redoubled in favour of Antipater, they spake at random whatsoever they would have them, to wit, That Alexander and Aristobulus had conspired to kill Herod by poison, then to go to Rome to demand the Kingdom: which had no probability. And when it was asked where this poison was, it was replied, it was in the Castle of Ascalon: and the whole matter searched into, there was nothing to be found. Alexander notwithstanding is arrested. He, generous, and much offended to see so many tortures, said stoutly to Herod, bitterly scoffing: To what end is it to make all these slaughters, seeing you will have it, that you are deceived? I have conspired, and if you desire to know with whom, with Pheroras your brother, and Salome your sister, Ptolemy, and Saprinius your Counsellour. Kill all the world, and you alone shall reign.

He spake too much to be believed, and delivered it in an accent, which sounded nothing less. However, he was for certain days imprisoned, untill such time as Archelaus King of Cappadocia, his father-in-law, advertised of this disaster, came to the Court of Herod. He took great care not to affront him, nor tell him, that he wronged himself to be so credulous: this was not the maner to treat with a man, who extremely desired to justifie his actions. The Cappadocian striketh sail, seeming to have great compassion to finde him in such trouble, saying, His children had done ill to disquiet him in that maner: that he came not to excuse his Son-in-law, but to chastise his Daughter, if she were found blame-worthy. Herod was so comforted to hear him speak in this sort, that the tears stood in his eys, and Archelaus, seeing he had found the ready way of perswasion, began by little and little to declare unto him, that in truth the Princes his Sons had shewed a little too much insolence, but that their facility was much abused, and it would be good to take heed thereof. He did so well, that at the last he dissolved the calumny, and Glaphyra being there present, with her eloquence, and tears, obtained whatsoever she would for her husband; so that the poor prisoner was instantly released.

Herod in the mean time lived like a Cyclops in his Cave, perpetually in the obscurity of an infinite number of distrusts, still upon the point of acting new cruelties; and, being observed to be capable of all sort of suspicions, the wicked Antipater failed not to furnish him with matter enough to foment his jealousies, and by the same means advance his fortunes. A wicked Grecian came to the Court of Judea, named Eurycles, who took upon him to be a Prince, and gave Presents to Herod, to insinuate himself into his friendship. The unhappy King relished this man, and ranked him in the number of his intimate friends. He was lodged with Antipater, and observing, that he at that time bare the greatest sway in affairs, he endeavoured by all means to win his favour, which he did, familiarly conversing with Alexander, and undermining him, that afterward he might carry truth and falshood to the ears of Herod, who gave him much credit.

Three years were not fully past, but behold calumny casteth the rest of her venome. Two Souldiers of Herod's Guard, cashiered for some slight offence, were afterward indiscretely entertained in the house of Alexander, who loved them, seeing them sufficient men, and capable of good employments. Behold them accused of conspiracy, immediately apprehended, and put to torture. The vehemency of torment made them say, that, at the solicitation of Alexander and Aristobulus, they had a plot upon the person of Herod, to kill him in hunting. At the same time the Governour of the Cittadel of Alexandrina, (which was one of the strongest Fortresses of the Kingdom) is accused to have been willing to deliver it into the hands of these young Princes; which he denied strongly and stoutly. But his son, provoked against the father for some disgrace, said, the disposition was true, and at the same time produced false letters of Alexander, which seemed to confirm the same, held notwithstanding to come from the hand of Secretary Diaphantus, a store-house of falsifications.

Herod would have no more proofs, he caused his two sons to be apprehended, resolving to ruin them: and verily every man at that time accompted them lost. When these things were in hand, Melas, a Counsellour of the King of Cappadocia, came into Judea, to understand the knot of the business: he found it much envenomed, and desperate of remedy. The wicked father caused his sons to be fetched out of Prison, to examine them before Melas, and to confront them with the Depositions. Alexander asketh, Where the accusers were: it was answered, They were already dead. He replieth: "It was an unjust "proceeding to put them to death in the guilt of a "lie, drawn out by force of torments, for ever to "shut up their mouth from verity. As for himself, "and his brother Aristobulus, they never had any "other purpose but to flie to Cappadocia, and from "thence to pass to Rome, to free themselves from "the unquietness of their father. When Herod heard speech of the voyage of Cappadocia, he entreated Melas to enquire particularly of Glaphyra, if she more clearly would utter any thing touching this design. Glaphyra then was sent for, and when at her approach she beheld her husband in fetters, it was a dreadful thing to see her afflictions. Alas! my dear husband (said she) are these the favours of your father? Is this the Diadem he hath promised you? And thereupon her heart, oppressed with grief, stopped up the rest of her words. Tears stood in the eys of the miserable Alexander, who passionately loved her, and all the company was so troubled with this spectacle of pitie, that those there present to examine looked one upon another, and forgat the formalities

Court of a Cyclops.

Alexander, Son of Mariamne, imprisoned.

He is delivered by Archelaus.

Last endeavour of calumny.

Alexander, and Aristobulus, sons of Mariamne, imprisoned.

malities of justice. Herod asketh Alexander, if his wife were not partaker of all his secrets. He answereth, Such was her desert, and discretion, that he concealed nothing from her. The poor Lady was a little amazed at this word. Notwithstanding, with great simplicity she said, she was ignorant of all that had passed, as the child not yet born, yet was very ready to tell a lie to save her Husband, and that she never would disavow it, although he should charge her with some crime. Alexander, touched to the quick with this terderness, said to her: "Madam, be not "astonished; you very well know, I never had any "other plot, but to carry you into Cappadocia, to "visit the King your Father. Behold all our offence.

This cured not Herod, but made him extend his suspicion upon King Archelaus, taking it ill, he should go about to withdraw his Son, without his privacy. He commanded the Prisoners to be set at liberty, and in the mean time sendeth new Ambassadours to Rome, to purge himself from some slanders wherewith he was charged, and to obtain of Cæsar full liberty to dispose of his children according as justice should require; which was assented unto. The young Princes are disgraced, and soiled with strange calumniations at Rome, so that no man durst undertake their defence. He very glad to have such dispatches, being (as he was) a man precisely formal, and ever giving colour of justice to his passion, assembleth the Council to frame an Indictment against his Sons, admitting all those, whom he saw mischievously bent to countenance his bad purpose, and sequestring others, who might cause some obstacle; amongst the rest Archelaus, expressly nominated by Cæsar to examine this business. Moreover, that which was an act of great injustice, he never would suffer his children to appear before the Judges, to be heard in their justification: but himself alone entereth into this Assembly, full of gall, and poison. Never was he seen to be so out of countenance, Passion having wholly transfigured him, in such sort, that he spake, and acted things little consonant to his gravity. His friends were to seek in him, and he seemed rather a savage Beast, then a King. Sometime he accused, and lamented within himself, sometime he stammered, and cut himself short. He produced Letters of his Son's, that had no value in them, as was those of their journey into Cappadocia, and yet, as if he had got a great victory, he cried out: Sirs, What say you to this? Behold you not great malice? O that I had been dead before I had known any such thing! Sometime he said he referred himself to Justice, and that through passion he would do nothing passionately. Sometime he published, he had not summoned this Assembly to judg, but to approve his opinion, to the end posterity might the more abhor Parricide. Then he cited Deuteronomy, which permitted Fathers to stone their rebellious children to death, and played the Scribe, or the Divine: then he shewed Cæsar's Letters, of which he made more account then of his Deuteronomy, and insisted thereupon, as if the offenders had already been peremptorily condemned by the sentence of Augustus. When they came to voices, Saturninus the Roman, a Consular man of great authority, absolutely disswadeth this cruelty, saying, Himself was a father, that he knew the price of children, and that Herod would repent him of this precipitation. This good man had three of his Sons with him, all gallant Personages, and well entertained in good employments, who spake in favour of these poor Princes. But to no purpose. After them standeth up Volumnius, a rude man, who drew to his faction all those, which practised to serve Herod's passion, who altogether most unjustly concluded upon their deaths. As soon as this Decree was published, on old Souldier of Herod's, named Tyron, very passionate for the innocents, went directly to the Palace, demandeth to speak to the King alone by himself, which was granted him. This honest man, taking him aside, gave him a sharp admonition, even to the reproaching him, that he had lost his wits, in commanding his true heirs to be put to death, to advance a Viper, who in the end would secretly sting him. Herod hearkened to him in the beginning with great patience, but speaking over much, he asked him, Who are those, that take exception at this judgment? My self (saith the good old man) first, and such, and such men of quality, whom he named. Herod caused him to be cast into prison, laid hold of the rest, and condemneth them all to death. Afterwards causeth his Sons to be carried to Sebaste, and directeth the most cruel of his Guard to strangle them in prison.

Arraignment, and death of the innocent.

These unfortunate Princes, who expected nothing less then such a sentence, seeing the dreadfull faces of Executioners, and the fearfull Image of death before their eys, looked pale with horrour, and asked them, Who brought you hither? But they, pulling them aside as sacrifices, and discovering the instruments of their cruelty, soon shewed wherefore they came: for without making any other answer, they took them by the throat, and puting the fatal Cord about their necks, by main force strangled them, devoid of mercy.

The poor Glaphyra, who as yet lost not the hope of her husband's liberty, having at that time prepared a new battery to dispose her father-in-law to clemency, heard the tidings of the death of Alexander, and withall of her own widow-hood. She, a good space, remained in a trance, then mute as a statue, last of all a little recollecting her spirits, and casting out a sigh from the bottom of her heart, "Wo is me! "(saith she) I thought not Herod would have pro-"ceeded thus far. Tell him the sacrifice of his cruelty "is not finished, for behold, one part of the Victim "is yet alive. Alexander, my dear Alexander, who "for ever in my heart shall survive, needs must you "end your innocent life by this infamous punish-"ment? Must you have him for Executioner, whom "Nature allotted you for a Father? At the last, I "might have been called to receive the last groans "of thy pensive soul, to embosom thy final words, "and enchase them in my heart. Then turning her self to two little children, which she had by her sides: Poor Orphans, what a Father have they snatched from you? Alass! you are timely taught the trade of misery. The poor Lady, night and day, disconsolately afflicted her self, and being no longer able to endure the Court of Judea, no more then a Lion's den, she was sent back into Cappadocia, to the King her father. Herod kept with him the two Sons, under colour of their education, but in effect to establish himself, fearing lest their name should serve for a pretext of some revolt.

O the providence of God! It seemeth you much slacken to fall upon guilty heads. These young Princes, Sons of so virtuous a mother, so well bred, so well educated, accomplished with so many excellent parts, declared lawfull successours to the Crown; these Princes, who had been seen (not above five years before) to return in triumph from Rome to Jerusalem, like the two twin-stars, who gilded all Palestine with their rays, these Princes, that promised so many Tropheys, so many wonders, behold them in the sweetness of their years, in the flower of their hopes, at the gate of the Temple of Honour, for a small liberty of speech unworthily massacred, in stead of a Diadem on their heads, an Halter about their necks, and caused to be strangled by two Sergeants, that so they might breath out their Royal souls under the hand of a Hangman. Behold the brave apprentiship, which Herod exercised three year together about the time of the birth of our Saviour, to prepare himself for actions much more enormous. It was said of Sylla, that if Mercy had come upon the earth in humane shape, he had slain her. But Herod did much worse. There remained nothing for him, after so many slaughters, but to embrew himself in the blood of fourteen thousand Innocents, and attempt upon the Son of God himself, which presently after happened, and of which every one by relation of the Scripture taketh notice.

small

Antipater, the Son of Herod from the top of the wheel.

It is time to behold the recompense those wicked souls received, for having dipped their fingers in so much blood, and so many tragedies, to the end we therein may observe the proceedings of the Divine Providence, which spareth not, first slightly to touch and assay by some visitation those, which it afterwards reserveth for the eternal pains of Hel. The detestable Antipater, who had directed all the passages of this wickedness, seeing the two Heirs of the Kingdom removed quite away by his practises, thought he had already a foot in the Throne. He continueth his cunning and malice, ever masking himself with the veil of piety, as if he had an unspeakable care of the life and state of his Father, while he in the mean time had no other aim, but quickly to make himself absolute Master of all, fearing lest the disposition of Herod, which was very fleeting, might alter; and for this cause he went up and down daily practising very great intelligences. But he was hated by the people like a Tiger, and the souldiers, who saw him embrewed in the blood of his brothers, so beloved by all the Nobility, could in no sort relish him. Above all, the people were extremely touched with compassion, when these little children of Alexander, and Aristobulus were led through the streets, who had been bred in Herod's Court. All the world beheld these poor Orphans with a weeping eye, and with sorrow remembred the disasters of their fathers. Antipater well saw, it was fit for him to withdraw himself, and decline envie, and not sindge his wings in the candle, fearing his father in process of time (who in such matters was subtile enough) might discover his purposes. Notwithstanding, he was so secret, that he avoided to ask leave of Herod to sequester himself, for fear to minister matter of suspicion to him. But he caused letters closely to be written from Rome to his father, by friends whom he had wrought for that purpose, which imported all he desired, to wit, that it was necessary he should be sent to Rome, to break the enterprizes which the Arabians plotted against the State of Judea. Herod having received these letters instantly dispatched his Son Antipater with a goodly train, rich Presents, and above all the Will of Herod, which declared him King after the death of his Father. Behold all he could desire in the world. But as the eie of God never sleepeth, and supprizeth the crafty in their own policies; it happeneth the mischievous Pheroras, who had acted his part (as we have seen) in this lamentable tragedy, departed this life, by a sudden death, and poisoned (as it is thought) by the maid-servant whom he had married.

Conspiracy of Antipater discovered.

Herod being requested to come into the house of his brother, to take examinations upon the fact, unexpectedly learneth how his Son Antipater had given poison to the dead Pheroras, at such time as he was out of favour, to poison the King his Father, whilest he was at Rome, that he speedily might return into Palestine with a Crown on his head. This was deposed even by the Son of the Comptroller of Antipater's house, and circumstanced with grounds and particulars so expres, that there was not any cause of doubt. Herod demanded where this poyson was. He answered, It was in the hands of the Widow of his brother Pheroras. She being examined upon the Fact, goeth up into a higher Chamber, feigning to fetch it: and being mounted to the top of the house, she, through despair, fell down headlong, with a purpose to kill her self. But God suffered not the fall to be mortal; they much heartned her, and promised all impunity, if she freely would deliver the truth. She telleth that true it was, her husband had received the poyson of Antipater, and had some inclination to give the blow: but that a little before his death, he repented himself, and detested such wickedness; and with these words, she drew out the poyson, which afterwards was known in the death of Delinquents to be very mortal. At the same time Bathyllus, set at liberty by Antipater, was taken coming from Rome to Judea, to advise Pheroras to hasten the business, and bearing with him a new poyson, if the first were not of force.

In the mean time, Antipater wrote to the King his Father, that he laboured earnestly at Rome to dissolve Obloquies, and accommodate his affairs with clearness: that he hoped to come to a period in them, and quickly return into Judea. Herod was desirous to lay hold upon him, and sendeth him this Letter.

'My Son, the frailty of my age, and debility of 'my body, daily instructeth me that I am mortal. 'One thing comforteth me, that having made 'choice of your person to succeed me in my Estate, 'I shall behold the decrepitness of my age flourish 'again in your youth, and, as it were, bury my 'death in your life; since I shall live in one part of 'my self, to me most pretious. I wish, you presently were with me, not so much for the assistance I 'expect from your piety, as for the prejudice your 'absence may impose on my Fortune. Fail not with 'the good leave of Cæsar, to return hither as soon 'as you can: delays nothing advance our Affairs.

Subtilty against Subtilty.

This bait was too tempting to defend him from the hook: upon this news he would, as it were, fly to Jerusalem; he dispatcheth his affairs, takes leave of Augustus, and hastily posteth to obey his Father's commandments. It was an admirable thing, that in the way he never had any notice of that which passed, so hated he was both of God and men. Yet so it was, that being in Cilicia he learned, his Mother was disgraced, which much astonished him, so that he resolved to retire back again, but one of his Council (perhaps wrought by Herod) shewed unto him, that, if nothing were plotted against him, he ought not to fear: and if any calumny were forged, he rather should hasten to strangle it; otherwise his absence would thrust him further into suspicion. This counsel he believed, and notwithstanding the remorse of his conscience, he took the way to Judea. When he was arrived in the Port of Sebaste, he began to enter into greater apprehensions of his own unhappiness then ever. For upon the same Haven, where he before had beheld so great confluence of people, which made many loud acclamations at his departure, not for the love they bare him, but for obedience to Herod, who so would have it, he perceived the chance of the Die to be now changed: he was entertained with respectless countenances, and that some beholding him scornfully muttered between their teeth, as cursing him for shedding the blood of his brothers. He was too far engaged to retire back, and the vengeance of God already had scored him out his lodging. He goeth directly from Sebaste to Jerusalem, and hasteneth to the Palace magnificently attired, and well attended. The Guard suffered him to enter, commanding all those, who accompanied him, in the King's name to withdraw. He was much amazed to see himself taken like a bird in a snare; notwithstanding he went forward, and entereth into the Hall, where his Father expected him, accompanied by Quintilius Varus, newly sent from Rome as Governour of Syria. After he had made an humble obeysance, according to the custome, he came to kiss his Father, but at that instant he heard the roaring of the Lion: for Herod retiring back, said unto him; 'Avant thou murderer 'of Brothers, and Father: the kiss of a Father was 'not instituted for thee. Behold Quintilius thy 'Judge. Advise with thy self, what thou art to 'morrow to answer upon crimes whereof thou art 'accused.

Woful event of Antipater.

the

He strucken with this word, as with a thunderclap, withdrew, bearing terrour in his face, and the image of his crime in his thoughts. He in the next Chamber found his Mother and Wife weeping, with many laments already preparing his Funerals: amazement so seised him, he had not language to comfort them, nor so much as tears to bemone his own mishap. He spent the whole night in great afflictions, finding by experience, it was much more easie to commit a crime, then excuse it. The next morning he is sent for by the Council, where he found the King his Father with Quintilius Varus, and many Counsellours of state. Yea, Letters were then intercepted, very lately written by his Mother, which signified all was discovered, and that he should carefully beware not to return, and put himself into the hands of his Father, if willingly he would avoid the throat of the Lion. This was represented unto him at the entrance to the Council: he expected nothing but the instant of strangling, so much his conscience tormented him. Behold the cause, why, casting himself on his knees, he besought his father not to condemn him, before he was heard.

Antipater accused before his Father.

Herod replieth: 'Impious Villain, what hast thou 'to say? Hath God then preserved thee to be the 'last scourge of my old age? Thou knowest, I have 'extracted thee from the dregs, to place thee over 'thy brothers, above, and beyond all hope. I have 'given thee my Money, my Revenues, my Autho-'rity, my Favour, my Secrets, my Heart, and 'Crown into thy hands, in a Will signed with my 'own hand; and thou canst not a little stay, till thy 'Father's eie is closed by natural death, to enjoy it? 'It was thither thy purpose aimed, when with such 'heat thou didst pursue the death of thy Brothers: 'nothing have I done in their Indictments, but by 'thy information, and advice. Wicked creature, I 'fear, lest thou hast stained me with their blood; 'thy Crime now makes their Innocency appear.

At these words he bitterly wept, the memory of Mariamne, and his unfortunate Children coming into his mind. He was so oppressed at his heart, that he was enforced to entreat Nicholas Damascene, who was as his Chancellour, to pursue the rest. Antipater preventeth him, and speaketh in his own defence: 'That he was much wronged in giving credit to Slaves, and silly women to his prejudice, that 'he had received Letters from Cæsar, whom a man, 'could deceive no more then God himself; which 'gave a most ample testimony of all his demeanors, 'and of the satisfaction he had given to Rome. That 'he never had failed in duty towards his Father, 'and that it were a passage of extreme folly to put 'himself into an uncertain hazard for a Crown, 'which he had, as it were, already in his hands. 'Briefly, without any further discourse, he offered 'himself to be used like a Slave, and to be put to the 'torture for proof of his Innocency. And therewithal he dreadfully tormented himself in such sort, that he began to move all the company.

Nicholas Damascene, who was a rough Gamester, taketh the word out of his mouth; he confronteth the Witnesses, he interrogateth, urgeth, involveth, and puts him into confusion, and thundereth a very bloody Invective against him: which at large is couched in Josephus's history, where like an Oratour he exagerateth all the circumstances of his Crime. 'Behold you not (saith he) a brutish stupidity to 'conspire against your Father, having as yet the 'blood of your Brothers before your eys, and all 'the assurances of the Sceptre in your hands? Needs 'must you perpetrate a Parricide, to make your 'self possessour of a Crown, which was acquired 'for you by so solemn and authentical a Testa-'ment? Look you after nothing, but the blood of 'your Father, to set a seal upon it? Yea, of a Fa-'ther, whose life is so dear to all honest men, and 'of nature so indulgent to love his Children, that 'have never so little merit. An ingratitude able to 'make Heaven blush, and Earth tremble under 'your feet. An ingratitude worthy, that all the E-'lements should conspire to punish it.

This man ceased not to discharge against him words of fire with a masculine eloquence, and the miserable Antipater prostrated himself on the ground, and prayed God to do a Miracle in favour of him, to make manifest his innocency, since he found himself so oppressed by the malice of men. It is wonder (saith the Historian) that those, who, during their life have believed no God, would yet acknowledge him at their death. This man lived as if there were neither Heaven, God, nor Angels; and now, seeing himself in the horrours of death, prayed the Divinity to excuse his Crime. Varus saith unto him; 'My friend, expect not extraordi-'nary signs from Heaven in your favour, but, if you 'have any good reasons, boldly produce them. The 'King your Father, desireth nothing more then 'your justification. Thereupon he stood confound-ed, like a lost man. Varus taking the poyson, that had been before represented to the Council, caused it to be given to an Offender already condemned. who instantly died, and all the Assembly arose (as it is said) with manifest condemnation of Antipater. His Father, esteeming him absolutely convicted, required of him his Complices: he only named Antiphilus, who brought the poyson, saying, This wicked man was cause of all his unhappiness.

It was a great chance, Herod at that time had not caused the sentence of death to be executed upon him; but, according to his ordinary proceeding, he resolved to inform Cæsar of all that had passed, and to send him the whole Process formally drawn, to order all at his pleasure. In the mean time Antipater is straightly imprisoned, expecting hourly, as a miserable Victim, the stroke of death.

Horrible state of Herod in his later daies.

Herod at that time was about seventy years of age; and already felt, through imbecility of body, the approach of the laſt hour. It was a very hard morſel for him to digeſt. Never man better loved this preſent life: very freely would he have forſaken his part of the next world eternally, to enjoy this, though he in effect was therein moſt unhappy. Towards the end of his days he grew ſo harſh, ſo wayward, then ſo cholerick, and furious, that his houſhold-ſervants knew not how to come about him: they handled him in his Palace as an old Lion, chained with the Fetters of an incurable Malady. He perſwaded himſelf, he was hated of all the world, and was therein no whit deceived, as having given too great occaſion thereof. The people almoſt forgot their duty with impatience, and could no longer endure him.

The golden Eagle thrown down.

As ſoon as his ſickneſs was bruited abroad, Judas and Matthias, the principal Doctours of the Jewiſh Law, who had the youth at command, perſwaded the moſt valiant of their Sect to undergo a bold adventure; which was, that Herod having re-edified and adorned the Temple of Jeruſalem, and (as he had always ſhewed himſelf, for the accommodation of his own Eſtate, to be an Idolater of Cæſar's Fortune) to ſet upon the principal Gate the Romane Eagle, all glittering in Gold. This much offended the ſight of the Jews, who could not endure any ſhould place Portraictures of men, or beaſts, or any other figures in their Temples; ſo much they abhorred ſuch Monſters, which their Fathers had ſeen adored in Egypt. Behold why this Judas, and Matthias, who were the chief, thinking the ſickneſs of Herod would help them, began earneſtly to exhort the moſt valiant of the young men, who every day frequented their houſes, to take in hand the quarrel of God, according to the ſpirit of their Anceſtours, and to beat down this abomination, which they had fixed upon their Temple. That the peril was not now ſo great, Herod having enough to do to wraſtle with his own pain: but, if it ſhould happen they loſt their lives, to die in ſo glorious an act was to be buried in the midſts of Palms and Triumphs.

There needed no more to encourage the youth. Behold! a troop of the moſt adventurous came forth about the midſt of the day, armed with Axes, and Hatchets, who climbed to the top of the Temple, and hewed in pieces the Eagles in the ſight of the whole world; Judas, and Matthias being there preſent, and ſerving for Trumpets in this Exploit. The noiſe hereof inſtantly came to the Palace, and the Captain of the Guard ran thither with the moſt reſolute Souldiers. He much feared ſome further Plot, and that this defacing of the Eagle might prove a preamble to ſome greater Sedition. But at the firſt, as he began to charge, the people retired, which the more encouraged him for purſuit. Fourty young men, of thoſe who had done the feat, were taken in the place; Judas, and Matthias, who accompanied them, deeming it a thing unworthy to fly away, and that at the leaſt they ought to follow them in peril, whom they had brought into danger. Being preſented to Herod, and demanded from whence this boldneſs proceeded, they freely anſwered, Their Plot had been fully agreed upon among themſelves, and if it were to do again, they would be in readineſs to put it in execution, in regard they were more bound to Moſes, then Herod. Herod amazed at this reſolution, and fearing greater commotions, cauſed them to be ſecretly conveyed to Jericho, whither himſelf after, though crazy, was carried, and, aſſembling the principal, ſpake to them out of his Litter, making a long Narration of the good Offices he had done in favour of the whole Nation; of the Temple he had built for them; of the Ornaments, with which he had enriched it: adding, He had done in few years, what their Aſmonean Kings could not perform in ſixſcore: and, for recompenſe of his piety, at Noon-day they had hewn down, with notable boldneſs, an holy Gift, which he had raiſed in the Temple, wherein God was more intereſſed then himſelf; for which he required a reaſon.

These now, fearing any further to incenſe him, declined the danger, and put him upon their Companions, leaving them to the pleaſure of the King. At that time the High-prieſthood is taken from Matthias, and another Matthias, who was held to have been the Authour of the Sedition, burned alive that night with his companions; at which time an eclipſe of the Moon was ſeen, that made this ſpectacle much more dreadful.

Fearful Malady of Herod.

Herod in few days, after he had tried in vain, and worn out all humane remedies, was reduced to that horrible ſtate of malady, which is rightly deſcribed by Joſephus, and Euſebius of Cæſarea. God would have him in this life taſt in long draughts the cup of his Juſtice, waſting that caitiff carkaſs with lingering torments. Behold the cauſe, why he was touched with a manifeſt wound from Heaven, and aſſaulted with a furious Squadron of remedileſs dolours. He, who from his young days had been enflamed with a deſperate ambition, felt at his death a fire, which devoured his marrow and entrails with a ſecret and ſubtile flame. He, who all his life-time had an enraged hunger to heap up treaſures, even to the opening of David's, and Solomon's Sepulchres, to extract booty from thence, was afflicted with dog-like hunger, both horrible, and ſhameful, which cauſed him day and night to cry out for meat, yet never was ſatisfied. He, who had made ſo many voyages, and gone ſo many paces to make himſelf great, ſaw then his feet ſwoln with bad and phlegmatick humours. He, who in his life had cauſed ſo many tortures to be inflicted, felt outragious and intolerable cholicks, which racked him. He, who had taken life away from ſo many men, was ſeiſed with an Aſthma, which hindered his breathing. He, who eſteemed Prudence and humane Policy for the ſinews of his Eſtate, felt in his body Cramps, and Convulſions of ſinews, which gave him many ſhakes. He, who ſhed the blood of the poor Mariamne, who ſlew her Sons, to make the Kids (as ſaith the Scripture) boil in the milk of their Dam; briefly, he who wallowed in the blood of about fourteen thouſand Innocents, of purpoſe to involve therein the Saviour of the World; died in his own blood, afflicted with a cruel Flux. He, who abuſed his body with prodigious Luxuries, had, dying, his ſecret parts filled with Lice, and Vermine, with an ignominious Priapiſm, a Malady not to be named.

Shall we then ſay, the Divine Providence of God hath no eys to be wakeful for the puniſhment of the wicked? This deſperate Wretch, inſtead of adoring the Juſtice of God at his death, and kiſſing the Rod, which had chaſtiſed him, dreameth of new Slaughters, publiſheth an Edict, by which he ſendeth for the principal of the Jews of every Province to Jericho, whither he cauſed himſelf to be carried, and, ſhutting them up in a Theatre, calleth his Siſter Salome, and her Husband Alexas, and then ſpeaketh to them in theſe words:

Notorious cruelty.

'It troubleth me not to die, and render the Tribute, which ſo many Kings have paid before me: but I am afflicted, that my death ſhall not be lamented as I deſire, if you aſſiſt not. Know then,

'for

'for this purpose I have sent for all the Nobility 'of Judea, whom you have in your hands. As soon 'as my eys are closed, put them all to the Sword, 'and let not my death be divulged, till first the for- 'tune of these same people be known to their 'friends: by this means I hope to fill Judea with 'tears, and sighs; which shall make my Soul leave 'my body with the more contentment.

The Wretch in saying this, with many scalding tears, besought his Sister by all that which she esteemed in the world most glorious, most sacred, as if he had asked Paradise of her, and that necessarily she must promise it to content him at that instant with oath, though afterward it were never executed. In this act alone he well declared, he had the spirit of a ravening Wolf in the skin of a man, and that the thirst of humane blood was become natural to him.

Death of Antipater.

As he was framing this notable Testament, Letters were brought him from Rome, written by Cæsar's command; which certified him, that Acme, a Jewish Lady, of Livia's Train, the Wife of Augustus, had been condemned for sinister intelligence with Antipater, and for that cause punished with death. As concerning his Son, he wholly left him to his disposition. This man in the very point of death still sucked vengeance with marvellous sweetness. Upon this news he taketh courage again, and calls for an Apple, and a Knife, busying himself in the paring of it. But in these employments, as his pains redoubled, he waxed weary of life, which he so much had loved; and at that instant, one of his Grand-children, named Achiabus, who stood near to the Bed, perceiving he rolled his eys full of rage, and made a shew as if he would have stabbed himself with the knife he had in his hand (which much affrighted the young Prince) held back his arm, as well as he could, and began to make a terrible out-cry, as if his Grand-father had yielded up the Ghost; whereupon the whole Palace was in an uproar. Antipater, who from the Prison heard all this tumult, supposing Herod was at the last cast, his feet irched in his Fetters, and did not as yet despair of the Crown, offering, as one would say, Mountains of Gold to his Keeper, to set him at liberty. But, O the judgment of God! his Goaler, in stead of giving ear to all his rewards, went directly to his Master, and relateth to him, how Antipater used all possible means to get out of prison, and take possession of the Kingdom. Herod howling, and knocking his head, How (saith he) will the Parricide murther me in my bed? I have yet life enough left to take away his. Then lifting himself up, and leaning on his Pillow, he calleth one of his Guard; Go you immediately (saith he) to the Prison, and kill this Parricide, and let him be buried in Hyrcanus's Castle without Funeral pomp. This was incontinently executed, and such was the end of this wicked Wretch, who had disturbed Earth, and Hell, to place himself in his Father's Throne, according as certain Mathematicians had foretold him.

Few days after his death, Herod, having declared Archelaus for Successour of the Kingdom, contrary to his first will, which was disposed in the behalf of Antipater, after he had accommodated his two other Sons with such shares, as seemed good to him, and given large Legacies to Augustus Cæsar, yielded up his wicked Soul in rage, and despair, in the L X X. year of his age, and X X X V I I. of his Reign. End of a Politician most disastrous.

A Prince (saith Josephus) who all his life desired to be Master of his Laws, and a Slave of his Passions; and who, notwithstanding all his great felicities, ought to be reputed the most miserable on the earth. Behold in what terms this Authour, a great Statist, speaketh it, to teach humane policy, there is no Prudence, Wisdom, Counsel, Greatness, nor Happiness, where God is not present. For laying aside eternal torments of the other life, wherewith this barbarous man, dying in punishments, was encompassed; I assure my self, there is neither Peasant, nor Handy-crafts-man, if he be not mad, would give one day of his life for the thirty seven years of Herod's Reign, which he passed in continual apprehensions, thorny affairs, perilous voyages, sinister distrusts, frosty fears of death, barbarous cruelties, remorses of conscience, the fore-runners of Hell, leaving besides a short and unfortunate Posterity. Behold his Picture, and Elogy!

HERODES ASCALONITA, VULTU FERUS, ANIMO BARBARUS, LUTO ET SANGUINE MACERATUS, A QUO NIHIL AD SUMMAM CRUDELITATEM PRÆTER DEICIDIUM ABFUIT, DEICIDIO VOLUNTAS NON DEFUIT: VULPINA FRAUDE REGNUM JUDEÆ INVASIT, AN. MUNDI TER MILLESSIMO NONGENTESSIMO SEXAGESSIMO QUINTO. REGNAVIT IRÆ SERVUS, JURIS DOMINUS, FORTUNA FELIX, CYCLOPÆA VITA INFELICISSIMUS. DESIIT COELESTI PLAGA FERALIS MORBI, ANNO REGNI TRICESSIMO SEPTIMO, VITÆ FERME SEPTUAGESSIMO, CHRISTI OCTAVO.

Upon the PICTURE of HEROD.

A man no whit with civil Grace endu'd,
Of Viſage hideous, of Manners rude;
A Monſter, made of maſſacres and blood,
That boldly God, Heav'n, Nature's Laws with-(ſtood:
Ill words within no certain limits fall,
But who once mentions Herod, ſpeaketh all.

BY the carriage of this Court one may ſee whither Vice tranſporteth great Fortunes. In the perſon of Ariſtobulus, and Hyrcanus, you behold that the Canker is to a body leſs dangerous, then the diſcord of Brothers to a State.

In the perſon of Antipater, a friend for advantage, who ſeeketh to fiſh in a troubled water, in the end fiſheth his fill, but is drowned in the act; to teach you, there is no policy ſo great, as to be an honeſt man, and that he, who prepareth ſnares for another, diggeth his own Grave.

In the perſon of Pompey, an Arbitratour, who worketh his own ends under the colour of juſtice, who buildeth his ambition on the ruines of ſtate, in the end, the Earth, which faileth him for his Conqueſts, denieth him a Sepulchre. He found no more Countries to conquer, and ſcarcely had he ſix foot of earth to make him a Tomb.

In that of Hyrcanus, too much credulity, too much facility to pleaſe others humours, too much puſillanimity in the government of Juſtice, which head-long threw him into a life as miſerable, as his death was cruel and bloody.

In that of Anthony, a paſſionate Judge, who turneth with all winds, and ſuffereth himſelf to be carried along by the ſtronger, without conſideration of Juſtice.

In that of Joſeph, and Sohemus, that it is perilous to treat with women, though free from ill purpoſe, and much more dangerous to reveal a ſecret, which who will ſafely keep, muſt make his heart a Sepulchre for it.

In that of young Ariſtobulus, how the moſt beautiful hopes are ſtorm-beaten in the bud, and that you muſt walk upon the proſperity of the world, as on Ice, that it muſt be handled like glaſs, fearing always they break not in the luſtre of their brightneſs.

In that of Alexandra, a boundleſs ambition, deſigns ſigns without effect, afflictions devoid of conſolations, torments without patience, and a death without deſerts, and all this becauſe ſhe gave not a good temper of virtue to her ſoul.

In that of the ſons of Mariamne, innocency perſecuted, and a little vanity of tongue deſperately revenged.

In that of young Antipater, policy deceived, the cloud of humane hopes cracked, puniſhment and revenge ever attending an offender.

In the perſon of Herod, an enraged ambition, which giveth motion to all his crimes, a double ſoul, crafty, cautelous, politick, miſchievous bloudy, barbarous, ſavage, and withall in the beſt of his tricks benummed, doltiſh, and dull, thinking to make a fortune to the prejudice of Religion and Conſcience. A goodly fortune, to make himſelf great, and live in the hatred of all the world, in the remorſes of a Cyclopean conſcience, a thouſand times a day to call upon death, not being able to die, and in the end to die in a body Leaprous, Stinking, Lowſy, and death to teare his ſoul from him with Scabs, Stench, and Lice, to make it ſurvive its torments in an eternity of flames. See you not here fair fruits of humane Wiſdom, Impiety, and Atheiſm?

In that of Mariamne, a ſoul raiſed above the higheſt ſphere of true greatneſs, a ſoul truly royal, holy, religious, courteous, merciful, wiſe, affable, and endowed with an incomparable patience, who as an Eagle, ſtrong of wing and courage, ſoaring above the ſtorms of the world, maketh her ſelf Miſtreſs of Tempeſts and Thunders, which for that they had ſerved as an exerciſe of her conſtancy, and perpetual battels for her life, ſhall through all Ages attend the immortality of her glory.

THE FIFTH BOOK.

Fortunate Piety.

WE have hitherto beheld a Court, which rather reſembleth Polyphemus Cave, then a King's Palace, to teach Great-ones, there is no brutiſhneſs ſo ſavage, whereinto Ingratitude towards God, and Vice, doth not precipitate a forſaken ſoul. Let us now ſee, that as unbridled Paſſions are of power to make an hell of a Prince's Court, ſo the Practice of Piety and other virtues make it a true Paradiſe. Behold the Court of Theodoſius the Younger, a Prince, who ſeemed to be born for nothing elſe but to ally the Sceptre to virtues, and manifeſt what royal greatneſs can do, guided by the rules of Piety.

Ring of God.

It is no ſmall miracle to behold an holy King. If God affected the curioſity of wearing a Ring, as well in effect as the Scripture attributeth it to him in Allegory, the moſt agreeable characters he would engrave therein, were the names of good Kings, who are his moſt lively repreſentations, as thoſe, who wed together power and goodneſs, two inſeparable pieces of God, but very incompatible in the life of man, ſuch are the corruptions of this Age.

Four ſorts of life.

Some live in the world tranſported with the torrents thereof, and that is weakneſs. Others flie the world, and in flying oft-times carry it along with them, and this is an illuſion. Others ſeparate themſelves as well in body as affection: and this is prudence. But few are found, who bearing the world on their ſhoulders through neceſſity, do tread it under-foot by contempt of vanities. That is it, which this great Prince hath done, whoſe Court we here deſcribe: for being ſeated among people, he built a deſert in his heart, and in a vaſt Ocean of affairs he lived as fiſhes, which keep ſilence within the loud noiſe of Waves, and preſerve their plump ſubſtance freſh in the brackiſh waters. I go not about to place Theodoſius the Younger in the rank of the braveſt and moſt heroick ſpirits, you hereafter ſhall ſee others more couragious and warlike; but I purpoſely have ſelected this Hiſtory, drawn from the Chronicle of Alexandria, Zonaras, Sozomen, Raderus, and others, to teach certain vain-glorious people, who make no accompt but of thoſe trifling ſpirits, fierce, mutinous, and unquiet, ſtamped with the coyn of impiety, how much they miſs of their reckoning; ſeeing this Emperour, with the ſole arms of piety, and modeſty, carried himſelf in a very long and moſt proſperous Reign, amidſt horrible tempeſts, which ſeemed ready to rend the world; and other raſh Princes, who made ſhew to ſwallow earth and ſeas, were drowned in a glaſs of water.

Extraction of Theodoſius.

God made his birth and education ſingularly to contribute to the ſanctity of his life. He was deſcended from Trajan, called the good Emperour by ſupereminence of worth: his Grand-father was the great Theodoſius, a man, who in arms had no ſuperiour that preceded him, and in piety no better ſecond then his Grand-child. The Emperour Arcadius was his father, a moſt generous Prince, who in the very begining of the fifth Age, to wit, the year after the Nativity of our Saviour, four hundred and one, ſaw this infant riſe as a bright Star, at that time when he ended the courſe of his life: as the Poets feigned the Sun reareth himſelf from the bed of aged Tython, to illuſtrate the world. His Nativity was foretold by the mouth of Saints, his moſt tender infancy conſecrated by the deſtruction of Idols; God at one and the ſame time putting him in the number of the living, and in the rank of Protectours of the Church, by a moſt remarkable act, of which behold the narration.

His birth foretold.

Prophecie of S. Procopius.

Saint Procopius, an Hermit endowed with admirable ſanctity, illuminated with the ſpirit of Propheſie, lived in the iſle of Rhodes, praying daily for the deſtruction of ſome remnants of Idolatry, which reigned in the Roman Empire, when by good chance two holy Prelates, Porphyrius and John, the one Biſhop of Gaza, the other of Caſarea in Paleſtine, ſayling for that purpoſe to Conſtantinople, went to lodg in the Hermitage of this holy man. He having received them with all reſpect anſwerable to their qualities, and entertained them according to the poverty of the Cell, underſtanding they travelled to the capital City

City of the Eastern Empire, of purpose to obtain an Edict from the Emperour, absolutely to destroy the Temples of Idols, and bridle the insolencies of Pagans, who stirred with so much the more boldness, as the drouping faintness of the government of those times promised them impunity, he was infinitely comforted to see so great Personages undertake so worthy a work, and God then prompting him these words, he saith: Courage, Fathers, the glory of this Conquest is due to your piety: Go stoutly to Constantinople, and acquaint the holy Bishop John Chrysostom with this design, resolving to execute what he shall think fit. For the rest, know the Empress is nine moneths gone with childe, and that, which is more, she beareth an Emperour in her Womb: upon the Mother, and the Son who is to be born, depends the expedition of this affair. They, very glad of this prediction, left the good Hermit Procopius, and in ten days arrived at Constantinople, where presently they visited Saint John Chrysostom, who received them with much respect, and very great contentment.

The affair being put into deliberation, the Bishop of Constantinople saw well, that the Empress might therein much assist, and that God ordinarily useth the piety of women to advance the affairs of Religion. Notwithstanding, he durst not present these two Prelates to her, fearing his recommendation might be prejudicial: for he very lately had a sharp difference with the Empress. It was Eudoxia a woman of a great spirit, and who naturally loved virtue, as milk in her Infancy, but she had a heart extremely haughty, and quickly would be offended, if any thing of great consequence were undertaken against her authority. Behold wherefore St. Chrysostom, who was of no pleasing disposition, as one, who had a spirit alienated from ordinary complements, sometimes towards those of his own coat, reprehending her openly at many meetings in the point of glory, wherein she most desired to be soothed, raised her indignation to the clouds. She was as yet in the height of her passion against him, and therefore he, judging it to no purpose for him to sollicite her, caused the two Bishops to be presented by the means of one called Amantius, an attendant of Eudoxia's chamber, a very wise man, and of great credit with his Lady. She, who knew her childe-bed-time at hand, gave very free access to religious men, as hoping all good success by help of their devotions; and seeing these two Bishops were particularly recommended to her by Amantius, in quality of persons endowed with a very eminent sanctity, she was unsatisfied till she had seen them, and having most courteously saluted them, excusing her bigness with child to have hindred her passage to the door for their reception, according to the usual practice towards persons of their worth, she forbear not most affectionately to conjure them to employ their most fervent prayers to obtain of God a happy delivery for her. The holy Bishops, after they had wished her the childe-birth of Sarah, of Rebecca, and St. Elizabeth, began to declare the cause of their voyage, unfolding in very expres terms the indignity of this Idolatry, the insolency of Pagans, the contempt of things sacred, the oppression of people, the lamentable mischief it would be to behold the worshipping of Idols still to flourish, which to abolish, the Saviour of the world had so much sweat, so much wept, and shed so much blood; and to see it predominate, as it were, in the eys of a most magnificent Emperour, and a most religious Empress, who had all the means to extirpate it. That in such a field the palms of eternal glory should be gathered, and that better they could not secure their estate, then by destroying the work of Satan, to erect the Tropheys of Jesus.

Eudoxia, mother of Theodosius.

Her humour.

Bishops treat with the Empress.

Eudoxia taketh fire, being thereto otherwise well enough disposed, and promiseth to recommend the business to the Emperour, to obtain the dispatches they required for their better contentment. The Bishops retired, expecting the effect of this promise. The Lady faileth not to offer her requests, and strike the stroke with her best dexterity. But Court-affairs proceed not always on the same feet, which the desire of the zealous move upon: she findeth the Council engaged in these retardations, who think it to no purpose to roll such a stone, "That Idolatry "should be left to bury it self, and at leisure dress "its own funerals. That the means to ruine it, is "to remove the heads of the Sect from all kinde of "Honours, and publick Dignities: to forbid the exercise of Superstition, and Conventicles, which "they make in private houses, to subdue Idolaters, "and burn them, as it is said, with a soft fire: That "the demolishment, which should be made of those "great Temples of Idols which yet remained, "would make much noise, and yield little fruit: "That this might thrust rebellious spirits into manifest despair; and in a word, it was feared, it "might be a means to turn the coin of the Emperour's coffers another way, who drew a good "round revenue from the City of Gaza, which "even at that time was in hand.

Zeal of Eudoxia.

Judgment of Arcadius his Council.

The consideration of interest, which ever holdeth as it were the ascendent in the spirits of men, transported at that time the belief of the Empress, who would no further proceed in this pursuit. She caused the Bishops to be assembled, signifying to them, how having treated this business with much fidelity, and sollicitude, she could not finde the Council disposed to this resolution; that they must have patience, and suffer the fruit to ripen before it be gathered.

Porphyrius unfoldeth the Prophesie.

Thereupon Porphyrius, Bishop of Gaza, the principal Agent, as being the most interessed, well perceiving the Empress had not used the utmost of her credit, saith to her in a discrete, and effectual manner: "Madam, that your Majesty may not "fear seriously to employ your endeavours in the "business now in question, I promise you in recompense, that God will give you a Son, which you "bear in your body, and that quickly you shall "see it to sway the Scepter by your side. Women desire nothing more then to conceive male children: but, if it concerneth the establishment of houses, they passionately love their Sons. Eudoxia, who, notwithstanding all the forcible words of Porphyrius, had before not undertaken the affair but sleightly, upon this promise made to her of a male childe, and of a Son to be Emperour, protesteth to employ her self wholly therein, and in such maner, that she not onely would cause the Idols of Gaza to be thrown down to the ground, and absolutely raze the Temple, but (which was not to be expected from her zeal) she addeth, she would build in the place of the Temple (it being demolished) a most magnificent Church. Porphyrius, thanking her for so much favour, taketh leave to retire to his lodging, attending the effect of the good man's Prophesie. Eudoxia faileth not in few days to be delivered of a fair Son, who is our Theodosius the Younger. As soon as he beginneth to breath air, behold him covered with royal Purple, declared Augustus, with intention to associate him the year following to the Empire of his Father. All the world was poured into joy at the birth of this infant, there was nothing but sports, largesses, and publick lick alacrity; ſo much happineſs they promiſed themſelves from this little Theodoſius, in whoſe infancy already were ſeen all hopes of the publick to bud.

Birth of Theodosius.

The Empreſs, ſeven days after her delivery, ſhewing her ſelf very gratefull to God, cauſed the Biſhops to be called, and received them at her chamber-door; then holding her little Theodoſius covered with a royal garment in her arms Fathers, (ſaith ſhe to them) behold the fruits of your Prayers, bleſs the Mother, and her Infant. Then bowing her royal head under the hands, and benediction of the Biſhops, ſhe preſenteth to them the fruit of her childe-bearing to be marked with the Sign of our Redemption, which they preſently did.

Dream of Porphyrius.

The good Empreſs having made them to ſit down, Well then (ſaith ſhe) what ſhall we do for diſcharge of our promiſe? Porphyrius taking the word relateth to her a dream he had the night before upon this ſubject, which was, that he ſeemed to be at Gaza, a City of his Biſhoprick, in the Temple of Idols, named the Temple of Marna, and that the Empreſs coming to him, offered him a book of the Goſpels, entreating him to open it, and read therein whatſoever he ſhould firſt encounter, and that, upon the opening thereof, he found theſe words couched in the Goſpel of St. Matthew: Thou art Peter, and upon this Rock will I build my Church, and the gates of Hel ſhal have no power againſt it: and that thereupon the Empreſs ſhould ſay: Courage, in good time. That (ſaith ſhe) very well accordeth with the deſign I have figured in my mind for the expedition of our affair. In few days, I hope the Son, whom God hath given me, ſhall be preſented at the holy Font of Baptiſm: in the mean time prepare ſome very ample requeſt, whatever you think good of, and upon return from the Chriſtening, juſt at your going out of the Church, preſent it confidently to my Son. I will inſtruct him, that ſhall carry him in his arms, to take it, and do what then ſhall be needfull. When he is returned to the houſe, I will do the reſt, and hope ſo much from the merciſull hand of God, that we ſhall have all we deſire. The Biſhops aſſembled fail not to preſent their requeſt, cauſing therein to be inſerted not onely the deſtruction of the Temple, but alſo many Privileges, and immunities in favour of their Churches.

Pious ſtratagems of a woman.

Baptiſm of Theodoſius.

The day of Baptiſm being come, all the City is adorned, and hanged, in ſuch ſort, that it ſeemed a little Heaven, where the Sun and Stars ſmiled out of their houſes. The Infant is carried in ſolemn pomp to the Font, waſhed, and regenerated with the water of Baptiſm, by the hands of St. John Chryſoſtom, who gave him the name of Theodoſius his Grand-father, and then adopted him for his ſpiritual childe. Baptiſm ended, they went out of the Church in very good order: the Princes, and Lords of the Court glittered in robes of their degrees, as Stars; the Court of Guard was in very good equipage, the number of thoſe, who attired in white bare burning Tapers in their hands, was ſo great, that they ſeemed to equal the lights of Heaven. The Emperour Arcadius was there in perſon, appearing that day with a moſt ſingular Majeſty, as he, who had given an Emperor to the world. Near to the father the little Theodoſius was carried, who drew tears of joy from all the people. The Biſhops, Porphyrius, and John, beheld this goodly Proceſſion to paſs along, and in the mean time ſpied their opportunity. They failed not to approach near, as the Empreſs had inſtructed them, and with a lowly obeyſance preſented their Petition to the Infant. The Gentleman, who bare him in his arms, received it, and opened it, as if he would make the little Theodoſius to read it, afterwards, skilfully guiding him with his hand, he made him bow his head, upon which he cried out aloud, ſpeaking to the Emperour, who was near: Sacred Majeſty, our little Maſter agreeth unto all whatſoever theſe good Prelates have asked of him: and in ſpeaking this held the Petition upon his breaſt. The people credulous, and deſirous to flatter the Emperour, thinking the Infant had made this inclination of his own motion, began at that inſtant to thunder with loud acclamations of joy, congratulating with the Emperour, that he had a Son, who, through forwardneſs of judgment, already received Petitions.

As ſoon as they were come to the Palace, the Mother, who had contrived all this buſineſs, made it to be read to her over and over, as a thing ſhe had never thought on before, and ſtraightways commandeth in the preſence of the Emperour to open the Petition once again. There was to be read the deſtruction of the Temple of Marna, and many immunities, which the Biſhops earneſtly demanded. The Emperour knew not which way to turn him, well knowing he had very lately rejected this ſuit at his Council-table, reſolving with himſelf to refuſe it the ſecond time. But the battery was too forcible. Eudoxia declared, it was an ill preſage not to ratifie the firſt grant her Son had made by a kinde of miracle, in ſuch an age, ſuch an habit, on ſuch a day, and among ſuch ſhouts of the people. I know not who could have reſiſted ſuch ſweet violences.

Marna deſtroyed by the Infant Theodoſius.

Arcadius, will he nill he, was conſtrained preſently to ſign the Petition, without reſtriction, or modification; and, which is more, to conſtitute expreſs Commiſſioners for the execution thereof, who failed not, upon the urgent ſollicitation made by the Empreſs, to raze the Temple of Marna, and build a moſt ſtately Church in the place.

Women ſtout to do good.

Behold how potent, and religiouſly cunning women are, when they addict themſelves to good. But God made all theſe paſſages conduce to the glory of his well-beloved Theodoſius, willing, that Hell ſhould howl, and tremble already under the feet of an Infant, who was no more then born, to make him one day dreadfull to all the powers of impiety.

Contentions between the Empreſs Eudoxia, and Saint Chryſoſtom.

The joy of the Parents conceived for the birth of Theodoſius was not long. I know not through what miſchance Eudoxia conteſted again with St. Chryſoſtom, upon a wilfulneſs, as forcible in the purſuit as unfortunate in the iſſue; for it ſteeped the remnant of this poor Princeſs days in bitter diſtaſts, and headlong threw her into a death diſavantageous to the reputation of her life: to teach Great-ones, and above all, Ladies, to bridle their paſſions, and never to oppoſe the authority of the Church. The Mitres of Prelates are as the Crowns of the Kings of Egypt, they carry aſpicks, which inſenſibly ſting thoſe, who too near approach with intention to offend them, having Juſtice on their ſide. It was a ſhameſull ſpectacle for Chriſtendom, to ſee, upon this great Theatre of the world, a woman conteſt with a Biſhop, and hazard her reputation againſt the moſt eloquent Tongue of the World. This Princeſs was ardent in any thing ſhe enterprized, and made all affairs dance to the tune of her intentions: ſhe ſo powerfully wrought the Biſhops, that they aſſembled a little Council of Prelates, paſſionate, and pliant to her will, who paſſed a ſentence of condemnation againſt Chryſoſtom, under pretext of a ſcroul, charged with a tedious contexture of calumnies, invented againſt this holy Prelate. Eudoxia would free her ſelf, and, to give contentment to the people, it behoved her to proceed therein with ſome colour of juſtice. Behold

A good document for Great-ones.

Saint Chryſoſtom baniſhed.

him

him banished into Bithynia. It was a bold act to tear out of the Throne of Constantinople a man, who, filling the sayls of Eloquence, as easily moved the people, as Winds do the sands of Lybia, which stir at their pleasure. The people of Constantinople spared not to murmur, as do the Waves of a mutinous Sea, and their mutterings were seconded with an Earthquake, which happened there at the same time; all tended to a revolt, if Chrysostom had not been repealed from this exile by the Emperour's authority.

Being returned to his See, he altered nothing of his former manner, crying out, thundering, and violently beating down the vice and corruptions of that Age. And as by chance Eudoxia caused a silver Statue to be dedicated to her self in a publick place, at the consecration whereof many sports, dances, and disorders were used; this gave new occasion to speak, which so vexed the Empress, that she resolved to ruin him, whatsoever it cost her. Arcadius shewed himself a little soft, and obsequious to the humour of his wife, who spared no wiles, inventions, credit, nor violence to bring her enterprize to pass. She came in the end (unhappy as she was) to be as prosperous, as she wished in this pursuit. S. John Chrysostom is exiled to Cucusa, a town in Armenia, which hath nothing more remarkable in it, then to have been honoured with the banishment of this worthy man. He swallowed so many toils and incommodities in this exile, that there he left his life, the more to illustrate the glory of his death. Divers prodigies happened at Constantinople, as messengers of the anger of Heaven armed for revenge of this injustice. Among others a violent storm of Hail, which much astonished all the City, and, four days after, Eudoxia died in travel, having long endured many bitter throws. It is held, her Sepulchre shook, until such time as the body of the Saint, carried in Triumph through Constantinople, seemed by the presence thereof to fix her tomb, who had furnished him with so many disturbances in his life.

Death of the Empress.

The emperour Arcadius made no long abode in this world after the death of the Empress his wife, and S. John Chrysostom; behold him surprized with a maladie, which he presently knew to be as it were a fore-runner of his death. After he had settled the affairs of his conscience, he ordered those of his Kingdom, and though he had his brother Honorius Emperour of the West, he would not rely upon him for the guardianship of his son; all great men are jealous, and many times diffident of their own blood: but he appointed as Tutour for his little Theodosius (who then was onely eight years of age) Isdigerdes King of Persia, his friend, who deputed a great Prince, named Antiochus, to establish an absolute peace with the Emperour, and offer him his aid against all pretenses, that might be raised against his state. Artemius, a Consular man, very wise and faithful, took the stern of affairs in hand, which most prosperously he managed in the great troubles and revolutions of the Western Empire.

Qualities of Pulcheria sister of Theodosius.

Theodosius was left an Orphan with four sisters, Flaccilla, Pulcheria, Arcadia, and Marina, but above all the rest Pulcheria possessed his heart from his infancy. She was the Pearl of Princesses, and one of the wisest women, which ever managed the affairs of a Kingdom. She had a strong and pleasing spirit, a solid piety, an awakened wisdom, an incomparable grace to gain hearts to her devotion. Her brother made such accompt of her rare virtues, that he associated her for a companion of his Empire, holding her in the quality of a Queen. She was onely two years elder then himself: the one was thirteen, the other fifteenth years old. In the fifteenth year of her age, behold her already so capable of government, that she was Regent of the Empire, and as it were a mother to her brother. Artemius, who had instructed her in state affairs, could not sufficiently admire the vivacity of her wit, the solidity of her judgment, the equity of her counsels, and the happiness, which ordinarily accompanied her resolutions. She then resolved to live in perpetual Virginity, not, as some have thought, to take away the jealousie of an husband towards a brother, and to hold the government always, wherein she so happily thrived; but for a mere inclination she had to the love of Chastity. She easily perswaded her sisters to the same, who took their flights to Christian virtues under the wings of this Eagle.

The holy Virgins, to make the offer of their Virginity the more solemn, gave an Altar of gold, garnished with Precious stones to the Church of S. Sophia; as presenting upon this monument the incomparable treasure of their Purity, and making humble prayer for the prosperity of their brother's Empire. This infinitely pleased Theodosius, and the more Pulcheria resigned her self to virtue, the more reputation she got with the yong Emperour. She then began seriously to make Religion, Justice, and Peace to flourish in the Empire. And seeing the person of her brother was it, which ought to speak by example to all the world, the good Lady embraced the care of his education, as the most important piece of her government. First, with an admirable wisdom she sequestred all those, who might cause any vices to slide into the soul of this young Prince, well knowing, no plague was so much to be feared in the Courts of Great-men, as to expose the ear of a childe to the Hisses and Venom of Serpents, which cast sin into the soul before they have eys open to behold it. She hated, as the shadows of Hell, all those subtile Artists of Fortune, who, to confirm themselves in authority, oftentimes thrust Great-ones into vice, and catch them by sensual pleasures, as Birds are with lime, to entangle and snare them all together. Secondly she procured worthy men to attend near the person of the Emperour, who royally might train him in the exercise of piety, wisdom, arms, and letters, as much as is necessary for a King. She herself, who was well versed in the Latine and Greek Tongues, and no whit ignorant of the Precepts of the Wise, often discoursed with her brother.

Altar of gold.

Education of Theodosius.

Plague of Great-ones.

That God who made Kings, had charged him with a Crown; the more to oblige him to be the best man in his Empire. That if he would gloriously reign, he must begin by the sway of himself. That by how much the more he acknowledged the dependance he had of God, to be united to him in the quality of an instrument, so much the more he should command over men. That our souls were as the mirrours of the Divinity, which, by how much the more pure, so much the more were they disposed to receive the rays of wisdom to their benefit. That vices in mean men were simply vices, but in the souls of Kings they were monsters. That, if he would reign happily, he must establish his Throne upon two columns of Diamond, Piety and Justice; the one would give him to God, and the other would give men to him. Moreover she exhorted him to make himself of an easie and open access to the necessities of all, who should prostrate themselves at his feet. To bear very much Reverence to persons Ecclesiastical, advancing the affairs of religion with all his endeavour. To be very merciful towards the poor, and sick. To gain the hearts of all his subjects by sweetness, therein imitating the Sun, who neither breaketh doors, nor windows to enter into houses, but penetrateth very peaceably with the benignity of his favourable beams. To conclude, she often represented the examples of good Princes, as of Constantine the Great, and of his Grand-father Theodosius, who because they took an happie way, had on earth enjoyed a most blessed Kingdom, and immortalized themselves in the memory of men, with much advantage, reaping whilst they lived, the first fruits of of the glory, of which they now in Heaven have an ample fruition. On the contrary, those, who desired to have their passion reign, with, and above them, in their Thrones, were involved in a brutish life, and extreme calamities, pursued with the execration of posterity, and torments of eternitie.

The blessed Pulcheria with so much grace did make these good instructions distill into the soul of her brother, who was already naturally disposed to the pursuit of good, that he took therein unspeakable contentment, and resigned his heart to be handled as a soft piece of wax in the artful hand of such a wisdom. Notwithstanding, as it is a matter very difficult so to banish vice from Princes Courts, but that there always will be found some Wolf covered with the skin of a Sheep, so amongst these, who guided the youth of Theodosius, there was a certain man called Chrysaphius, a subtile and crafty spirit, with too far insinuating himself into the favour of the Prince, cast in the end some blemish upon this fair soul, and made work enough for Pulcheria, as we shall see hereafter. But at that time all was very peaceable: Pulcheria repleniſhed the heart of her brother with wisdom, the Court with good examples, the Altars with vows, and the world with benefits. And all so prospered in her hands, that it seemed, the golden Age, foretold to be under the government of a Virgin, was returned to the world.

The Emperour was now arrived near the limits of his twentieth year, and it was thought very expedient to tie him in the bonds of a chaste marriage, to which he should bring the innocency of an Age, bred either in the contempt, or ignorance of vice. Pulcheria cast her eys both within and without the Kingdom, to finde a wife suitable to his humour, at which time the providence of God, that guideth our lives and affairs, gave an admirable testimony of his authority, leading a Maiden, poor, unknown, needy, as by the hand, first to Constantinople, afterward to the Marriage-bed of the Emperour. So many Queens and Princesses affected this alliance, and every one promised it to themselves, flattering their hopes therein, when to the wonder of the world God caused the lot to fall upon a silly creature.

Admirable adventures of Athenais

Leontius, a Painim Philosopher, bred up in a poor Cottage, had one onely Daughter, which at that time was as a Diamond hidden in a dung-hill, no man knowing the worth thereof: God drew it from this darkness to make it glitter in the prime Court of the world. This is the admirable Athenais, who was singularly privileged from Heaven with beauty of body, but incomparably heightned with gifts of the mind. Her father instructed her from her tender years, and enabled her in Philosophie, Rhetorick, Poesie, and other arts, wherewith usually they are adorned, who are ingeniously bred. This Maid lived by learning as the Bee by the dew, and all her pleasure was to study, thereunto invited by two powerful motives; first, the fervour of her Spirit, sparkling like a flaming Wheel, and secondly, ambition of Sex, which made her desire to transcend men in their best faculties. That, which the Poets have feigned of Pallas, is a fable, but he that should behold Athenais might see a true Pallas. It seemed she was some Intelligence, who had left the Heavenly Orbs, to come to be enchased in this beautious body, and converse with men. It was said, her father, well read in the knowledg of Stars, foretold the good fortune which should happen to her, and that making his Will he left all his wealth to two sons he had, to wit, Genas and Valerius, making no mention of his daughter so much beloved, whereat she being sad, Let Heaven alone (saith he) dear daughter, your fortune will be good; more shall you have then your brothers. Thus man is often pleased to mix the verity of Histories with some Fables, to give reputation to predictions of Mathematicians, as if the Stars had some power upon that which absolutely dependeth on the pleasure of God, or as if one must study much in the book of the Planets, to say, that a Maid bright as a Star, and wise as Minerva, was to come to great fortune. Howsoever it be, as soon as her fathers eys was shut, the wicked brothers, greedy, as Griffons, used their sister most inhumanely. Interest had neither eys for the Beauty, nor ears for the Eloquence of Athenais: behold her despoiled and driven from her fathers dwelling, enforced to retire to the house of a poor Aunt she had in the City of Athens.

She must make this Ship-wrack to arrive to a good Haven: she were lost, had she not had such a loss. This Aunt gave her notice of another Kinsman in Constantinople. They both resolve to visit her, and mediate something by her means. Behold they are now in the capital City of the Empire, not well knowing who brought them thither: but God, who was their guid, secretly contrived this work. The good Kinswoman of Constantinople competently entertaineth, and lodgeth them, very glad she might exercise her charity on a creature so well deserving. The City was much pleased with the gracious acceptance Pulcheria gave to all afflicted persons, and the justice she rendered to those, who were oppressed by violence. The good women, Cousins of Athenais, thought they should not do amiss to complain to the Princess of the wrong she had received from her brothers, and espying their opportunity, they both took her along with them. It was not now needful to beg much the favour of admittance, the Maiden bare her letters of recommendation on her fore-head. Pulcheria at her entrance was dazled with the brightness of her aspect, and when she began to unlose her tongue, never was Syren so attractive with songs, as she with words. Pulcheria not onely heard with patience, but greediness, still fearing she would make an end of her discourse, such pleasure she took therein. Many questions she asked her, and above all very particularly enquired of her Kindred, how she had been bred, and whether she were a Virgin: which having judiciously found according to her desire, she put the business into suspense to hear it again another time, by the course of audience ordinarily given: and from that time she had a strange design in her heart, to make her wife of the Emperour her brother.

Politicians, who will measure all things by their own ell, and penetrate into the purposes of the whole world, judg this manner of proceeding was a great wisdom in Pulcheria, ever desirous to sway and possess the spirit of her brother. She foresaw, if he married some great Princess, she might bring with the titles and Crowns of her Ancestours, pride and disdain into the house, and that so many alliances as she might have, might divert Theodosius his mind on many objects: That she being of noble extraction would rule without a companion, and therefore it was better still to hold the highest place in government: that she should make choise of some virtuous and handsom Maid, though of mean parentage, to frame her as her creature, dispose of her where she best pleased, and then last of all conform her to her own will. Thus many judg of others intentions by their own dispositions.

But it is much more likely Pulcheria, a creature wholly celestial, guided herself by other motives, the honour of God, piety, peace, and her brother's contentment. He already had signified to her, he would not captivate himself in an enforced and ceremonious Marriage, and that he desired no other portion with the woman he should marry, but Virtue, and Beauty; which was the cause the Princess supposed this Maiden was fitly sent from Heaven, in the time he was in the treaty of Marriage. She failed not to make relation to her brother concerning an Athenian Maid, who was presented to her upon a suit in Law, which she commenced against her brothers, who unworthily had used her, and was indeed the most Beautiful, Innocent, and best-spoken creature, which might be found throughout the whole Empire. She thereunto added no other thing at this time. It is enough to put matches to the fire without commanding them to burn. Theodosius, upon the report his sister made of this incomparable beauty, asked if there were no means to see her. Pulcheria answereth, she had given day to hear her cause. The Emperour, whether it were he used not to be present in such Audiences, or whether he would hear her speak to her own Sex with the more natural propriety, fearing he should give her too much respect, if he presented himself in judgment, made his sister to sit in the Tribunal, himself resolving to see all that should pass through a secret window prepared for this purpose. Athenais faileth not to come, on the day and hour assigned, to plead her cause. Then was plainly to be seen the Empire, which humane beauty and an eloquent tongue have over earthly powers. The confident maid, having before broken the Ice when first she spake to the Princess, speaks now to her with much liberty:

Athenais pleadeth her cause.

MADAM, I shall have cause to love my shipwrack all my life-time, since it hath given me opportunity to arrive at your feet, as to the port, where all miseries are powred out, to be changed into felicities. Your Majesty may see the violence of my brothers great, since it hath constrained me to undertake this voyage with much toyl, and now presently to trouble your ears with my complaints, which the softness of my nature should cause me to smother, were it not they are extorted by a powerful hand, which is that of necessity. Had my brothers granted me so much of my father's goods (which was mean enough, yet for my enablement sufficient) but one sole silly Cottage, I patiently would have satisfied my self without pressing their fortunes. But they have not left me one inch of Land, and, which is more, have driven me from my father's house (where I ever have inhabited) with exceeding much incivility, which I had rather dissemble, it being not my intention to accuse my own blood, to which I have wished as much good as to my self. By their own saying, I have no other fault, for which I ought to be banished, and despoiled, but certain privileges of Nature. They alledge unto me for all reason, that I may hope for a good fortune, and that it was sufficient even in my father's judgment. If imaginary hopes are of power to dispose true and lawful heirs, what may we hereafter expect to be solid in the world? As for my own part, I have nothing to do with such fantasies as they form to themselves: I desire not great fortunes, but content my self with that mediocrity my birth hath allotted me. A little wealth shall suffice to put me in safeguard against the accidents of a necessitous life, and sweetly to manure the Sciences my father left me as a portion. Hereupon Madam, I most humbly beseech your Majestie will be pleased to be informed of this I affirm, and if you finde it, as it is, true, to do me justice, which I must seek in your Court, it being banished from all the world beside.

She spake these words with so much grace, that all those there present were ravished therewith, persecuted beauty never wanting compassion throughout the world. Every one wished her well, each one became her Advocate, yet some were pleased to importune her with many curious questions in this affair, to put her upon replies, and make her exercise the vivacity of her excellent wit, wherein most happily she gave satisfaction.

Theodosius beheld all this with affectionate tenderness: the eye and tongue of this creature mutually divided his heart, at one and the same instant love surprized him by the eys and tears. Pulcheria, without making any other proposition, promiseth all favour to the suppliant, and having dismissed her, goeth to visit her brother, who had the arrow of chast love deeply fixed in his heart. Resolutely he saith to his good sister, that never would he have other wife then Athenais. They were now upon the point to proceed in the marriage: but it was found she was uncapable of that Sacrament, being not as yet baptized. Her Painim father had bred her in Paganism: better she knew the Theogeny of Hesiodus, then the Genealogie of Jesus Christ, better Homer's Iliads, then the Books of the Gospels, better the Apopthegms of Pythagoras, then the Commandments of God. All the Court, which had be rapt in admiration with her pleading, was much troubled to see so fair a soul drencht in infidelity: some seriously treated with her about her conversion. Atticus the Patriarch of Constantinople employed himself therein to the utmost of his power. Paulinus, a great favorite of Theodosius, who was now upon some terms of jealousie with him, by occasion of a late accident, made himself as it were a prime agent in this business, seeing his Master affected it so ardently. And being well read in divine and humane learning, beyond the profession of a Sword-man, and most eloquent to explicate himself, he marvellously by his conference advanced the conversion of Athenais. In the beginning she was obstinate in Pagan doctrine, and fortified her self upon all propositions with Homer's Iliads, which she alledged as her Gospel; and when the great indecencies were opened to her, which this Poet attributeth to these heathen gods, she sheltered her self with subtilties, as a Hedg-hog with his quils, evading by oblique interpretations, drawn from the allegorical sense, so that much ado there was to disarm her. In the end, God, who would have her to be his, unsealeth her eys, and maketh her behold, as in the glass of a bright mirrour, on the one side the impertinences of Idolatry, and on the other the greatness, majesty, verity, solidity of our faith. As soon as the first reflection began to fall directly upon her understanding, behold all the wild fancies of her opinions were scattered, to give place to the truth. Never any soul more savourly tasted its conversion, never any creature more affectionately resented the benefit of calling to Christianity. She bathed her self in the knowledge of our mysteries, as in a sea of delights, and in short time became so skilful in the law, that she wrote in Homer's verses the principal acts of Jesus Christ: and even as Mary Magdalene with the same hair, wherewith she had weaved nets for wanton love, made a towel to wipe the feet of our Saviour, so the devout Athenais consecrateth from henceforth all the graces of her wit and learning, which she had mis-used in vanities, to the Tropheys of Jesus.

Her conversion.

She was baptized at Constantinople with joy, and incredible magnificence, named Eudoxia, at the holy Font of Baptism, confirmed in Christianity, nourished with holy Sacraments, wherein she was entertained with most sensible devotion. The Ceremonies ended, Pulcheria caused her to be called, saying:

Eudoxia, my sister, it is now time you forget the house of your father, and that you withdraw the suit against your brothers. God who hath granted you the life of the soul, and lights of faith, hath magnificently provided for the ornament of your person: for he hath chosen you to be the lawfull wife of the Emperour Theodosius, our most honoured Lord and brother. All is agreed on, and such is his resolution, nothing more remaineth but your consent.

The holy maid astonished at such words, covered her forehead with the vermilion of shamefastness, and prostrating her self at the feet of Pulcheria, be-beſought her, to entertain her onely in her Palace with her maids, in the quality of a ſervant, to waſh the feet of others, as Abigail ſpake. But the more ſhe ſhewed humility, the more ſhe ſeemed recommendable, and Theodoſius, to whom virtue ſerved as a powerfull motive, was after her converſion much more enflamed to love her. She muſt yield her ſelf to the will of God. Behold her, wife of the Emperour; the marriage was ſolemnized on the ſeventh of June, in the year 421. with all pomp correſpondent to the Majeſty of ſo great an Emperour, and the joy of ſuch a marriage.

Her brothers underſtanding the good fortune their ſiſter had, afflicted as they were with their own conſcience, fled like wilde men, no man purſuing them. But the good Queen, conſecrating the firſt acts of her Chriſtianity to forgetfulneſs of injuries, cauſed them to return, and obtained of the Emperour for the one, the government of Sclavonia, and for the other, a moſt honorable place in Court. God knows, the good women, who, with ſo much charity had aſſiſted her, were not forgotten. Nothing was changed in her but ſect, and condition, all the virtues of humility, modeſty, and affability, remained with her, and how much the higher ſhe was raiſed, ſo much the more ſhe under-valued her ſelf, as if ſhe had foreſeen the ſtorm which ſhould afterward aſſail her.

Sanctity of Theodoſius his Court.

Hither it is, I call all Noble and Great men, who flatter their ſenſuality by a falſe imagination of impoſſibility in the way of perfection, while they abide in Courts and greatneſs, in company, and affairs. The Court of young Theodoſius was at that time, the prime Court of the world; that of the Roman Emperour was fallen into eclipſe. Thither was the confluence of all Nations, the ebb, and flood of great affairs, a profound peace, an abſolute power to ſatisfie all ſorts of deſires with attractive objects, and delights, ever ready to be reaped; and in the mean time, what a life led the new couple? what a life Pulcheria and her ſiſter? what Monaſtery more regular then the Court of this Emperour? what virtue, what chaſtity, what ſanctity, what devotion, was ever found in Cloiſters, which hath not here been ſeen with ſo much the more luſtre, as it is more difficult to have all vices a power, and all virtues in will? If in Religion the firſt accompt be made of devotion, which is the maſter-wheel of all great actions, this Court was as the Tabernacle of the antient Law, which born amongſt Armies, environed with hoſts of men, briſtled round about with Pikes and Javelins, ever retained a ſweet ſilence, a chaſte Religion, a ſacred veneration, and perpetually had holy fire in centinel, victims, and prayers in ſacrifice.

So the Palace of Theodoſius amongſt all the clamours of affairs, all the rumours tumults, and accidents, which upon one ſide and other occur in a large Empire, never ſo much ſlackened as to loſe the ſweetneſs of prayer, which was as the Manna theſe Royal ſouls daily gathered in the deſert, which they had planted in the midſt of their hearts. Pulcheria, as the Abbeſs, governed the devotion of all the reſt, by her counſel and example. As ſoon as break of day drew the curtain of Heaven, to diſcover the works of God, they adored the work-man, and aſſembling in the houſhold Chappel, ſung the praiſes of God, following therein the courſe of the Church-prayers. The whole time was there circumvolved in compaſs: the divine office had the firſt fruits of affairs, and recreations had likewiſe their turn, nothing was exorbitant, where all was done by weight and meaſure. If in religious life ſo much eſteem be had of poverty, as of walls, and rampires of the City of God, where ſhall you find a more admirable poverty, then in this Court? Is it not a prodigious thing to be ſpoken, that this good Emperour, for whom Seas and Rivers ran, for whom the earth opened her boſom with ſo much prodigality, for whom ſhe kept ſo many magazines of Gold and Silver within her entrails, beholding himſelf among the revenues of a great Empire, ſo husbanded them for the entertainment of things neceſſary, wherein he was ever magnificent, that he ſuffered no exceſs in his own perſon? He uſed all his bleſſings as things borrowed, and ſometimes in his own particular, would not permit the expenſe of his diet exceed the value of the work of his own hands. He painted verly well, and took pleaſure, ſo much as affairs would give leave, to delineate the holy Scripture in moſt noble characters, ſaying to his familiars, It was reaſon, ſince all the world took pains in his Kingdom, himſelf ſhould have a Trade, and that as others, he ſhould learn to dip his bread in the ſweat of his brow, and his body being of the ſame compoſition which others are, it was fit to exerciſe the ſame labours.

Such innocency was very far from the profuſions which are made in Princes Courts, with the expenſe of the peoples blood, a matter, that beyond all other burthens would ſurcharge them at the Judgment-ſeat of God. The Emperour's ſiſters, to imitate him, had always their works in their hands, that they might leave no paſſage open to idleneſs. If in Religion chaſtity be eſteemed, here the conjugal ſupereminently flouriſhed between Theodoſius, and Eudoxia, virginity in Pulcheria, and her ſiſters, Marina, Flaccilla, Arcadia, was as redolent balm, which aſcended to Heaven in a perpetual ſacrifice. The very name onely of diſhoneſty, was not ſo much as known in this Palace, yet all things were therein learned, but vice and idleneſs. Glances of the eye were ſimple, and Dove-like, words pondered, ordinary diſcourſes of the imitation of Jeſus Chriſt, and virtues of Saints, carriage full of reſpect, Honour, and Majeſty. This chaſtity abode among the chief in Court, and was ſpread over all the reſt by the odour of good example, as do the rays of the Sun, which involve the whole world, without ever parting from the original Fountain of light. If in Religion obedience be eſteemed, this Court was the very model of well-obeying, and commanding. Thoſe holy ſouls had made a law to themſelves moſt exactly, to obſerve all the Commandments of God and the Church; to reverence the Prelates of the ſame, to cheriſh, aſſiſt, comfort the religious, and all Eccleſiaſtical Orders with moſt cordial affection, tempted with holy reverence in ſuch ſort, that the moſt auſtere Monks could not be more punctual in religious obedience, then all of this Court, were in the government of their conſciences. God for reward, imprinted on the Emperours forehead the rays of his Majeſty, which made him ſo much the more awfull, as he leſs of purpoſe ſought to make himſelf ſuch.

Excellent chaſtity and modeſty.

Note here O Noblemen, an holy Court

If in religious Orders, they live in perpetual exerciſe of mortification, what life more mortified, then to behold ſo much humility in ſovereign Greatneſs, ſo much chaſtity in vigorous youth; in an abſolute power to do all, ſo much retention? In ſo much ſcience, ſo much conſcience? ſo much temperance, among ſo many occaſions of delights? Beſides the Faſts of the Church, which were there exactly kept, abſtinence was obſerved on the Wedneſday, and Friday in every Week. The Emperour gave the example, his wife, and ſiſters imitated it, their table was rather a perpetual liſt of temperance, then a proviſion of dainties.

Mortification.

A worthy Act.

It was obſerved, the good Prince travelling one day through the heats of Summer, full of duſt, and ſweat, his Court being in great ſcarcity of water, behold a Peaſant cometh, who preſenteth him with a draught of cool water in a fair cryſtal glaſs: he was in his paſſions ſo mortified, that as another David, after he magnificently had recompenſed the good man's Preſent, he gave it back again to beſtow where he pleaſed, without once touching it, thinking it unreaſonable he ſhould flatter his own taſte, during the thirſt of his followers.

He ſometimes ſtole away in hunting, and went to Dine with ſome Hermit, where he fed on a little ſlice of mouldy bread, and drank the clear water of the Fountain, proteſting afterward, it was one of the beſt repaſts he had made, for commonly it was ſeaſoned with ſacred diſcourſe, and wholſome counſel. In his apparel, although he appeared full of Majeſty, according to his quality, yet he oftentimes hid under his royal Purple the old frock, or hair-ſhirt of ſome holy Anchoret. In publick Shews he alſo abſtained from gazing, that ſeeing, one would have thought him blinde. His virtues were ſo much the more, as they had the leſs of affectation. He was in converſation among men, as a man, and yet therein preſerved himſelf pure as an Angel.

If Religion be the Hive, wherein the hony of good doctrine is made, Theodoſius was moſt ſtudious, and well verſed in divine and humane Learning: he oft ſpent one part of the night in ſtudy, that he might employ the day in his affairs; and that which is an admirable note of infinite ſweetneſs, and facility, this good Emperour, for whom a thouſand, and a thouſand, would have thought themſelves moſt happy to paſs the night in watching, he, for fear of interrupting the ſleep of any the meaneſt ſervant, cauſed by art a marvellous Lamp to be made, which perpetually flamed, Oil running thereinto by certain little paſſages, or conduits, which eaſily were turned. There was no Prelate ſo learned, who admired not his great promptneſs to repeat by heart all the Texts of the Bible: and as for the Civil Law, he was ſo converſant therein, that he cauſed, by his direction, that notable Book of Imperial Conſtitutions to be compiled, which to this day beareth his Name.

Admirable lamp.

Briefly, to ſhew that Theodoſius in his Court yielded nothing at all in perfection to the moſt auſtere Hermits, Glycas recounteh, that an holy Anchoret, who had paſſed fourty years in the horrour of a dreadfull Penance, as he one day was touched with ſome ſleight imaginations of his own merit, God revealed unto him, that in thoſe fourty years he had done nothing in the deſert in matter of perfection, which the Emperour Theodoſius had not performed in his Court. This put into his heart ſo ſharp a ſpur to know the conſcience of the Emperour, that he went directly to the Court, where he was very courteouſly received: and conſidering with himſelf how the Prince was clothed, uſed, ſerved, honored, he had much ado to underſtand where this perfection was. In the end, one day ſpeaking to him apart, he conjured him for God's ſake, to recount ſome good works he did. Theodoſius felt a marvellous ſtrife in his ſoul, in the contention between his humility and obedience: humility ſought to hide it ſelf, but the obedience he ought to yield to a man, who conjured him with ſo many ſigns, to tell him in the name of God what he did, and to teſtifie a truth, prevailed with him. After he had bewailed his imperfections, he recounted with much modeſty his prayers, abſtinencies, alms, mortifications of hair-cloth, and ſuch like, and then added, that being ſometimes enforced to be preſent in the Theatres, to wit, in ſports, and paſtimes, wherein the wiſeſt were ſpectatours with much liberty, he at that time in ſuch maner withdrew his ſight, that none of thoſe levities entered into his eyes: ſo that amongſt ſo many Horſe-races, ſhews, oſtents, pomps, and noiſe, he was ever in a perpetual tranquillity. The Hermit was ſo amazed, to hear of ſuch mortification of ſenſe and appetite, in occaſions ſo moving, that away he went, no further preſuming of himſelf, but ſingularly edified by the life of the Emperour.

Arrival of an holy Hermit, and his diſcourſe with Theodoſius.

If then in his retired life onely he equalled the perfection of Anchorites, who now may ſufficiently value the virtues of a King, which neceſſarily muſt be ſhewed in publick, after they have been watered with the tears of his prayers, and ſweetly manured in the ſolitude of his heart? He was ſo wiſe, and diſcrete, that all his actions and words remained perpetually in as juſt an equality, as do the nights and days under the Equinoctial; ſo milde, that he not onely deſired to ſave the living, but alſo to raiſe the dead; ſo mercifull, that all the miſeries of the poor which came to him went no further then himſelf; ſo juſt, that he made a golden Age of his Kingdom; ſo much he obliged the Church, that it ſeemed his hands were fatal to overthrow all the Monſters of Hereſie, as were the Eunomians, Encratites, Macedonians, Novatians, Donatiſts, Neſtorians, and other ſuch like: and how much the more he endeavoured to advance the Kingdom of God, in ſtopping all impiety with incomparable zeal, ſo much the more God, who maketh Kings to reign, eſtabliſhed his Sceptre, cauſing the heavenly powers to fight for him, and holding the winds and tempeſts at command in his favour. Witneſs the notable victory he obtained againſt Roylas, who having paſſed Dannubius, with all the forces of Scythia, and Ruſſia, came pouring like a furious torrent upon Conſtantinople. God ſo ſtayed this Barbarian, in favour of his well-beloved Theodoſius, that he turned him into aſhes with a thunder-ſtroke, and blaſted his whole Army by the violence of horrible tempeſts. On the other ſide, Baravanes, King of Perſia, breaking the treaty of peace, came into the field with innumerable forces, to ſwallow the Eaſtern Empire, aſſociated with Alamondar the Saracen King, who drew along with him no leſs then an hundred thouſand men: and all this was ſcattered in an inſtant, a Panick terrour being crept into the diſorder of this vaſt Army. This is to teach thoſe, who make no account of Princes, if they be not hot-ſpurs, raſh, and many times impious, what a devout Emperour can do.

Great Virtues.

Notable victory.

But ſince there is no beauty in creatures ſo perfect, which it not ſoiled with ſome blemiſh, it cannot be denied, but that this excellent Prince had (as others) his defects. Among the reſt, he is blamed not to have uſed ſufficient induſtry in affairs, but to ſuffer himſelf, through too much facility, to fall into the complacence of others humours. He ſometimes ſigned diſpatches without well-examining them, through over-much confidence in thoſe, who were much converſant about him, and being of a ſingular integrity meaſured all others by himſelf.

Defects of the Emperour.

Pulcheria his ſiſter, to correct his negligence, reſolved one day to draw a transaction in formal, and expreſs terms, by which Theodoſius gave, and conſigned into her hands his Wife Eudoxia, to uſe and handle her at her pleaſure. He, without reading the contents of the Writing preſented unto him, according to his cuſtom, let his Pen run, and ſigned it. Pulcheria wiſely made uſe of this her grant: for gently leading the Empreſs into her chamber, ſhe there held her her as a priſoner. The other demanding the reaſon, this tranſaction was produced, ſigned by the hand of her Husband. The good Queen knew not what to think, and ſhewed rather a diſpoſition of offence then laughter. Notwithſtanding her complaints, ſhe was held in captivity, and Theodoſius asking where the Empreſs his Wife was, it was anſwered, ſhe was in the Princeſs his ſiſter's chamber. She is in good company (ſaith he) but I wonder what tedious buſineſs can keep them ſo long together: Go, bid her come hither. He was ſo paſſionately affected, that the hours he ſpent without beholding her ſeemed years unto him. A Gentleman deputed thereto bare this meſſage to Pulcheria. She perſiſting in her game, with a ſerious countenance, ſendeth word to the Emperour, he ſhould not expect her, and that ſhe was not at his command. Theodoſius was amazed at theſe words, and could not imagine what game his ſiſter meant to play, having never hitherto known any ſuch levity in her. He preſently haſteneth into Pulcheria's chamber, And what device (ſaith he) is this? Where is my Wife? The poor Priſoner ſtretched out her hand to him; Pulcheria oppoſed it, and ſheweth ſhe was hers, to buy, and ſell, and diſpoſe of at her pleaſure. And as the Emperour admired much theſe ſo extraordinary proceedings, in a Perſon of his ſiſters humour, ſhe cauſed him to read the Writing, ſigned with his own hand; then adding good counſel, Behold, (ſaith ſhe) moſt Sacred Majeſty, the good y order, precipitation, and negligence bring to affairs. The holy Emperour took this advertiſement in good part, and promiſeth he never more would ſign diſpatches at this rate. But Eudoxia was vexed at this ſport in good earneſt. She was in an eſtate wherein ſhe would no longer be overawed; ſhe knew the power ſhe held over her husband's heart, having already given him pledges of her fruitfulneſs, to wit, a daughter named Eudoxia, who was afterward married to the Emperour Valentinian. It much troubled her, that Pulcheria ſtill retained ſome ſmall predominance over her, and ſhewed a ſpirit of command: ſhe reſolved with ſelf, that her perſon at this time required another conſideration; that ſuch tricks had heretofore been well enough accepted in that eſtate ſhe was in, but not as now ſhe is: it is too great a game to play upon Diadems. Theſe petty reſentments of the point of honour eaſily creep even into the pureſt ſouls, and who ſeaſonably ſtops them not, findeth his heart drencht in the gall of certain averſions, which weaken charity. I know not what cooling-card this goodly game caſt between the two Princeſſes, but from that time the one would no longer be commanded, and the other purſued her ordinary courſe, which was to command. Theſe hearts formerly united were now upon breach, which notwithſtanding never outwarly appeared, ſo retentive they were on both ſides. God would exerciſe both, and put them into the furnace of tribulation to purifie them, and take away ſome droſs, which by long proſperities is eaſily contracted. He firſt began with the Empreſs Eudoxia, to whom he ſuffered a moſt ſenſible accident to happen, the nature whereof behold, which verily is pitifull. But who will think it ſtrange to ſee Eudoxia fallen into the ſiniſter opinion of Theodoſius, ſeeing the ſame hath chanced to many Saints, yea, to her, who hath born the Standard of all ſanctity, the moſt Bleſſed Virgin.

Rare act of Pulcheria, to correct the haſty precipitation of her brother.

Honours change Manners.

Athenais, a poor Maid preferred by Pulcheria, could not brook her.

Upon the day of Epiphany, as the Emperour returned from Church, with great pomp, and magnificence, a certain countrey-man, a ſtranger, and unknown, brake through the preſs, accoſteth Theodoſius, who was of moſt eaſie acceſs, and preſenteth him with an Apple of an extraordinary ſize, eſteemed at that time as a rare fruit. The Emperour receiveth it gratefully, and commandeth to give the good man preſently about the value of one hundred and fifty crowns. As ſoon as he was returned to the Palace, he goes to viſit the Empreſs, and, full of joy, giveth her this fair preſent, which he had taken of the Peaſant for a great rarity. Out alaſs! this verily was the Apple of diſcord, infected with the breath of the Serpent, which horribly rent aſunder this poor Court. The good Empreſs, having underſtood that Paulinus, a great favorite of Theodoſius, was in bed ſick of the Gout, to pleaſe and comfort him, ſent him the Apple, not mentioning from whom ſhe had received it. Paulinus was ſeized with ſo great joy, ſeeing ſuch a courteſie from a perſon ſo eminent uſed towards him, that the contentment he received at that time charmed the pain of his Gout. He ſo admireth this goodly fruit, that he judgeth it worthy of Imperial hands, and without delaying reſolved to ſend it to the Emperour, excuſing himſelf through indiſpoſition of health, that he himſelf was not the meſſenger. Theodoſius knew the Apple, which he had very lately put into the Empreſs hand, he turned it on every ſide, and judged it to be the ſame: thereupon a furious jealouſie, as if it had been breathed from Hell, began to lay hold on this gentle ſpirit, all the objects of what was paſt returned to thicken this black vapour, to frame a cloud thereof, and reſolve it into a ſtorm. It is true, the Empreſs loved Paulinus with a moſt chaſte and innocent love; one muſt have had the heart of a Tiger not to love him. He was a Lord very much affected by her husband: it was he, who partly had drawn her from the obſcurity of Gentiliſm by his learned and friendly conferences; he, that had procured her Baptiſm; he, that had wrought her marriage; he, that yielded the moſt faithfull ſervice to their Majeſties in the chiefeſt charge of the Empire, wherein he had been moſt nobly emploied: all which made him worthy of great reſpects, beſides that, he was of a very royal converſation, which had great power over all thoſe, who treated with him. The good Lady, who ever had her Pen in hand to work ſome piece of her invention to the glory of Altars, which ſhe affected, was pleaſed to communicate her labours to Paulinus, and diſcourſe with him of holy things. All theſe conferences, which ever had been for the honour of an entire reputation, and which before yielded nothing but Honey, were all turned into gall in the heart of Theodoſius, by this lamentable jealouſie, wherewith he was poſſeſſed.

Apple of diſcord.

He inſtantly ſendeth for Eudoxia, the more deeply to ſound her heart, demanding what was become of the fair Apple he had given her. The poor Princeſs was overtaken, and ſeeing her ſelf between the Hammer and the Anvile, I know not what geſture appeared on the brow of her husband, but ſhe well perceived this fair ſoul was not in its ordinary ſituation. She therefore declining ſuppliant intreaty thought to under-prop her innocency with a Lie, and ſaid, ſhe had eaten the Apple. Virtue hath nothing to do with the veil of untruths to cover it ſelf, it is not her cuſtom. Had ſhe freely told what ſhe did with the Apple, as her intention was moſt ſincere, all the malignity of ſuſpicion would have been diverted. But this ſudden ſurprizal a little altered her judgment, and all ſhe did was to remedy the paſſion ſhe ſaw to be enkindled in the heart of Theodoſius, by the eys, which are as the mirrours of our Soul. The Emperour urged her upon this anſwer. She, who already was involved, tumbled her ſelf further into the ſnare, and, that ſhe might not ſeem a Liar, a Liar, ſware by the life and health of her Husband, ſhe had eaten the Apple. He to convince her of this impudence, drew this fatal fruit out of his Cabinet; it is then flown from your ſtomach into my Chamber without corruption: behold I have found a wonder. The Empreſs at the ſight of this fruit, endured the ſame ſymptoms in innocency, ſhe had done in crime; for ſhe becometh very pale, and was ſo confounded, that ſhe had not courage enough to ſpeak one only word. Theodoſius in an inſtant retireth like lightening, and withdraweth into his Cabinet, having his heart wholly drench'd in gall and bitterneſs. The poor Eudoxia on the other part poureth her ſelf into tears without comfort, as her miſery ſeemed devoid of remedy.

The evil of a ſleight Lie.

Siniſter accidents.

Here was a rough tryal which God ſent to theſe innocent Souls, and yet we need not wonder, ſince Saint Joſeph (as I have ſaid) one of the moſt perfect husbands which the earth ever bare, gave too much ſcope to his ſuſpicion, upon the chaſtity of her, who was more pure then Angels. Love, jealouſie, anger, and ſorrow divided the heart of the Prince in the ſad retirement of his Cabinet, and drew ſtrange ſighs from him.

A ſilly Maid (ſaid he) come of nothing, who was toſſed in a ſtorm as the Tennis-ball of Fortune, without ſupport, without means, without favour, to have been preferred before ſuch, and ſo many Princeſſes, who ſought my alliance, raiſed even to my bed by lawful marriage, to plant d ſhonour there; to have been enobled wi h a Diadem, and negligently to pollute it by her ingratitude, and Paulinus whom I truſted as my ſelf, that he might ſatisfie his deſires with all the greatneſs and beauties of my Empire, (for all was in his hands) to proceed ſo far as to attempt the bed of his Maſter! Where ſhall we hereafter finde fidelity? We muſt ſearch for it among Tartars and Scythians, for it is baniſhed from Chriſtianity.

It is not well known, who in theſe confuſions ſuggeſted to the Emperour this wicked counſel, to deſtroy Prince Paulinus. The Soul of Theodoſius was too ſweet to reſolve on an act ſo tragical, without others motion: ſo likewiſe, it is not credible it ſhould proceed from Pulcheria, who was in affairs more reſerved, and ever guided by the rule of conſcience. However it was, the hiſtory ſaith, the poor Paulinus, who knew nothing of that which paſſed, was cured of the Gout the ſame night, by a very rough and moſt bloody Phlebotomy, for he was put to death without any form of proceſs. Others have written, he was firſt baniſhed into Cappadocia, and there oppreſſed by the faction of his enemies. O God, what may not depraved Love do, ſince ſincere amity cannot avoid ſuſpicion, attended by an accident ſo ſtrange! Some have ſaid, nothing elſe followed, but the ſequeſtration of Paulinus, and that ſhould more pleaſingly run from my Pen, which abhorreth blood. But as the Scripture, ſpeaking of David, and other holy Kings, hath not diſſembled their faults, I will not ſo paint Theodoſius exteriourly, that I cover this aſpertion of too much credulity, precipitation, and revenge in this matter, which proceeded even to blood; as the Chronicle of Alexandria aſſureth us.

It is a fearful example, to ſee a Soul ſo milde, by the diſturbance of a paſſion, and ſome pernicious counſel, tranſported ſo far, to teach Great-ones they cannot maturely enough conſult in the like occaſions. The Father of this Paulinus had been High-Steward in the Court of the Emperour: Paulinus himſelf from his infancy had been bred with Theodoſius, participating in all his counſels and pleaſures of youth: he was grown ſo high, that nothing but the hand of his Maſter could ruine him. He lived in the reputation of a great man, and his words were heard in Court like Oracles: yet notwithſtanding, behold him, to ſatisfie jealouſie, miſerably maſſacred, and the glorious Services he had done to the Crown, recompenced with a direful Cataſtrophe. It is unknown why the Divine Providence permitted the ſame. It often-times holdeth the affairs of the world under the Veil and Silence: but we muſt preſume, all which it permitteth, is done with juſtice. When the afflicted Empreſs underſtood the death of Paulinus, ſo ſudden and unexpected, ſhe well ſaw the Emperour was tainted with the venome of moſt cruel jealouſie, and that all her Apologies would be fruitleſs. The poor Lady ſaw nothing about her but darkneſs, fantaſies, and affrightments. The clock which ſtruck, ever ſeemed to her the laſt moment of life, yea, and that in her opinion, over-ſlow to end her miſeries. When her Soul was able to ſurmount the ſtorm, ſhe ſaid to God with an affectionate heart;

Strange affliction of Eudoxia, and her words.

Alas! God of juſtice (for I dare not implore thy mercies) thou haſt well touched me on that part which was moſt ſenſible in me. Although I had ſeen my Diadem, thunder ſtricken by thy hand, fall into duſt at my feet, though thou hadſt taken this creature from my ſide, which thou haſt afforded me as a pledge of our Marriage, though all infirmities and maunes of death had conſpired againſt me, I doubted not always to have had courage enough to bear my ſelf above wind and tempeſt. But what light of ſpirit would not be eclipſed, what temper of heart would not be loſt in theſe dolorous affictions? Thou haſt lifted me up, as they do little children to the branch s of a Tree, to make me fall down head-long, and cruſh me with a ruine, as ignominious, as my fortune was eminent. Were I now under the poor roof of the houſe, from whence thou dr weſt me, I ſhould be too happy. You have expoſed me to th mid day light, that I might not be unfortunate without making all the world witneſs of my wretchedneſs and diſgrace. And yet (my God) thou knoweſt my eys have ever been chaſte, and that never any other love entered into my heart, but that of a lawful husband. It is better to ſuffer in Innocency then Crime: but it always is a thing worthy of compaſſion, to behold Chaſtity unworthily perſecuted. That poor innocent hath gone before me into the other world, and hath ſerved as a Sacrifice for his Maſters jealouſie: his ſervices ought not to have been crowned with ſuch a recompence. It is my friendſhip, as chaſte, as unhappy, that hath betrayed him: my ſins are ſo great, that I cannot do good, but by doing ill. My God, expiate them by death, and only deliver me from the hands of diſhonour.

Vanity and inconſtancy of worldly affairs.

Thus went the afflicted Turtle mourning in the ſolitary retirement of her heart: the nights were irkſom to her, ſo much was her ſleep clogged with dreams and fantaſies, which with the more horrour repreſented her calamity; and when the Sun aroſe to bring comfort in his rays to all creatures, he found the eie lids of this poor Princeſs all watered with tears, which he could not dry up.

In the mean time, the Court of Theodoſius was in a ſad ſilence. It was not well known what Tragedy was played. The Emperour ſhewed a melancholy diſtracted ſpirit; the Empreſs bare the image of her ſorrow in her dejected countenance: Pulcheria abode in a prudent diſſimulation, and an admirable adviſedneſs. The ſudden death of Paulinus made it to be ſuſpected there was ſome ſtrange accident. Every one diſcourſed according to his opinion. At that inſtant, Eudoxia was ſeen to be removed from Council, and manage of affairs, deprived of the Imperial Bed, abandoned by all thoſe who before adored her: ſhe was dead to the evil life, and only ſurvived to ſee her own Funerals. It was thought Pulcheria, who was deſirous to make a ſequeſtration, (fearing leſt her preſence might again enkindle the fire covered under aſhes in the Emperours heart, to poſſeſs it to the prejudice of affairs) cauſed the counſel of undertaking the voyage of the Holy Land, to be ſuggeſted to her under-hand. But it is more credible far, the good Empreſs took this reſolution upon her own motion, for the reaſon I will deliver.

Departure of Eudoxia.

A devout Roman Lady of a noble houſe, named Melania, who filled the Deſerts, Cities, Provinces, and Empires, with her fame, paſſing into Paleſtine, there there to weir out the reſt of her days in peace, went by Conſtantinople, and was received at the Emperour's Court; where ſeeing Eudoxia endowed with an admirable ſpirit, but yet untrained to the ſweetneſs of things ſpiritual, ſhe endeavoured to give her a taſt. The Empreſs, who at that time was in the proſperities & delights of a flouriſhing Court, thought ſhe ſhould handle devotion, as a Captain Philoſophy, and it was enough to taſt it outwardly. But when this ſad accident, like the ſteel, began to ſtrike on the flint, it made the ſparkles fly out in good earneſt. She was on fire to forſake the Court, where ſhe no longer was what ſhe had been: ſhe ſighed after thoſe places of the Holy Land, as the thirſty Hart for the ſtreams of a Fountain. I well believe ſhe took counſel at that time of Chryſaphius, a powerful Eunuch, who had governed Theodoſius from his infancy, and was much reputed in Court, cloſely countermining the over-much authority, which Pulcheria had, according to his opinion, in affairs; but he took good heed openly to affront her, ſatisfying himſelf to act his part by Eudoxia, according to the directions ſhe gave him. This man, very underſtanding in buſineſſes, found it was to good purpoſe to retire back, to come on the better, that it was neceſſary the Empreſs ſhould give way for a time, and that her abſence would make her the more deſired; and that he in the mean ſpace would do all good offices for her with the Emperour, and act his part in time and place. Concluſions of the voyage are made, leave was not hard to be obtained of the Emperour, ſeeing his Inſtrument Pulcheria was thereunto wholly diſpoſed. When it came to a ſeparation, which was a thing very ſenſible in mindes ſo long time, and with ſuch ardour, mutually loving: the good Eudoxia could not refrain to ſay to her Husband with tears in her eys;

SACRED MAJESTY, I am upon terms to ſee you no more in this world; for which cauſe it is fit I diſcharge my Conſcience. Behold me ready to depart, not only from the Court, but this life, if you ſo ordain. I ſorrow not for greatneſs, nor delights. I have ever thought the proſperity of the world was a current of freſh water, which looke h not back on any thing, and haſteneth to pour it ſelf into the ſalt Sea. I only grieve, that having brought to your Court two ineſtimable Jewels, Virginity, and the reputation of a Childe of Honour; the one, which I ought rather to have given to God, I dedicated to your Bed, and the other is taken from me by your ſuſpicion, grounded upon a ſudden ſurprizal of a word ſpoken from a heart perplexed to ſee you troubled. You have cauſed the Prince Paulinus to be put to death, and in doing this, you have not bereft me of a Lover, but your ſelf of a good and faithful Servant, and God grant the voice of blood accuſe you not before the Tribunal of the Sovereign Judge. I hope God, who is the Protector of Innocents, will one day take my cauſe in hand, and when Truth ſhall give light through your ſuſpicions, you at leaſt will render me the honour, which I ever only have ſought, to be conveyed into the aſhes of my Tomb.

Theodoſius knew not how to anſwer her but with the moiſt dew of his eys, which began to do the office of his lips: a few ſuch words were enough to turn his Soul topſie-turvy. Pulcheria readily made the ſtop, ſaying, That which was paſt could not be recalled, over which God giveth us no other power but of forgetfulneſs. That the Empreſs might in good time go to ſatisfie her devotion; and that, were ſhe her ſelf free from the bondage of affairs, it would be one of her greateſt contentments to bear her company.

Voyage of Eudoxia into Paleſtine.

Thus Eudoxia departed, travelling directly to Jeruſalem, and with her the grace and alacrity of Court. All Conſtantinople was filled with ſadneſs, at which time the Plains of Paleſtine were already comforted with the firſt rays of this bright day-break. Whereſoever ſhe paſſed, the people ran thither by heaps to behold her, ſhe was received with much applauſe, with eloquent Orations, and all demonſtrations of hearts affections; and particularly her approach was much celebrated in the City of Antioch. For it is ſaid, the Senate going out to receive her, ſhe replied at an inſtant, as ſhe was ſitting in her golden Caroch, to the Oration pronounced before her, and undertook to praiſe this famous City with ſo much grace and judgment, that the principal and moſt eminent of the City, raviſhed with ſuch courteſie, dedicated two Statues to her, the one of Gold in the Senate-houſe, as to the Empreſs, the other of braſs in their Library, as to the tenth Muſe. Entering into Jeruſalem, ſhe was received as an Angel from Heaven: but above all, the Clergy rejoyced at the abode ſhe meant to make there, well knowing the Church ſhould thence derive great ſuccours in its neceſſities. Some perſwaded her David had propheſied ſhe ſhould re-edifie the Walls of Jeruſalem, becauſe in the Fifteenth Pſalm, where theſe words are read, In bona voluntate tua ædificentur muri Jeruſalem: the Septuagint have tranſlated, in Εὐδοκίᾳ. The interpretation was not amiſs; although it were not literal, it had the effect. For the pious Empreſs in proceſs of time made many moſt worthy reparations. There ſhe began to live as in another world: ſhe ſeemed to her ſelf to have caſt from her ſhoulders the burthen of a huge Mountain, ſhe now breathed a far other air then that of Court, ſhe had another taſte of things divine. All her ſtudy was to pray, meditate, and hear exhortations and ſpiritual conferences, to read and learn holy Scripture, to ſow Charities, that ſhe might reap Merits, to viſit the Cells of Anchorets, to ſee how their Garments and Girdles were made, to obſerve their manner of living, to multiply Monaſteries, to cloath Virgins, to heap up Reliques together, and ſuch like things.

Chryſaphius laboureth the return of the Empreſs; in the mean time ſeeking his own ends.

Theodoſius underſtanding her carriage, and the good entertainment ſhe had every where, thought it was the work of God, who favoured her innocency, and at that time the flames of his chaſte love began to burn more forcible then ever. He loved her with a love mingled with reſpect of her merit, and compaſſion of perſecuted innocency. He was pleaſed to have her ſpoken of in private, and hear the life deſcribed ſhe led in this new world. Chryſaphius perceiving him to take fire in good earneſt, followed his opportunity according to promiſe, and one day ſeeing the Emperour well diſpoſed, adventured to ſay:

SACRED MAJESTY, How long will you deprive us of this Saint? Muſt needs the Deſerts of Paleſtine ſo long time poſſeſs her to our prejudice? It is a wonder your Palace hath not been able to endure a Vertue, which maketh it ſelf to be ſeen, heard, and adored in the ſavage Wilderneſſes. The poor Lady hath well paid for a little ſudden ſurprizal of ſpeech. Know beſides, ſhe never hath failed in fidelity to your Bed, and hereon I would ſwear upon the holy Evangiſts, and expoſe my hand to the fire: but God hath already ſufficiently declared it by the ſequel of her deportments. What is done, is done; we cannot reſtore life to the dead, but we ought to yield honour to the living which hath unjuſtly been taken from them. It is an obligation of conſcience. Who hinders how we cannot ſuddenly ſee her by your ſides? Theodoſius anſwereth; It would be my deſire, but thou ſeeſt the impediment. I fear my ſiſter will not like it. Chryſaphius replieth; Truly, my Lady, your ſiſter ought to be ſatisfied with the abſolute command your Majeſty giveth her in all the affairs of your Kingdom, without attempting on the contentments of your marriage, or the honour of this good Princeſs, whoſe faults ſhe ſhould rather cover with her royal purple, if any ſuch had eſcaped her, but of neceſſity ſhe ought to honour her merits. Let me alone, and I will give her ſatisfaction.

Theodoſius giveth him abſolute commiſſion, and thereupon, as it is moſt probable, he adviſeth the

Empreſs

Empreſs to return to Conſtantinople, with ſmall noiſe, and much haſte, and ſo plotteth, that the Emperour, under colour of going a hunting, ſaw her, ſpake to her, treateth with her of her return, which preſently was publiſhed, and all the City, which paſſionately affected her, uſhered her in. Behold her arrived, as if ſhe had flown in the air, and received with much honour and magnificence into the Palace. Pulcheria, amazed at this accident, ſetteth a good face upon it, entertaineth her with ſtrict embraces, congratulateth her pilgrimage, ſpeaketh to her of nothing but Monaſteries, Croſſes, Reliques. In the mean time very cloſely ſheweth, ſhe did not well like him, who had contrived this. Chryſaphius imagining he had to do with an imperious Maid, ſeaſoned from her youth in government, who never would forgive him this fault, reſolveth to play at faſt and looſe, thinking he had credit enough to do this by the means of Eudoxia. For the love, which Theodoſius bare to her upon her return, was a torrent, which after it hath a long time been reſtrained, breaketh the forced damms, and with vigorous impetuouſneſs drowneth the fields. He was ſo ardent and paſſionate, that he ſeemed unable to deny her any thing. This was the cauſe why Chryſaphius, whoſe name is, as much as to ſay, a Seamſter of Gold, having already made a ſeam of his Trade, ſtitched another together more ſtrong then the former. He boardeth the Emperour under the wings of Eudoxia, in the heat of his affections moſt ardent; both joyning to make the battery more forcible, declare to him, That MADAM his Siſter daily deſired to gain repoſe, as ſhe had often ſaid, and that it was a thing lawfully due for the long ſervices ſhe had yielded to the Crown. That it was a wonder, how ſhe, having dedicated her ſelf to the Church by the vow of Virginity, could perſevere ſo long in Court. That becauſe Theodoſius had one, who held with him the firſt place in all favours, on whom he might repoſe himſelf, and was thereunto obliged by reaſon, which was his wife. That the ſpirit of Pulcheria was not ſuitable to the humour of Eudoxia; when one ſtar riſeth, the oppoſite muſt fall.

Chryſaphius, an hereſical Eunuch, projecteth to ruine Theodoſius his Coſin.

Theodoſius apprehended this buſineſs as the moſt ſlippery path he had ever trod: but what cannot love and the ſoft inticements of a woman do? Wearied out with ceaſeleſs importunities, he yieldeth; he ſendeth for Flavian the Patriarch, and entreateth him to put his Siſter Pulcheria in the rank of Virgins, who are dedicated to the ſervice of the Church, were ſhe willing, or unwilling. Flavian, much amazed at this manner of proceeding, telleth him, he ſhould take good heed of this reſolution, that he undertook one of the greateſt paſſages of State he had ever done in his life, and that the danger thereof was much to be feared. The Emperour replieth, He hath well pondered it, that ſuch was his will, and he muſt ſpeedily ſee it executed. The Patriarch (Pulcheria being exceedingly affected by all the Clergy) adviſeth her to withdraw without further reſiſtance, otherwiſe he ſhould be forced to do that, which would much trouble him. The good Lady underſtood well what he would ſay, ſhe had already ſmelt the plot, and was unwilling to do any thing unworthy of her virtue: for ſeeing her fortune altered by the change of the Emperour her brother's will, ſhe freely deſpoiled her ſelf of the manage of affairs, as from a ſhirt, which one hath long worn; and retiring from the Palace, went to lodge in a houſe ſomewhat diſtant from Conſtantinople, where ſhe lived in marvellous Sanctity. Virtue is as the Geometrical Cube, on what ſide ſoever it be caſt, it always findeth its baſis.

Virtue of Pulcheria.

Behold then a new face of government, which beginneth under Chryſaphius and Eudoxia; but the miſchief was, an old Dotard, called Eutyches, came into the field to ſow an hereſie, holding the body of our Lord, after the union with the Word, was no more of the ſame nature that ours are, but that the Humanity was wholly diſſolved into the Divinity. The hypocrite ſo covered his opinion, that he ſhewed not to teach this doctrine, but for the reverence he bare to the Son of God. This became a ſtumbling-block to many good Souls. As he advanced this propoſition, the Biſhops oppoſed to ſuppreſs it, and he for ſhelter caſt himſelf into the arms of Chryſaphius, who not contented to embrace this buſineſs with all fervour, embarqueth likewiſe therein the Emperour Theodoſius, and Eudoxia his wife, firſt through great ſimplicity, afterward by a ſtrange unhappineſs, which almoſt brought them to deſtruction, if the Divine goodneſs had not otherwiſe diſpoſed. Theodoſius, the holy and pious Emperour, perſecuted the Religious, and Saints. He wrote to Pope Leo, in favour of Eutyches, he cauſed falſe Councils to be held, and covered the ſeditious under the protection of his arms, even to the authorizing the attempt committed on the perſon of the good Patriarch Flavianus by expreſs Letters. What doth not a plaiſtered ſanctity for the ſubverſion of the ſimple? What doth not a bad ſervant, when once he poſſeſſeth the eaſie nature of his Maſter?

Chryſaphius entangleth the Emperour, and his wife, in the Hereſie of Eutyches Pulcheria, who ſome years before had ſeen the hereſie of Neſtorius to ariſe, and had partly ſtifled it, when ſhe was in the manage of affairs, by her excellent direction, never was deceived in the choice of a ſide, but moſt conſtantly tied her ſelf to the doctrine of the See Apoſtolick. That gave a particular benediction to all her enterprizes, and made her ſway in the peoples hearts, as ſhe cauſed true Religion to flouriſh on Altars. All the Eaſtern and Weſtern Clergy eſteemed her, and lent their aſſiſtance to maintain her authority, which was no little ſupport. All thoſe, who have ſought to ſtrike theſe Powers, have therein loſt their endeavours. And very well Ariſtobulus King of the Jews, one of the greateſt States-men, who had governed that Kingdom, being upon his death-bed, freely confeſſed, the fouleſt fault he had ever committed in matter of policy, was, to have oppoſed the Phariſees; who then had lawful authority over affairs of Religion; and gave his wife Alexandra, counſel to practice and hold good intelligence with them by all poſſible means. The very ſame, which he adviſed out of reaſon of State, Pulcheria practiſed by conſideration of piety, and ever held her ſelf firm on the Rock of S. Peter; as it is ſaid, The Mothers of Pearl fix themſelves to Rocks during the tempeſt. If the wicked Eutyches had appeared in her time, ſhe had conſumed his hereſie, as the Ice of one night under the rays of the Sun; but it was then in the kingdom of darkneſs. Chryſaphius perpetually beſieged the ears and heart of the Emperour Theodoſius, diſguiſing all affairs to him, according to the ſway of his own paſſion. He drew along with him the good Eudoxia, who became too curiouſly intelligent in matter of Religion, and loſt her ſelf to follow rather the aims of her pregnant wit, then the tracts of holy humility, more agreeing to her Sex.

Great prudence to ſtick to Altars, and the true Church.

Pulcheria, who underſtood all this goodly buſineſs, was much perplexed to ſee her brother and ſiſter-in-law, after they had ſhaken off the yoke of her good precepts, to fall into a little apoſtaſie: and not being able to get acceſs to talk with them, ſhe made the apple of her weeping eys ſpeak to God in continual prayers. She wrote to Rome, ſometime to the Emperour Valentinian her Coſin, ſometime to Eudoxia the younger, his wife, daughter of our

Eudoxia,

Endoxia, sometime to Pope Leo himself, soliciting them for the reduction of these poor wandering sheep: she every where disposed squadrons of religious persons, to force God with the arms of prayers. All the powers of Heaven and earth conspired at that time; the battery was strong enough to move a heart that never yet was obdurate.

Theodosius awakened. In the end, Theodosius awakened, as out of a long sleep, opened his eys, and with horrour saw the precipice, whereinto he was ready to fall. He detesteth the disasterous Eutyches, and leaveth him to the censures of the Church. Pulcheria four years after her banishment returned in triumph to the Court, with the general applause of all sorts. Her first care was to seise on the person of Chrysaphius, and by form of justice, to send him into the other world, that he might no longer trouble this; wherein she shewed, that living otherwise as a Bee in the delights of Virginity, she had not so much honey, but withall a sting.

The poor Endoxia well perceived her Mistress was returned, and her heart bled to behold this change. She no longer remembered the condition of Athenais, and she, who before would not be but under the feet of Pulcheria, could not endure her now by her sides. It is a strange thing, how the air of the Court doth, as it were, necessarily breath ambition. These two pure Souls, which seemed in the beginning (as an Antient hath said) able to abide together in the eie of a Needle, when they were in concord, found the whole world in their discord too little for their separation. Eudoxia, tired with the many revolutions of Court, returneth to Jerusalem, as a Pilgrim, with a great oath never to set foot again in Constantinople: and verily, she had her Tomb in Palestine, as we shall see anon.

Theodorus in the collection of his History insinuateth to us, that she never undertook this voyage till the death of the Emperour Theodosius her Husband, which happened shortly after. You would have said, that his good sister was come of purpose to dispose his Soul for this passage. He was about fifty years of age, and had already ruled fourty three years, with a most happy Reign, had not this apple of discord been, which outragiously disturbed the peace of his Court, and steeped his life in many acerbities. That which is read most probable of his death, is, that riding a hunting at full speed, and falling from his horse, he hurt the reins of his back, so that of necessity he must be carried back to his Palace in a Litter; at which time, he plainly saw his last hour approached, and signed his innocent life with the seal of a death truly Christian. A Prince in all things else of a most sincere life, religious, learned, milde, courteous, patient; in whom nothing could be blamed but the over-much facility of his nature, which many times made his heart of wax to be moulded in the hands of those, who were neerest unto him, and this was in a manner the cause of his ruine. But it was well for him he betook himself firmly to the good counsels of his sister, who dearly loved his good, and aimed at nothing but the glory and repose of his Empire. We have here inserted his Portraicture, and Elogy.

His death.

FLAV. THEODOSIUS JUNIOR, ARCADII ET EUDOXIÆ FILIUS, OCTO ANNORUM PUER ORIENTALE CEPIT IMPERIUM, ET PER ANNOS QUADRAGINTA TRES PULCHERIÆ SORORIS AUSPICIIS, ARMIS ET LEGIBUS FELICITER ADMINISTRAVIT: PRINCEPS DE MELIORI NOTA, CHRISTIANUS, VITÆ INTEGERRIMÆ, DIVINIS LECTIONIBUS INTENTUS, PATIENTIA ET CLEMENTIA SUPRA CÆTEROS CLARUS, OBIIT CONSTANTINOPOLI ANNO CHRISTI CDLII. ÆTATIS XLIX.

Upon the PICTURE of THEODOSIUS.

A Sceptre free from pride, a goodneſs ſweet,
A life not feign'd, but where true graces meet.
As zeal, he for ſole favour did advance,
So Heav'n his Shield became, the Croſs his Lance.

Marriage of Pulcheria, and new Government.

HE had no Male Iſſue by his Wife Eudoxia, and the Empire might not fall to the Diſtaff, which ſeemed to invite theſe two Princeſſes, who till this day had ſwaied in Government, to ſound the retreat. But Pulcheria was become very neceſſary for the State, and as yet had not loſt the appetite of rule. Theodoſius having caſt his eys by the advice of his Council upon Martianus, to declare him Succeſſour in his Empire: Pulcheria married him, only under the title of Wedlock, with mutual conſent of both parties to keep Virginity. This woman was made to govern men, and Empires. She was already fifty years old, and had managed the State about thirty ſeven. Behold ſhe beginneth a new Reign, with the beſt man of the world, who only had the name of a husband, and in effect ſerved and reſpected her with as much regard and humility, as if he had been her own Son. She could not in the world have made a better choice. This great man was naturally enclined to Piety, Juſtice, compaſſion towards the neceſſities of man-kind. He was very valiant, for he had all his life-time been bred among Arms, and, during his Empire, no barbarous Nation durſt ſtir, ſo much was he feared. It was a wonder by what byaſs God led him directly to the height of worldly honours. He was of baſe extraction, a Thracian born, of a good wit, and a body very robuſtious, which made him finde a ſweetneſs in War. He going to Philippolis to be enrolled in the liſt of Souldiers, by chance it happened he found a dead body upon the way, newly maſſacred. This good man, who was very compaſſionate, had pity thereon, and approached to give it burial: but this charity was like to have coſt him his life; for being buſily employed to enterr this body, one laid hold on his throat, as if he had been the murtherer, and that he made this grave for no other intention, but to bury his own guilt. The poor man defendeth himſelf in his innocency as well as he could; but conjectures prevail beyond his defence. He was now under the Sword of the Executioner, when by good hap the Homicide was produced, who had done the deed, convicted by his own confeſſion. This man thruſt his head into the place of the innocent, and Martianus brought his away to behold it one day glitter under the Rubies and Diamonds of the Imperial Crown. This was not without long trials of [illegible]ility, which transferred him from degree to degree, through all the hazards of a long and painful warfare. He was then mature in years, in account one of the greateſt Captains of the Empire. Behold why Pulcheria could not be deceived in her choice. This good husband, who held his wife as a Saint, was wholly directed by her counſels, and ſhe daily purified his Soul in religion and policy. He became in ſhort time ſo brave & perfect in this Schole, that he was accounted one of the moſt accompliſhed Emperours, who had born the Sceptre ſince Conſtantine. God well ſhewed his love and faithful protection towards Martianus, when, in the ſecond year of his Empire, he diverted the furious Attila from the Eaſt, who even now roared over the City of Conſtantinople, as a thunder-ſtroke before it brake in ſhivers.

Marvellous accident of Martianus.

Good ſucceſs of Martianus.

This Attila was a Scythian, a great Captain, who promiſed to himſelf the Empire of the World, and for that cauſe had taken the field with an Army of 700000 men, compoſed of ſtrange and hideous Nations, who had gone out of their Country like a ſcum of the earth, ranging themſelves under the conduct of Attila, for the great experience he had in the manage of Arms. He, notwithſtanding was a little man, harſh, violent, his breaſt large, his head great, the eie of a Piſmire, his noſe flat, his beard cloſe-ſhaved, beginning already to wax griſled. He walked with ſo much ſtate, as if he thought the earth had been unworthy to bear him; and, though meerly barbarous, the deſire of honour ſo poſſeſſed him, that being one day at Milan, and ſeeing Pictures, where the Roman Emperours were repreſented, who had Scythians, his Country-men, caſt at their feet, was ſo enraged, that inſtantly he ſent for a Painter, and cauſed himſelf to be drawn, in a very eminent golden Throne, and clothed in royal Robes, and the Emperours of Rome and Conſtantinople bearing Bags on their ſhoulders filled with Crowns; then made them to be poured at his feet, alluding hereby to the vaſt ſumms of money he in good earneſt extorted from the Empire, and which Theodoſius gave him afterwards to divert the courſe of his Arms,: thinking that ſpeedily to diſpatch ſuch an enemy out of his Territories, it was only fit to make for him a bridg of ſilver. This man ſeemed created to ſhake the pillars of the earth, and for that cauſe made himſelf to be called The ſcourge of God. There was no Infant ſo little, in the arms of the Nurſe, who hearing Attilas named, did not think he ſaw a Wolf. He conſidering, that Martianus, a moſt valiant man, at that time ſwayed the Eaſtern Empire, durſt not come near, but haſtened to fall upon the Weſt, where Valentinian the younger reigned, Son of Honorius, Coſin of Theodoſius, and Pulcheria, a wanton and diſſolute Prince, as you ſhall underſtand in the courſe of this Hiſtory, loſing his life and Empire by his ſenſuality. So it was, that Attila, attempting firſt upon the Gauls, found work enough; for the Romans, French, and Goths (not unlike dogs, who, after they have worried one another, rally themſelves together to reſiſt the Wolf) by a common conſent, heartened each other under the conduct of Ætius, Moroneus, and Thyerry, againſt this Barbarian, and having given him battel, defeated one part of his Army in the Catalonian Plains: but he failed not to pack away, creeping along like a great Serpent, which, loaden with redoubled blows given by Peaſants, hath received a maim in his body, and notwithſtanding ſaved his head.

God, who derideth the proud, and in his Amphitheatre is pleaſed to make, not Lions to fight with Bulls, but the weakneſs of the earth againſt the moſt inſolent greatneſs, reſerved the conqueſt of this Monſter to religious perſons and women. It is a wonder, he coming to Rome, as to the period and butt of his ambitions, all enflamed with great deſires, in this clattering of harneſs, and loud noiſe of Armies, all the world trembling under the ſcourge: the brave Pope S. Leo went out to ſeek him, and preached ſo well unto him, that being come thither as a Lion, he returned as a Lamb: for Attila entertained tained him with marvellous respect. So had he done before to S. Lupus, Bishop of Troys, granting him whatsoever he could desire. All his Chaplains were much amazed; for, among other Titles, this Hun had the name of being inexorable to Suppliants: and it then being curiously asked of him, who made him at that time lose his fury, he confessed he saw a venerable person by Leo's side (it was the great Saint Peter) who threatened him with death, if he condescended not to what the good Pope desired of him.

Attila then leaving Italy, and passeth into Sclavonia, without being wished for again, but by one sole woman. Alas! who would believe it? Honoria, sister of the Emperour, Cosin-german to Pulcheria, fell in love with this Monster. I know not what she had seen in this Picture, which commonly was painted with the horn of a Bull on his forehead. It was not in my opinion his fair eys, nor goodly nose, which made him sought after, for he was one of the most deformed creatures of the world: yet he notwithstanding was reputed a great Captain, and a puissant King. This blind Princess so breathed the air of ambition, that, though he were wholly Pagan and hideous, she no whit was affrighted: for verily her passion was so much enkindled, that she secretly dispatched one of her Eunuchs with express Letters, beseeching Attila he would demand her in marriage of the Emperour her brother, and she should account it a great honour to be his wife. This Scythian entered into a much greater estimation of his own worth then ever, beholding himself sued unto by a Roman Lady of noble extraction, and thereupon grew so eager, that he immediately addresseth an Ambassadour to the Emperour Valentinian, to require his sister of him in marriage, and the moiety of his Kingdom; otherwise he was not gone back so far, but he would return with his Army to enforce his obedience.

All the World was now strucken with terrour, when by good chance he saw himself, for some pressing occasions, engaged to return into his Country, where all these lightenings were quickly turned into a shower of blood. After he had sweat under harnes, like another Hannibal, who, in the end of his conquest was brutishly besotted in the bosom of a Capuan Lady: this haughty King of Huns, as soon as he came into his Countrey, wholly engulphed himself in Wine, and Love. Besides a great rabble of creatures, which he had to satisfie his lust, he became in his old days passionately enamoured of a Gentlewoman, named Hildecon, whom he married with Sports, Feasts, and excessive alacrity. That evening, after he had freely drunk, according to his custom, he retired into his Nuptial Chamber with his new Spouse, and the next morning was found dead in his bed, floating in a river of blood, who had drawn blood from all the veins of the world.

Death of Attila. Some said, it was an eruption of blood, which choaked him, but others thought Hildecon, lead thereunto, one knoweth not by what spirit, nor by whom solicited, handled her pretended husband as Judith did Holofernes. Behold how God punisheth the proud. A despicable Dwarf, who commanded over 700000 men, who forraged every where, environed as with a brazen wall, who boasted in the lightenings of his puissant Arms, who razed Cities all smoaking in blood and flames, who wasted Provinces, who destroyed Empires, who would not tread but on Crowns and Sceptres, behold him the very night of his Nuptials, full of drink, massacred by a woman, having not so much as the honour to die by the hand of a man.

The same night that Attila yielded up the ghost in his own blood, our Saviour appeared in a dream to the good Emperour Martianus, and shewing him a great Bow all shivered in pieces, saith; Martianus, behold the Bow of Attila, which I have broken: thou hast no further cause to fear thy Empire. Thus you see, how God fighteth for the pious even while they sleep.

This scourge being so fortunately diverted, Martianus, and Pulcheria, attended with all their power, to the consolation and ornament of the universal Church, under the direction of the great Pope Saint Leo, whom their Majesties most punctually obeyed. At that time were seen the Reliques to march in triumph into Constantinople of the good Patriarch Flavianus, massacred by the practises of Hereticks: at that time the exiled Bishops were with honour re-established in their seats. At that time the Council of Chalcedon was celebrated, where the Emperour Martianus, though wholly a Souldier, made an Oration, first in Latine, for the honour of the Roman Church, then in Greek his natural language. At that time Heresie was fully condemned, and impudence surcharged with confusion. At that time an infinite number of godly Canons were confirmed by the Council, and strongly maintained by the authority of the Emperour. At that time Justice was fixed in the height of perfection. Briefly at that time the whole world was infinitely comforted by the good order and liberalities of this Holy Court.

It was an admirable Empire, and a happy Marriage, and nothing could be desired more in this match but immortality. But the holy Virgin Pulcheria being about fifty years of age, not so much loaden with years, as merits, wearied out with continual travel and care, which she had endured almost fourty years, in the manage of affairs, found her repose in exchange of the Court of Constantinople for that of Paradise. She died in a most pure virginity, which she carefully had preserved all her life-time, leaving the poor for her heirs, who were her delight, after she had built in her own life time five Churches, and among the rest, one to the honour of the most blessed Virgin Mary, which surpasseth all the other in magnificence, besides many Hospitals, and Sepulchres for Pilgrims. Torches made of Aromatick wood cast out their odoriferous exhalations when they are almost wasted: and the virtuous Pulcheria made all the good odours of her life evaporate in the last instant of her death. She, who had lived as the Bee in the tastful sweetnes of purity, died as the Phœnix in the Palms, not of Arabia, but of conquests, which she had obtained over the enemies of our nature. We have here annexed her Picture, and Elegy.

PULCHERIA FLA. THEODOSII JUNIORIS SOROR, AUGUSTA, VIRGO ET CONJUX, AUGUSTORUM FILIA, SOROR, NEPTIS, UXOR: PROPUGNATRIX PONTIFICUM, MAGISTRA IMPERATORUM, CUSTOS FIDEI, MUNIMEN ORTHODOXORUM, ECCLESIÆ ET IMPERII DECUS, NOVA HELENA, NOVUM ORBIS MIRACULUM, ANNO CHRISTI CLIII. ÆTATIS LV. IMPERII XXXIX. AD COELESTEM AULAM PROFICISCITUR.

Upon the PICTURE of PULCHERIA.

A golden Virgin in an Iron Age,
Who trampled under foot infernal Rage:
A barren Wife, a fruitful Maid, unstain'd;
That all the World within her heart contain'd.
Mother of People, Mistress over Kings, (brings.
And who 'twixt Church, and Law, firm union
She in her self bright Sceptres did behold
Joyn'd to the Cross, Altars to Crowns of Gold,
The married life unto Virginity,
And glorious greatness to Humility.
If Virtue were a substance to be seen,
Well might we here suppose this happy Queen
Should lend her body, that it outward may Resplendent lustre to the World display.

GReat Ones may here behold, the shortest way to the Temple of Honour is to pass by that of Virtue. Never Woman was more honoured in her life, never Woman more glorious in her death. That great Pope, S. Leo, S. Cyrill, and all the excellent men both of the East, and West, have employed their Pens in her honour. So magnificent and noble Acclamations were made to her in Councils, that nothing would be wished more glorious. A little before her death in the Council of Chalcedon, they cried out, Long live the Empress most Sacred; Long live PULCHERIA, Long live the Second S. Helena: God preserve the Saint, preserve the Orthodox, preserve her, who is the Guardian of Faith.

What Trophеys of Alexanders, and Cæsars, are comparable to such Honour? Raderus, who hath learnedly written her Life, maketh a Collection of her Titles, and calleth her the holy Pulcheria, ever a Virgin, always sacred, a Virgin out of Marriage, a Virgin in Marriage, Daughter of an Emperour, Mistress of Emperours, Protectress of Popes, Guardian of Faith, Bulwark of the Faithful, Honour of the Church, Glory of the Empire, the new Helena, the new Miracle of the World, the new Example for Posterity. The Titles, which Saints have given her, and her Name in the quality of a Saint, have been couched in the Menologe of the Grecians, and the Roman Martyrologe, the Tenth of September, a Month wherein she passed from this World, to the glory of Saints, in the year of our Lord 453. And Martianus her Husband, being not able to live without this Celestial Soul, fled quickly hence after her, to enjoy the recompense of his Piety. Of whom behold here the Picture, and Elogy.

FL. VA-

FL. VALERIUS MARTIANUS, SOLA VIRTUTUM COMMENDATIONE AD IMPERIUM EVECTUS, PULCHERIÆ CONJUGIS INTEGER CONJUX, MODERATUS DOMI PRINCEPS, FORIS ATTILÆ FURORI MODUM IMPOSUIT: QUASSATUM IMPERIUM CONTRA PARTHOS ET VANDALOS CONFIRMAVIT PRUDENTIA, ET ORTHODOXAM FIDEM ADVERSUS EUTYCHEN TUTATUS EST FIDE: VIXIT ÆTATI SATIS, IMPERIO PARUM, SIBI SEMPER VICTURUS, OBIIT ANNO CHRISTI CDLII. IMPERIO VI. MENS. VI.

Upon the PICTURE of MARTIANUS.

A Man without Eſtate, Souldier untrain'd,
Husband not wiv'd, an Emperour unſtain'd:
Whoſe ſtrength, triumphāt acts, & virtues bright,
We may his proper children call aright.
What did he not, ſince in himſelf he made
No change, but to a Sceptre from the Spade?

Eudoxia lived in the holy Land in the Eutychian Hereſie.

LEt us return now to our Pilgrim, Eudoxia, who lived in the holy Land, not being in the way of ſanctity. A woman, endowed with a goodly body, and a fair ſpirit, hath the charge of a veſſel very hard to be ſteered; more of ſuch ſuffer ſhipwrack then reach the Haven. The good Princeſs departed from Conſtantinople in grief, gall, and anxiety, which proceeded from the change of her fortune, and, that which is more, ſeduced alſo with the hereſie of the wicked Eutyches. Theodoſius her huſband yielded at the firſt encounter, and ſubmitted under the obedience of the Church: Eudoxia ſtill perſiſted, ſo apt the nature of women is to maintain an errour with obſtinacy. She had but too much wit to be deceived, and yet not prudence enough to diſcover the deceit. A Wolf clothed in the skin of a Sheep, that is to ſay, one Theodoſius, a falſe Monk, who had gained her under appearance of ſanctity, and much wrought upon her, during her abode in Paleſtine, wholly plunged her in the mire of hereſie, which ſhe ſupported in his favour, and endeavoured to illuſtrate by the ſubtilty of her wit.

How was it poſſible, but this hereſie of Eutyches, maſked with the falſe zeal of reverence towards the Perſon of the Son of God, might not enſnare a woman, very eaſie to take impreſſions, which had ſemblance of devotion, ſince even divers holy Hermits, who numbred many years in auſterities, and penance, before they were well informed, ſuffered themſelves to be tranſported with this novelty? Among others, the great Geraſimus was ſeen to fall, that Angel of the deſert, who tamed Lions, and uſed them as Mules, was beheld involved in the ſnares of this infamous Apoſtata, from whom he afterward freed himſelf by the mercy of God. It was a lamentable thing to ſee this poor Empreſs, who had forſaken all the greatneſs of Court, to live in retired ſolitarineſs, thus caught in the nets of her own judgment. She thought daily to amaſs infinite heaps of good works in the exerciſes of piety, which ſhe inceſſantly practiſed, and it was but duſt ſhe bare in her hands, blown away by the wind of preſumption. God would not loſe this fair ſoul, which he had enchaſed in a beautious body, to make her in the end of her days, an exact miracle of virtue, and as ſhe kicked ſomewhat too eagerly againſt ſo many teſtimonies of verity, he reſolved to break this feminine pride with the iron rod of another very ſenſible affliction. She was then, in her own opinion, out of the danger of inconſtancy, but had ſtill one part of her ſelf upon the Imperial Throne, who received all the violence of the ſtorm, to make the effects thereof pass into her heart, by the painfull counterbuff of a love, which could not be renounced without a petty apostacy in nature.

Eudoxia's affliction in her daughter.

paſs

Strange disorder in the Roman Empire.

Eudoxia her onely daughter, inheritrix of the name and beauty of her mother, was admired to Valentinian, Emperour of Rome, to be the subject of a wofull tragedy, and to make posterity behold, that too eminent greatness is often ruined with thunder. This Valentinian, sister's Son of the Emperour Honorius, cosin of Theodosius, not being able to content himself with the springs of his own house (according to the Proverb) and repose himself in the beauty of a Princess so accomplished, as he in lawfull wedlock had espoused, daily went an hunting after change in the infinity of forbidden loves. The sensuality of this Prince so much displeased God, that for this vice he ruined in his person this great Roman Empire, which so many times had caused her victorious Charriots, loaden with Palms, and Laurels, to pass over the heads of the Kings and Monarchs of the world, so often had it been shaken, and so many times established by concussion, needs must a wicked sin of luxury interpose irrecoverably to entomb it.

Lust ruineth Empires.

The Emperour then beholdeth with a wanton eye the wife of an eminent Senatour, named Maximus, and seeing this Lady was honest, and loyal to her husband, he thought her a bird not easily caught. Behold, he resolveth to try all the priviledges of his power, and break all the bands of equity to give vent to his passion. What doeth he? Behold, he inviteth Maximus to a sumptuous, and royal banquet, which he had prepared, miserable man! who knew not this feast was a snare to entrap the honour of his wife. After supper, Valentinian inviteth him to play, under the colour of passing away the time, which he most willingly did, and so beateth him in game, that, after he had lost all, he gaged down the Ring off his finger, wherewith he used to seal his Letters. Valentinian wan it, greatly rejoycing, not so much for the value of the Gem in it, which was of great price, as to have found a passage to his treacherous design. He presently dispatcheth a Gentleman with this Ring, who bare news to the Lady, that her husband sent for her to the Palace to salute the Emperour. This was a very well-coloured pretext. Notwithstanding, it cast most strong apprehensions into the soul of his Lady, who too well knew the deportments of this Prince. But considering this precious pledge of her husband, held for an undoubted earnest-peny of his command; she goeth, and consecrateth all the difficulties, which she conceived, to the obedience towards her Lord. The poor Lady was no sooner arrived, but was ravished, and violated, to satisfie the brutish lust of a man, more drunk with love then wine.

The Palace of a Christian Emperour, which should be a Sanctuary for the chastity of Ladies, is by an act black, and villanous defiled. The chaste Turtle, who would not survive her honour, as soon as she returneth to her lodging, exclameth against her husband with outragious words, thinking he had consented to this disaster. Go (saith she to him) ingratefull, and unnatural man as thou art, to prostitute the honour of thy wife to the brutishness of a Prince, abandoned by God and men: dost thou not yet feel the Executioners of thy conscience, which reproach thee with thy crime? Maximus much amazed at such words, What is the matter, or where have you been, foolish woman? saith he. She shewing the Ring, Dost thou not yet acknowledge thy disloyalty, filly, and perfidious man? behold that; which will accuse thee before God. He, as she began to unfold her self, too soon found his own shame, enjoyneth her to silence, and dissimulation, and hath no vein in him, which tendeth not to vengeance.

Valentinian had a brave and valiant Captain, who supported the whole Empire: this was Aetius, very lately adorned with the spoils of Attila, whom he in a pitch'd battel had vanquished. Maximus thought he must ruinate this pillar to make the whole house to fall, & therein was not deceived. But, being a man full of craft, so dissembleth what was past concerning his wife, as if it had never come to his knowledge, onely he endeavoureth to gain the good opinion of a powerfull Eunuch, named Heraclius, who was the Emperour's instrument, and having already gotten him at his devotion, suggesteth to him in great secret, he had learned from a good hand, that Aetius, Lieutenant General of the Emperour, was much puffed up with the victory he obtained against Attila, & that he on all sides practised confederacies both without the Kingdom, to make himself absolute Master of all: that under the shadow of entertaining the French and Goths in good correspendence with the Empire, he purchased them for his own service with the Emperour's revenues, and that nothing remained for him, but to set the Diadem upon his own head, which quickly he would do, were he not with all speed prevented. Heraclius faileth not roundly to relate all this to his Master, who was already stirred with jealousie towards Aetius, seeing his fortune took so high a flight, that it seemed to mount above wind and tempest. Valentinian, an hair-brain'd Prince, perpetually drunk with lust and choller, without any further inquisition, sendeth for Aetius to the Palace, and with enraged passion, How (saith he) Traitour, Is it thou, who undertakest to bereave me of the Crown? and saying that, taketh out a poinyard which he had in his bosom, and killed him with his own hand. An act both bold and barbarous.

The poor Aetius, who had born the brunt of an Army of seven hundred thousand men, who first confronted a man, that shoke the pillars of all Empires, who returned from the Gauls amply loaden with victorious Palms, one of the most glorious Captains that ever was, at that time shewed at Rome as a prodigie of valour, fell dead as a sacrifice at the feet of his Master, receiving by the just judgment of God that entertainment he before had given to Bonifatius the great Governour of Africk. Valentinian, as if he had acted a Master-piece, went presently to one of the wisest Counsellours to boast thereof, asking of him, if he had not well played his prize. The other replieth: Sacred Majesty, if you had taken an Hatchet with your right hand, and cut off your left arm instead of giving this accursed blow, you had not done so ill. And I believe you too soon will feel the loss you have received. These words were not without effect, for the death of Aetius being presently after divulged, it put the souldiers into fury, who loved him as a brave and valiant Captain, under whose standard they had given so ample testimonies of their worth. Two of the most hardy of them, Ostias, and Transtilas, after they had massacred the Eunuch Heraclius, assailed the person of the Emperour, who was at that time in the field of Mars, and desperately murthered him, it being impossible to free himself from their hand, God permitting this in revenge of the murther lately committed, and so many adulteries, wherewith this miserable Prince, degenerating from the blood of Theodosius, was polluted.

Maximus, who cast the Stone, and afterward withdrew his arm, causing all this tragedy to be acted to his own advantage, after the death of Valentinian, as being moſt eminent, obtained the Empire with little reſiſtance, and his wife, during theſe enterprizes being dead (perhaps through diſcontent for her own diſaſter) ſeeketh the marriage of the Empreſs Eudoxia, wife of Valentinian, and daughter of our Athenais. The poor Princeſs drenched in a deluge of ſorrow for the death of the Emperour her husband, ſhewed in the beginning to be deaf in this motion of marriage: but as the ſpirits of women are mutable, and ſoothed with glory, in few days, forgetting death, ſhe reſolveth to live among the living, and, for accomodation of her affairs, weddeth Maximus. Behold him in a ſhort time in the Throne, and bed of his Maſter, revenging himſelf of one wickedneſs by another much more execrable. But vice in greatneſs hath ever a ſtaggering foot. Maximus was no ſooner entered into the Palace, but his head aked, and the remorſe of conſcience diſtracted him. His moſt truſty friends heard him ſighing ſay, he eſteemed that antient Damocles happy, who was a King but the ſpace of a diner-while; ſo much already was he diſquieted with the Empire, as if he had foreſeen his own cataſtrophe. It chanced one day this unhappy man, familiarly diſcourſing with his new ſpouſe, let a word eſcape him, which coſt him his life: for, to give her a great token of his affection, he confeſſed himſef to have intermedled in the deſign of Valentinian his death, not ſo much for the deſire of the Empire, as of her beauty. Eudoxia was ſtrucken with ſtrang horrour at theſe words, not ſuppoſing her firſt husband had been deprived of life and Sceptre by his practices, and therefore reſolving to be revenged, ſhe covereth her plot with diſſimulation, & bendeth all her powers to content his humor. She ſaw how her mother had been uſed at Conſtantinople, ſo that from thence probably ſhe could expect no ſuccor. The fury of revenge tranſported her to an act very hazardous, which was to call Genſericus King of the Vandals, in ſect an Arian, reigning in Africk, to make a voyage into Italy, which he did with an huge Army, by means whereof he eaſily poſſeſſed himſelf of Rome, where all was in diſorder. And as he came thither, rather led by his unquenchable avarice then any motive of juſtice, or piety, he rifled all that which was rich and excellent, even to the treaſures of the Temple of Jeruſalem, whereof ſome had ſtill been preſerved at Rome, ever ſince Veſpaſian. Maximus, after he had reigned two moneths, is knocked down, and rent like a ſacrifice. He, who in all charges had well thrived with honeſty, when he began to practiſe treachery, found that, which a great Prelate had ſaid in his Hiſtory, That great mens fortunes, like Scorpion, carry their venom in their tails.

to

Wicked revenge of a woman.

Sidon. Apol. lib. 3. Ep. 13. Ut ſcorpius ultimâ parte pereutit.

The Empreſs Eudoxia, who, to ſatisfy her ſeminine Paſſion, had made all this goodly innovation, in the ſight of the great Pope S. Leo, who was ſpectatour of all theſe calamities, mended not her market: for ſhe, with her two daughters, were by this Barbarian carried into Africk, one of which bare her name, and was married to the Son of Genſericus, who afterward poſſeſſed the Sceptre: and the other was Placidia, ſent in the end with her mother to Conſtantinople, after the death of Martianus. Behold terrible accidents.

Converſion of Eudoxia.

Eudoxia our Pilgrime, after recital made to her of all this tragedy, began ſeriouſly to open her eys, and laying her hand juſt upon the wound, acknowledged ſo many diſaſters had befallen her, for that ſhe had ſtrayed from the true faith. Thereupon, to ſettle her wavering ſpirit, ſhe deputeth an Embaſſadour to holy Simeon Stilites, near the City of Antioch.

This Simeon was a prodigie of man, who lived in a body as if he had been but a ſpirit. For figure to your ſelf a Pillar fourty foot high, and on this Pillar ſome little ſhroud fixed there as a Bird's neſt, open, and expoſed on all ſides to the injuries of weather; there this great man, to raiſe his body to God as well as his heart, placed his abode. It was a ſtrong lodging, where he could neither lie nor ſit in any faſhion, but ever ſtood bolt upright, without roof, without coverture, his hair being ſome-what whitened with Snow, and his beard full of Ycicles, ſome time roaſted with the boiling heats of the Sun, and in the midſt of all this he paſſed the days and nights in contemplation, eating but once a week, and that very ſparingly. Stilites.

To this famous Hermit then, who was the Oracle of Chriſtendom, Eudoxia ſendeth Anaſtaſius, a truſty Biſhop, who in much ſecrecy laboured her converſion, to conſult with him upon doubts of faith. Simeon anſwereth in theſe terms:

"Poor Princeſs, the malice of the evil ſpirit, who "ſaw the great treaſures of thy rare virtues, would "needs winnow and ſift thee. Theodoſius the falſe "Monk, a Miniſter of Satan, hath corrupted thy "fair and glorious ſoul. But courage, my daughter, "thou ſhalt die in the faith, conſult no more with "me, thou ſeekeſt waters far off, having the Foun"tain near at hand. It behoveth to addreſs thee to "Euthymius, who will ſerve as thy directour in an "happy way.

This anſwer being related to Eudoxia, ſhe cauſed this Euthymius to be ſought out on all ſides, who ſhould undertake this buſineſs. He was a venerable Hermit, having become hoary in the exerciſe of a long penance, and one who was hard to be found out, ſo much he avoided light and the converſation of men. Notwithſtanding God permitted him to be found, and brought, as it were by force, to the place where the good Empreſs was. She ſeeing this bleſſed old man, proſtrated herſelf at his feet, ſaying: "Fa"ther, I have lived long enough, ſince I have the ho"nour to behold you, it is from your hand I expect "the remedie of all my evils. The holy man raiſing "her with much ſweetneſs, Daughter (ſaith he) the "evil ſpirit hath too much abuſed your credulity: "it is time you open your eys to ſee the ſcourges "of God. All your ills have proceeded of nothing "but Infidelity. And if now you deſire to be cured, "there is but one word: ſtand no longer upon diſputation, but follow the Councels of Nice and "Conſtantinople. Behold the rule of your faith, which "you ſhall learn of John Biſhop of Jeruſalem.

Euthymius, after he had thus ſpoken to her, returned to his Cell, and ſhe goeth directly to the Temple of Jeruſalem, attended by an infinite number of Religious, lifting their hands to Heaven in thanksgiving for this converſion. She abjureth the hereſie of Eutyches, between the hands of the Biſhop, and abſolutely reconcileth her ſelf to the Catholick Church, with ſo much fervour and zeal, that ſhe ceaſed not all the reſt of her days to extirpate impiety, and amplifie the Church in all parts of the Eaſt where her power extended.

Worthy life, and glorious death of Eudoxia.

The good Empreſs then led a life wholy celeſtial, her ſoul being purged in the Furnace of painful tribulation, afterward purified more and more in the love of God, held not of the body but by a ſlender thread. Her heart was an incenſe, daily diſſolved into the flames of her charity, ſending to Heaven its fragrant exhalations. Her two eys were the Conduits, by which penance with a powerful expreſſion diſtilled tears, which are as the nectar of the love of God;

God, her hands like those of the Spouse, true globes of gold, repleniſh'd with an ocean of bounty, poured through the Cities, and deſerts of Paleſtine. In every place nothing was to be ſeen but Churches and Hoſpitals, but houſes for the poor built at her coſt; ſo that an Authour named Cyrillus, who lived in her time, aſſureth us, it was a thing impoſſible to number them, God being willing to diſpoſe her paſſage out of this life by the exerciſe of ſo many good works. And being upon the confines of her laſt year, ſhe went to viſit a magnificent Church of St. Peter, which ſhe had founded, and one day repoſing near to a Ceſtern, where ſhe laboured for the good of the ſaid Church, ſhe began to caſt her eys upon a great number of Monaſteries, all near one to another, which were in the charge of her good father Euthymius, then fetching a deep affectionate ſigh, ſhe ſpake theſe words of the 24. Numeri: O Jacob, how fair are thy pavillions! O Iſrael, how excellent thy tabernacles! Then turning her ſelf to a Gentleman of her train, "Go (ſaith ſhe) ſeek out Euthymius, and "intreat him to do me the honor, that I once again "may ſpeak to him. If he ſhall ſay, he ſpeaketh not "with women, tell him I no longer know what ſex "is, and that I converſe onely with Angels. Euthymius in his Cell had by revelation, that this Saint ſhould quickly paſs to a better life, and he came directly to bring her the news thereof. The Empreſs ſaluted him very courteouſly, and diſpoſed her heart to ſpeak to him touching a certain ſumm of money, ſhe deſired to give for the entertainment of his Monks: but the good man divining the thoughts of her heart, ſaith to her: "Madam, trouble not "your ſelf for this money, there are other affairs "which more concern you: know, you very ſhortly muſt depart out of this world, and now you "ought to have but one care, which is to entertain "your ſoul in that ſtate you deſire it ſhould part "out of this life. Eudoxia at the firſt was amazed at this diſcourſe. It ſeemeth ſouls (as Plato ſaith) go not but with grief out of fair bodies, but this was too much diſengaged to do in the end of thoſe days any unreſigned act. After ſhe had a long time talked to Euthymius, as one would with Angels, ſhe gave him the laſt adieu, full of hope to ſee him at the Rendez-vous of all good men. Returning into Jeruſalem, ſhe had no other care, but to ſet a ſeal upon all her good works, then diſtributing whatſoever ſhe had to the poor, ſhe expected the ſtroke of death freely, and reſignedly: her ſoul was taken out of her body throughly ripened for Heaven, as fruit which onely expects the hand of the Maſter to gather it. She was about threeſcore years of age, having ſurvived Theodoſius her husband, and Pulcheria, Flaccilla, Marina, Arcadia; for all of them went before her into the other world: ſhe was married at twenty years of age, ſhe ſpent twenty nine in Court, and as it were eleven in Jeruſalem: ſhe deceaſed in the year of our Lord 459. the one and twentieth year of Pope Leo, and the fourth of the Emperour Leo, Succeſſour of Martianus. A woman very miraculous among women, who ſeemeth ſo much to have tranſcended the ordinary of her ſex, as men ſurpaſs Beaſts. More then an Age is required, ere Nature can produce ſuch creatures. They are born as the Phenix, from five hundred to five hundred years, yea, much more rare. A great beauty, great wit, great fortune, a great virtue, great combats, great victories; to be born in a poor cottage, as a Snail in his ſhell, and iſſue out to ſhew it ſelf upon the Throne of an Empire, and die in an hermitage! all is great, all is admirable in this Princeſs: but nothing more great, nothing more admirable, then to behold a golden veſſel, with ſails of linen, and cordage of ſilk, counterbuffed by ſo many ſtorms, overwhelmed, and even accounted as loſt, in the end happily to arrive at the haven. Behold her Portraicture and Elogie.

Numb. 24. Quàm pulchra ſunt tentoria tua, O Jacob habitationes tua, O Iſrael!

EUDOXIA

EUDOXIA AUGUSTA, THEODOSII JUNIORIS CONJUX, EX HUMILI FORTUNA IN MAGNUM IMPERIUM TRANSCRIPTA SCEPTRUM VIRTUTIBUS SUPERAVIT, COELESTIS INSTAR PRODIGII FOEMINA, INGENIO, FORMA, VITA, SCRIPTIS, ET RELIGIONE CLARISSIMA: CUM VICENIS NUPTA ANNOS XXIX. EGISSET IN IMPERIO, ET UNDECIM FERME IN PALÆSTINA, HIEROSOLYMIS RELIGIOSISSIMO EXITU VITAM CLAUSIT ANNO CHRISTI CDLX, ÆTATIS LIX.

Upon the PICTURE of EUDOXIA.

Fortun'd unparallel'd, Beauty her own,
A ſpirit that admits no Paragon.
Divine, immenſe, although it ſeem to be,
'Twas but the Temple of the Deity.

HER example drew an infinite number of great Ladies, to contempt of pleaſures and vanities of Court, to ſeek the Temple of repoſe in the deſerts of the Holy Land. Among others, Queen Eudoxia her Grand-childe, who, as we have ſaid, was married into Africk, treading the world under foot with a generous reſolution, came with her Crown to do homage at the Tomb of her Grand-mother, kiſſed her aſhes, as of an holy Empreſs, and was ſo raviſhed with the many monuments of Virtue ſhe had erected in the Holy Land, that there ſhe would paſs the reſidue of her days, and chooſe her Tomb at the foot of that from whence ſhe derived her blood, and name.

It is a great loſs to us, that the learned books written by this Royal hand have been ſcattered; for thoſe varieties of Homer, which are extant, are not Eudoxia's. Photius, much more ſubtile then Zonaras, to judge of the works of antiquity, maketh no mention thereof in the recital of the writings of this divine ſpirit, but of her Octoteuch, which he witneſſeth to be a worthy, heroick, aad admirable Piece. Behold that which is moſt remarkable in the Court of Theodoſius.

And verily for as much as concerneth the perſon of the Emperour, he did enough to make himſelf a Saint, by living ſo mortified in his paſſions, in the delights of a flouriſhing Court. It is a meer brutiſhneſs, a very plague of man's ſoul, to make no account of Princes, but of certain braggards, vain, brain-ſick, and turbulent ſpirits, who fill Hiſtories with vain-glorious bravadoes, whoredoms, murthers, and treacheries: theſe are they of whom the ſpirit of fleſh (an enemy of God) proclaimeth falſe praiſes, and ſuch an one ſeemeth to himſelf ſufficiently great, when there appeareth a power in him to do ill. A calm ſpirit, united, docible, temperate, though he have not ſo many gifts of nature, is a thouſand times to be preferred before theſe vain-glorious and audacious, who are only wiſe in their own opinion, valiant in raſhneſs, happy in vice, and great in the imagination of fools. It is good to have the Piety of Theodoſius, and to ſet over-much facility work in praying, and pray in working: to have the beak and plumage of an Eagle, and the mildneſs of a Dove; to lay the Hide of a Lion at the feet of the Statue of Piety.

As for Pulcheria, ſhe was the mirrour of perfection among the great Princeſſes of the earth, yet not without her ſpots, but ſtill giving water to waſh them away. And for Eudoxia, you finde in her what to take, what to leave, many things to imitate, few to reject, but an infinite number to admire. Behold in the end the Fortunate Piety, which I have ſet before your eys as a golden Statue, not only to behold it in paſſing by, but to gild your manners with the rays, and adorn your greatneſs with the glory thereof.

Who will not admire the proſperity of the Empire of Conſtantinople, in the manage of Theodoſius, of Pulcheria, of Martianus, under the rule of piety, and not ſay, Behold the world, which trembleth in all the parts thereof under the prodigious armies of Barbarians, who ſeemed deſirous to rend the earth, and wholly carry it away in fire, and blood from the centre? Behold the Roman Empire, which hath troden under foot all Sceptres and Crowns of the earth, ruined, diſ-membered, torn in a thouſand pieces, in the hands of a vitious Emperour, who buried it under the ſhivers of his Sceptre: and behold, on the other ſide, God, who preſerveth his Theodoſius, his Pulcheria, his Martianus, among theſe formidable inundations, which caſt all the world into a deluge, as heretofore he did Noe in the revengeful waters, which poured down from Heaven to drown the impurities of the earth. What Nurſe was ever ſo careful to drive a fly from the face of her little Infant while it ſlept, as the Providence of God ſhewed it ſelf affectionate in the conſervation of theſe elevated Souls?

Obſerve the perſons preciſely, and conſider each in particular. What happineſs in the Empreſs Eudoxia, whileſt ſhe laboureth for the glory of Altars: God gave the heart of her husband into her hands, the World in honour at her feet, and a little Theodoſius by her ſide, who in his infancy maketh all the hopes of his Mother to bud. But as ſoon as this poor Princeſs, forgetting her duty and ſelf, contended with S. John Chryſoſtom, behold her cut down with the Sithe of death, carried away in her flowre, deprived of the contentment and glory which ſhe poſſeſſed. Behold ſhe received a breach in her reputation, which cannot in the memory of all ages be repaired. Her bones are in horrour and dread, till ſuch time as S. Chryſoſtom, baniſhed by her commandment, and returning dead to Conſtantinople, came to ſerve as an Anchor for the floating aſhes of this unfortunate Empreſs.

Conſider this little Theodoſius, who even at his birth maketh the Idols to fall, the Pagan Temples to ſinck, and Hell to houl under his feet. What glory was it to bury the remainders of Idolatry, what a Trophey to extirpate under his Reign ſo many Monſters of Hereſies? What celeſtial comfort, to ſee in his time ſo many learned writings to be laid at his feet? to ſee ſo many worthy men flouriſh, ſo many Saints; as Leos, Cyrils, Chryſoſtoms, Simeons Stilites? to ſee the Church all garniſhed with ſtars and lights? to ſway a Sceptre more then fourty years in a peaceful Kingdom, among ſo many tempeſts? and, which is more, to fall into ſome defects by ſudden ſurprizal, and expiate them by a happy repentance? to ſee himſelf drawn by a powerful hand from the brink of a Precipice, and in the end to yield up his ſoul in the midſt of Palms and good odours of a glorious life? See you not a Fortunate Piety.

Behold Pulcheria, as an Eagle on the top of a Py-ramide, which ever hath her eie on the Sun, and ſeeth all ſtorms broken and confounded under her feet. Was there ever a more Fortunate Piety? To ſay, that a Maid at fifteen years of age, ſwaying Emperours, and Empires, enchaining all hearts of the world, to make her ſelf on earth a Crown, might boaſt to have had the Univerſal Church for trumpet of her praiſes, and from the government on Earth, to mount to Heaven by ſo happy death, born as on a Chariot of Liberality, and Magnificence! Where may one more manifeſtly ſee the happineſs of true and ſolid piety?

Behold Athenais, a ſilly Maid, who had not ſo much as a poor Cottage for ſhelter, as ſoon as ſhe embraceth Piety, and offereth the faculties of her Soul to the honour of Altars; behold her raiſed upon the Throne of the prime Empire of the world: afterward, as ſhe came a little to forget God, he ſent her a very ſharp affliction, but as ſoon as ſhe hath again recourſe to the arms of Devotion, the cloud of calumny caſt on her forehead diſſevereth, the ſtorm paſſeth away, and her face all glittereth in glory; and, which is moſt admirable, God layeth hold of her even in the gulph of errour, whereinto a wicked hypocrite had caſt her, re-conducteth her to Altars, receiveth her ſoul in peace, and cauſeth her to reign both in her ſelf and blood in all the three parts of the world: for ſhe held in perſon the Sceptre of Aſia, her daughter Eudoxia was married to the Emperour of Rome, the Capital City of Europe, and her Grand-childe was Queen of Africk, miraculouſly finding a Kingdom in her own captivity. Is not this a Fortunate Piety?

Add alſo hereunto Martianus, a poor Peaſant, who now had his neck under the Sword of the Executioner, falſly accuſed of a crime, whereof he was innocent; and God taketh him by one hair of the head, delivereth him from ſhame and peril, marvellouſly guiding him to the government of a great Empire, giveth him innumerable proſperities, and indeed maketh him another Conſtantine. Ought not impiety to burſt with rage, and confeſs, that happineſs, greatneſs, benedictions, and favours of Heaven are for piety?

Here it may be, you will alſo have ſome remembrance of the Court of Herod, where you have ſeen the poor Mariamne in virtue ſo ill-entreated, and will think that piety in this creature was unfortunate. But if this thought occur, would it not condemn all the Martyrs, and all the Saints, whoſe lives notwithſtanding we ought to judge moſt happy, ſince that vanquiſhing the petty misfortunes of the world, ſhe hath fallen into the boſom of felicity? Tell me, one hour of life in patience and tranquillity of ſoul, which this good Queen had among ſo many ſtrange accidents, is it not more worth then the thirty ſeven years of her husband, all clouded with crimes, diſturbances, and fury? Tell me, is it not a happineſs and an incomparable glory, that God would partake in perſecutions with this good Princeſs, ſuffering himſelf by this ſelf-ſame man to be purſued, who had been the hammer of all her afflictions? Is it nothing to die in the Amphitheatre of Patience, in the Theatre of Honour by the ſame Sword, which was afterward unſheathed againſt Jeſus Chriſt? Is it nothing to give up the life of a Piſmire in exchange of an immortal glory on earth, and an happy repoſe in Heaven.

And if you beſides deſire to ſee her fortunate piety according to the world, is it not a blow from Heaven, to ſay, That all the race of Herod iſſued from his other wives was unlucky, miſerable, execrable, deprived of their Father's Sceptre, chaſed away, exiled, ſcourged with whips from Heaven, and the Grand-children of Mariamne, remained laſt in royal Thrones? Tigranes her Grand-childe deſcended from Alexander, was King of Armenia, crowned by the hands of the Roman Emperours. Agrippa the Great, iſſued from Ariſtobulus, who having been fettered with an iron chain, through the cruelty of Tiberius, was ſent back to his Kingdom by Caius Cæſar, and honoured with a golden chain of like weight, with the ſame of iron, wherewith he had been fettered.

Agrippa the youngeſt, under whom S. Paul pleaded his cauſe, was preſerved from the horrible ſack of Jeruſalem, as Lot from the flames of Sodom, and reigned in Tyberiade, and Juliade, even to decrepit age.

Berenice, Grand-childe of Mariamne, was extremely courted by the Emperour Titus, entituled The world's Darling. Another called Druſilla, was married to Felix Governour of Judea, of whom is ſpoken in the Acts, God likewiſe recompenſing the virtue of the Mother in the Children by ſome temporal favours: and all thoſe, who diſpoſed themſelves to virtue, were fortunate, to make it appear by evident teſtimonies, that unhappineſs ariſeth from nothing but impiety.

Theſe two Courts, the Hiſtories of which we have here repreſented, in my opinion ſufficiently ſhew the unhappineſs of impiety, and fortunate ſucceſs in the lives of Great-ones, when they are guided according to the Laws of Heaven.

If I hereafter ſhall continue this work, I will unfold, according to the ſucceſſion of Ages, the Elogies of great men, who in the practice of the world flouriſhed in all piety, to caſt confuſion upon the foreheads of ſuch, who, being heirs of their blood and fortunes, alienate themſelves ſo far from their merit. Yet cannot I abſolutely promiſe any thing: firſt, Becauſe the exerciſe of preaching and other miniſteries, afford me little leiſure to write; and although I might have ſome time for this purpoſe, yet have I ſome other labours upon the holy Scripture of a longer task, which would require their ſeaſon. Secondly, I ſee many worthy men, who much more ably can perform it, then my ſelf; my Talent is ſmall, and my Pen is ſlow, it can haſten nothing, I muſt ponder my works before I publiſh them, though very imperfect. They ever ſeem to me too ſoon to take flight and light: I would, as it were, perpetually hold them by the wings. Briefly, it is no ſmall labour to finde ſo many Saints in Courts. You know the Philoſopher, who ſearched for men with a Candle at Noon-tide, and had much ado to finde any: how much more difficult think you is it to meet with Saints, eſpecially in the decrepitneſs of this age, wherein there is little vigour, and many maladies? If you require books of me, I ſay, give me Saints, although verily I rather ſhould endeavour to engrave ſanctity in my manners, then writings. The time will come when books ſhall be gnawn by Moths on Earth, and works in Heaven eſteemed.

LAUS DEO.

THE HOLY COURT.

THE SECOND TOME.

Treating of the
- PRELATE.
- SOULDIER.
- STATES-MAN.
- LADY.

Written in FRENCH by NICHOLAS CAUSIN, of the S. of JESUS.

Tranſlated into Engliſh by S^r. T. H.

LONDON,
Printed, Anno Domini M DC LXIII.

To the RIGHT HONOURABLE

EDWARD D'SACKVILE,

Earl of DORSET, Baron of BUCKHURST, Lord Chamberlain to the Queen's Majeſtie, Knight of the Noble Order of the Garter, and of his Majeſties moſt Honourable PRIVIE COUNCEL.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

THE eminent, and well deſerved place, your Honour holds in the Court of her Majeſty, to whoſe gracious favour the firſt part of my Work was heretofore humbly conſecrated, emboldens me in the adventure of this preſent addreſs to your Honour; nor ſhall there, I hope, any notable diſproportion appear to the eys of the judicious, that I thus purpoſely ſelect your Honour to wait on her HIGHNESS in a printed Dedication, who at Court in ſo near a degree daily attend on her Sacred perſon.

The great and general applauſe, with which France hath entertained the whole Work in the original, gave encouragement to my pen to continue that firſt labour in the tranſlation of this Second piece. Here may be ſeen the Court of a great and glorious Prince ſtanding conſpicuous to all eys, like a goodly Fabrick raiſed on four fundamental columns; two of which, the Souldier and the States-man, may not improperly ſeem to reflect on your Honour.

The firſt, when in the fair occaſions of his Majeſties fit employments, his juſt reaſon ſhall at any time call you forth into action: the ſecond, in the preſent and frequent uſe he hath of your well matured counſels: both which, by maſculine courage and ſober wiſdom, aptly perſonated in Conſtantine and Boetius, are here preſented to the life, as ſtrong patterns for imitation. It is your honours patronage, that thus brings them with the reſt into the fruition of Engliſh air, and me by this opportunity, into the grateful acknowledgment of many favours received from your Honour, which ſince I cannot make known by more real demonſtrations, I offer this poor endeavour to ſupply the plentiful deſires of him, who reſolves to perſiſt,

The humble devoted ſervant of your Honour,

T. H.

TO THE WISDOM of GOD INCARNATE.

ETernal WISDOM, Supream INTELLIGENCE, behold me proſtrate before the Abyſs of your great and Divine lights, to offer up the homage of my perſon and book, acknowledging the nothing both of the one and other; and proteſting to have neither ſpirit nor pen, which is not of You and for You, who are the ſource of good thoughts, and accompliſhment of all praiſe-worthy diſcourſes.

The Deſign and Order of this Book.

WE have, to ſpeak properly, but two great Books, Heaven and the Bible, which ſhall never periſh: The reſt bear ſome ſway, and have ſome laſting among men, yet in concluſion we finde their ends; but the moſt part of thoſe which are written in theſe days, fall into the world as drops of Rain into the Sea, of which the Ocean neither feeleth the approach nor departure. I expoſed my firſt Tome of the HOLY COURT, amidſt ſuch a throng of Writers, as it were with this conceit, thinking I carried a little dew into a great River, and that when I had ſpoken ſome truths, as it were paſſing along, I ſhould in my birth, bury my ſelf in the Tomb of ſo many Volumns; which is excuſable by the law of neceſſity, and honourable for the multitude and quality of thoſe, which are there to be found.

Notwithſtanding I ſee that God, who guideth our lives and pens, hath been pleaſed this work ſhould gain ſome eſtimation, and that, as it hath exceeded the merits of its Authour, ſo hath it ſurmounted his hope, expoſing it ſelf with ſome fruit and comfort, by an endeavour which I ſhall never think ill employed.

This hath again put the pen into my hand, to continue what I had begun, whereunto ſuch Honourable perſonages have perſwaded me, with motives ſo reaſonable, that having ſmall ability to undertake a ſecond labour, I had likewiſe leſs power to refuſe it.

Such as complain, my pen hath not ſoon enough ſatisfied their deſires, muſt remember, that though tardineſs be a mother ſomewhat unpleaſing, yet are not the children therefore deformed. The production of good Books ſhould not reſemble that of certain Birds, which according to the ſaying of an Antient, iſſue from their mothers before they are born; but we muſt a long time form and foment them in our minds, that they may appear in publick: for it is a very poor buſineſs, by precipitation to be able to hope no other thing, but through haſte to fail, that you may repent at leiſure. I rather fear the reproach of raſhneſs then delay, becauſe in this mortal ſtate wherein we live, all our perfecteſt actions are no other then groſs eſſays of perfection. Sympſius.

This may be ſpoken without extenuating the worth of ſome celeſtial wits, who make expedition, and goodneſs walk hand in hand; it being abſurd, that thoſe who are unable to imitate them, ſhould boaſt infirmities oppoſite to their abilities. For my part, I content my ſelf to afford good liking and admiration to the Works of others, reſerving nothing elſe but labour for mine own. And although, notwithſtanding my endeavour, I never finde ſufficient ſatisfaction in this Book, to pleaſe thoſe Readers whom I have found ſo propitious, yet doubt not but I have in ſome ſort anſwered their deſires.

For in this ſecond Volumn I treat of the Courts of Conſtantine the Great, the two Valentinians, Gratian, Theodoſius the Elder, Theodorick in Boetius his cauſe, Clodoveus, Clotilda, Levigildus, Hermingildus, and Indegondis, in ſuch ſort, that I have ſelected the principal ſanctities of Great-ones in the firſt ſix Ages of Chriſtianity, which will not be ſleightly valued by thoſe, who better love to finiſh a Work then unboundedly diſtend it.

Moreover alſo, to be better then my promiſe, in my firſt Volumn having taken the Court in general, I here deſcend into particulars; and there being four ſorts of perſons, which compoſe the life of Great-ones, that is to ſay, the Prelate, the Souldier, the States-man, and the Court-Ladie, I have made a brief Table of the conditions neceſſary in every ſtate, couched in four Diſcourſes, purſued with as many Books of Hiſtories, which contain excellent Models of virtues, proper to all orders and ſtates of life, in perſons moſt eminent.

I can aſſure my Reader, theſe Summaries of Precepts, which I have ſo contracted in ſo few words (it being in my power to enlarge them in divers Volumns) are not unprofitable; and the Hiſtories are ſo choſen, that beſides their majeſty, which unfoldeth the goodlieſt affairs and paſſages of Empires in the beginning of their Chriſtianity, they have alſo a certain ſweetneſs, which ſolid ſpirits ſhall finde as much to tranſcend fables and modern eloquence, as the ſatisfaction of truth ſurpaſſeth the illuſions of Sorcerers.

You ſhall perpetually therein obſerve a large Theatre of the Divine providence, wherein, God himſelf knoweth, I have no other aim, but to digniſie Virtue, and depreſs Vice, without any reflection upon the perſons of theſe times, no more then if I wrote in the Reign of Charlemain or Saint Lewis. I heartily entreat all thoſe ſpirits of application, who cannot hold their noſe over a piece of work, unleſs they finde it to ſuit with their own fantaſies, imagining that all literature is the eccho of their own thoughts, that if they have any Commentary to produce, they would rather make gloſſes upon their own dreams, then my Books. We are not as yet, God be thanked, in ſo miſerable an Age, that we dare not offer ſacrifice to truth without a diſguiſe, ſince it is the glory of Great-ones, openly to wage War againſt Vices, as their greateſt Enemies.

For to ſpeak truly, after I had preſented my Firſt Tome at the feet of the ſacred perſon of our great King, I likewiſe conſidered in his Court rich and reſplendent lights, in all orders, which might ſerve as Models for my Treatiſes,: but to avoid affectation of all worldly complacence, I have purpoſely declined it; my nature and habit having already ſo alienated me from all worldly pretences, that it would prove painful to me to court any man, if he had not Heaven and the Stars to give me for reward.

For

For ſo much as concerneth the form of writing, obſerved by me in this Second Volumn, I will truly confeſs to my Reader, that I have therein proceeded, rather guided by my proper Genius, then art, or cunning. And although I heretofore have been curious enough to read and obſerve all, what ever Greek or Roman eloquence hath produced of worth, yet I confeſs there is a certain ray of God, which encountering with our ſpirit, and mixing with nature, is more knowing then all precepts; and I may affirm this for the inſtruction of Youth, which hath asked my opinion concerning the qualities and conditions of ſtile. True it is, I have handled many books, written in all Ages, and have found the wiſeſt of them to be elevated in conceits and words, above the ordinary ſtrain, but always free from affectation. Others are ſo paſſionately enamoured of certain petty Courtſhips of language (which are capital enemies of perſwaſion, and which we moſt eſpecially ought to avoid in diſcourſes of Piety, the nerves whereof they weaken, and blemiſh the luſtre, ſince even thoſe who ſpeak to us out of Chairs, by word or writing, although in terms deſcreetly modeſt, make the leſs impreſſions on our hearts) and many times ſo ſeek after their own reputations, as they forget how much they are engaged to truth. We ſee ſome, who through over-much wit ſearch out ſtrange ways, conceptions different from common underſtanding, words extravagant, and in all things ſo vehemently adore their own imaginations, that they cannot endure any but themſelves in paper (which is the cauſe they very ſeldom meet with the habit of humane underſtanding, as being true Citizens of Plato's Common-wealth) of ability to controle all, and to do nothing. Some glory in barreneſs, and would willingly be diſpleaſed with God, that he hath more plentifully ſown Stars in ſome parts of the Heaven then in others: they can brook nothing that is generous, without ſnarling at it, and taxing it, ſuppoſing beauties and ſplendours are defects, becauſe they ſurpaſs their capacities. Finally, there are ſome, who ſo furniſh themſelves, with the worth of others ceaſeleſs allegations, that they frame diſcourſes like to thoſe Helenas all of gold, where we can finde nothing but Drapery; not being able to diſtinguiſh the hand from the foot, nor the eye from the face. I enter not into the conſideration of our times, having learned rather to regard the Works of the meaneſt Writers then cenſure them. But, to ſpeak ſincerely, I never thought it fit to adviſe or purſue ſuch courſes: and as in this Work I have not wholly declined Learning, nor ornament of Language, which I ſuppoſed apt for the purpoſe, endeavouring many times to enchaſe them with ſeemly accommodation; ſo have I been unwilling to repleniſh my leaves with Authours and Foreign tongues, this being undertaken rather to perſwade virtue among men eminent, then to fill the common places of young Students.

I likewiſe have ſo intermingled my ſtyle, that not deſcending into a petty language of complement, which had been below my ſubject, I thought to make it intelligible, yea even unto thoſe who make no profeſſion of arts or ſtudy. My onely aim is to ſpeak, and to be underſtood, perſwaded thereunto by the ſaying of Philo, that Speech and Thought are two ſiſters, the youngeſt whereof is created, that the eldeſt may be known. I have more laboured upon the weight of ſentences then ornaments of words, not at all pretending to the honour of earthly pens, which we daily behold to grow in ſo many Authours of this Age, who would be much more abſolute, did they apply themſelves to graver ſubjects, and in ſome ſort imitate the Sun, who affording admiration to the world, hath none himſelf.

Notwithſtanding it often happeneth, not with the moſt eminent Writers, who ordinarily are endowed with much modeſty, but certain extremely profane wits, to idolatrize their own inventions, to condemn all treatiſes of worth and value; that it is impoſſible to be eloquent in our language, but in the expreſſion of vanities and impurities. Truly, if queſtion were made to judg of French eloquence, the riches of Babylon are not ſo exquiſite, as to be compared with the beauties of Sion.

Whileſt there are letters and men, there ſhall ever be praiſes for the excellent Books, which come from the pens of ſo many worthy Prelates, and other perſons of quality; yea, even from the Laity, who have exerciſed their ſtyle upon arguments, Chaſte, Honourable, and well-worthy of all recommendation. I ſpeak this as it were by the way, having at this time no purpoſe to enlarge upon recital of an infinite number of able men, who ſtand ready with pen in hand; nor likewiſe to commend thoſe of my habit, who have expoſed their excellent labours to publick view, and which I know might be well waited on by a large number of choice wits of the ſame Society.

But for as much as concerneth my ſelf, I have already diſcharged my promiſe, and doubt not, but that in theſe four Models, I have ſufficiently comprized the whole ſcope of my deſign. For the reſt, I think the Books of devotion that are publiſhed, ought to be rare and extraordinarily well digeſted: becauſe ſuch is the quantity of them, that the number of Authours will quickly exceed the proportion of Readers. Diſtaſt is a worm, which ſticketh on the moſt reſplendent beauties; and although a thing may be excellent, we muſt not therefore glut any man with ſuperfluity, leſt good offices turn into contempt, and charity make it ſelf tireſom. Yet ſo it is, that we muſt confeſs, pieces well ſelected and curiouſly handled can never ſo ſuperabound in number, as to offend thoſe, who can diſtinguiſh of merit.

For if it be true, as I have heard, that there are many good and learned Religious men of divers Orders, who prepare themſelves to write upon this ſame ſubject, I am very glad, and proteſt it ſhall be acceptable to me, becauſe ſo they may perfect what I have begun, with more profit then my ſelf.

Note here the cauſe why I ſtay my pen, and if there be ought good in this Volumn, I look upon it as that Mirrour, which was fixed on the wall of the Arcadian Temple, where thoſe who beheld themſelves, ſaw in ſtead of their faces, the repreſentation of the Divinity they adored. So in all this, which here may profit my Reader, I ſee nothing of mine own, but in it acknowledg the Father of Light, who is the ſource and end of all, which is in us eſteemed laudable, and whom I humbly beſeech, if there be any thing attractive in this Diſcourſe, he would be pleaſed to draw it upward, as the Adamant, tranſporting ſuch as ſhall read it to the love of their CREATOUR, to whom is due the tribute of all honour, as to Him who is the beginning of all perfections. This is the onely comfort of our labour: for, not to diſſemble a truth, he that more regardeth to write then to live, courting his pen, and neglecting his own conſcience, ſhall always have trouble enough to defend himſelf from Moths, Rats, and Oblivion. And though he ſhould be laden with the applauſes of the whole world, in a paſſionate life, it were but to gain a ſilly ſacrifice of ſmoak without him, to harbour fire and tempeſts within his own houſe.

It is ſaid, the Stars by contribution of their rays, ſtrengthen the activity of Hell-fire; and I may ſay, all the lights of underſtanding and reputation will ſerve but to encreaſe the torments of a reprobate ſoul, who ſhuts his eys againſt God, not to open them to other object then vanity.

Pauſan. in Arcadicis.

Centrum terra validius accenditur, ex limpiditate flamma cæleſtis. Vienna ex Ptolomæi Almageſto.

TO

TO THE NOBILITY,

Dedicated to the CHURCH.

SRIS,

THe Benefits you have received from God, and Examples the Weal-publick expecteth from you, are so essential obligations of duty, that when we speak of the Piety of Great-ones, you instantly are selected out to hold the first rank therein, and to be the cause, that Virtues, which ever are voluntary, may turn, as it were, into title of necessity. For, to joyn the Clergy to Nobility, is to connect two things together, which are both in Nature, and the Gospel, very eminent. It is to profess one's self an honest man by Birth, and Dignity, to stand on a Pinnacle, and serve as a Torch, to change your Word into Law, and Life into Example.

The Bishops of all Ages have been esteemed amongst men, as the Stars in the Firmament, whereof the Prophet Daniel speaketh; as the Senatours of Heaven, the Fathers of the Common-wealth, the Interpreters of God, the Mediatours of the Marriage contracted between the Lamb and the heavenly Jerusalem. Daniel 12. 3. Dionys. ἀφιερωσαι, De Ecclesiastica Hierarchia.

This is the cause why we ever think it is to desire a good work, to desire a Bishoprick, taking the words of the Apostle in a sense, which flattereth sensuality, informeth not the Conscience: but now, that the passage to Offices, and secular Dignities, is closed up from many with bars of Gold and Silver, whom birth seemeth to invite thereunto; they hope to repair themselves on the spoils of the Church, where such as proceed by sensual and worldly ways, often-times finde poyson and death hidden under a seeming sweetness.

For, Sirs, we must tell you, your Dignities, how eminent soever they be, are like the roof of the Temple in Jerusalem, which had Flowers among gilded Prickles; in my opinion to teach Bishops, that Mitres bordered with gold, and diversified with stones, have notwithstanding their points and prickings. Villalpandus upon Ezechiel, out of Josephus de bello Judaico lib. 6. c. 6.

Had we as many eys open towards Heaven, as Heaven openeth to behold here below the most secret actions of men, we should be strucken with horrour to see an Ecclesiastical Dignity fall to the lot of a depraved Soul, which changeth all the abilities thereof to incentives for sin, and to make of his proper honours the true snares of his Soul.

But it is a common disaster, that the smoak, which in the book of Toby driveth away the Devils, doth here daily surprise men. We stick on apparences, and if we retain some Maxims of Verity, we use them as Letters written with the juice of a Lemon, which can hardly be read but by the help of fire.

So, that when the day of Judgment shall manifest it self by fire, and, that at the departure of the Soul, flames shall be presented to enlighten it, even to the bottom of the Conscience, then shall it be, when all the knowledge of virtue, which we here on earth retain so poor and languishing, shall appear with enflamed characters for our condemnation. Hermanus Hugo de prima scribendi origine.

It is an admirable thing, which the good Cardinal Hugo, who flourished about four hundred years ago, as he lay on his death-bed, where, with much advantage the vanities of the world are discovered, and, when perhaps some too indiscreetly flattered him upon the splendour of his dignity, spake in the voice of an Oracle; Take away these vanities; for I protest, if it were to do again, I had rather die in a Monastery covered with leprosie, then with the scarlet Robe of a Cardinal. The life of Hugo.

Yet notwithstanding this man had been so little idle, that besides the Concordances of the Bible, which he composed, and the Commentaries he made upon the whole Corps of holy Scripture, he so courageously employed himself in the exercise of good works, that being drawn out of the excellent Order of S. Dominick, he retained all his former virtues, which found no change in him, but that they added to their native beauty the lustre of authority. I speak this, not to inform Prelates, from whom I should receive instruction, but to represent to so many of the young Nobility, as we now daily behold advanced to Ecclesiastical charges, the peril there is in Prelacies, which are not guided by the paths of a good Conscience.

It is a monstrous thing (said holy S. Bernard) to hold the higheſt place, and have the loweſt Courage, the firſt Chair, and the laſt Life, a Tongue magnificent, and an Hand ſlothful; much noiſe about you, and little fruit, the countenance grave, and actions light; great authority, and no more conſtancy then a Weather-cock. It were a better ſight to behold an Ape on the houſe-top, and ſmoak in a Candle-ſtick, then a man dignified without merit. Bern. de conſid. lib. 1. cap. 7.

On the contrary part, when Science and Virtue agree with Nobility, to make up a good Church-man, it is so glorious a spectacle, that it may be said, God, to produce it on earth, hath taken a pattern from himself in Heaven. I wish no more faithful witnesses then this Prelate, which I shall present unto you in this first Treatise, after I have made a brief Summary of Precepts, which I have purposely comprised in very few Pages, to render them the readier for the understanding; well knowing, there are store of Books largely enough dilating on this Subject, the length of which I have avoided to attend the matter.

I wish it may have an effect in your hearts worthy of your courage, that honouring your Dignity for Virtue, Virtue may enoble you with Titles of true Glory.

THE

THE HOLY COURT.

SECOND TOME.

THE PRELATE.

The First SECTION.

That it is convenient the Nobility ſhould govern the Church.

Æterhitas mundi ex obedientiâ ad intelligentiam matricem. Apud. Matthiam de Vienna, qui liber impreſſus anno 1462.

I Begin by the Altar to meaſure the Temple of the Holy Court, and ſet a Prelate before your eys, who bare Nobility into the houſe of God, and there furniſhed himſelf with all the virtues, which made him ſpeak like an Oracle, and live as a true Image of Divinity. the Platoniſts ſay, the whole order of the world dependeth on Intelligences, which bear ſway in the motion of the firſt Heaven; and we in imitation of them may ſay, all the good of Chriſtendom proceeds from the examples of Eccleſiaſtical men, to whom the Son of God hath conſigned his authority on their brows, his word in their mouths, his blood and Church into their hands. For if Bees, ingendred of the body of a Bull, carry in their entrails the very form of that Bull from whence they are derived; by a much more juſt Title the people will bear the marks of thoſe, whom God hath given them for Doctours, and Fathers, whether it be by correſpondence of nature, through cuſtom, or by imitation, which ever hold a very great predominance over ſpirits diſpoſed to receive their impreſſions. Behold the cauſe why a Prelate, who liveth conform to his profeſſion, imprinteth the ſeal of the Son of God on all thoſe ſouls he governeth, and produceth himſelf in as many objects as he hath imitatours of his virtues. As on the contrary part, he who liveth ill in great Nobility, and Dignity, is a Seraphin in appearance, but a Seraphin without eys, without heart, without hands, which hath wings of a profane fire, able to burn the Propitiatory, if God afford not his helping hand.

Vyſſes Aldrovan. de apibus.

And for as much as we at this day ſee the Nobility aſpire to Eccleſiaſtical charges, and many fathers to diſpoſe their children thereunto, ſometimes with more fervor then conſideration, it hath cauſed me to undertake this Treatiſe for the Nobility, which dedicate themſelves to the Church, as well to ſhew the purity of intention they ought to exerciſe therein, as to give them a fair diſcovery of the goodly and glorious actions they ought to purſue in the practice thereof. I here will firſt offer you a ſimple draught, which I afterward intend to adorn with the greatneſs of St. Ambroſe, as with more lively colours.

Plato rejoyced to behold Princes and Governours of Common-wealths to become Philoſophers, and we have cauſe to praiſe God, when we ſee the children of Noble Houſes to diſpoſe themſelves to Prieſthood, not by oblique and ſiniſter ways, but with all the conditions which their blood requireth, and ſacred dignity exacteth in ſo noble a ſubject.

Why ſhould we deny them Mitres, Croſiers, and eminency in the Church? ſo far is their birth from miniſtring any occaſions of the contrary, that it rather affordeth them favour both to undertake ſuch charges with courage, and diſcharge their conſcience with all fidelity.

The reaſons hereof are evident. For firſt, we muſt aver, that by how much the more honourable the charges are, ſo much the rather they are proper for ſuch as make profeſſion of honour; provided always on the other ſide, they have qualities ſuitable to thoſe miniſteries they pretend to exerciſe. And are there any in the world more ambitious of honour then Noblemen? Oſtentation is the laſt ſhirt they put off, and where can you find a more ſolid, and eminent honour, then that which is derived from the lawfull adminiſtration of Eccleſiaſtical functions?

Ariſtotle ſaith, Truths, which tranſmit themſelves through the common ſenſe of every man, get into credit as it were by the degree of nature. Now ſuch hath been the eſteem of all Nations, that Kingdoms, and Common-wealths being eſtabliſhed upon Religion, and temporal juriſdiction, as on two columns; Religion ſo much the more excelleth politick government, as things divine tranſcendently ſurmount humane. And for this cauſe, favours, priviledges, & preheminences, have ever been given to Prieſts in the greateſt and moſt flouriſhing Monarchies and Common-wealths of the world, as we may ſee in Hiſtories, & as the policy of the Ægyptians, Aſſyrians, Chaldeans, Medes, Perſians, Grecians, Romans, Gauls, and other nations.

Ariſt. l. 1. περὶ ἑρμηνείας Xenophon. l. 4. de factis & dictis Socratis, tribuit etiam Socrati. Strabo Geograph. lib. 14. Ælian. lib. 14. cap. 14. Var. Euſ. in Chron. Agathias Hiſtor. lib. 2, &c.

The honour of Prieſthood gained ſo much on the hearts of all people that the Monarchs of the earth ſeemed not to rule but with one arm, if they made not in one and the ſame perſon the alliance of Prieſthood and Royalty: ſo that oftentimes they ſhewed themſelves as depraved in their proceedings, as greedy in matter of honour.

The Roman Emperours, who ſtretched their authority as far as the point of their Lance could be extended, and who needs would be Commanders of arms,

Arms, to become thereby Masters of Laws, failed not to joyn the Mitre with the Diadem, and as soon to make themselves great Prelates, as great Emperours; thinking by this means to have the more power over the hearts of the people, and the less opposition for resistance, when they had depressed the forces, which might give some remarkable counterpoize to their greatness. And it is an admirable thing, that the first Christian Emperours, as Constantine and his children, still retained the titles of the Great Pontifices of Gentilism, as a Maxim of State, lest, foregoing this fantasie of dignity, they should behold themselves bereaved of some Jewel of their Crowns.

Baron. ad annum Christi. 382. num. 6. Gratianus primus nomen Pontificis respuit.

This is to authorize my proposition, which saith, True Honour belongeth to Ecclesiastical charges, when they are well administred: since the Monarchs of the world, from the very abuse of these Dignities, have derived glory: but to desire them for honour, is to dishonour the dignity by the unworthyness of your desire. So many Ixions now adays cast themselves athwart the smoak to court a cloud, that there is almost no love left, but for false Deities. That which maketh Ecclesiastical men honourable is, well to use their titles, and embellish their charges with the ornament of their lives. Otherwise all this petty gaudery, which we see sparkling round about them, is very little. It is not the Mitre, which maketh the Bishop, but to be esteemed worthy of the Mitre by transcendency in virtue, is to be more then a Bishop without merit.

Superiora non habent coronas, quia nè ventos quidem. Senec. natural. l. 1. c. 1.

Sometimes we beholding the Meteors of the air imagine to see Crowns about the Sun and Stars, which really are nothing but vapours, composed of gross air, which illusion coloureth, our imagination figureth, and the wind scattereth. This is to make fools believe there are Crowns encompassing this mighty Star. The Sun is adorned sufficiently with his proper rays, should he borrow his brightness from the vapours of the earth, he would no longer be the Sun. Even so is it, when with a terrestrial and impure eie we consider some exteriour marks of Ecclesiastical dignity: we think such things make Prelates, and we therein are deceived, for they are vapours of the earth, which the wind sooner or later will dissipate. He that will be truly resplendent, must within himself bear the source of his own light.

Herein consisteth the most excellent form of honour, when a Prelate allieth sincerity of life to the dignity of his place, and that to serve as an example for all noble spirits, who make election to be of the Church, he advanceth his extraction by the lustre of virtues, which are as rays reflecting from the Divine greatness.

I say for a second reason, That when Noble-men hold Ecclesiastical Offices, and therein employ their whole extent of duty, we may hope from their ministeries not only more radiance, but succour also, as from such as command with greater authority, and make themselves to be obeyd with more advantage.

It is undoubtedly true, that God sufficiently maketh it appear, he hath no need of men, when purposing to stretch out his arm to some extraordinary actions, he oftentimes extracteth creatures from dregs and dust, to set them in Thrones, and establish them with such authority, that he causeth the powers of the earth to bow under their commands, who bear the decrees of Heaven; which hath been seen in the infancy of the Church, and in the sequel thereof, through all ages: yet must we say, that, as our Saviour, although he had a science increate as God, a science infused as a Prophet, a science of beatitude, as he, who was possessour thereof from the first moment of his life: notwithstanding to accommodate himself to the laws of that nature, which he had assumed, spared not to work by humane science, which Divines call experimental. So in the government of the Church, though he sometimes operates without any regard had to dependance on the ordinary course, which himself hath established, as when he took simple fisher-men, to make them Masters over the Sages, and Instructers of Monarchs; yet at other times proceeding in a common strain, and more usual to nature, he chose men of note and authority, to employ them in the large confines of his Empire and jurisdiction.

S. Thom. 3. part. q. 30.

So drew he Moses from Pharaoh's Court, to make him the God of Pharaoh: so for Princes among the Gentiles, which he meant to enrole under his standard, he elected Kings and Sages; so, after he had constituted his Church under the government of a poor fisher-man of Galilee, he took one derived from the blood of Emperours, whom he made his Successour, to wit, S. Clement; so he caused in divers occasions Ambroses, Gregories, Leos, Calixtuses, to arise, and so many others of most honorable extraction, that they might bear Nobility as a dowry into the bosom of the Church, which they had so happily governed.

This Nobility was to their dignity as a gilded case to a rich tablet, as gold to the diamond, beauty of body to the soul, habiliments to the grace and garb of body. They had more lustre, more splendour, more resolution; and the subjects, who have not always intentions so pure in rendering honour to Ecclesiasticks, as not to regard the exteriour ornament of their qualities, and conditions, became more obsequious to their commands, having not boldness enough to contradict even those, who by right of their birth had as soon entered into Empire, as life.

How many times had secular powers been seen to transgress their limits, to usurp on the Church, and what disorder had we beheld to arise from the prosecution of this confusion, had not the hand of God raised Ecclesiasticks of noble houses, of great authority, of much courage, to sustain the shock, to tie the hands of the factious, and punish the boldness of the most daring; to call back (as Job saith) the prey out of the teeth of iniquity, and make a Diadem to himself wholly composed of actions of justice, magnanimity, religion, in this manner more resplendent then if he had possessed all the pearls of the Orient?

What a fair field of Battle, what goodly Palms, what bright glory hath a noble soul, to make it self a brazen wall for the defence of the Church, and obtain of God the blessing pronounced by the Prophet Isaiah, in favour of the High-Priest Eliachim? What a glorious honour is it, to be set in a place of trust, to be planted by the hand of God to serve as a prop for the house of God, to be the seat of glory for the Lord of Hosts, to carry the movables, riches, and greatness of the Church on his shoulders?

Isaiah 22. Figam illum paxillum in loco fideli, & erit solium gloriæ domui patris sui, & suspendent super eum omnem gloriam domûs patris ejus.

Finally, For a third reason, to conduct the Nobility to Ecclesiastical Dignities is to bring it into its house. All things willingly return to their source: The waters cease not to glide along, to render themselves to the Ocean. The rays of the Sun touch the earth, not forsaking their star; the branches of the Tree offer the homage of their verdure, leaves, and fruits, to the root: he goeth well, that hasteneth to his beginning.

Now so it is, that the greatest part of the Church endowments came from the Nobility, who then despoiled themselves to cover the Altars, and now many unveil the Altars to cloath themselves. If you (O Noble-men) desire to enjoy the patrimony, which your Anceſtours have left to the Church, you ought not to ſeek it by unlawful, miſchievous, and tyrannical ways, but by means proportionable to the intentions of thoſe, who laid thoſe rich foundations. And what intentions had they, but to cut the Trees of Baſan to make Oars for the Veſſel of S. Peter, but to lay their wealth at the feet of God, who, according to the Prophet, made himſelf a foot-ſtep of Sapphires, to ſerve as a Ladder for glory; but to entertain on earth an image of the heavenly Jeruſalem, to grant to the Church men of ſcience and conſcience, men of courage and fidelity, for the ornament, ſupport, and maintenance thereof?

Ezech. 27. Quercus Baſan dolata in remos navis Tyri, divites ſeculi Eccleſia appliciti. Hieron. ſuper Ezech.

If you approach thither with ſuch an intention, I am of opinion, the gates ought to be opened unto you, and that you ſhould enter into your ſelf to govern the houſe of Jeſus Chriſt, and not deſtroy it. We have, thanks be given to God, a great King, all whoſe inclinations diſpoſe him to goodneſs, as lines to the centre: as much love as he hath for juſtice, ſo much zeal hath he for the glory of Altars. As God is pleaſed to ſow the ſtars on the azure of the firmament, ſo hath he a ſenſible delight to furniſh the Church with good Prelates, becauſe they are the ſtars of the earth. Merit under him is in poſſeſſion of good hopes, and hope is not far diſtant to be conſummate in fruition. He is pleaſed to gratifie the Nobility with the goods of the Church, but he will, his intention be ſeconded by the merit of thoſe, that ſhall enjoy them. Take the waies of wiſdom and virtue to enter into your inheritance, which ever are moſt aſſured and the moſt honourable. The time hath been, when one muſt, as it were, have done evil to receive good; if now good be offered to thoſe who do it, who would willingly be vitious, and ſow crimes to reap miſeries.

The ſecond SECTION.

That the Nobility ſhould not aſpire to Eccleſiaſtical Offices, but by lawful ways.

Lucian. In Jov. Trag.

PRophane Lucian ſpake truer then he thought, when he feigned Gentiliſm was filled with gods, whereof ſome were made of wood and ſtone, ſubſiſting by the prerogative of antiquity, which age and time gave them: the other much more lately formed, were of gold and ſilver, repreſenting the profuſe prodigality of the later ages. This cauſed a divorce in the Temples; the Gods of earth were ſtill willing to hold their ranks, ſhewing beſides the antiquity of their original, that they were framed by the confident hands of admirable work-men, and had lineaments excellently poliſhed. The gods of gold and ſilver, dignified by the riches of the ſtuff of which they were compoſed, ſpake proudly, & needs would have priority, ſince the metal, whereof they were made, tranſcended much in the eſtimation of men. The matter was put into deliberation in the great Parliament of Olympus, & the golden gods carried it, not by merit, but by authority of their riches.

Should this ſcoffing ſpirit be raiſed again in theſe our days, to make a Satyre on the manners of theſe times, he could not be better fitted. For to ſpeak, not univerſally of all Eccleſiaſtical Nobles, ſince, thanks be to God, there are many, who moſt happily have linked to Nobility all the other qualities requiſite to their condition: but conſidering in groſs the diſorder & corruption, we may well ſay, the gods of gold at this day have the upper-hand. We heretofore ſaw divers ſpiritual men, extracted from low condition, who arrived to dignities by the degrees of labour, integrity, knowledge, and were finally crozier'd and mitered by the ſtrength of much merit. Theſe men appeared in the Church of God, as thoſe antient ſtatues made by the hand of Polycletes, Phidias, and Syſippus, there was not a lineament in them which ſpake not. But when gold and ſilver began to ſway more then ever, the rich, allured with the wealth of the Church, brake a way through by the help of contentions, authority, & command, which ſilver gave them over the courſes of humane things: they maugre induſtry and virtue, have made golden gods, which baniſh, as it were, all the gods of earth, notwithſtanding the excellent forms, and all the gifts of nature, and grace they could poſſibly acquire. It ſeemeth for theſe men the Church is at this day become a great Oak overturned, where men haſtily on every ſide run for prey: there is not a hand ſo little, that wil not become outragious to bear away ſome ſpoil thereof.

But you, noble and generous ſpirits, who in your minorities dedicate your ſelves to the miniſteries of the Church, behold the firſt ſtep you muſt tread. Be careful herein, as your lives and ſalvation are dear unto you; aim wel your carrier, enter by the gate of honor, to free your ſelf from the diſturbances of life and troubles of death. Be you aſſured it is the abomination of the deſolation, foretold by the Prophet Daniel, the gall of bitterneſs, and perplexity of ſin, declared by the Apoſtle S. Peter, to enter into an Eccleſiaſtical benefice by unlawful and ſtrained ways, without vocation. The reaſons hereof are evident.

Dan. 9. 27. Act. 8. 23.

Firſt, The Saints have called this vice, the iniquity of Libanus, alluding to theſe words of the Prophet Habacuck; The iniquity of Libanus ſhall cover thee. Where the Text ſpake to thoſe, who deſpoiled the Holy-land, becauſe the Mount Libanus is a holy hill of Paleſtine, all covered over with fair Cedars, much renowned in the Scripture, from whence it cometh, it myſtically ſignifieth the Church: and thoſe are truly covered with the iniquity of Libanus, who ſurcharge themſelves with the weight of inexorable juſtice, for attempting on the higheſt pieces of the patrimony of God, wch are the offerings of the faithful, left for the maintenance of Eccleſiaſtical ſtate.

Habac. 1. Iniquitas Libani operiet te.

This iniquity of Libanus is the ſin of Zeb, Zebeus, and Salmana, who are branded with perpetual infamy for plotting againſt the Tabernacle of God. The Prophet ſaid, that encouraging one another they caſt out theſe inconſiderate words: Let us go, and poſſeſs the Sanctuary of God, as our proper inheritance. And what, I pray, do ſuch like now adays? Hold they not the goods of the Church, as one would a Tenement, to paſs it from hand to hand from Nephew to Nephew? although they often-times in their conſcience judge them moſt uncapable, yet needs muſt they take good heed how they forgo any thing: the chairs muſt be filled with honour, with fleſh, and hay, and rather will they ſet ſhadows on a Pinacle, then render to God what is due to him. And what will happen to theſe Salmanas, or Salmoneans? even that, which the ſame King and Prophet ſaid, They ſhall turn about as the wheel of the Potter: inceſſantly wandering from purpoſe to purpoſe, from ambition to ambition, from bargain to bargain, in a thouſand embroilments of ſpirit till death come, who ſhall bruiſe them (as ſaith the Wiſe-man) on the Ciſtern, and ſhall ſcatter them for ever from the face of God.

Pſal. 82. 12. Hereditate poſſideamus Sanctuarium Dei.

Pone illos ut rotam.

Confringes rotam ſuper ciſternam. Eccleſ. 12.

It is no ſmall matter to invade the treaſure of Kings, ſince it is the blood of the people, the ſinew of war, the knot of peace; and the blood-ſuckers of State, which abuſe it, ſooner or later ſhall pour their lives out in the duſt. And what do you think is it, to abuſe the patrimony of God (whereunto ſo many good ſouls have oft-times contributed their blood and ſweat) and to enter therin as a Fox, a Lion, without out any other intention but to ſlay and devour the flock, which they ought not ſo much as to ſhear?

The crimes, which do affront the Divinity, ever bear their puniſhments behind them. Craſſus felt among the Parthians the Religion of the Temple of Jeruſalem, which he had deſpoiled; the fortune of the Romans was made a prey, the Army routed, the Treaſures forſaken, the lives of ſo many mortals expoſed to the dint of Sword, to chaſtiſe the avarice of one man, who durſt invade the goods conſecrated to the Divine Majeſty. Whileſt he ſtretched out his Harpie's hands on the goods of men, God ſuffered him: ſo ſoon as he ſet his Tallons on the moveables of the Temple, he felt the ſteel of Barbarians, as revengers of his Sacrilege.

Plutarch. in Craſſo.

An hand from Heaven before, for the ſame cauſe, charactered the dreadful decree of a Babylonian King, which hath ſerved as a Tragedy for all poſterity: and afterward Heliodorus in the Macchabees was prodigiouſly puniſhed by exterminating Angels, who in the mid-day ſcourged him in the ſight of all the world, employing the heavenly Whips on his body for the ſame crime, as he had beſtowed his hardineſs and hand to ſteal a Jewel from Heaven.

Daniel 5. 15. 2 Machab. 3.

If you ſay there is much difference between the ſacrilegious, who ſteal the Treaſures of the Church, and thoſe, who by ways unlawful ſeize on benefices, which they unworthily hold, to the confuſion of Chriſtianity. I anſwer, there may be the difference that would be between a publick Robber, and a private Thief; the one proceeding with open force, the other more cautelouſly, cauſing his venom to creep, is by ſo much the more pernicious, as under the skin of a Sheep he bears the heart of a Wolf.

Add hereunto for a ſecond reaſon, that the Balthazars, Craſſuſes, and Heliodoruſes, and the Hereticks of our time, who have made open war againſt the Treaſures of the Temple, having nothing at all hurt the reputation of the Church, which as the Pole-ſtar is ever in motion, and never ſetteth: but the unjuſt Uſurpers of Prieſt-hood, who ſometimes enter into charge with extreme defect of Science, and Conſcience; beſides, that they unprofitably devour the Patrimony of the Son of God, do burthen his Spouſe with eternal reproach.

It is obſervable, that in theſe deplorable times, where all ſeemeth to tend to the ſubverſion of Laws, ſtill ſome new Monſters have appeared, who by their birth have declared the diſaſters that ſhould happen to the world.

The tenth Age, which was the true Iron-age, wherein all vices were in force, all ſciences in eclipſe, all abuſe in credit, and, as it were, all crimes in impunity, afforded neither Satyres, Chimeraes, Centaurs, nor other monſters againſt nature. But, for a certain preſage of great evils, which we afterward ſaw to over-flow all Chriſtendom, children of great men were ſeen, who had nothing great in them but vice, as being ſuch, who were born for diſgrace, bred in diſorder, naturalized in ſin, to enter, during their minority, into Eccleſiaſtical charges, to debaſe authority, and aboliſh merit. A Pope John the Eleventh, enormouſly vitious, having the malice of a man moſt debauched, and the age of a child unexperienced, to ſit in the chair of S. Peter! A Theophylact, ſon of the Emperour, by the abſolute power of his Father, to ſeize on the See of Conſtantinople, to become afterwards a Merchant of Horſes, which he ſo violently affected; that beſides the prodigious race of two thouſand, which he ordinarily bred, he many times left the Altar, where he ſacrificed to the living God, to haſten to ſee ſome Mare of his, that had foled in the ſtable! Our France hath not been exempt from this unhappineſs; for, in the ſame age, Hugo, a childe of five years old, was conſtituted Archbiſhop of Rhemes to poſſeſs the ſeat of the great S. Remigius, which was to parallel the foot of Hercules to the leg of a fly.

Baron. ad annum Chriſti 931 Joannes 11. Miſcria ſi lius, matre ariam tum amoribus florente. Curopalates & Baron. ad annum 926.

Frodeardus Hiſtor. Rhemen. lib. 4 cap. 17. Monſtrum, inquit, unquam hactenus in orbe Chriſtiano viſum.

All Chriſtendom was amazed to behold ſuch promotions, & held them in the rank of Comets, which make terrour to march before them, and after them ſterility, maſſacres, & diſaſters. Were there no other conſideration but the intereſts of the Church, this ever ought to touch a heart, which as yet retaineth ſome vein of Chriſtianity, nor ſhould it ever give conſent to any preferment, which might appear ſo diſadvantagious to her, whom Jeſus Chriſt hath by his blood made his lawful Spouſe. But beſides the detriment of Religion, for a third inſtance, the manifeſt loſs of young men is incurred, who are engaged in Eccleſiaſtical Dignities, not being accommodated with conditions neceſſary to undergo ſuch a burden: much better were you to ſend them directly to the houſe of fools, then to expoſe them upon the pinacle of the Temple with ſo little diſcretion: for in this priſon of mad-men they ſhould finde thoſe, that would tie them, thereby to ſtay their folly; and in theſe falſe dignities they meet with liberty, which freeth them, to precipitate them into all ſorts of vices Fathers and Mothers, God pardon you, what a Torch do you ſet on fire, to burn and conſume the houſe of God, when blind with affection, and benummed in judgment, you ſo embrace your young Apes, that you ſtrangle them with exceſs of indulgence? To enkindle ambition in the veins of theſe yong ſots, almoſt at their coming out of the Cradle, to ſet them on the top of the houſe, over mens heads with an arm and ſling of ſilver, be they vitious, be they impious and diſſolute, be they ſtupid and heavy as earth, ſo that they have the breath of favour, and oars of ſilver (as had the Rowers of Queen Cleopatra) needs muſt they be placed on the top of the Turret, to be ſeen the further off. Many times charges of great importance, and ſuperintendence over the heads of ſo many mortals, are given to men, to whom a ſilly Farmer's wife would not have committed the keeping of a Cow. The Idumeans enterprize upon the Sanctuary, and theſe Owls endeavour to drink up the Lamp-oyl of Churches, by an ambition of ſo ſtrong a flight, that it will admit no limits, but infinity. Have you no commiſeration of the publick? The Common-wealth is at this day an old ſong (ſay you) whereof little care is to be had, we deſire to know more then an air, which is that of our own proper intereſt, ſince it is an act of prudence well to accommodate one's affairs. Yet are you no whit aſhamed of your ſelves? though ſilver furniſh you with a brow of metal to regard no man, yet is it a ſhameful thing to be deſirous to erect in the world the tree of Nebuchadnezzar turned topſie-turvy, where four-footed beaſts are above, and little birds beneath? Were it not a goodly thing to ſee Horſes, Aſſes, and Bulls to neigh, bray, and bellow upon the branches of trees, while the ſmall birds of Heaven, ſo many celeſtial ſpirits, thruſt from the rank, which wiſdom and virtue giveth, go mourning up and down among the thorns of a neceſſitous life? But we muſt prefer our children, anſwer you. Who ſays the contrary? Raiſe them on the ſteps of actions Chriſtian, ſolid, and illuſtrious, cauſe them to paſs through the Temple of Virtue, before they go to that of Honour: examine their talents, their capacity, their ability, otherwiſe you do not advance, but precipitate them into publick ſcorn, into loſs of reputation, and danger of ſoul.

This benefice is not a benefice, but a malefice, but a golden snare, a carcanet of Medea, a Trojan horse, which will produce arms. You, in procuring such an honour, resemble those Idolatrous Parents, who sacrificed their children to the God Moloch (that is to say, the Sun) and caused them to be burnt alive in the hollow Statue of the Sun, not caring to forego their lives, so they might lose them in those flames, and lights, which were the Hieroglyphicks of honour. O mere madness! for the life of a Flie, which we daily share with death, to be willing to dam your self and posterity, to stand on the brink of the abyss, and not deign so much as onely to open your eys to behold the precipice?

Seldenus de Diis Syris. pag. 78.

The third SECTION.

Of Vocation, and Calling.

IF you desire to know how you should proceed in the preferment of your children to Ecclesiastical degrees, first, understand it is true, Mercury is not made of all wood. If question be concerning an Husband-man, Merchant, Artificer, or Sheepherd, we try the nature of the children, and endeavour to accommodate each one of them according to their dispositions, and natural inclinations.

Suppose you it is onely fit for the Church to expose them at adventure, without election, or discretion? What exorbitancy is it to think it lawfull to take the simplest, and weakest for Priests, and Religious? What tyranny to divert some with all sorts of cunning, and violence, and thrust others on as it were with a fork? To have in all your proceeding no other aim, but the benefit of your family, to force the Laws of Heaven to bow under the interests of your house, to give that to God, which you cannot settle else-where, and if any accident happen, to take that from God, which you have given him? Hereby it cometh to pass, that after many years we behold Birds, which change both their plumage, and kinde upon some very slight cause (not speaking of those, who do so by way of counsel, & conscience) the scarlet-Cloak succeeding the Church-Cassock, and the Sword the Breviary: wherein they do much worse then the wooers in the house of Ulysses, who being not able to gain access to the Mistress, made their address to the servants. But these forsake the Lady, whom they have espoused, to court the chamber-maids; professing all their life-time the infidelity of their promises by the exchange of their habits.

Vocation is most necessary for admittance into to the Church, which appeareth in two points: the one ordinary, the other extraordinary. Extraordinary calling hath marks and signs, that draw near to a miracle. So we see those, who have been great and eminent in the Church, have had some Genius, which hath even in their infancy made the first glimmers of their greatness to appear, drawing the whole world after them with astonishment.

Joseph. Antiq. lib. 2. cap. 5.

So Moses, though he were a little child, tossed Pharaoh's Diadem like a shuttle-cock, which gave a very ill presage to the Egyptians of their approaching ruin. So Elias seemed from his mother to suck fire with milk, which was a prediction his mouth should one day be (as indeed it was) the Arcenal of the God of hosts. So the cradle of S. Epiphanius (as Ennodius relateth) was seen all on fire: a vine in a vision issued out of the mouth of little S. Ephraem: a flaming pillar environed the head of S. Modestus: and it is written, that Gregory the Seventh, who from a base extraction, was born to the Throne of S. Peter, heaping together the chips he found in his father's shop, who was a Joyner, and arranging them in divers figures, innocently wrote, without thinking thereon, as a child in sport, Dominabor à mari usque ad mare.

Epiph. de Prophetis. Ennodius. Anonymus in ejus vita. Raderus. Crantzius lib. 2.

All these callings, and many other of the like kind, are known by extraordinary signs; the rest take the ordinary way, and are observed to be in the good nature of children fit to be dedicated to the Church, which is a matter very considerable. If you ask wherein this good nature consisteth: I answer, It is not in the influence of Stars, nor in the Genius, as Pagans have placed it, nor simply in the beauty of minde, in the goodness of constitution, health, strength, vigour of body, though these may much contribute thereunto; but it appeareth in two principal rays, of which the one is tranquillity from passions, by making a reposed calm in a soul, fit to entertain the Spirit of God; the other, which ariseth from the first, is the docibleness of a mind tractable, with ease to dispose it self to inclinations of honesty. Behold these two principal heads, whereon this excellent nature of an inestimable price is established.

And first, for as much as concerneth the tranquillity of passions, it is undoubted, that every man, being composed of four elements, by consequence draweth along four roots of all the motions thereof, which are, Love, Fear, Pleasure, Sorrow. There is not a man, which feeleth not some touch. But as every Sea hath his winds, though Mariners observe that some are more tossed then others, so, though every soul have its passions, we must confess there be some of them mildely disposed, and others more roughly distempered. You see men, who from their most tender age taste of strange extravagancies, choler, harshness, rage, despight, which maketh them to be of a spirit fantastical, uncivil, and obstinate, against which you must ever fight with an armed hand. Others from their cradles are endued with a peaceable soul, as a Sea in the time, that Halcyons build their nests on the trembling agitation of waters; they have inclinations to virtue wholly Angelical, in such sort, that they seem to be as it were conveyed therein, as Fishes in their element. From this repose from passions ariseth the second condition of good nature, that is, docibleness of spirit, the beginning of education, and happiness of life. For as Divines require in those, who receive faith, a certain Religious affection to Divine things, discharged, and purified from all spirit of contradiction; so in matter of moral virtue and piety we stand in need of a tractable soul, which fixeth it self on good instructions, as the Ivie cleaveth to trees and pillars. Go not then about, when you make choice of an Ecclesiastical man, to tender some Esau, some spirit of the field, who is onely pleased with arms, and slaughter of beasts: take rather a Jacob under the pavilions, a sweet and temperate spirit, that is wholly disposed to the sound of virtues.

But you, Noble Spirits, who have met with this excellent nature, I may speak the words of the Prophet unto you: God hath given you a soul wholly covered with precious stones, enriched with gifts, and admirable talents; he hath enriched it in a body endowed with a singular temperature, as a Diamond set in the head of a Ring. Much hath he given you, and therefore much requireth at your hands.

Ezech. 28. Omnia lapis pretiosus operimentum tuum, & foramina in die quâ condita es præparata sunt.

The fourth SECTION.

Of Virtues requisite in the carriage of a Prelate. The first is Wisdom.

DO you demand what God requireth from you? I answer, five principal virtues; which were were very well represented in the Ephod of the High-Priest, of the old Law, as S. Gregory the great (a) hath well observed. This Ephod was a certain mantle that covered the shoulders, composed of four colours, of hyacinth, purple, white, and scarlet, the whole wrought all over with threds of gold, enterlaced with curious work-manship. Why this dressing? why these colours? to teach you seasonably to bear on your shoulders the conditions requisite to your profession. The hyacinth, or sky-colour, signifieth, the first thing you ought to do is to fly, as the plague of virtues, from these travantly and unworthy spirits, who have no other object in the possession of the goods of the Church, but flesh-pots, and play: you are to frame for your selves a soul totally noble, wholly elate, merely celestial, which conceiveth strong resolutions one day to dedicate it self to God, not in a mercinary manner, but with the utmost endeavour of its power. Think not (b) saith S. Ambrose) that being called to an Ecclesiastical state, you have a slight commission from God. Wisdom requireth, you consider the mysteries of Heaven, and that you be highly raised above the ordinary strain. Justice willeth you to stand Centinel for the people, who expect aid from your prayers. Strength desireth you to defend the Tabernacle and Camp of the God of Hosts. Temperance ordaineth, you live with singular sobriety and continency. You are (saith (c) S. Isidore of Damieta) placed between divine and humane nature, to honour the one with your Sacrifices, and edifie the other by your examples. A Priest (d) ought to be as a young childe, issued out of the schole and bosom of the son of God, even as an Angel, to govern the Church, not to despoil it, to treat with God in prayer, not to handle a sword. He should be entire in his judgments, just in his resolutions, devout in the Quire, firm in the Church, sober at Table, prudent in recreations, pure in conscience, serious in prayer, patient in adversity, affable in prosperity, rich in virtues, sage in words, upright in preaching, and free in all good actions. Great S. Denis the Areopagite (e) addeth a notable sentence, saying; That he, who most especially seeketh to transcend others in holy Orders, ought most nearly approach to God in all sorts of virtue.

For which cause your education should not be in the ordinary way. If you have brothers that are to be bred for the world, let them live in the practice and fashions of the world. O, how unworthy are you of the hopes to which God calleth you, if you envy them the favour of the house, and of those I known not what kinde of petty trifles of their own profession! Your condition is much other, if you follow that spirit which guideth you.

(f) Heretofore Monasteries were the chief scholes of Kings, and the Great-ones of the earth, to cause them to suck in virtue with the milk: your abode should be in places, where you have engaged your heart, and your faith, which best can prepare and manure you for the life you have chosen.

It is truly a scandal to your profession, if you be ashamed to wear a habit proper for an Ecclesiastical man, and blush at the standard of your warfare. A shame likewise, if you must be terrified by way of menaces to make you say your Breviary; or if it be needful to allure you thereunto by I know not what kinde of worldly allurements: these verily relish of the unworthiness of a childish spirit. (g) See you not that Benefice draweth an Office after it? that no man should enlarge your conscience by soothing your neglect, and extenuating the obligations you ought to have? If you observe not therein that which you shall be advised by a sage and exact spiritual Father, you may very well most dangerously wander. We are in the Church (saith S. Bernard) (h) to sow joy and good example: joy for Angels by our devotions, and the secret aspirations of our prayers; example for men by our good works. The mind in the judgment of Philo (i) should hold a little household Consistory, where discharged from sense, and the mass of sensible things, it may study the knowledge of it self, and the search of truth.

You should love your condition even from your tender age, and live in the Sanctuary like a young Samuel. The toil of affairs and secular recreations is not for you. Leave the Onions of Egypt to sensual souls; your entertainments are in the society of Angels. (k) Priestly dignity, to which you aspire, requireth a sober gravity, alienated from the ordinary way, a serious life, weight, and maturity. How would you have the people honour you, if you have nothing above them? How should they admire you, beholding vices and imperfections in your manners?

(a) Greg. de Pastor. p. 2. cap. 5.

(b) Mediocre nè putes quod tibi commissum est: Primum, ut alta Dei videas, quod est sapientia: deinde ut excubias pro populo Dei deferas, quod est justitia: castra defendas, tabernacula tueatis, quod est fortitudinis: Dei ipsum continentem ac sobrium præstes, quod est temperantia. Amb. de Offic. lib. 1.

(c) Isiod. Pelusiota lib 3. ep 2.

(d) Sacerdos debet esse Christi alumnus, à peccatis segregatus reator, non raptor; speculator, non spiculator; dispensator, non dissipator; pius in judicio, justus in consilio, devotus in Choro, stabilis in Ecclesia, sobrius in mensa, prudens in latitia, purus in conscientia, assiduus in oratione, patiens in adversitate, lenis in proximitate, dives in virtutibus, expeditus in actibus, sapiens in sermone, verax in prædicatione. Alphons. Torrez.

(e) Dionys. ep. 3. ad Demophilum.

(f) Bern. l. 4 de consid. c. 6. Ubi de comitatu Episcopi inter mitratos discurrere calamistratos non decet.

(g) Onus personale sacrificium laudis & fructus laborum. Suarez. de orat. l. 4. c. 12 ex Clement. 1.

(h) Seminemus hominibus lorum exemplum per aperta opera: Seminemus Angelis gaudium magnum, per occulta suspiria. Bern. serm. 30.

(i) Occidente sole anima, in totum exonerata sensibus mole rerum sensibilium, veritatem videbit in Consistorio domestico. Philo de vita supplicum.

(k) Sobrietas à turbis gravitatem, seriam vitam, singulare pondus, dignitas sibi vendicat Sacerdotalis. Quomodo potest observari à populo, qui nihil habet secretum à populo? Quid in te mireatur, si sua in te recognoscit? Ambr. ep. ad Iren.

The fifth SECTION.

The second virtue of a Prelate, which is Fortitude of spirit against Avarice and Riot.

THe second livery of your colours is the Purple, which adviseth you to have a strong and truly noble soul. When there is occasion to defend the glory of God, you must have the arm of God (a) and the thundering voice of God, not to gain respect by austere looks, and affectations of severity, which many times proceed from much infirmity of spirit.

The Council of Aix saith, (b) the Church is a dove, which teareth no man with her tallons, but is pleased sweetly to strike with her wings. The true gravity of a Priest consisteth in manners, not countenance. (c) It ought to be a seal of diamond, firmly to preserve the characters of virtue, and sign others by example. This fortitude will come upon you, by accustoming not to comply with any vice whatsoever. There is not a worse slavery then to put your liberty into the hands of sin. It is a long chain, and hath many gordian knots: cut them resolutely as did Alexander, and conquer the Kingdom of your passions, which is of more worth then the Persian, or Indians. Above all, if you desire to rule, avoid two rocks most dangerous for a Church-man; whereof the one is the thirst ever to get a new, the other lazyness and profuseness in a living already acquired.

Think not to advance your state, and encrease the number of your benefices, otherwise it were to seek out God for bread, not for miracles: it were for living to lose well-living, so to become a bad Merchant, not a good Pastour. What cause have you of disturbance? A reasonable benefice is enough for you. If you desire to have a shoe over-wide, and not fit for your foot, you deceive your self. Say not you are poor, there can be no poverty where you have God for inheritance, and he, whom God all-rich sufficeth not, deserves to be perpetually poor. This desire, which men without ceasing have to be ever on increase, much vilifieth Ecclesiasticks. It affords them as many dependences as they have pretensions. It makes them servilely sooth the passions and vices of those Great-ones, from whom they expect a recompense. It robbeth them of the Kingdom of God, to tie them to the chain of men, who many times are more enthralled then Galley-slaves.

(a) Si habes brachium sicut Deus, & simili voce tonas, circunda tibi decorem, & in sublime erigere. Job 40.

(b) Meminisse oportet, quia columba est in divinis Scripturis Ecclesia appellata, quæ non unguibus lacerat, sed alis piè persuasit. Con. Aquisgran. Con. 124.

(c) In constantia Sacerdos sit adamantinum signatorium: Mens nostra figuram sui semper cudiens characteris, universa quæ occurrunt sibi ad quæ litatem sui status figuret, atque transformet, ipse verò insigniri nullius incursibus possit. Cassian. Coll. 6. c. 12.

Pe

It is a great ſhame to intrude wickedly hereinto, to ſurprize an honour by the way of a diſhonour. Saints have obtained Benefices by flying them, and now we muſt run over the heads of a man, and beaſt, to overtake them. That brave Architect Vitruvius thought it very ſtrange, that an Artiſan preſented himſelf to a great man, to be employed in his own faculty, and profeſſion, and thereupon ſpake a moſt remarkable ſentence: (d) I ſee Architects, who beg, and underhand ſue to be employed: as for my ſelf, I have learned of my Maſters, that we ſhould not ask of any man, but rather be intreated by others to uſe care and endeavour. He muſt be blameleſs, who bluſheth not to require that, which may be denied him. What would this noble ſpirit have ſaid, had he ſeen Church-men to debaſe themſelves, not onely to ſupplications, but to ſervices moſt unworthy their quality, to obtain cure of ſouls, which others in ſolitary wilderneſſes have fled from, through Briars, and Thorns, among ſavage beaſts?

You ſhould imitate that worthy Grecian wraſtler, of whom Clemens Alexandrinus (e) ſpeaketh, who after long preparation going to combat ſtaied himſelf on the way, and looking on a Statue of his God ſaid unto it: I have done my duty, do you yours. Become a good man, and a deſerving, and believe God will not fail to give you what ſhall be moſt behooffull.

Our great King Robert made one day upon this occaſion an Obſervation for ever to be remembred, noted by Glaber, an antient Authour. He ſaith, that a certain Abbot having preſented the King with a goodly Horſe, in imitation of thoſe, who fiſh in giving, and caſt out one gift as an book to draw another, hoped this Horſe would run ſo well for his Maſter, as to bring him home a Biſhoprick. But the good King ſeeing the ſiniſter intention of this man ſent him to the Church, commanding him to return with his Crozier, which he quickly did, propoſing to himſelf in his minde an augmentation of Livings, as his avarice had repreſented to him. But as ſoon as the King eſpied him afar off: "Hold down that "Crozier (ſaith he) you are unworthy of it, ſince "you think to have it from a man: to the which he obeyed, though much aſhamed, and was as one dropped out of the clouds. Our Robert, endowed with a natural goodneſs, was not willing he ſhould too long ſuffer this diſgrace, but commanded the Crozier to be put into the right hand of the Image of our Saviour, which ſtood directly upon the Altar, then turning himſelf to the Abbot: "Take "(ſaith he) your Crozier, and learn, that it is he "there that gives it you. I would not have you ſo "much as give thanks to a mortal man, but that you "freely uſe it, as the honour of your charge re-"quireth. What a King? What a Leſſon?

As for the other rock, which concerneth the uſe of goods, God forbid, when you come to maturity of age, that you employ the Patrimony of Jeſus, the ſweat and blood of the faithfull, in good chear, exceſs, and play to fatten beaſts, or men worſe then beaſts, who live but on the ſins of others, to raiſe unto your ſelf an heap of anger in the day of judgments. God forbid, the buildings of an Abbey ſhould fall to decay, the Altars become naked, the Images of Saints ſhivered in pieces, the Lamps, and Lights be eclipſed, the Walls weep, and Spiders there ſpin their webs, Rats run up and down, and Religious men famiſh: that Prieſts there ſhould preſent themſelves before the Altar with ridiculous habits, which taſte of a Tavern, whileſt I know not what little neece drags Silk at her heels, at the charge of the Crucifix.

My God! who will bring back to us a Guy the Groſs, that flouriſhed in the time of St. Lewis? I would kiſs his aſhes, and put them, were it poſſible, over Mitres and Crowns. (g) This great Perſonage, firſt a Proctour, married, and father of two Daughters, his wife dying, was made Prieſt; from a Prieſt, Biſhop of Puy, from thence Arch-Biſhop of Narbone, afterward Cardinal, and laſtly Pope. It was expected that his two Daughters, which he left to the world, ſhould become great Princeſſes: but the good Pope made one Religious, with a penſion of thirty pounds, and married the other, giving her for full dower three hundred pounds in marriage to a nephew-Prieſt, who promiſed himſelf many Titles, Mitres, and Croziers, of three Prebends he poſſeſſed he took two away, commanding him to content himſelf with one alone, and by his Letters ſignifying, it was not reaſon his advancement to the Papacy, which gave him cauſe of terrour, and tears, ſhould ſhould miniſter matter unto his of pride, and riot. This act of ſimplicity is a thouſand times more admirable, then if he had made his Daughters Queens of Antioch, and turned all his houſe into Gold.

Behold the prudence of St. Auguſtine, of whom Poſſidius (h) writeth: He uſed his own kindred as the reſt of the faithfull, giving to them, if the caſe ſo required, not to enrich them, but to free them from neceſſity, or at leaſt to make them live in the leſs penury.

To what purpoſe ſhould you be prodigal of an eſtate, whereof you are but a Steward (i)? One part thereof is due to the Miniſters of the Altar, another part to the poor, (k) and a third part to the Fabrick. If there be any magnificence in the Church, it belongs to the publick, particulars ſhould be ſatified with modeſty. Why ſhould you paſs into the other world, charged with crimes, and debts, drawing the malediction of heaven and earth on your heads.

The fifth SECTION.

The third quality of a good Prelate, which is purity of life.

YOur third attire is of white Linen, which ſignifieth the Angelical purity you ſhould obſerve from your moſt tender years, to carry it with you to the Altar. The Prophet Iſaiah (a) telleth, they ſhould have their veſſels very clean, who are choſen to bear the veſſels of God. And for this purpoſe all the Saints adviſe us to avoid the daily and familiar converſation of women, who are manifeſt ſnares of chaſtity. (b) Believe me, it is one of the moſt important points of your carriage. A Prelate abiding within the limits of this purity would appear in his commerce with men, as if he came from a Quire of Angels. But as ſoon as he falleth into a licentious life, he forſaketh the dignity of his character, and goeth out from the Throne of Majeſty, as the unfortunate Babylonian King, to feed on Hay among beaſts. The night diſcovereth not more Stars in the Heavens, then it openeth eys on the earth to obſerve his moſt ſecret pleaſures, ears to hearken to his deportment, and mouths to divulge them through all Provinces. He is looked on as a ſtrange bird, that is newly gone out of his element; and God permits, that, having ſold his ſoul for Hogs-draff, he ſhould ſtill reſt unſatisfied, finding eachwhere a long web of perplexities, and a rolling wheel of immortal puniſhments. To ſome he ſerves for matter of mirth, to others as a ſhuttle-cock, he giveth occaſion of tears to few, of indignation to all.

Men

(d) Vitruvius in præfat. l. 6. Cæteri Architecti rogant, & ambiunt, ut architectentur: mihi à præceptoribus eſt traditum, rogatum non rogantem oportere ſuſcipere curam; quòd ingenuus color movetur pudore, petendorum ſuſpicioſus.

(e) Clem. Alexand. Strom. l. 7. ἀνὴρ δίκαιος τὴν νίκην ἐμοί. An excellent paſſage of King Robert. Glab. Rudolphus, lib. 5. c. 1. Idem refert Juret. ad Ep. 157. Yvonis Carn. Quidam tribuunt Henrico Imper.

(g) Vita Clemen. 4. apud Alphonſum Ciacconium.

(h) Nec ſuos conſanguineos in ſua vita ac morte more vulgi tractavit; quibus, dum adhuc ſupereſſet, id, ſi opus fuit, quod & cæteris erogavit, non ut divitias haberent, ſed ut non egerent, aut minus egerent. Poſſidius de S. Aug.

(i) Non cui propria ſunt, ſed communes Eccleſiæ facultates. Proſper. lib. 1. de vita contemplativa cap. 6. Sacerdotes bonorum Eccleſiæ non poſſeſſores, ſed diſpenſatores ſunt. Aug. ep. 50.

(k) Mendici Dei ſumus: ut cognoſcat ille mendicos ſuos, cognoſcamus nos noſtros. Aug. ſer. 5. de verbo Domini.

(a) Mundamini qui fertis vaſa Domini. Iſaiah 52.

(b) Verè continentes aſſiduas mulierum etiam probarum familiaritates fugit. S. Ephrem. de temperantia. Non poteſt cum Deo toto corde habitare, qui fœminarum acceſſibus copulatur. Fœmina conſcientiam ſicum pariter habitantis exurit. Hier. ad Nepotianum.

Men for him are wounded with jealouſie, and women, have they never ſo little honeſty, abhor him. There are none but certain Harpies, which (as ſaith Cardinal Petrus Damianus) flie round about Altars to pillage them, who bear him the like good will, as Ravens do to carrion. He lives in a kinde of ſtupidity of ſpirit, in continual indiſpoſition of body, diſgrace in his temporal fortunes, the fable of the world, the object of Heaven's anger, and earth's execration. Finally, he reſembleth an old Sepulchre, that hath nothing in it but ſtench, and Titles. Happily then ponder in your heart, what the life of a Prieſt ought to be, who is the houſe God, of the cabinet, and as it were of the boſom of God. To think a wickedneſs, is a crime; to commit it, a ſacrilege; to bear it to the Altar, is a ſin which hath no proper name: there are Titles, and Offices of all vices. Oh how pure ſhould that mouth be, which approacheth to kiſs the Son of God! Oh how clean ſhould thoſe hands be, which are choſen to purge away the world's ordures! Oh how chaſte ought that heart to be, which is bedewed with the blood of the Word Eternal!

What an horrour, when a faithleſs ſoul from the bed of Wolves goeth out to find the Lamb, and carrieth the pollutions of the earth to the Sanctuary of the living God: like to that beaſtly Empreſs Meſſalina, ſpoken of by the Satyriſt(c) who bare to the Imperial bed of Claudius her husband, the infamy, and noiſomneſs of places, which ſhould not be ſo much as named in the Palace of a Roman Emperour.

St. Peter (d) ſaid, we muſt break all ill thoughts by the exerciſe of the preſence of Jeſus Chriſt, as the waves are daſhed againſt the rocks. And S. Chryſoſtom (e) adviſed Prieſts to be pure, as if they were in Heaven amidſt the Angels.

Chaſtity, faith holy Zeno, is happy in virgins, ſtrong in widows, faithfull in the married, but with Prieſts it ought to be wholly Seraphical. It is fit, he ſhould have little of the body, who is made to manage and handle the body of the Son of God. It is fit, he ſhould have ſmall commerce with the fleſh, who knoweth how to incarnate the living God in his hands. A carnal ſoul, ready to ſell his Patrimony for a meſs of Pottage, as the unworthy Eſau, is more fit for Hogs, then the Sanctuary. They heretofore ſacrificed to the Sun without effuſion of wine, and thoſe, who ſacrifice to the Maſter of the Sun, ought to entermarry ſobriety with chaſtity, which are ever mutually linked together. The banquets of rich ſeculars (ſaid S. Jerome f) are not ſo proper for Church-men. It is much fitter to comfort them in afflictions, then to accompany them in their feaſts. A Prieſt, who is ſtill preſent at weddings, is never well eſteemed of. He that would behold the modeſty which is to be obſerved at the tables of Eccleſiaſtical men, let him at the leaſt take a model upon that which Tertullian writeth in his Apologetick of the Primitive Chriſtians. Our table, ſaith he, hath nothing in it, which taſteth of ſordidneſs, ſenſuality, or immodeſty; we eat there in proportion, we drink according to the rules of temperance, ſo much we ſatiate our ſelves as is neceſſary for men, that muſt riſe in the night to offer their Prayers to God. We there ſpeak, and converſe as in the preſence of God, our hands waſhed, and Candles lighted, every one reciteth what he knows of holy Scripture, and of his own conceit, all to the praiſe of God. Prayer endeth the banquet, as it gave beginning thereunto. From the table we go to the exerciſe of modeſty, and honeſty: you would ſay, if you ſaw us, it were not a Supper we had in hand, but a Leſſon of Piety.

(c) Fada lupanaris tulit ad pulvinar Neronem.

(d) Inſtruebat Petrus diſcipulos actus vitæ ſuæ omni horâ cuſtodire, & in omni loco Deum reſpicere, firmiter cogitationes malas cordi ſuo advenientes non ad Chriſtum allidere. S. Clem. Ep. 1.

(e) Neceſſe eſt ſacerdotē ſic eſſe purum, ut in cœlo collocatus inter ipſas cœli virtutes medius ſtaret. Chryſ. de ſacerdotio.

(f) Convivia vitanda ſunt ſecularium, maximè eorum qui honoribus tument. Conſolatores nos potiùs mœroribus ſuis, quàm convivas proſperis noverint. Facilè contemnitur Clericus, qui ſæpe vocatus ad prandium nec non recuſat. Hieron. Ep. 2. Nepotian.

The ſeventh SECTION.

The fourth perfection of a Prelate, which is obſerved in zeal, and charity.

YOur fourth mark is ſcarlet, the ſign of the ardent charity and zeal you ought to retain towards the houſe of God. The buckler of brave Champions of the God of Hoſts ſhould be a buckler of fire, and all his ſouldiers muſt appear in crimſon caſſocks. You muſt early learn to bay the Hares skin in the hall, that you may afterward go into the field for the hunting of ſouls. You muſt become a wall of fire, to ſerve as a rampart in the houſe of God. You muſt be a Star, to run over, and enlighten the little world recommended to your charge. You muſt oppoſe the power of great-ones, the ſtrength of the ſturdy, the wiles of the crafty, the cloſe practices of the wicked, to divert ill actions, advance good, leave unprofitable, deſtroy vice, plant virtue, chaſtiſe delinquents, recompenſe men of merit, protect the poor, juſtify the innocent. You muſt be an eye to the blind, a foot to the lame, arm & hand to the maimed, a Sanctuary to all the world. You muſt have as many chains to oblige men to you, as God hath given you means of wel-doing. Let the miſeries, which in a right line would haſten to you, if it be poſſible, may paſs no further then you: let your houſe be a ſhop, where from ſtones the Sons of Abraham may be raiſed.

Num. 2. Clypeus fortium ejus ignitus virî exercitus in coccinis.

The High-Prieſt heretofore bare the whole world on his habit, of which he was, as it were, the Advocate; and you muſt think, when you are in office, all the world is on your ſhoulders, and that both the living and dead ſhall have a ſhare in the duty, which you ſhall render thereunto. It ſhall be your act to carry the Torch of example before the people, to inſtruct men, to cure and comfort their infirmity, to pray and ſacrifice, both for the World of the living, and thoſe, whom death already hath divided from our converſation.

What charity think you can you have to be diſcharged from theſe obligations? You muſt learn to love ſouls, as the moſt precious moveables you have in the world, to pleaſe your ſelf with the places, where the objects of your zeal are, and the knots of your charge, rather then the Courts of Princes, when you ſhall have untamed ſpirits to govern, let them ſerve as an arreſt for your heart, a ſubject for your induſtry, an exerciſe for your virtues. Satan in Job went round about the earth to entrap man. Do you think you do too much, in your opinon, if you advance ſome ſteps to ſave men? Noe was ſhut up in the Ark with about three hundred kinds of beaſts, peaceable among the waves, and deſtruction of the world, becauſe ſuch was the will of God: and you cannot reſt among ſouls created according to the Image of the Divinity, whereunto you are by duty engaged under the peril of your ſoul. What a ſhame is it for a Church-man, if he cannot live, unleſs perpetually among Horſes, Dogs, and Apes, when God ſummons him to the charge of ſouls? Julius Cæſar wondred to ſee men, who dandled Apes, having children in their houſes; and who cannot but admire, if God allotting you ſo many ſpiritual children, you perpetually kiſs Monkeys, play with little Dogs, and carry Hawks?

Nullum omnipotenti Deo tale ſacrificium, quale eſt zelus animarum. Greg. ſuper Ezech. Hom. 12.

The eighth SECTION.

The fifth excellency of a Prelate, which is Science, and Prudence.

FInally, for concluſion, you muſt ſprinkle gold over your Hyacinth, purple, and crimſon. Theſe are are the rays and lights of knowledge and prudence, which are as necessary for a Prelate, as the eie for a beautiful body. Discretion (saith S. Bernard) is not a simple virtue, but the Governess of all Virtues, the Guide of Passions, and the Mistress of Manners, which if you take away, Virtue becometh Vice (a). Prelates (as Pope Zosimus assureth us) are the eies of the Church, and if these eies be eclipsed, what darkness may we expect over the other parts of the body?

(a) Discretio non est tam virtus quàm quædam moderatrix & auriga virtutum, ordinatrixque affectuum, & morum doctrix. Tolle hanc; & virtus vitium erit. Bonav. Pharet. l. 2. c. 27. Bern. super Cantic.

We must not tell a noble Spirit, how shameful a thing it is to be in high degree of dignity, and play the golden beast. You cannot brook this affront, the very Infants and the dumb world speak, and with a finger shew it you, as did the Ass, of which Ammianus (b) writeth, who in the City Pistoia mounted at mid-day into the Tribunal of a Judge, and began with much earnestness to bray, as if he had done well to the purpose.

(b) Tribunali ascenso asinus dissonat. Hinnitus rugiens. Ammian. l. 27. c. 1.

It is a lamentable thing, if for your sake we be enforced to say, that Fortune is a daughter of a good house, but that she prostitutes her self to servants: that the Church is absolutely wise, but becomes the share of the ignorant. It were a ridiculous thing, if on you the fable of the Owl should be verified, which telleth, That the small birds had found a Rose on the way, and preparing to sing for mastery, they appointed Judges to give it to the victorious, under title of recompense for his song, as the prize of his conquest. But as they were disposing themselves for trial, came a mischievous Owl in the night, and carried away the flower without singing. Can a noble heart well endure this application should be justly made upon him, and to be held an infamous bird, which hath stollen away the flower due to the little Nightingals? Glass will not present the figure objected, if it be not leaded; whatsoever you may have either of lustre, or talents, will have no subsistence, if you lead not your head with the strength of endeavour.

Should you have the Pomegranate, which is the fruit of Kings, and were you of the blood-royal, if you have not little Bels on the border of your Garments, as had the High-priest of the old Law, to make the doctrine of the word of God to resound, you would be despised. Why then do you intermeddle with so many toys and petty trifles of children? You should be an Alexander, who better loveth the Launce of Achilles, then the Lyre of Paris. You must in these Scholes be fed with the marrow of Lions, as that young Prince, and not entertain your self with catching of flies. When you grow aged, you should not be in a Bishoprick, like a blinde Cyclops in an hollow Cave.

The ninth SECTION.

The Motives, which noble Prelates have to the duty of their Profession.

IN the Name of God, permit you may be rectified in these five virtues, which I have before alledged. The obligations which you have hereunto, if you well consider them, are very great. First, You see that such, as are of the same blood with you, endeavour to make good what they profess. Those who manage Arms will part with nothing of the glory of Arms. The most timerous would be flayed, and torn piece-meal, for a poor punctilio of honour, which is oft-times merely imaginary. They fly among naked Swords, Flames, and Musket-shots, to purchase a little reputation, which hath not ever the reward it expecteth. And you, O Noble-men, that are in the pay of the Sovereign King, whose liberality cannot deceive you, in a most honourable profession, and which should not be blemished with remissness, would you spare your endeavour to do something worthy your birth? Do you not behold a flourishing Nobility round about you, which being consecrated to the Church discovereth marvellous hopes unto us? Some do as the vines of Smyrna, that, whilest they were in blossom, bear their fruit. There is nothing now every where but study, and fervour. There are those, who win Troy the magnificent, now wholly enflamed, and will you under hatches lie snoring in the Ship.

In the second place, see who you are. You are destined to treat the cause of men with God; (a) would you betray it? You are selected to be the Oracles of God; would you make your self a Weather-cock? You are chosen to be the Ark of the Testament; would you become a vessel of reprobation? You are an Angel, and in hope a little God; would you be an Angel of darkness, and a god of straw? Apply your self wholly to God, to whom you owe all. It is not a matter of discretion for you to do well, it is a point of necessity. Angels hover over your heads, and men are on every side to observe your actions. Those, who are blinde as Moles in their own errours, have the eys of a Lynx to espy your imperfections (b).

(a) Omnis Pontifex ex hominibus assumptus pro hominibus constituitur in ea quæ sunt ad Deum. Hebr. 5.

(b) Aristoteles lib. 4. Politic. c. 15. vocat Magistratus ὀξυωπας, lumina obliscu præfixa, quod sacerdotibus proprium. S. Hier. Epist. 3. In te oculi omnium diriguntur: domus tua, & conversatio, quasi in speculo constituta, magistra est publica disciplina.

Do you not enjoy a goodly honour, when it shall be said of you, that you have a Dignity, which becomes you, as a ring of gold the snout of a hog (as speaketh the Scripture (c), and when the King, who is pleased to take the pains to look into the deportments of men Ecclesiastical, who are of eminent extraction, shall perceive you are in the Church as an unprofitable burthen, (d) to disgrace the charge which honoureth you, and that all those that name you, when you happen to be mentioned in honourable assemblies, will wish a cloud of darkness at noon-day to cover the shame of their foreheads?

(c) Prov. 12. Circulus aureus in naribus suis.

(d) Principatus sine meritorum sublimitate, bonorum titulus sine homine, dignitas in indigno, ornamentum in luto. Salvian l. 1. ad Eccles. Cath.

Add, that the Church stretched out her arms and entreateth you would not suffer her Laurels to wither in your hands, to defile her victories, nor eclipse her lights. She hath seen many miseries, many hath she born, many vanquished; but never felt any wounds more dolorous then those, which fell upon her by vice (e), ignorance, and the negligence of her Prelates. That is it, which hath opened the gate to heresies, which hath fomented infidelities, enlarged impiety, disposed the brows of the wicked to impudence, the tongue to slander, the hands to rapine, which hath darkened the present times with horrible confusions, and which vomiteth upon the times and ages of posterity. Will you encrease these calamities, and with your corruptions make a bridg for the faithless to ruine Christianity? For that perhaps shall be the last scourge, which God will use to punish the abuses of ill Prelates, and the sins of the people in general.

(e) Nescio criminum an numinum tur-bam. Tert. adverf. Valentinianos de eorum Disc. cap. 3.

For conclusion I demand, what will become of you in the end at the last judgment of God, under which the Angels tremble, who govern the world? What will become of you, when you shall be accused to have been a Viper in the Church, a scandal to the simple, an ill example to the most corrupt, a fiery Torch, that would enflame the house of God? Where may one finde punishments sufficient to inflict on you, and were can you get members enough to furnish out so many punishments, when the stones and marbles of those places you have possessed will crack into pieces to fly into your eys? On the contrary, if you take the right way, which I propose, propose, you shall lead a peaceable life in the security of a good conscience, rich in honour and ability, honourable in reputation, terrible to the wicked, reverenced by honest men, fertile in good actions, abundant in infinity of fruits, fruitful in recompenses, prosperous in successes, glorious to posterity, attended on earth with the odour of virtues, and crowned in Heaven by Eternity.

The tenth SECTION.

The examples of great Prelates are very lively spurs to Virtue.

TO come to this effect, often represent before your eys the lively images of so many worthy Prelates, who have flourished through all Ages, and behold them as Stars, which God with his own hand hath planted in this great firmament of the Church, as well that he there might make his glory shine, as here to prepare a way for our direction. Think sometime within your self what a spirit one S. Nilamon had, who died with terrour, as they bare him to the Throne of a Bishop, for which so many other pine away with ambition, he foregoing life with apprehension he should lose his innocency? What humility in S. Peter of Alexandria, who being the lawful Successor of S. Mark, would never mount to his Chair, but contented himself to sit the residue of his days on the foot-stool, until, after his death, the people, having attired him with his Pontifical habit, did carry his body to the sear, which he never had possessed? A man truly humble, whose death must be expected to honour his merit, as if honour were incompatible with his life. What zeal in Eustathius Bishop of Epiphanium, whose heart was so surprized with only notice of the profanation of a Church, that he fell down dead in the place, making himself a Tomb, furnished with the triumphs of his own piety, a thousand times more pretious then gold and richest Diamonds? What liberality in S. Exuperius Bishop of Tholouse, to give away the gold and silver of his Church, for the necessities of the poor, yea, even to the carrying of the blessed Sacrament in a little basket of Osier? What charity in Saint Paulinus, who after he had in alms spent his whole Patrimony, which was both very rich and abundant, sold himself, and voluntarily became a slave, to redeem the sons of poor Widows? What faith in Saint Gregory Thaumaturgus, to remove mountains, and command over Elements, with as much liberty as a Master over his servants? What power in S. Leo, and S. Lupus, to stay Attila, and make head against an Army composed of seven hundred thousand men, drawn from the most dreadful Nations of the earth? What confidence in S. Martin, to submit his shoulders to receive the fall of a huge tree, on condition he might thereby banish the Idols? Let us lay aside all other actions, which are miraculous: behold the lives of those, who have traced a more ordinary way. Imitate the contemplation of a S. Denis, the fervour of a S. Ignatius, the constancy of a S. Athanasius, the contempt of the world of a S. Hilary, the generosity of a S. Cyprian, the austerity of a S. Basil, the mildness of a S. Augustine, the majesty of a S. Ambrose, the vigilancy of a S. Gregory, the vigour of a S. Cyril, the wisdom of a S. Remigius. Propose to your self the acts of S. Vedastus, Herculanus, Eleutherius, Medardus, Lucipinus, Nicerius, Romanus, Sulpitius, Pretextatus, Germanus, Amandus, Claudius, Lambertus, Wolphraus, Swibertus, and many such like. Consider the deportments of S. Thomas of Canterbury, S. Lewis of Tholouse, and, above all, let not your eie pass over S. Charles Borromæus, whom God hath made resplendent in our days, to teach us, that no Age is secluded from Sanctity.

Martyrol. Rom. ad 6. Januar.

Baronius.

Chron. Alexandr.

A man is powerful to perswade virtue, when in one and the same instant he alledgeth threescore thousand reasons, each of which weigh a Crown of gold (hath one of the best Writers of this Age said:) and so did S. Charles, forsaking threescore thousand crowns of yearly rent for one mornings Mass.

He was a Bishop, who often fasted with bread and water, even in the time of feasts; who every day said his Breviary on his knees, and moistened it with his tears: who celebrated Mass every day with a majesty more then humane, who had two retirements in the year to attend to Spiritual exercises; who read the Bible on his knees, shedding brinish tears, who gave alms above his ability, who in person waited on the infectious, who wore hair-cloth under his scarlet habit, who slept on the bare boards, who stirred not out of his Dioces, who visited it on foot, who in his charge made himself indefatigable, who ever was the foremost in good works, in the Church, in the Hospital, with the sick, at a Sermon, who was most exact in not giving Orders, nor Benefices, but to persons very capable, and of good life; who never did any matter important, without communicating it to the Pope, and his Cardinals, whom he as an Oracle honoured. These are the words of this fore-mentioned Authour, which seem to have very little bulk, but much weight. Is it not sufficient to make you undertake by necessity that, which you cannot refuse without crime? No longer think upon piety as a thing impossible, and do not like ill Physicians, who make the sick despair of health, because they cannot cure them.

The Reverend Father Binet.

These later Ages are not so barren of good men, who are most excellent Plants in the Orchard of Almighty God, but that it hath born, and doth still produce plenty of good Prelates, who honour their profession by the merit of their virtues. If you cast your eie upon those, whom the nearnes of time doth make us, as it were, almost to touch, you shall behold a Cardinal George of Amboyse, who was marvellously potent, but employed all his power to the maintenance of the Church, and State, and never sought to be great, but to oblige inferiours, nor approach to the Court, but there most gloriously to serve his Prince.

A Zimenes, Arch-bishop of Toledo, who amidst the magnificence of Court retained the austerity of a religious man, who was such an enemy of pomp, and ostentation, that he hath been seen to visit his Dioces on foot, without train, or attendance, who employed his ample revenues, to make war against Sarazens, build Monasteries, found Universities, imprint those admirable Bibles in many Languages, which are the treasures of all the Libraries in the world. A Pool, who was not only free from the ambitions and avarice of the world, but made as small an account of his body, as of his shirt, since he being violently persecuted by King Henry the Eighth, plainly said, that for defence of the faith he would as willingly dis-array himself of life, as of his habit, and would ever be as ready to enter into his Tomb, as into his bed to sleep. You shall there behold the four Cardinals of Bourbon, who have equalled their virtues to the blood of Kings, and the Purple of their sacred College. The great Cardinal of Lorrain, who hath had the honor to anoint three of our Kings with his own hands, to assist in their Councils, to enlighten them with the rays of his spirit, to fend them by his fidelity, fortifying his hand from his tendreſt youth, for the conſervation of the State. In all theſe pomps he wore auſterity under ſcarlet, he preached, and ardently catechiſed the moſt ſimple of his Dioceſs, he ſupported, as an adamantine pillar, the faith, which was both in France and Germany ſo ſhaken by the unſpeakable diſorder of the times: he received the remnants of the Engliſh ſhipwrack with moſt pious liberality, he inſtituted Religious Orders, he raiſed Seminaries, he, on every ſide armed againſt impiety.

A Cardinal of Tournon, who ſerved four Kings, to wit, Francis the Firſt, Henry the Second, Francis the Second, Charles the Ninth; and that in France and Rome, in all the moſt important affairs: being likewiſe Arbitratour of the great Potentates of the earth, with a moſt remarkable loyalty, a prudence ineſtimable, a courage invincible. A Baronius, who hath eternized himſelf by the endeavour of his hands, a thouſand times more honourable then all the Monarchs of Egypt in their rich Marbles, Pyramids, and Obeliſks. But from whence think you have the large bleſſings of his labours proceeded, but from a moſt innocent life, which was as the Sun without blemiſh? but from a moſt ardent charity, which cauſed him for the ſpace of nine whole years, to viſit Hoſpitals morning and evening, to help the neceſſities of the poor? but from a moſt ſingular piety, which waſting his life in the fervour of his prayers, conſumed alſo his revenues with good works in moſt ſacred liberalities?

A Tolet, a Religious man out of Order, who, raiſed to the dignity of a Cardinal, employed the moſt part of the hours of day and night in prayer; living on nothing almoſt but herbs and pulſe, faſting the Saturdays with bread and water, and adding a particular Lent beſides the ordinary, to the honour of the moſt glorious Virgin Mary, as the reverend Father Hilarian de Coſta, obſerveth in the Treatiſe of his life. Cardinal D'Oſſat, writing to Monſieur Villeroy, affordeth him the titles of ſanctity, learning, prudence, integrity, worth, fidelity; and ſaith, it is an admirable thing, to ſee the handy-work of God in raiſing this great man for advancement of the affairs of France, and abſolution of the late King of moſt famous memory. And the great Cardinal Peron, in a letter he wrote to this triumphant Monarch, dated the ſecond of September, in the year 1595. ſaith, among other things, ſpeaking of the negotiation of Tolet upon this affair. 'Beſides, that he hath 'renounced all worldly reſpects, to embrace the e-'quity and juſtice of your cauſe, that he hath ſhut 'up his eys from the natural obligation of his 'Prince, Country, Parents, that he hath trampled 'under foot all ſorts of menaces, promiſes, and tem-'ptations: he hath alſo taken ſo much pain both of 'body and minde upon this treaty, that we much 'wonder he ſhrunk not under the burthen; com-'bating ſometimes by writing, ſometime by confe-'rence with thoſe who were oppoſite, removing and 'animating ſuch as were ſtupid, and in ſum, carrying 'this buſineſs with ſuch zeal and conſtancy, that 'your Majeſty could not hope for ſo many trials, 'not to ſay, ſo many maſter-pieces, yea miracles, 'from the moſt affectionate and couragious of all 'your ſervants. Behold the teſtimony of a moſt untainted Prelate.

I ſay nothing of the excellent Bellarmine, nor of that prime man among the Learned, the moſt illuſtrious Peron, nor of the great light of ſanctity, my Lord Biſhop of Geneva, whoſe lives are printed. I likewiſe behold moſt eminent perſonages on the Theatre of France, who as celeſtial bodies, have ſufficient height and luſtre, and are of ability to exerciſe a pen more powerful then mine: but ſince I have put my ſelf upon limits, not to ſpeak here of any man now living, I better love to reſemble thoſe, who being not of ſtature able to affix Crowns on the head of the Suns ſtatue, burnt flowers to it, to make their odour mount to the Heavens. So ſince I cannot crown their merit with humane praiſe, I will offer up prayers and vows for their proſperities, with all ſubmiſſion due to their eminent qualities. As it is not my humour profuſely to enlarge upon the panegyricks of the living; ſo is it not my intention to inſert all the dead in this little Treatiſe. If you ſeek for thoſe, who ſpeak and write purpoſely, you will be overwhelmed with a main cloud of witneſſes, which will ſhew you men who have been greater then Kingdoms, who have parallel'd the paſſed Ages, edified the preſent, enlightened the future, and upheld great fortunes by a much greater ſanctity. All theſe will tell you, we have nothing immortal in us, but the riches of the minde, and all this exteriour luſtre of the world, which charmeth the eys of men, is but a cloud in painting, a petty vapour of water, a fable of time, a Dial, which we then only behold, when the Sun of honour reflecteth on it, and, which muſt in the end be buried in an eternal night of oblivion. Let us now ſee the great S. Ambroſe, whom we among thouſands have ſelected to ſerve as a model for this firſt diſcourſe. You therein ſhall obſerve a man of a moſt noble extraction, endowed with admirable parts, and, who by neceſſity of duty, and conſiderations of charity, was converſant in the Courts of Emperours, and in the infinite perplexity of many affairs, which he with all manner of prudence and courage handled, ſhewing in his deportments a vigorous ſanctity, choſen by the Divine Providence, to make, as it were, the whole ſtate of Chriſtendom moſt eminent.

Greg. Paſtoral curæ lib. c. 4.

St.

S^r. AMBROSE.

The first SECTION.

His Calling.

THE first mark of perfection, which we require in a good Prelate, to wit, Divine calling, is in great S. Ambroſe ſo manifeſt, that, were it written with the rays of the Sun, it could not be made more perſpicuous. We may in ſome ſort ſpeak of him, what he ſaid (a) of S. John Baptiſt, That it ſeemeth God began to prepare him from his Mother's womb, to exerciſe his virtue one day in main battles. Firſt, It is a thing remarkable, that ſeeing reſolution was taken in Heaven, to make this Prelate one of the moſt couragious and eloquent men of the world, he ſhould be extracted from the Nobility, which is ordinarily full of generoſity; being derived from a Father, honoured with one of the chief charges of the Empire, which was the Lieutenancy over the Gauls. Beſides, he came into the world firſt breathing French air, which hath been eſteemed (according to S. Hierom (b) the Countrey of the moſt noble and learned ſpirits of the earth: and Sidonius (c) another Prelate hath ſaid, The valour of a French-man extendeth further then his life; for he liveth even then, when the ſoul and body are divided. Secondly, As we have obſerved before, God many times declared the calling of Infants by ſundry preſages. It was a great ſign of the eloquence of Saint Ambroſe, to behold a ſwarm of Bees (d) all together ſettle on his Cradle, which was at that time brought out into a Court of his Father's Palace, that the Childe might thereby take a little freſh air. The Nurſe ſeeing theſe little honey-creatures buzz about him, much nearer then ſhe could have wiſhed, coming, and going to his lips, was affrighted, and thought to drive them away, but the Father, who walking in the ſame place with his wife and daughter beheld this pretty ſport, made a ſign ſhe ſhould hold her hands, leſt by exaſperating theſe little creatures, ſhe might provoke their ſtings. In the end, they peaceably forſook the place and ſoared away ſo high, that they loſt ſight of them. At that time Ambroſe, Father of our great Prelate, ſpake aloud as with the ſpirit of propheſie; This Infant ſhall be great. And verily, theſe Bees much better alluded to S. Ambroſe, then to Plato, who is ſaid to have had the like hap in his infancy. For we muſt affirm, the eloquence of Plato had hony in it, and no ſting: but this of S. Ambroſe, beſides the exceeding ſweetneſs thereof in peaceable arguments, had, when there was occaſion of combate, ſtings that pierced to the quick.

We may well ſay, he was the moſt elaborate in his ſtyle, of all the Doctours of the Church, eſpecially if we ſpeak of the Latines. For many, as S. Hierom, and S. Auguſtine, often-times dictated with much vehemency of ſpirit what came to their minde: but S. Ambroſe did not ſo much accuſtome himſelf to dictate to a writer, for he in compoſing ever had his pen in hand, (e) to poliſh his works at leiſure, and as we ſay, Lick his own Bear.

Add hereunto another ſign of his vocation, in the childiſh ſports he exerciſed without conſideration, as did heretofore Saint Athanaſius, being then, as he, an Infant, which was, to cauſe his ſiſter, and the children which attended her, to kiſs his hand, as the hand of a Biſhop, he therein taking much pleaſure. It ſeemeth, God ſometimes ſheweth children as with his finger the way they ſhould purſue. It is an admirable thing, that there was in Paris found a young beggar, called Mauritius, ſo far tranſport-

(a) Ambl. 1. Comment. in Lucam, cap. 1. Ungebatur & quaſi bonus athleta exercebatur in utero matris: ampliſſimum virtus certamini parabatur.

(b) Hieron. adverſus Vigilantium. Sola Gallia monſtra non habuit, ſed viris ſemper fortiſſimis & eloquentiſſimis abundavit.

(c) Sidonius Apol. carm. 1. Invicti per-ſtant animique ſuperſunt. Jam prope poſt animam.

(d) The Cradle of S. Ambroſe.

(e) Ambroſ. Epiſt. 65. ad Sabinum. Nobis autem, quibus cura eſt ſimilem ſermonem familiari oſui ad unguem diſtingere, & lento quodam ſuo gradu, aptius videtur proprium manere noſtra eſſe, &c.

ed in his own fancy, that he one day might become Bishop of Paris, that many offers being jestingly made unto him in his infinite necessity, to move him to renounce the right he pretended to the Bishoprick of this ample City, it proved merely impossible: which a wealthy man perceiving, he so furthered him in study, as in the end he came to the degree, which to himself he had prefigured. What shall we say? God unlooseth even the tongues of Mothers, to speak prophetically touching the state of their children. Witness a most honourable Lady, named Ida, Mother of three Sons, Baldwin, Godfrey, Eustace, who one day sporting with her, and hiding themselves under her Gown, and many times shewing their heads with divers pretty childish dalliances; the Father casually coming thither in the midst of their play, as they were all covered with their Mother's garment, demanded, Who have we there? The Lady readily answered, not knowing what she should say, It is a King, a Duke, and a Count. So it proved; Baldwin was King of Jerusalem, Godfrey succeeded in the Dutchy of Lorrain to his Father the great Godfrey of Bouillon, and Eustace was Earl of Boloigne. God made use of this woman's tongue, as of the hand of a Dial, which pointeth out the hours, as the great wheel guides it, leaving no memory where it touched. Ambrose did the like at that time, directed by the spirit of God. He made himself Bishop in his own imagination; but when he pursued the way of his proper reason, and natural judgment, he therein used all resistance, not thinking he was called thereunto.

In the third place, his calling was altogether extraordinary and miraculous, in that being sent into the Territory of Milan, in the quality of a Governour: Probus, who substituted him, merrily said; Go, rule like a Bishop, rather then a President: recommending mildness unto him, that he might apply a lenitive to the great rigours that were used in matter of justice. This fell out much otherwise then Probus and Ambrose had projected; for, as the History telleth, Auxentius, an Arrian Bishop, who had much longer lived then was fit for a man so wicked, some little time before deceased at Milan, the Metropolitan place of his Diocess, & when there was question to proceed to election, there were many difficulties between the Catholicks and Arrians, every one coveting to create a Bishop of his own party. The emulation, which was much enkindled, threatened to draw blood from the veins of both sides, before it could be quenched. Ambrose, as a Magistrate, went thither to redress it. And behold at the same instant a little childe, as if it had been an Angel descended from Heaven, cried out in the midst of the Assembly, Ambrose must be created Bishop. This loud voice was seconded by all men, as a voice sent from the mouth of God. The fire of dissention was quenched in an instant, the most outragious courages forsook their Arms, and thought on nothing but to raise Ambrose, who was not as yet baptized, to bear him by ordinary degrees to the Episcopal Chair.

There were some obstacles herein on every side. For first, it was against the Laws of the Church to choose a Bishop, since the Council of Nice condemneth those Prelates, who give Orders to Priests presently after baptism. Secondly, There was an Edict of the Emperour, which forbad the advancement of his Officers and civil Magistrates, without his express consent. In the third place, Ambrose, who was wholly dedicated to a secular life, had neither vein nor artery, which enclined to election. But who can resist the spirit of God, when he is pleased to strike a stroke with his own hand beyond the imagination and judgments of men? All difficulties one after another were taken away: and this election was approved, not only by the holy See, but of all the Eastern, and Western Bishops, who much rejoyced and congratulated with S. Ambrose, by their Letters. The Emperor Valentinian gave his assent thereunto, boasting, he had sent such good Governours to Provinces, that they were thought capable of Bishopricks. There was no body but Ambrose to subdue, who used all sorts of engines and practices to divert this purpose. He, who ever of his own nature was exceeding milde, feigned himself bloody, causing racks and tortures to be publickly exercised on offenders, yet needs would they have him for Bishop. He, who was most chaste, made men and women of ill life haunt his house, and descended even to the shadow of sin, to flee the light of glory, yet ceased they not to pursue him. He fled, and after he had for a whole night travelled hard, thinking he was far off, found himself at the gates of Milan, from whence he departed. In the end he was forced to yield to the spirit of Almighty God, who gave him such evident tokens of his calling. Needs must he undergo the charge he so constantly had refused, and where humane prudence loseth its sight, we must suffer it to attend the direction of Eternal Providence.

Vade, age, non ut Judex, sed ut Episcopus.

The election of St. Ambrose. Concil. Nicenum. Can. 1. Miserum est eum fieri magistrum, qui necdum didicit esse discipulus. Innocentius primus ep. 12. ad Aurelium Hieron. Ne milles antequam Tyro, ne prius magister sis, quam discipulus.

The second SECTION.

A short Elogie of the Life, and Manners of S. Ambrose.

I Will do as Geographers, who put the whole World into a little Map. I intend to comprize in few words that which deserveth a Volume, and give you a brief table of the life, and manners of this great Saint.

S. Ambrose was a man, in whom it seemed virtue was incorporated, to make it self visible to mortal eys. Goodness, which cometh to others by study, seemed his by nature, since he had consecrated his infancy by the ignorance of vice, and whiteness of innocency. Others think it ill to commit a sin, and with him it was a great vice to omit a virtue. When he lived in the house of his father, with his good sister Marcellina, he attended to the practice of virtuous actions: they both were as flint-stones, which by proximity make the sparkles fly. So the holy emulation they used in the pursuit of good enkindled the sensible apprehension of God in their hearts, by a mutual reverberation. He went from this Schole, as Samuel from the Tabernacle, to bear innocency to the Episcopal Throne, and there to receive dignity. His life served as a Rule, his example as a Torch, his Learning as an Ornament, and his very silence, as an admonition.

Rare endowments of a Prelate.

If you regard the virtues, which ordinarily lay the foundations of spiritual building, such as are sobriety and continency; Ambrose undertook fasts for delight, commonly eating but once a day, and that with moderation: he tied himself to the one, for the love of the Cross, and admitted the other by way of necessity. This exercise much served him to conserve his purity, which most inviolably he kept even in the very course of secular life, as it was found in his private papers, where he very ardently begged of Almighty God, that he would give him grace to maintain in his Episcopal dignity the gift of chastity, which he had offered him in a secular life. He daily rose from his bed, as the Phœnix from her nest, having no other flames, but those of that great Sun, which scorcheth Angels in Heaven, and the most

Angelical

Angelical hearts on earth. From this temperance proceeded his admirable converſation, which gained all hearts; and who ſo well knew how to joyn the wiſdom of the Serpent with the ſimplicity of the Dove. He was prudent with good men, ſharp againſt the practices of the wicked, yet crafty never. His diſcourſe came from him with ſuch an Oeconomy, that the ignorant found inſtruction therein; the curious light, the learned ſolidity, the eloquent grace, the vitious terrour, the virtuous edification, the timorous confidence, the afflicted conſolation, and the whole world admiration. There was nothing idle in this man, all ſpake in him, all tended to praiſe-worthy actions: his ſtudy was holy Letters, his care to expreſs in his manners what he had read in books; he was prompt in all which he did, and had but one hinderance in the world, and that was prayer, which he would never have left, if diſcretion had not taught him to forſake God, to finde God. His intentions were moſt ſincere, his negotiations honourable, his ſilence diſcrete, his words ever profitable, his heart full of compaſſion; and although the eminency of his life raiſed him above all men, yet the ſweetneſs of his nature made him familiar with all ſuch as ſtood in need of his aſſiſtance. As much as his zeal made him terrible to thoſe, who durſt contend with his Maſter; ſo much his mildneſs rendered him communicable to all the world: his exteriour imployments nothing diminiſhed his interiour, nor did retirement for contemplation hinder the manage of affairs.

Never was he imperious, but to ſupport the Empire of the Saviour of the World. As he elevated himſelf towards Heaven, when there was occaſion to defend the Church; ſo he humbled himſelf to loweſt degrees, when he was to condeſcend to humane infirmities. Honour always ſeemed to him the tribute of God, and whileſt he lived, he conſtantly yielded it to his Maſter, without keeping ought elſe for himſelf, but the burthen of his miniſtery. His continual exerciſe was to inſtruct Monarchs, exhort people, convince Hereticks, comfort the afflicted, feed the hungry, cloath the naked, redeem priſoners, entertain pilgrims, ſhew the way of ſalvation to the erring, ſave the deſperate from ſhipwrack, enflame the luke-warm, cheriſh the fervent, provide for all thoſe who were under his charge, and punctually to act all the duties of his profeſſion.

Expreſſa ab Hilar. Arel.

He thought all the miſeries in the world were properly his, and bewailed them as his own. He likewiſe accounted the good hap, commodity, and advancements of his Neighbour, were his own riches and enablements, as if in one ſole heart all the hearts of the world were included. There was neither need of Porter, nor Page in his houſe, to give him notice of ſuch as would ſpeak with him, for he was ever expoſed to commerce, as writeth S. Auguſtine. Every one ran to him, nor did any man think the time long in his company; ſuch pleaſure they took in his converſation. The needy who arrived at his houſe went not away without relief. From the time he entered into office, he conſecrated his whole patrimony to the poor, giving, as it were, all he had, without reſerving ſo much as himſelf. Although tranſitory goods are conſumed, faith never is waſted. Faith ſerveth for alms, and alms fail not to faith. Theſe temporal aſſiſtances gave paſſage to grace and ſpiritual viſits; by which he endeavoured to ſweeten, as with oyl, the yoke of Jeſus Chriſt, and adorn with virtue the ſouls of all his ſubjects, as his own heart, which was a true receptacle of charity. Never was man more beloved, or feared then he; ſo well did he know to diſpence theſe two different affections. Every man reverenced him as his Lord, and obſerved him as his father; each man thought he found his country, kindred, and accommodations, where S. Ambroſe was.

The ſecond SECTION.

His Government.

THe Eccleſiaſtical Government of S. Ambroſe is the rule of all the noble actions of the Clergy, as heretofore the Sicle of the Sanctuary was the model of other coins. This great man hath left ſuch an Idea her eof in his writings and manners, that the ſenſual finde therein how to conſider their end, the luke-warm wherewith to be enflamed, the imperfect to be corrected, and the moſt perfect what they may daily learn. His fair ſoul was as the Ibis, a bird of Egypt, which buildeth her neſt in the Palms. It was perpetually converſant in great contemplations, and had no more impreſſions of the earth, then the ſupreme ſphere of celeſtial bodies.

The principal Maxim, on which he eſtabliſhed the perfection of his Eccleſiaſtical life, was that which he afterward digeſted in writing, in the Epiſtle to Irenæus, whereof I have ſpoken heretofore: 'Go 'to, Ambroſe (ſaith he within himſelf) behold thy 'ſelf a Prieſt, and, which is more, a Biſhop. This 'dition requireth a ſober gravity, alienated from 'the manners of ordinary men; a life wholly ſeri- 'ous, weighty, and ſolid, in degree of ſingularity. It 'is a folly to think the dignity of a Biſhop conſiſteth 'in the exerciſe of ceremonies, or exteriour ge- 'ſtures in publick. How ſhall he be regarded by the 'people, who hath nothing in his manners different 'from the people? What wouldſt thou have the 'world admire in thee, if it behold nothing in thee 'above it ſelf, if it findes its imperfections there, if 'after it hath bluſhed at one vice to which it is ſub- 'ject, it obſerve thou haſt placed it in the throne 'of dignity with thee? Since needs I muſt be a Bi- 'ſhop (a) let me ſeek out a life free from the 'tongues of the moſt inſolent, and which hath ne- 'thing common with the works of weak ones.

Epiſt. ad Irenæum, quæ eſt ſecunda libri tertii in ordine vigeſima. The foundation of an Epiſcopal life.

(a) Quærat meus nobis vitam inacceſſam ſeremonibus inſolentium, inviam operibus impiorum.

Following this rule, he in his heart deteſted the practice of thoſe, who enter into charge by ſiniſter ways, and ſeek after nothing therein but exteriour luſtre, or temporal commodities: in ſuch ſort, that ſpeaking of ſuch a Prelate in the book which he compoſed of Epiſcopal dignity, he ſaith; (b) We behold him with carnal eys as a great Biſhop, and God with his eys, which cannot be deceived, ſees him as a foul Leper. Fleſh took the dignity, and the ſoul hath loſt honeſty. Fleſh predominateth over people, and the ſoul is a ſlave to Devils.

(b) Lib. de dignitate Sacerdot. c. 5. Oculis quidem carnalibus videtur quaſi Epiſcopus magnus, & divinis obtutibus inſpicitur quaſi lepra ſua magnus. Caro ſuſcepit dignitatem, & anima perdidit honeſtatem. Caro dominatur populis, & anima ſervit damonii.

It is no hard matter to perſwade a man to virtue, who believes it to be his principal buſineſs. This ſage Prelate, having laid the foundations of good and ſincere intentions, applied himſelf ſo to his charge, that day and night he admitted no other thought. For, leaving the manage of houſhold-affairs to his brother Satyrus, he addreſt himſelf wholly to Epiſcopal functions, which he exerciſed with ſo much perfection, induſtry, and readineſs, that Paulinus, an eie-witneſs of his actions, ſaid, He did as much alone, as five other Biſhops.

First, Seeing he ſucceeded a man, who had ſown diſſention, he found it was very neceſſary often to preach Catholick verities, which he performed with much fruit, but labour indefatigable. For, coming from the order of Magiſtracy to Epiſcopal dignity, he muſt learn that, which his firſt profeſſion never had taught him; and although he might in ſuch neceſſity ceſſity have made uſe of others labours, notwithſtanding he, who prudently thought fit, that the doctrine we teach ſhould bud in our hearts, and take beginning in our inventions, to produce it with the more utility, put himſelf ſeriouſly to the reading of Scriptures and holy Fathers that were of his time, to bring forth afterward in his ſoul what he ſhould ſpeak and obſerve; for it was the counſel, which he afterward gave to Biſhop Conſtantinus. You (c) muſt (ſaith he) gather together the water, which diſtilleth from the Prophets, as the clouds from many places, to the end, your land may be moiſtened and watered with their familiar fountains. His preachings were ſolid, pure, gently flowing, and full of good inſtructions; and although his diſcourſe had much ſweetneſs in it, yet had he not ſo ſuck'd honey from thoſe Bees, which courted him in his cradle, that he retained not their ſtings. A nature too flexible reſembleth the air, which as ſoon giveth place to beggars, as Cæſars: as there is nothing more inſupportable in a charge then a ſpirit opinionative, ſo nothing is more fruitleſs then a weather-cock, who turneth with every wind, and hath no other direction, but the paſſions of all thoſe, that neareſt approach him. S. Ambroſe endeavoured to cure all the world, as much as he might poſſible with ſweetneſs, mixing oft-times his own tears with thoſe of his penitents: but if he met with obdurate and rebellious hearts, he took upon him a marvellous predominancy both of authority and eloquence, to tame vice, and diſarm inſolence. Conſtantine (d) a great Phyſician obſerveth, that it is not good to feed thoſe with hony, or milk, who are dangerouſly wounded, for ſeldom by this courſe is death eſcaped. Our great Biſhop made the like judgment upon the maladies of the ſoul, and never bent himſelf to cheriſh by ſupple indulgences thoſe hearts, which he ſaw to be ulcered with any malice. His admonitions were not upon idle diſcourſes, for they were ſeen to be waited on with good effects, and, as it were, a general reformation in all orders.

(c) Colligit de pluribus locis aquam, quam effundunt nubes prophetica, ut terra tua humeſcat, & domeſticis irrigetur fontibus. Lib. 3. Ep. 1

(d) Conſtantinus Medicus De liquidis.

(e) Reformation of the Clergy

(e) He began to meaſure the Temple by the Sanctuary: for eſteeming that the ſinews of words are laudable examples, he endeavoured to make a good Clergy to ſerve as a mirrour for the Laity. The waters of Jordan heretofore offered homage to the feet of Prieſts, becauſe they bare the Ark on their ſhoulders. There is not any thing that gives not way to a good Eccleſiaſtick, who carrieth ſanctity in his heart; his words are thunder-claps, when his life is the lightening. Behold why this great Saint deſired nothing ſo much, as to ſee the houſe, not of Cæſar, but of Jeſus, free both from crime and ſuſpicion of it. Above all, he ſtrove to extirpate two plagues fatal, & oppoſite enemies of all ſanctity, avarice, and luſt; not only deſiring the Prieſts of his Dioceſs ſhould have chaſte bodies, but innocent hands alſo, and not covetous to draw ſuperfluities to their condition of life. He voluntarily bred them in poverty and frugality, as in the firſt manſion, from whence the glory of the primitive Church proceeded, well knowing, the augmentation of riches doth not equally encreaſe piety.

One would not believe what choice he made in Eccleſiaſtical preferments, even to the refuſing many times of ſome, who had been very much recommended unto him, and had nothing to give occaſion of rejection, but ſome petty uncomelineſs in geſture or exteriour parts, that alone offended the eys of Saint Ambroſe, who was not willing to ſee any thing but luſtre in his Clergy. And although ſuch things ſeemed idle to many, yet was he no whit in his judgment deceived; for having one day diſmiſſed two for one ſole levity in their gate, he found they afterward made ſhip-wrack of faith, and already diſcovered the unconſtant perfidiouſneſs of their minde in this wanton action of their carriage.

Where reaſons could not avail, he employed a ſevere cenſure, having no regard to exteriour ſemblances, when there was occaſions to chaſtiſe a crime. Witneſs one Gerontius, who lived in Milan, under his rule, a man of a ſpirit moſt pregnant and curious, beyond his profeſſion, who was not contented to ſeek into the ſecrets of Phyſick, and exceſsively endeavour to poliſh his tongue, which was very pregnant, but he deſcended to ſome folly of Negromancy. Now this man having an itch of ſpeech, and eſpecially of all that, which he thought might make for his advantage, vaunted in ſome company, that he one night had taken one Onoſcelides, that is to ſay, a Devil, who appeared to him with the legs of an Aſs, and that he had ſhaved him, and led him to the Mill: whether it were that he in effect had ſeen ſuch a ſpectre, his brain being already much diſpoſed to illuſions; or whether it were, through vanity and impoſture, that he boaſted himſelf of what he had not done, as it often-times happeneth to ſuch kinde of men, who make tropheys of great crimes, whileſt it raiſeth them in the opinion of the world above the ordinary ſort. Theſe words being related to Saint Ambroſe, he very ſharply reprehended him, and impriſoned him in his own houſe, enjoyning ſundry penances for expiation of this fault, moſt unworthy of a Deacon of the Church of Milan, ſuch as he was. He, who was not capable of ſuch a remedy, fled, and went to Conſtantinople, with intention to diſgrace S. Ambroſe, which he did as much as poſſibly he might. There, by the ſoft inſinuation of his wit, joyned to an incredible vain tattle, in ſtead of ſeeking out a wholeſom plaiſter for his ulcers, he covered them with cloath of gold, in ſuch ſort, that through the favour of Great-ones, whom he had gained, he was preferred to the Biſhoprick of Nicomedia. S. Ambroſe effectually wrote to Nectarius, diſcovering the impoſtures of this man, and beſeeching him for the honour of the Church, and his own proper intereſt, he would not ſuffer that Epiſcopal See to be defiled with ordures, that aſtoniſhed heaven and earth. Nectarius employed all his power in this affair, deſiring both to diſcharge his own conſcience, and oblige the Biſhop of Milan: but he found this Impoſtour had by his charms got ſo much favour, that to remove him was very difficult. The glory hereof was reſerved for S. John Chryſoſtom, who afterward removed him, as ſoon as he was preferred to the Dignity of Patriarch of Conſtantinople.

Behold the ſeverity this great Paſtour uſed in the inſtitution of his Clergy; and as he ſaw that good Religious men and women ſerved for a great ornament of the Church, ſo he took a moſt particular care to entertain them, and manure them as worthy plants of the garden of the Church. Never could he reſt till he ſaw a Monaſtery erected in the ſuburbs of Milan, where many holy perſonages dedicated themſelves to a ſolitary life, to perform on earth what the Angels do in Heaven. As for Virgins, who took the Veil irrevocably to conſecrate their Virginity to Jeſus Chriſt, he trained them up in the Church, with ſo much ſtudy, fervour, and zeal, that we cannot imagine more. For he dedicated to them the firſt fruits of his labours, writing in their favour the books of Virginity, which he compoſed in the firſt year of his charge, in a moſt flouriſhing and elaborate ſtyle; where, to ſhew the reſpect he bare to this profeſſion, he ſpake theſe words unto them:

Religious cheriſhed by S. Ambroſe.

My

Excellent ſpeeches to Virgins.

My holy daughters, it is not yet three years ſince I undertook this charge, and you know from whence I was drawn, and the ſmall time given to diſpoſe me to ſo weighty a burthen: notwithſtanding, I afford you the fruits of my tongue, ſince I have learned more in your manners then in Books. The flowers which grow in my diſcourſes, come from your garden. It is not precepts for Virgins but examples drawn from the life of Virgins. Your manners have breathed a certain grace into my ſoul, and I may ſay, that all that, which my endeavour hath of good odour in it, is derived from your prayers. For who am I but a barren thorn? But God, who heretofore ſpake to Moſes among Thorns, will now to day ſpeak by my mouth.

His Sermons and books had ſo much effect, that Virgins came from the utmoſt limits of Chriſtendom to be veiled at Milan; which S. Ambroſe ſeeing, he could not wonder enough that he perſwaded Virginity where he was not, it not being in his power ſufficiently to multiply it according to his deſire, in places where he reſided (f).

(f) Hic tracto, alibi perſuadeo: ſi ita eſt, alibi tractemus ut vobis perſuadeamus. l. 1. de virginibus.

He cauſed the Biſhop of Bologna to come unto him, led on by the ſame ſpirit as himſelf, to aſſiſt in this deſign, of whom he one day ſaid in full aſſembly: (g) Behold the fiſher of the Church of Bologna, fit for this ſort of fiſh; Lord afford fiſh, ſince you have given us coadjutours. And conſidering that ſome murmured at theſe his proceedings, as if the world ſhould inſtantly fail by this means, he ſhewed in a moſt eloquent Sermon, that no one had cauſe of complaint either married or unmarried; the married, becauſe they had wives, not virgins: the unmarried, becauſe they ſhould find ſufficient; and that the carnal, who oppoſed virginity under pretext of multiplication, reſiſted by this means the chaſtity of marriages, where continency is often-times exerciſed, even by neceſſity: as for the reſt, we are not to believe the world will be ruined through virginity: for, admit it ſhould fail, it would ever be a matter more honourable for it to decay by virtue then concupiſcence. But it is ſo much otherwiſe, ſaid he, that we ſhould lay hold of that, which we ſee by experience in the Churches of Africa and Alexandria, where there are moſt Virgins, they have the greateſt number of men.

(g) Adeſt piſcator Bononienſis, aptus ad hoc piſcandi genus: Da Domine piſces qui dediſti adjutores.

This employment nothing leſſened the aſſiſtances, which he afforded for the inſtruction of thoſe who lived in an ordinary courſe.

(h) Above all, he endeavoured to root hereſies out of their hearts, and certain cuſtoms of Gentiliſm, which eaſily ſtole in by contagion into the houſes of the faithful. Among other things, there was a Pagan-guiſe much practiſed at Milan and other places of Chriſtendom, which was, to celebrate the firſt day of the year with riots and diſorders: a matter much reſenting the Bacchanals. He ſo cut off this abuſe by his great authority, that of a day prophaned with ſo much ſenſuality, he in few years made it among Chriſtians a day of penance and faſting: which for ſome ſpace afterward was obſerved in the Church, until ſuch time as the memory of the ſuperſtitions of Gentiliſm was wholy extinct. Others entertained this fooliſh belief, that when the Moon was Eclipſed, ſhe ſuffered much through the perſecution of ill Angels, who then endeavoured to exile her; and therefore they went out of their houſes, with many Pans and Cauldrons, making a loud noiſe to diſſolve, as they ſaid, the deſign, which evil Spirits had againſt the Moon. The ſage Paſtour made an expreſs homily againſt this ſuperſtition, wherein he much confounded thoſe who were infected herewithal. Moreover, it being a cuſtom very antient, and introduc'd by the Apoſtles, to make in Churches, which then were the houſes of the faithful, Agapes, that is to ſay, bankets of charity in favour of the poor, this by little and little was changed into liberties unworthy of Chriſtianity. For ſenſuality had got ſuch ground, that faſhing charity in this action, it rather ſeemed a ſacrifice to the belly, then an act of piety. S. Ambroſe aboliſhed all theſe rites, and cut off ſuch abuſes even in the leaſt root, that it was never ſeen again to ſprout in the Church. S. Auguſtine incited by his example, practis'd the like in Africa, and afterward cauſed the decree to be inſerted in the third Council of Carthage.

(h) Superſtitions and exceſſes taken away.

In the proportion that he exterpated vice, he planted ſolid virtues in the hearts of the faithful, whom he ordinarily entertained, with theſe inſuing inſtructions, counſelling other Biſhops to do the like. (i) Firſt he ſought in all places to form in minds a ſtrong imagination of the preſence of God, unwilling that Chriſtian virtues ſhould be petty Hipocriſies, guided by the natural extent of humane reſpect, but rather intentions wholly celeſtial; and for that cauſe he ſaid (k) If any man be alone, let him regard himſelf more then any other in the world.

(i) Purity of intention.

(k) Si quis ſolus eſt, ſe ipſum præ cæteris erubeſcat.

(l) Secondly, ſeeing the inordinate deſire of riches was a petty apoſtacy of faith, and root of all diſorders, he very often did beat on this anvile, labouring by all ſort of good endeavours to withdraw hearts from the love of earth, that he might raiſe them to Heaven. Among other things, you have theſe excellent words in the Epiſtle to Conſtantius: (m) To enjoy much, is to have a great burthen: great riches are a vain oſtentation; the indifferent, for uſe. We are all Pilgrims in this life; all the buſineſs is not in going, perfection conſiſteth in a ready paſſage. To what purpoſe do you ſo torment your ſelf with the deſire of hoarding? Be wiſe, and you ſhall have ſufficient. A virtuous man thinks nothing is without him but ſin. Whereſoever he ſets his foot he finds a kingdom. All the world belongeth to him, becauſe he uſeth all the world as his own.

(l) Cove-touſneſs oppoſed.

(m) Multa oneri, moderata uſui. Viatores ſumus vitæ hujus: multi ambulant, ſed opus eſt, ut quis bene tranſeat. Sapientis nihil alienum, niſi quod virtuti incongruum. Quæcunque acceſſerint ſua omnia. Totus mundus poſſeſſio ejus eſt, quoniam eo toto quaſi ſuo utitur. Epiſt. ad Conſtantium.

In the third inſtance he made ſharp war againſt the ambitions and vanities of the time, diſpoſing minds as much as he could to Chriſtian humility by this Maxim: (n) The greateſt knowledg in the world is well to act your part: It importeth not in what condition of life we are, ſo that we diſcharge our conſcience, and the duties of our places. We muſt ſo uſe the matter, that our manners may recommend our condition, and not derive their worth from our dignities.

(n) Ambition. Nihil intereſſe in quo ſtatu quis ſe probabilem præſtaret, ſed illum eſſe ſtatum bonorum, ut quocunque quis ſtatu probaretur. Illud præcipuum, ut magis mores commendarent ſtatum, quam ſtatus mores.

In the fourth place, he uſed infinite care to maintain conjugal chaſtity in the lives of the married, oftentimes ſhewing by pregnant reaſons, that luſt (a) was a fire, which burnt the garment of the ſoul, and waſted mountains even to the bottom. And becauſe bravery is ordinarily the neſt where diſhoneſty hatcheth, he couragiouſly oppoſed profuſeneſs in that kind, uſing ſharp reprehenſions againſt women, vain and diſſolute in attires. One day amongſt the reſt, he proved they were as in a perpetual priſon, loaden with puniſhments and condemned by their own ſentence (p) It is pity (ſaith he) to ſee a woman, that hath upon the one part a great chain about her neck, and on the other gyves about her feet. What matter is it whether the body be charged with gold or iron, if the neck be alike bowed under the yoak, and a gate hindred? The price of your bands ſerves for no uſe, but to give you cauſe to fear your torments. Miſerable that you are, who condemn your ſelves by your own proper ſentence; yea, more miſerable then criminals, for theſe do ſee nothing but their own Liberty, and you love your captivity.

(o) Luxurie.

(p) Exceſs in apparel. Hinc calliſ cattenâ conſtringis, inde pedes compes includit. Nihil refert, auro corpus onereturne, an ferro, ſi cervix premitur, ſi gravatur inceſſus, nihil tritium juvat, niſi quod vos mulieris, ni pereat vobis pœna, trepidatis. Quid intereſt alienâ ſententiâ an veſtra vos damnet? Hinc vos etiam miſerabliores, quàm qui publico jure damnatur, quòd illi optant exuti, vos ligari. Lib. 1. De Virginibus.

In the end, he much recommended charity, juſtice, government of the tongue, flight from ill company, and modeſty in all deportments; whence it came to paſs; that he wrote thoſe admirable Books of Offices, which ſet out all Chriſtian virtues with an eminent luſtre. The good Prelate was in his Biſhoprick, as the Pilot in the ſhip, the ſoul in the body, the ſun in the world, labouring in all kinds, and having no other repoſe, but the viciſſitude of travails.

The

The fourth SECTION.

His combates, and firſt againſt Gentiliſm.

Evident danger of Chriſtendom.

IT is time now that we behold our ſtrong Giant enter into the liſt againſt Monſters; for armed with weapons of light, he enterpriſed ſundry battails againſt Sects, vices, and the powers of darkneſs, which ſought to prevail. I will begin his proweſs by the encounter he had with Symmachus, Governour of the City of Rome, who endeavoured by his eloquence, and credit, to re-advance the prophane ſuperſtitions of Gentiliſm. This combat was not ſmall, nor leſs glorious for the memory of S. Ambroſe, with him that will well conſider it, the danger was very great, for the name and deſign of Julian the Apoſtata as yet lived in the minds of many men of quality, and of malign ſpirits, who had conſpired with time to ſtifle Chriſtianity, making corrupt and imaginary Deities to re-enter into the poſſeſſion of the world. This Symmachus was the Enſign-bearer, a ſubtile man, well ſpoken, and of great authority; to whom the Emperours had cauſed a golden Statue to be erected with the title of The Prime man of the Empire, both in reputation, wiſdom, and eloquence: and for that cauſe he promiſed himſelf he had power enough to ſet God and the Devil upon one and the ſame Altar. He practiſed to diſguiſe Pagan Religion by his artifices, drawing it from the ordures and brutiſhneſs thereof chanted by Poets, to give it a quite other face, and repreſent it with a maſk, which he had framed out of ſundry Philoſophers under the reign of Julian, to render it the leſs odious. And ſeeing the times favoured him, by reaſon that after the death of Gratian a moſt Chriſtian Prince, Valentinian, who was an infant under the guardianſhip of an Arrian mother, held the ſtern of the Empire, he reſolved therefore to fiſh in a troubled water, and by ſurreption obtained certain Edicts in favour of Paganiſm, againſt which St. Ambroſe framed moſt powerful oppoſitions. I will render you here the two pleadings in thoſe terms they were pronounced, to confront the babble of a Politician with the eloquence of a Saint.

The underſtanding Reader ſhall here obſerve two moſt rich pieces of Eloquence, which I have rendred rather as an Oratour then a Tranſlatour, to give them the luſtre they deſerve. I am deſirous you may ſee in the Oration of Symmachus, what a bad conſcience can do, which hath eloquence to diſguiſe truth, and how we muſt ever judg of men rather by their works, then their words.

The Oration of Symmachus to Theodoſius and Valentinian the Younger, for the Altar of Victory, exerciſe of Pagan Religion, and revenue of Veſtals.

SACRED MAJESTIES,

Note, that he feigneth Theodoſius as preſent, who knew nothing what had paſſed.

SO ſoon as this ſovereign Court, wholly poſſeſſed by you, hath ſeen vice ſubdued by laws, and that you through your Piety have razed out the memory of paſſed troubles, it hath taken upon it the authority, which the favour of this happy Age hath afforded, and diſcharging the acerbities long time retained upon the heart thereof, hath once again commanded me to bring you its complaints in a ſolemn Embaſſage.

Thoſe, that wiſh us not well, have hitherto bereaved us of the honour of your audience, thereby to deprive us of the effect of your juſtice. But I now come to acquit me of two obligations; the one as Governour of the City, the other as Embaſſadour: as Governour I do a work, which concerneth the Weal-publick, and as Embaſſadour I preſent you the ſupplications of your moſt humble ſubjects.

Diſſentions we have no more amongſt us, for the opinion is ceaſed, that one, to become a great States-man, muſt be particular in his opinions. All the Pagan Senatours agreed not before upon this Embaſſage

The greateſt Empire, which Monarchs may enjoy, is to reign in the love and eſtimation of their ſubjects: ſo is it alſo a matter intolerable in thoſe that govern the State, to nourish their diviſions to the hurt of the publick, and eſtabliſh their credit upon the loſs of the Prince's reputation.

We are far diſtant from thoſe imaginations; for all our care perpetually watcheth for your intereſt, and for that cauſe we defend the Decrees of our Anceſtours, the Rites of our Country, and fatal happineſs thereof, as a thing, which concerneth the glory of your age, to which you gave a new luſtre, when you publickly proteſted never to enterpriſe any thing upon Cuſtoms eſtabliſhed by our Anceſtours.

Behold! wherefore we moſt humbly beſeech you to reſtore the Religion, which ſo long hath preſerved this Empire. If we will remember thoſe Princes, under whom we have lived, though divided in Sects and Opinions, we ſhall finde ſome have retained the Religion of their Anceſtours, the other not rejected it. And if authority of the dead ſuffice not to give us example of what we ſhould do, at the leaſt let us take it from the diſſimulation of the living, who in tolerating antient Ceremonies have diſcovered they had no purpoſe to condemn them.

We at this preſent require the Altar of the Goddeſs Victory may be reſtored to us, thereon to offer our ſacrifices. Is there any man in the world ſuch a friend to the Barbarians our enemies, who will oppoſe this deſign? The experience of paſſed times teacheth us wiſdom for the future. It is time we avoid ſo many dreadful prodigies, which menace us, and at laſt yield the honour to the name of Victory, which we have denied to its Divinity. Victory, o Sacred Majeſties, hath already powerfully tied you, and will yet much more oblige you. It is a work for the wicked, who never have had experience of its benefits, to hate the honours thereof: but your worth cannot chooſe but adore that, which ſerves as a favourable ſupport for your triumphs. A ſubtile inſinuation of Symmachus.

Victory is a Divinitie, that hath her Altars charged with vows of the whole world. The man is moſt ungrateful, who will diſhonour that, which he profeſſeth to deſire: and were it not an action of juſtice to afford veneration where it is due, yet ought we not to be deprived of the ornaments of our Senate.

Suffer our old age, moſt ſacred Majeſties, to leave to poſteritie the Religion received from our Anceſtours, when we were as yet in our infancie. The love of antient Rites is a marvellous tie. The Emperour Conſtans, who would have cut it off, therein loſt his labour, leaving an example to others to decline ſeverity, which nothing availed him. We, who are much affected to the eternity of your Name and Dignity, muſt ſo uſe the matter, that the ſucceeding Ages may finde nothing, which requires alteration in your actions. Conſtans the ſon of Conſtantine the Great.

Where ſhall we hereafter ſwear to your laws and commands, when we ſhall finde all the Altars demoliſhed? Who ſhall ſerve as a terrour to the perfidious to arreſt their falſhood, if they no longer apprehend the Divinities, which they in foregoing time reverenced? We are not ignorant, that all this great Univerſe is filled with the preſence of God, and that there is no place of ſafeguard for Perjuries: yet it is a matter moſt important to repreſs the liberty of crimes by the viſible preſence, and marks of an antient Religion. This Altar of Victory is the knot of our Concord, and the manſion of publick Faith. All that, which giveth authority to our Decrees, is, that we pronounce them after we have ſworn fidelitie upon Altars: and ſhall we then without difference prophane an Altar ſo Religious, where we at other times have taken Oath, and prophane it under the reign of Princes, who more entruſt the ſecurity of their perſons on the faith of their Subjects, then force of their Arms? But the Emperour Conſtans is ſaid to have ſhewed the way thereof. Why do we imitate in a Prince, who hath ſo many other perfections, that, which hath worſt ſucceeded with him, and which he never had done, if good fortune had made him ſee another to miſcarrie before him? The faults of a predeceſſour are not unprofitable to a ſucceſſour, who from them will derive profit: and oft-times a man lays the firſt ground of his Virtues on the Vices of another. It happened, that this good Emperour foreſaw not the diſcontent, which would ariſe from this action, the matter being as yet new, and without preſident: we, who now have other knowledges then he, cannot have the like excuſes for our errours. Your Majeſties ſhall finde in this Prince actions enough worthy of imitation, which you may purſue with more glory, and leſs envie. Neither did he cut away any thing of the privileges of Veſtal Virgins; he repleniſhed the Temples and Miniſteries of the Gods immortal with Nobility, and was willing Coin ſhould be taken from his Coffers, to defray the charges of antient ceremonies. Coming to Rome, he marched through all the ſtreets of this eternal City, accompanied with his Senate, moſt glad to behold him: with a favourable eye he ſaw Conſtans was allied to the Emperour, for which cauſe he ſpeaketh warily.

saw the Temples, which bare the titles of our Gods on their fore-heads; he enquired the original of their goodly buildings, and applauded the founders. And though he were of a Religion different from ours, yet was he not desirous to make his piety triumph in the extinguishment of that of our Ancestours. He preserved for the Empire its antient customs, well knowing, that in matter of Religion each man hath his opinion, his rites, and ceremonies; all which require freedom.

Maxims of a Pagan.

The spirit of God, which governeth this great world, hath distributed its Protectours to every Cities; and as Heaven hath given us souls, so it every where decreeth certain Geniusses, and fatal powers for the government of mortals, which oblige us to regard them more by the profit we derive from them, then any other consideration. All the reasons which we here below have of the Divinity are obscure, and we cannot know God better then in his benefits, in the memory, and experience of prosperities from him derived.

He speaketh as a man ignorant of faith.

If antiquity be of power to give any weight to a Religion, why shall we not maintain a Faith established by so many Ages? Why shall not we follow the steps of our fathers, who have so happily succeeded their grandfathers? Propose to your selves, that Rome at this time presents it self before your eys, and in these terms speaketh to you.

Subtile discourses.

O most excellent and just Princes, who are the true Fathers of the Country, have regard to the old Age, whereunto I am arrived, in pursuing the piety of my founders: give me leave to exercise the antient ceremonies, since they are not such as I ought to repent my self of, and to practise my ordinary guises, since liberty is the inheritance of my birth. The Religion, of which you would bereave me, is that which hath vanquished the world, that which hath chased Hannibal far from my walls, and driven the Gauls from my Capitol. Have I then been preserved among so many Armies and perils, to be now at this day dishonoured, by my children? Have I then given Law to the whole world, to receive it in my elder days from simple Fisher-men? I yet do not know what they will teach me, but I well understand, the correction of old Age must needs be heavie, and in much danger also to become the more ignominious. I honour the Gods of my Fathers, the Gods of my Birth; I beg peace of them, will any man teach me ought else? I think after we have well disputed, we shall finde we have all but one and the same God, but that we honour him under sundry titles. We all live subject to the same Stars, we all are covered with the same Heaven, involved all in the same World; let us suffer every one to seek out truth according to his poor industrie. God is a great secret: it is no wonder, if we endeavour to finde him by so many divers ways.

Dangerous Maxims used afterward by Hereticks.

But I leave the disputation hereof to those, who have more leisure then I: I come not to give a battle, but to present you with our humble prayers. I would willingly know whether your Majesties Coffers have been throughly filled, since the small revenews have been taken from these poor Vestals, which before they enjoyed? They see themselves frustrated of the recompenses, which the most avaricious Emperours have decreed them, and in so great a liberality of your Majesties, which enricheth all the world, they alone have cause to complain of necessitie.

Philastrius de hæresibus.

Vestal Virgins.

Moving words.

It is not gain, which leadeth them, but the honour to receive the wages due to their Chastity. It is to violate the holy veils, which attire their heads, to deprive them the ordinary privileges of their profession. The poor maids ask nought else of you but a bare title of prerogative, as their great poverty hath freed them from surprize of their enemies: for nakedness is that alone, which violence cannot disarray. The more you have cut off from their privileges, so much the more have you robbed them of the honour of their charges, since their Virginity, which is vowed to publick safety, hath so much the more merit, as it findeth the less recompense. God forbid your treasures, which are most innocent, should be defiled with prey drawn from the Vestals. The revenues of good Princes still encrease, rather from the spoil of Enemies, then loss of Priests. There is no gain can recompense the wrong done them by this decree. The further off your dispositions are estranged from all manner of avarice, so much the more is their condition miserable, since they behold themselves so tormented under such great clemency, and frustrated of an happiness, which they cannot lose but with honour. For were they despoiled by Harpyes, we should deplore their miserie in the compassion we take of their innocency: but the world, which seeth them deprived of their fortunes under Emperours so reserved, & moderate, will say, needs must there be crime on their part, since on yours they behold nought else but sanctity.

Possessions bequeathed to Virgins by the last Will of those, who deceased in the Devotion they bare to their Temples, are still withheld: I humbly beseech you, O sacred Pontifes, who sit in the place of justice, why would you make void the publick Religion of your Empire with the succession of a particular? Let dying men make their Wills with all security; suffer them to depart with this belief, that they have Princes not covetous, who will maintain what they shall bequeath in leaving the world, of their abilities. It is your honour, and contentment, to see such an happiness in the state, which you manage, and likewise to deliver dying men from the disturbances they may have upon the nullitie of their Testaments. Is there any thing in the world, that more concerneth the Roman right, then the Roman Religion? How would you have the change of pertie to be called, made upon moneys, which their Nature, nor the Laws have not put into the condition of unclaimed and perishable goods? Legacies are permitted to freed men, slaves are not denied the petty profits given them by Wills. Is there none but Virgins and those Virgins so noble, yea Virgins vowed to the exercise of Ceremonies, fatal for preservation of this Empire, must be deprived the possessions, which come to them by lawful ways of inheritance?

Symmachus magnifieth the Vestals.

What availeth them to consecrate the Chastity of their bodies to publick safety, to lay the foundation of an eternity for this Empire, on the ayd of their prayers, to tie to your Standards, your arms, and your Eagles, the favour of heavenly assistances, to present vows powerful for th whole world, and be bereaved the rights, that are denied to no man? It will hereafter be better to serve men then Gods, since we, desirous to make our Empire religious, make it ungrateful.

It is not the sole cause of the Vestals which I plead, it is that of all humane kind, for the dishonour of their profession is the source of all our evils. The law of our fore-fathers hath honoured these holy maids, and all those that are vowed to Altars, with some small revenew, and some very just privileges. This hath ever been for them maintained, until new ordinances were made by some Bankers, who degenerating from the care of their Ancestours, have employed the revenews dedicated to Virginity on the entertainment of certain Porters. From thence consequently came that great Dearth, the effect whereof the whole world hath felt, where lean Harvests have deceived the hopes of every Province. Let us not accuse the earth of this disaster, for it is innocent. Let us not quarrel against heaven, for it is just. Let us not complain, the worm hath gnawa the ear of Corn, or wilde Oats have choaked the Fruits of the earth: our sacrileges have made the year drouthy, and good reason it were, the whole world should be frustrated of a benefit it hath taken from Religion. Were there any example of our unhappiness in former times, we might say this Famin happened by a certain revolution of years, fatal in such accidents. But where shall we finde any thing like to this in the passed Ages? Where shall we finde a sterilitie so knotted together by the malignity of the ayr? Where shall we finde, that the people hath been enforced to have recourse to wild Plants and Acborns of the forest Dodonia, to satisfy their hunger?

Famin.

When did our Fathers ever behold a spectacle so cruel, whilest they cherished the Ministers of Religion at the charge of the publick? When did they ever shake Oaks, but for Hogs? When did they ever pull Herbs up by the roots to feed men? When did the Fields, which for the most part accustomed enterchangeably to rest, as it were on purpose, fail in one and the same year? Hath this been, when the people shared their provisions with the Vestal Virgins? Liberalitie used towards Priests graced the years revenews, and it rather seemed a remedie against barrenness, then a largess of piety. Now God in the necessitie of each one avengeth the detention of a benefit, which he would have common for all the world.

Some one will say, It is no wonder, if we refuse to entertain a strange Religion at the charge of the publick. God forbid, your Majesties should think the revenews, which were heretofore ordained for the Vestals by the Common-Wealth, should at this present be summed up as the coyn of the Weal publick.

As the Common-wealth is composed of particulars, so hath it no more right over Donatives, then it hath on particular persons. Your selves, who govern all, preserve for each one what appertains to him, and would have justice extend it self further then your power. Consult, if you please, with your magnificence, and it will tell you, that what you hitherto have given to so many particulars, is no more a publick good, for the gifts are no longer theirs, who bestowed them, and that which was in the beginning a benefit, by custom and succession of time, becomes an obligation. It is to affright the consciences of your Majesties with Panick fears, to think to make you believe you give to our religion that, which you cannot take from it without injustice.

I pray God the secret assistances of all Sects may favour your Clemencie, and that this same, which hath so long time ayded your Ancestours, if it can no longer stand in credit with you, may at least keep you in its protection. We will on your Majestie's behalf afford it all rights, and it towards you shall continue ordinary favours. We demand nothing new in requiring the exercise of a Religion, which hath preserved the Empire for your father (now with the Gods) and which hath blessed his bed with lawful heirs of his Crown. This good Prince, being entered into the condition of the Gods immortal, beholdeth from Heaven the tears of these poor Vestals, and well sees customs cannot be violated, which be with so much affection maintained, but by the diminution of his authority. Afford at least this contentment to your good brother, received into this celestial company, as to see a Decree corrected, that was not his own. Cover an Act under oblivion, which he had never suffered to pass, had he foreseen the discontent of the Senate, and for which the deputies were diverted, which we sent unto him when he was alive, for the fear his enemies had of his equitie. It much importeth the publick to take away a foul blame from the ashes of a good Prince, and justifie the passed-by abolishment of the present.

He speaketh of Valentinian.

The fifth SECTION.

The Oration of S. Ambrose against Symmachus

MOST SACRED MAJESTY,

It is drawn from his reasons, conceptions, and as it were from all his own words.

ALthough your Minority gave us undoubted signs of the strength of your spirit, and constancie of your faith, yet the rank I hold near to your person obligeth me to prevent the surprizes of a crafty Discourse, which creepeth amongst so many golden words as the serpent amongst the flowers.

It is ill, the Governour Symmachus hath employed so fair a tongue on so foul a subject. The deceit of his eloquence makes us suspect the weaknes of his Gods: for ever a bad cause seeketh that support in words, which in truth it cannot finde. Such are the ordinary proceedings of Pagans, when they speak of their superstitions.

Their Orations resemble those ancient Temples of Egypt, wherein under golden Tents lodged Idols of Rats and Crocodiles. But the Scripture teacheth us rather to live then talk, and recommendeth the contempt of language to oblige us to solliditie of vertues. That is the cause, why (most sacred Majestie) after I have entreated you to take my discourse rather in the weight of reasons, then number of words, I will answer to three points, which the Governour seemeth to comprize in his speech. The first toucheth the Religion of Pagans. The second the revenews of Vestals. And the third the cause of the Famin we have felt.

A singular resolution of Symmachus his strongest argument.

I understand in the first Article, it is Rome, which speaketh with her eys ful of tears, and sighs at her heart, demanding the exercise of Pagan superstitions, because they are such (saith the Governour) which drave Hannibal from the walls, and the Gauls from the Capitol.

It is to publish the infamitie of false Gods to defend them in this manner; and better we cannot refute Symmachus, then by shewing him armed against himself. For I ask, if those Gods are the Protectours of this Empire, why they so long time suffered Hannibal to triumph in the ruins of Italie? Were their hands so short they could stretch them no further then their Wals and Temples? As for the Gauls, what shall I say? I much wonder how the Governour doth mention it, since it is in effect a thing most ridiculous, to say, that the enemies being in the heart of the Citie, all those protecting Gods should stand idle in their Temples, in such sort, that all Histories have published, the people of Rome owed their preservation, not to the Gods, or sacrifices, which nothing availed them, but to the gagling of a Goose, which by good hap awaked the drowsie Centinels, if it be not, that Symmachus, as he is inventive enough, will say, that Jupiter had then forsaken his burning Chariots and Thunder-bolts, to shut himself up in the throat of this Gosling. But as a lie is ever industrious to hurt it self, did not Hannibal adore the Roman Gods? If it be true, that they always bear victory in their hands, why did not Hannibal surprize Rome with the assistance of those Gods? Or why did not the Romans vanquish Hannibal in all their Battels? Why had both one and the other oftentimes the worst? On what side soever you turn, you must see Gods conquered, who cannot denie their impotencie, if they avow not their nullitie.

It is not Rome then, that speaketh in this manner as Symmachus makes it, never gave she him his commission: but she says by the mouths of her brave Captains:

Rome speaketh with Majestie.

Romans, what have I done to become a butcherie, and to be imbrewed with the blood of so many creatures? Victories abide not in the entrails of beasts, but the arms of Souldiers. It is not the death of Oxen hath made me subdue Monarchs, but the valour of men. Camillus by force of arms displayed my Standards on the Capitol, which your ceremonies suffered to be taken away. Attilius exposed his life for the trial of his fidelity and safety of the Weal publick. Scipio Africanus found triumph, not among the Altars of the Capitol, but in the field of battel. If you desire to see the goodly effects of your superstitions, behold Nero, who was the first that drew the sword of the Cæsar's against the Christians, behold Emperours monethly made, and unmade like the Moon; behold those, who were the most zealous in your ceremonies, whereof some having shamefully enthralled the worlds Empire to foreigners, and the other promising themselves great victories under the favour of their Gods, have found servitude. was not there then an Altar of Victory in the Capitol? From whence, I pray, proceeded so many sinister accidents, if good hap be divinely destined to those who obey it? I much repent me of these barbarous ceremonies, though too too late. You, that have made me so many times become red with blood, suffer me once to become ruddy with shame, that I so lightly have been deceived, to the end I may not blush to see my self converted with all the world. And tell me not, I pray, that I am old. Decrepitness is not in years, but in manners. It is never too late to learn one's Salvation, and it is ever seasonable to do good. Shame is but for those, who have neither power, nor will to correct their vices.

Notable answers to the liberty of Symmachus.

Come and learn a new warfare of Christians with me, which in Earth beareth arms, and in Heaven its conquests. From whom should I learn the mysteries of Heaven, but from him that made it, and not from man, who doth not so much as know all that passeth in his own house? Whom would you have me confide in the matter of belief we ought to have of God, but God himself? How shall I take you for a Master, since in the seeking to teach me, you confess your own ignorance? You say, God is a great secret, and must be sought by many ways: but he, who once hath hit on the ready way, why should he amuse himself with crooked turnings? You seek him blindfold, and we finde him in the light. You enquire him with suspicions, and minds disturbance, and we finde him in the revelation of the wisdom and veritie of God himself. It is a malicious stupiditie to think we can serve this sovereign Master in all sorts of Sects. As there is but one Sun in the world, so is there but one truth. It is a straight line, which is to be made but one way. All other superstitions are crooked lines, that have as many semblances as defects. How can we reconcile our Religions, you admire the works of your hands, and we accompting it an injurie done to God to worship the works of men? How shall we have one and the same God, if you adore Stocks and Stones, which our God instructeth us to trample under-foot? To whom shall we entrust this verity in such a great diversitie of opinions, but to a Man-God, whose words were no other, then the prophesies, wisdoms, and verities; his life innocencie, sanctitie, and virtue; his actions, power, wonders, and miracles in all parts of the world? What secret spirit set the Cross on the top of your Capitol? You demand proofs of the Divinity, and I shew you the conquest of a world, under the feet of one Crucified: the less this action hath of man, the more you behold therein the work of God.

Grave words for the Emperour.

Then Symmachus, you redemand the altars of Idols, of whom? Of a Christian Emperour, whose heart is in the hands of God, and arms are for the protection of Faith. Would you have him employ his chast and innocent hands, which he never lifted up but to the living God, to repair the monuments of a false Deity? In what Historie finde you, that the Pagan Emperours have built Chapels and Temples for us? And think you, our great Prince hath less Zeal for truth, then his Predecessours for falshood? They have made all the parts of the world ruddie with our blood for defence of their Idols: but God hath blasted their purposes, and overthrown by his power, what they would have raised by their injustice. Would you that a Christian Emperour should from the ruins of your Gods, restore for you, in contempt of his own Religion, objects of sin on the Altars?

A pertinent reply to the act of Vestalis.

But let us a little further see the sequel hereof. They demand revenues for the Vestals, for they cannot otherwise serve their God. Behold how courageous the Gentiles are. We have imbraced and maintained our faith in povertie, injuries, and persecutions, and they cry out their ceremonies cannot subsist without their own interest. It is a shameful thing to sell Virginity, and to fix themselves on profit through the despair of vertues. What armies have these Maids to maintain, who have such care of their revenews? Their number exceedeth not seven, which they have chosen amongst so many thousands to guard a mercenary virginity, that still reserves a night to make experience of Marriage. Is it for this they must be Mitred? For this scarletted? For this endowed with a thousand privileges, and entertained in magnificent Caroches, with a train of Princesses to brave it through the streets of a Citie? Behold the holy Virgins, and poor Maidens of Symmachus. By my consent let him reflect the eye of his understanding and body on the state of our Religious women: he shall see companies replenished with honour, integritie, shamefacedness, who know how to use the gift of Virginity as it ought to be. They wear no attires, nor pompeous Mitres on their heads, but a poor veil, which borroweth its lustre of their chastity. They know not what belongs to attractives of beauty, for they have renounced all curiosities in the world. Purple and Superfluitie never dwels in their house; but rather Fasts and Austerities. It is not their custom to flatter, or sell at the price of honour and privileges the puritie of their bodies, but much otherwise, they do all as if their sufferings were to be the recompense of their vertues. Never will they learn the trade of setting their flesh to sale to the best bidder, and sell the abstinence from pleasures to them that offer most: well knowing the first victory of chastity is to triumph over greedines of riches, which are the most dangerous baits of sin.

If

If we should give great revenues to all the Maids, which are now ready to receive the veil, what treasures would furnish out such an expense? And if they dare affirm, that none is due but to Vestals, is it not an impudence to be desirous to deprive Christian Virgins from goods given in favour of virginity, as if to be Christians were to be the less chaste, or as if the Religion they profess, were on their fore-heads a mark of infamy? Who can endure under the reign of most Christian Emperours, customs, which are onely tolerable in the Empire of Nero's? Symmachus demandeth monies of the Common-Wealth for entertainment of his Vestals, and we by certain modern Laws have been bereft the successions, which we might expect from particulars, without making complaints; so temperate we are in our proceedings. Some Ecclesiasticks likewise have been made to renounce their patrimony, to be freed from Court-obligations, and enjoy the privileges of the Church. Were this done to the Pagans, they would cast flames from their mouthes, for how could it be but very troublesome to purchase the vacancy of a holy ministry with the prejudice of his means, and in consecrating himself to the safety of the whole world, to have necessity for recompense in his house? Wils are valid in favour of the Ministers of Idols: be they never so profane in superstition, so abject in condition, so prodigal of their honour, they are not frustrated of what appertains to them by this article. There be none but the Priests of the living God, who are deprived of common right, because they are vowed to service of the publick. Their manners most innocent are not punished, but their degree; as if it held the rank of crime: that which a superstitious Widow bequeatheth to sacrifices of Idols, shall remain inviolable; and what a Religious Widow leaves by Will to a Priest of the eternal Religion shall be condemned as a nullity.

I speak not this now by way of expostulation, but to shew how I suppress lawful complaints by strength of patience. They answer, they touch not legacies given to the Church in general: and I require of them, who ever hath robbed the riches of their Temples? Christians have heretofore been bereaved their substance, which is the marrow of men; of ayr, which is common to all living creatures; of earth, which none ever have denied to the dead, since even the enraged Sea hath oft-times sent back the bodies of our Martyrs to the haven, as it were to give them burial. Notwithstanding say not a word, nor do I now accuse any man of cruelty, the condemnation whereof the victory of the Cross hath gained of the whole world. But if a piece of land be seized from a South-sayer, who contrary to all Religion holdeth wealth given in favour of Religion, all the world must be summoned with an alarm. If they will possess lands by our examples, let them imitate the charity we practice for the publick. Where are the Prisoners they have redeemed? the Poor they have fed? the Banish'd they have succoured? Of all our wealth we nought retain but faith, the rest is spent in the necessities of men, and they think it reasonable to employ it in massacre of beasts, to see if they have not the death of Princes in their intrails. Is not this insupportable?

An answer concerning the dearth.

Yet notwithstanding their Gods, saith he, have revenged on our heads the injurie done to their Priests, by a general Famin. That is it, which hath caused us to eat roots and barks of trees, which hath made us shake Oaks to eat Acorns, and envy Hogs their food, since we unjustly detain the sustenance of men. Behold great prodegies, and which never happened to the Gentiles. To whom doth Symmachus think he tells these Fables? To us, who know the Pagans were heretofore so accustomed to eate Acorns, that for this onely cause deified their Oaks? It is possible their Gods should appoint that for punishment, which these have so oft bought with price of Incense and blood of Beasts? And then, what injustice were it that for a small handful of sacrificers and South-sayers, who pretend to be interessed herein, these cruel Divinities should take revenge by a general desolation of all Provinces? How should they so long stand with arms across in the ruins of so many Temples, fallen on their Idols, to come to contest with us, upon a just retention of the superfluities of a silly Sacrificer? Behold now already how many years the Pagan Sect hath been declining, hath any one seen for all this the River Nilus overflow to revenge what hath passed at Rome, since the conquest of Egypt hath been tolerated under the arms of the Cross? And if these Gods have this last year avenged their injuries, enforcing us to feed on Acorns: why this present year, when the contempt of their name is much greater then ever, have they not made us eat Thorns? The living God be praised, who husbandeth good and evil for us with a most wise œconomie; we have seen the hillocks smile under the beauty of Vines, we have beheld the earth curled with ears of Corn, and to yield us so plentiful harvests, that they have given joy to some, admiration to others, and satisfaction to the whole world. Yea, we can say, the last year hath not been so barren, but that it hath left in many Provinces marks of the fruitfulness thereof. The Gauls have been more enriched then ever, the Sclavons have sold Corn, which they never sowed. The Grisons have had such store that they have given to their neighbours, more cause of envie then compassion, and those who were friends in a great scarcitie, are made enemies in large fertility. Genova and Venice have tasted the commodities of the fruits of Autumn, and in a word, the year hath not been every where so prodigious as the eloquence of the Governour.

Nay, these objections are more tolerable, but that, which we cannot endure nor dissemble with your Christian Majesties, is, that the Gentiles out of braverie dare affirm, they offer Sacrifices to their Gods in your names, and they protect you. Who hath given them this commission? Who makes them account your commands so criminal, as to take them for commandments? Let them guard their defenders whom they have hitherto ill protected, and let them not presume their Gods, being so feeble for preservation of those who yield them such honour, should be able to shield others who handle them with such contempt.

A reply concerning the antiquity of Paganism.

Yet must we (saith the Governour) defend the ancient Religion. Nothing is elder then the truth, which hath seen the world in its cradle; but a false Religion, the more ancient, the more dangerous it is, since it is an antiquity of errours, the presumption whereof time doth augment. Virtues are not measured by the ell of times, but the greatness of perfections. If we in like manner will consider the works of nature, we shall find the last to be the best.

The world, as you say, was nought else in the beginning, but an assembly of little atomies, which flying in the ayr, wove one with another the web of this great work: afterward it became a confused mass, full of horrour and darkness, till such time, as the great work-man came to separate the elements, adorn the heavens with lamps, and dispend light over the face of this universe. Then the earth disarraying it self, as from a robe of sorrow, seemed to admire the Sun it had never seen. Consider you not how the day at its birth disperseth darkness, with a little dawning of brightness, which insensibly increaseth till the time it discovereth it self in the glittering light and fervours of the mid-day? Behold you not how the Moon, which monethly waxeth and waneth, now seemeth lost to us, then shows her self as it were a little thred, streight she becomes a well-formed Crescent, afterward in the proportion that she looketh on the Sun she is augmented, and lastly composeth for us a great Globe of light? Know you not how the earth was before rude, not having felt the iron Coulter, but so soon as the husbandly labourer began to exercise a power upon it, and cultivate the barren Plains, they took upon them a much other aspect? For mollifying in this tillage all which was wild, they spred out unto us Grapes and Harvests, where we before had seen nought else but Nettles and Briers. See you not also how at the point of the first season the earth is wholly bare, then in the Springs progress it beginneth to produce certain small Flowers, which are as the eys of the Meadows; but eys, which spring and Eclipse in one and the self-same day; and the best of all is kept for the latter season? And we our selves, when we are born, are nothing else but a little lump of flesh, which is polished with time, and changed into a more lively infancy, but still ignorant, until our soul be perfected by time, for then we leave the rudiments of minority to become perfect men. Behold the course which Religions have held in the world: all that which is gone afore, hath been either in part gross and carnal, or deceitful and lying, by the cunning of the Devil. Grace in latter times hath put a seal on the work it began from the birth of the world. If things the less antient be the less perfect, we must prefer the Chaos before the Sun, Acorns before Harvests, March-Violets before Grapes, and say we have done ill to cover the earth with silver, and change Shepherds cottages into the gilded Marble of the Capitol.

But they are industrious to wound themselves, crying up the antient ceremonies. If this antiquity be so recommendable, why did Rome yearly change her Religion, as certain birds do their feathers, introducing daily some innovations in matter of superstitions, derived from the same Nations they by their arms had captivated? Shall it be said she will open her Temples to all the Idols of the earth, and onely shut them up from heavenly verities? He now here speaketh to us of a victory, which is a gift of God, and not a Goddess: a gift, which is oftentimes granted to the strength of legions, and never allotted to the impiety of superstitions. They will set up their Altar in the midst of a sovereign Court, and say, that maugre our opposition we must swallow the smoak of their sacrifices, hear their goodly, musick, and receive the ashes of their prophane victims on our forehead, where we bear the character of the living God. Is it not absolutely to out-brave Christianity under most Christian Emperours? What shall now presently be done at Court by the better part of the Senate, which is Christian? It will be necessary that they either in refusing untruth oppose your edicts (if the unhappiness of the time should make them favour a request so uncivil) or by connivency confess their sacrilege. I will speak freely, it is not an Altar they desire to plant in the Capitol, but rather faith, which they now would tear from our hearts. If you command such a sin, you commit it.

The Emperour Constans, of most worthy memory, being as yet but a Catechumen, would not so much as behold this Altar, for fear that by the sole sight thereof his conscience might be polluted: he caused it presently to be taken away, and will you restore it, to make them hereafter sweare to your lawes before false Gods? What need have we of such an oath? The Senate is assembled by your commands, and for you. To you they owe their fidelity and conscience, not to Gods who are of no accompt. It preferreth you before their own children, but not before their Religion; then is it a charity much greater then your Empire, to preserve that piety which safeguards your Empire. All here below in the affairs of men is most uncertain, all therein is transitory; and great fortunes, which have the Sun in their face, have Ice under-foot: we possess nothing immortal but true Religion, which raiseth us above Monarchs to equal us with Angels. Pompey after he had measured three parts of the world, more by his triumphs then travels, is defeated, repelled, banished, and dead on the frontiers of the Empire, by the hand of a half man; and the earth, which seemed too scanty for his conquests, was seen to fail him for a Tomb. Cyrus, after he had overcome so many potent Enemies, after he had equalled his victories to his clemency, is vanquished by Tamaris, and his head, crowned with so many Lawrels, served as a matter of sport for a woman, who drenched it in a Leathern Sack filled with humane blood, saying unto him, Satiate thee with that thou so much hast desired. Hamilcar, Captain of the Carthaginians, one of the most superstitious Princes, that ever the earth bare, after so many Trophees, threw himself through despair into the Fire, which he had caused to be kindled for the Sacrifice of his Gods, seeing it had no whit availed him. I will not say Christian Emperours shall ever be fortunate in temporal affairs: but I dare affirm, that if we must needs be afflicted as men, although we should loose all, yet never ought we to forsake Religion, as Julian that unhappy Monarch hath done, who joyned the ship-wrack of his faith to the loss of his Empire.

Most sacred Majestie, remember that all the men of the world fight for you, and that you should combat for the true Religion, without which, there is neither protection in the Empire, nor safety in the world. If there be occasion to resolve a matter of arms, make address to your Council of War; but if a point of Religion be handled, you neither ought nor may determine it without the advise of your Bishops. You should see them all here assembled, if the practice of our Enemies had not prevented them. I answer for all, and in the name of all I implore the piety and justice of your Majestie, that no man here may pretend to abuse your Minority to the prejudice of your soul. Take heed how you precipitate any thing in this affair, without imparting it to the Emperour Theodosius, whom you have hetherto honoured as a Father.

If you do otherwise, I will not conceal that from you which my profession commandeth, and conscience obligeth me to tell you: You will come to the Church, but you will finde no Bishop there; or if you do, it will be but to resist you. What would you answer him, when he should tell you, The Church hath nothing to do with your liberalities; since you have adorned the Temples of Gentilisme, you shall never build the houses of Sion; the Altar of Jesus Christ cannot endure your offerings, since you have erected Altars for Idols. Your word, your letter, your Signet, is the work of your heart, of which our enemies make a Trophey, and which you cannot deny. Your service can no longer be pleasing to the Saviour of the world, since you are ingaged to false Divinities. Think you to serve two Masters? Think you it will be lawful to entertain Vestals to the contempt of Religious women of your name and belief? You have no more to do with Bishops, since you have preferred Sacrificers to the Devil before them. What answer you to this? That you have committed a fault pardonable in a child? Every age is perfect for Jesus Christ, and there is no infancy, but is replenished with God, if it render it self not unworthy thereof.

Little Infants heretofore have confronted Executioners, and born away the Crown of Martyrdom, and will you betray our Altars? What will you answer to your good brother the Emperour Gratian of holy and glorious memory, when he shall say, My brother, I never thought my self vanquished by mine Enemies, whilst I left the Diadem on your head. It hath not grieved me to die, since my place was replenished with so good a Successour, I freely have forsaken the Empire, being perswaded the ordinances I made in favour of Religion would remain inviolable to posterity. Brother, these are the spoils I gained over devils: these are my titles and Trophys; these be pledges of my piety and monuments of my faith, which you have since taken away from me by your Edicts. What may an Enemy do more? You have violated what I so piously ordained for the glory of Altars. It is a thing which he, who so unworthily bare arms against me, never did. The Sword which transfixed my body did me less hurt then your Edicts: more sensible am I of the wound you impressed on my cinders, then that which the Tyrant fixed on my members. The one took from me the life of body; but this bereaves me the life of memory and virtues. On this day it is that I loose an Empire, since I see my self deprived of that I always preferred before Empires, and that it is taken from me after my death, yea by the hand of a man, whom I infinitely loved. Brother if you have done this of your own accord, you have condemned my faith; and if by constraint, you have betrayed your own: and being wholly dead as I am, you make me die in you, who am of my self the better part. On the other side, think you not but that the Emperour Valentinian your father, whose name you bear, will say unto you, Son, you have done me much injurie, so to condemn my conscience, and to believe I ever had any purpose to tolerate superstitions so prejudicial to Christianity. I punished all crimes that came to my knowledg: but never have I heard of an Altar of Victory nor prophane Sacrifices to be made in a Sovereign Court before the eys of all Christendom. Dear son, you greatly dishonour the respect, which is due to the memory of your father, if you think he oweth his Empire to superstition, and not to his Religion.

I heartily beseech God, most Sacred Majestie, if this affair be so important, as you see, to your conscience, to the memory of your father, the ashes of your brother, your own reputation, to the judgment which posterity shall give upon you, and that which transcendeth all other considerations, to the universal Church, you now do what you will one day wish to have done, when we shall appear before the eys of the whole Church Triumphant, to the end your actions may be free from reproof, as my counsels are of Repentance.

Ambros. epist. 11. ad Valent.

Who could resist these Thunder-bolts? Symmachus reputed at that time, as we have said, the prime States-man in the Roman Empire, both for eloquence and authority, was ashamed of his superstition, and in pleading for Victory lost it, well shewing it was nothing, since it had so little countenanced a man, who ascribed so much unto it, which made Ennodius say, Symmachus in pleading for Victory, hath lost the Victory, left by him in the hands of S. Ambrose, plainly discovering, the Goddess was very unreasonable to forsake those that served her, and gratifie such as offended her.

Dicendi palmam Victoria tollit amico, Transit ad Ambrosium plus favet ira Deo. Ennodius.

The triumph of S. Ambrose in the conversion of S. Augustine.

The sixth Section.

Of the Nature, and Condition of this great man.

The greatness of S. Ambrose in this conversion.

I Come to one of the most remarkable actions of S. Ambrose, resplendent in the conversion of great S. Augustine, the benefit whereof Heaven and earth have divided, since this incomparable man serves as a support for the Church Militant in the revolution of so many Ages, and an ornament to the Church Triumphant through all eternity. It is none of the least gifts from Heaven, that our Ambrose was selected for an affair of so great importance, that the whole world might finde its interest therein, and for a victory so eminent, that were the Angels as capable of envy, as they are repleat with charity, as they have loved the Conquest, they would envy the glory thereof. Happy voice of thunder, which made this Hind to bring forth her young, after the throws and agitations of twelve years. Happy the Beseleel, who so well hath laboured in the Tabernacle of the living God: Happy the David, who hath subdued this Rabbath, so many times shaken by the arms of great Captains. Happy the Alexander, who with the sword of the word hath cut so many Gordian knots, as held this great Spirit in disturbance. I here defie all the Amphitheaters which have been in the world, and so often mixed the blood of men with that of Lions and Elephants: I call those spectacles, which so many times have attracted the eys of Cæsars:

Exod. 31.

2 Kings 12.

ſars: I deſire the jouſts, turneys, races, chariots, triumphs, and thoſe magnificences may be propoſed, which have drawn blood from all the veins of the world, to eſtabliſh ſuperfluity; and that it may be conſidered whether there were ever combate comparable to this which I preſent; where a holy Biſhop entred into the liſt againſt the prime Spirit of the world, where God ſits enthroned, where the Angels ranged before the gates of Heaven, contemplate, where three parts of the world expect the iſſue of this Duel, where Heaven applaudeth, the earth trembleth, where Hell frowneth, the Devils houl to ſee themſelves deceived of their prey: Where the victorious Ambroſe triumpeth, where the unvanquiſhable Auguſtine yieldeth, to be confirmed by his fall, to be raiſed by his abaſing, fortified by his weakneſs.

Gentle Reader, I entreat you, as my purpoſe is no other, but to enchaſe in this Hiſtory of S. Ambroſe, the acts of Eccleſiaſticks, who to him are ſo particularly tied, that you think it not ſtrange if I more at large diſtend my ſelf upon a Narration ſo proper for the ſubject which I treat of: I doubt not but the manner wherein I ſhall unfold it, will render it wholly new, as the greatneſs thereof made it honourable, and the utility ſtill ſeaſoneth it with ſome particular delight.

Impediments in the converſion of S. Auguſtine.

That we may here well obſerve the ways of the Divine Providence in the direction of man's ſalvation, and the ſtrength of S. Ambroſe quickened with the ſpirit of God: it is neceſſary to conſider the powerful oppoſitions, that ſo long time hindred this converſion, which I reduce to three principal heads, Curioſity, Preſumption, and Carnal Love.

It is a dangerous peſtilence in matter of Religion to take the wind of Curioſity, which ordinarily fixeth it ſelf on the faireſt ſpirits, as it is ſaid Cantharides reſt on the beautifulleſt Roſes. A great train of vices is ever waited on by a great curioſity, and he that can well know them, ſhall finde, that to be curious is to forſake innocency, to draw near to ſin, ...rioſitas rerum efficit, non peritum. S. Zeno 2. de æterna Filii generatione.

according to the eloquent Saint Zeno, Curioſity maketh more Offenders in Priſon, then Learned in Scholes; and ever the deſire to know what God would have hidden, is paid with ignorance of one's ſelf.

Curioſity and the deſcription thereof.

Were I a Painter, or Pourtraier, to repreſent to youth the vanity of this paſſion, I would make the ſtatue thereof on a moving Globe: what can be more inconſtant? I would give it wings; what is lighter? I would ſprinkle it all over with eys: what more watchful? I would fill it with ears: what more induſtrious in the diſcovery of ſo great a diverſity of things? I would give it a mouth perpetually open, for it is no ſooner filled by the ear, but emptied by the mouth. I would lodge it at the ſign of Vacuum; for what is more vain? I would afford it Spider's webs for attire: what is more frivolous? For Table and Viands, ſmoak; what more ſlender and hungry? I would ordain for Officers many Liars and Impoſtures, for ſuch people are its favourites. Before it, a certain itch of general knowlege ſhould go, for it is the ordinary meſſenger thereof. At the right hand Opinion, for it is it which deceives her. At the left, Tattle, it is that which inſtructs her: after it, I would ſet diſturbance of ſpirit, ignorance, and miſery; for it is its inheritance in the end.

Auguſtine, as it were, from his moſt tender years, made himſelf tributary to this falſe Deity, and inſtead of taking the way of true Religion by the paths of holy ſimplicity, needs would he dive into it by reaſons and humane ſubtleties, which alienated him as far from truth as they were of power to encline him to vanity.

The wit of S. Auguſtine.

He had a great wit, as it were, like a prodigy, and it ſeemeth that Africk which produced him, would then bring forth nothing which was mean. It muſt ſtill bring forth huge monſters, or mighty men. He notwithſtanding was over ſharp, being not as yet in his conſiſtence, but reſembled the glaſs of a mirrour, which cannot render forms till it be leaded. So this admirable wit through want of the virtue of humility, which is in men as lead in the mirrour, ſparkled with a vain preſumption, which bringeth with it no other profit, made more illuſions in eys then it left good examples in manners. Now to ſpecifie the qualities of this excellent nature, we muſt conſider it from his tendereſt years; ſince the diſpoſition makes it ſelf ſoon appear in children, as the Roſe in his bud.

His inclinations.

Auguſtine began almoſt as ſoon to ſtudy as to live, for he burned from his younger days with a thirſt of knowlege, ſo eminent, that he ſurmounted his age. And for a note of his curioſity, which already rather aimed at ſplendour then utility: young though he were, he reſembled the children, who make themſelves Preachers before they can read. Nothing was he pleaſed with the elements of Grammar, which he reputed too low for his ſpirit. He would climb without a Ladder, and ſcorned to learn of a Grammarian how the name of Æneas was written, but rather readily diſputed whether Æneas had been at Carthage, or not. Greek to him was a Pill, which he ſwallowed not but by conſtraint, and better loved he to ſpeak Latine by cuſtom, then the rules of Donat. All his delight was to know Fables and Hiſtories, to weep over the diſaſtrous loves of poor Dido, and to be angry with Juno with ſo good a grace, that compoſing thereupon certain imitations of Virgil, he raviſhed his Maſters, and companions in the Schole; which made it well appear he one day ſhould become more fruitful in ſtrong imaginations (which are the principal pieces of eloquence) then religious in choice of words and poliſhed in periods. His Father, who diſcovered the riches of this wit, had an ardent deſire that he might ſwim in a large water, for he as yet ſtudied at Oran a petty Village of Africk, having not the means to go to Carthage.

Want of enablements is many times a counterpoize to the height of the underſtanding: but in depreſſing it, he crowned it; ſince generous ſtudies (according to Plinies ſaying) are lodged at the ſign of poverty, and ever Sciences are refined by neceſſity. Auguſtine, not then knowing what God would do with him, ſought to make a fortune, and ſuch likewiſe was the will of Patricius his Father, who more deſired to ſee him eloquent, then chaſte. Behold why the good man, who had much courage and little means, ſtrove beyond his ability to ſend his ſon to Carthage, the moſt famous Univerſity of Africk. As great fiſhes are found in great Seas, ſo Auguſtine had there wherewith to ſatisfie the paſſion of his curioſity, and meaſuring his own ſtrength with that of others, ſaw matter enough how to make his wit be held in eſteem, to which he already had ſufficient inclination.

He was not contented to exerciſe himſelf in eloquence, which in all Ages hath had much reputation among arts, as the fulleſt of noiſe, and that which unfolds it ſelf with moſt oſtent: but he throughly ſtudied Philoſophy and all other Sciences, which are of power to make an able man, in ſuch ſort, that there was not then a book which he had not with undefatigable induſtry peruſed. The poor young man went like a torrent whither paſſion tranſported him, and where the blaſt of ambition breathed, having the feeling of Chriſtianity in him very faint: for much better he loved to meaſure the world in his vanity, then poſſeſs it in the love of God; not as yet conſidering the difference between a good country ſwain, who at full eaſe enjoyeth the fruits of his tree, whereof he knoweth no other ſecrets, and a Philoſopher that obſerveth the ten Categories, and remains almoſt famiſhed, not taſting of any one fruit.

undefatigable

Aſtrology. His curioſity failed not to tranſfer him to judicial Aſtrology, wherein he employed much time, ſtill thinking to diſcover ſome ſecrets in this labyrinth of fools, which better knoweth how to involve minds, then give them ſatisfaction. He happeneth one day to confer with an old Phyſician, a man grave, and of great capacity; who ſeeing him paſſionately in love with theſe books of Aſtrology, ſaid, Son, if you deſire to tranſcend others in any profeſſion of the world, rather take eloquence, in which, as far as I can ſee, you have greatly profited, then to ſtick on vain Sciences unworthy of your judgment. Verily I will herein confeſs the ignorance of my youth, I have been as much addicted to judicial Aſtrology as ever was any man of my condition: for I not only ſought the ſatisfaction of my minde, but the eſtabliſhment of my fortune. Notwithſtanding I have wholly left it, through a moſt undoubted knowlege that we cannot reſolve on any thing ſolid therein. Judge you what you pleaſe, but ever a well rectified ſpirit will be aſhamed to profeſs a ſcience not ſupported by reaſon, and which knows almoſt no other trade but to deceive. This at that time ſomewhat ſtartled him, but ſtayed not his purpoſe, ſo much he loved to deceive himſelf, and ſo much he reſolved to finde out this ſecret in the end. But ever as he waded further, not diſcovering firm land, he found trouble in a barren labour, and much vanity, where he to himſelf propoſed ſome ſolidity.

Nothing confirmed him ſo much in contempt of this folly, as the diſcourſe he had with Firminus, a young man of eminent quality, ſick of the ſame diſeaſe that he was: for the curioſity of Aſtrology ceaſed not to incite him, as being born of a Father an Aſtrologer, a man of honour, but ſo curious, that he calculated the very horoſcope of Cats and Dogs that were whelped in his houſe: yet ſo little had he profited therein, that at the ſame time his ſon came into the world, a ſervant of his neigbours being delivered of a male-childe, he foretold, according to the rules of his art, that both of them being born under one ſame conſtellation, ſhould run the like fortune; which was ſo falſe, that this Firminus his ſon being born of a rich Family, progreſſed far into the honour of the times, whileſt the ſon of the ſervant, notwithſtanding the favours of his goodly horoſcope, waxed old in ſervitude.

This young man who made this narration, though convinced by his own experience, ſtill ſuffered himſelf to be beguiled with his proper errour, ſo difficult it is to take away this charm by force of reaſons. Our Auguſtine, by little and little diſperſed thoſe vapours, both by the vivacity of his own excellent judgment, and the conſideration of others folly. He was likewiſe ſolicited to attempt a kinde of magick, much in reſpect among the heathen Philoſophers of that Age; which was to ſeek predictions from the ſhop of the Divel, by means of the effuſion of the blood of beaſts, and ſometimes of children. But God, who as yet held a bridle on this uncollected ſoul, and would not ſuffer it to be defiled with thoſe black furies, gave him in the beginning ſo much horrour upon all theſe proceedings, that a Negromancer promiſing him one day to bear away the prize of Poeſie in a publick meeting of Poets, if he would aſſure him of a reaſonable reward, he anſwered, That were the Crown to be given in thoſe games of profit, of gold wholly celeſtial, he would not buy it by ſuch kinde of ways, at the rate of the blood of a flie. Which he partly ſpake through ſome ſence of piety, partly alſo by the knowlege he had of the illuſion and barenneſs of ſuch Sciences.

His Religion. He was much more troubled about the Articles of faith: for though from his childhood he was educated in Chriſtian Religion, under the wings of his good Mother S. Monica, yet ſuffering his minde to mount up unto ſo many curioſities, he had greatly weakened the ſence of piety. And being deſirous to penetrate all by the help of humane reaſons, when he began to think on the Chriſtian Maxims of Faith, he therein beheld much terrour and abyſs. He came to this condition, that not content with the God of his fore-fathers, who taught him holy counſels, and the univerſal voice of the Church, he put himſelf upon maſtery, now wholly ready to ſhape a Divinity on the weak Ideas of his own brain.

The Manichees at that time ſwayed in Africk, who having found this ſpirit, and ſeeing he might one day prove a ſupport to their Sect, they ſpared nothing to gain him; and he being upon change, it was not very hard to bring him into the ſnare. This Sect ſprang from one named Manes, a Perſian by birth, and a ſervant by condition, who having inherited the goods of a Miſtreſs whom he ſerved, from a good ſlave which he had been, had he remained in that ſtate, became by ſtudy an ill Philoſopher, and a worſe Divine; for mingling ſome old dotages of the magick of Perſians, with other Maxims of Chriſtianity, partly by the help of his purſe, partly alſo by an infinite of impoſtures derived from his giddy ſpirit, he made himſelf head of a faction, proteſting he was the Holy Ghoſt. His principal folly conſiſted in placing two Gods in the world, the one good, the other bad, who had many ſtrange battles. The body, as he ſaid, was the creature of the evil God, and the ſoul a portion of the ſubſtance of the good, enthralled in matter. And following theſe principals, he gave a phantaſtical body to the Saviour of the world, ſeeming it a thing unworthy of the world, to be perſonally united to the fleſh, which he held in the number of things execrable. Behold the cauſe why thoſe who were ingulphed in this Sect, made ſhew to abſtain from meat and wine, which they termed the Dragon's gall.

I do not think that ever Auguſtine fully conſented to all the Chymera's of Manes, which were innumerable; but at the leaſt he reliſhed this Sect in the opinion it had of the original and nature of the body and ſoul, and in many other articles, even to the believing (as himſelf witneſſeth) fables moſt ridiculous. Great God! who thundereſt upon the pride of humane ſpirits, and draggeſt into the duſt of the earth thoſe that would go equal with Angels! What Eclipſe of underſtanding? What abaſing of courage in miſerable Auguſtine? To ſay that a man, whoſe eye was ſo piercing, doctrine ſo eminent, and eloquence ſo divine, after he had forſaken the helm of faith and reaſon, became ſo abandoned, as to make himſelf a party of the Sect of a barbarous and phantaſtical ſlave, who in the end for his miſ-deeds, was fleyed by the command of the King of Perſia; as if the skin of this man could no longer cover a ſoul ſo wicked.

Behold

Behold whither curiosity transporteth an exorbitant spirit. Behold into what so many goodly gifts of grace and nature are dissolved. Behold now the Eternal Wisdom besotteth those, who forsake him to court the lying fantasies of their imagination.

A second impediment. Presumption.

A second obstacle went along with this extravagant curiosity, to settle him fixedly in errour, which was the presumption of his own abilities, an inseparable companion of heresie. He, that once in his brain hath deified Crocodiles, and Dragons, not only adoreth them, but will perswade others, that he hath reason to set Candles before them, and burn Incense for them. It is a terrible blow, when one is wounded in the head by his proper judgment, whose ill never rests in the mean. We come to the end of all by the strength of industry: Stones are pulled forth from the entrails of men, the head is opened to make smoak issue out; but what hand hath ever drawn a false opinion out of the brain of one presumptuous, but that of God? All seemeth green, saith Aristotle, to those, who look on the water; and all is just and specious to such, as behold themselves in proper love. Better it were, according to the counsels of the antient Fathers of the Desert, to have one foot in Hell with docibility of spirit, then an arm in Paradise with our own judgment.

Augustin. l. de duabus animabus contra Manichæos.

Augustine, not to acknowlege his fault, would ever maintain it, and thought it was to make a truth of an errour, opinionative to defend it. He had that, which Tertullian saith is familiar among Hereticks, swellings, and ostentation of knowlege; and his design was then to dispute, not to live. Himself confesseth two things long time made him to tumble in the snare: the first whereof was certain complacence of humour, which easily adhered to vitious companies; and the other an opinion he should ever have the upper hand in disputation. He was as a little Marlin without hood or leashes, catching all sorts of men with his sophisms: and when he had over-come some simple Catholick, who knew not the subtilties of Philosophy, he thought he had raised a great Trophey over our Religion. In all things this Genius sought for supereminence; for even in game, where hazards stood not fair for him, he freely made use of shifts: as were he surprized, he would be angry, making them still believe he had gained. As a certain Wrastler, who being overthrown, undertook by force of eloquence to prove he was not fallen. This appeared more in dispute, then game: for having now flattered himself upon the advantages of his wit, he was apprehensive in this point of the least interest of his reputation, and had rather violate the law of God, then commit a barbarism in speaking, thereby to break the law of Grammar, to the prejudice of the opinion was had of him. It was a crime to speak of virtue with a Solœcism, and a virtue to reckon up vices in fair language. When he was publickly to enterprize some action of importance, the apprehension of success put him into a fever; so that walking one day through the City of Milan with a long Oration in his head, and meeting a rogue in the street, who confidently flouted him, he fetched a great sigh, and said, Behold this Varlet hath gone beyond me in matter of happiness. See, he is satisfied, and content, whilest I dreg an uneasie burthen through the bryars, and all to please a silly estimation. The ardent desire he had to excel in all encounters, alienated him very far from truth, which wills, that we sacrifice to its Altars all the interests of honour we may pretend unto: and besides it was the cause, that the wisest Catholicks feared to be engaged in batttle with so polished a tongue, and such unguided youth. Witness this good Bishop, whom holy S. Monica so earnestly solicited to enter into the list with her son, to convert him; for he prudently excused himself, saying the better to content her, That a son of such tears could never perish.

A third Impediment. The passion of love.

Besides the curiosity and presumption of Augustine, the passion of love surprized him also to make up his misery, and to frame great oppositions in matter of his salvation. But because this noble spirit hath been set by God, as the master of a Ship broken on the edge of a rock, to shew others his shipwrack, I think it a matter very behooffful to consider here the tyranny of an unfortunate passion, which long time enthralled so great a soul, to derive profit from his experience. The fault of Augustine proceeded not simply from love, but from ill managing it, affording that to creatures, which was made for the Creatour. Love in it self is not a vice, but the soul of all virtues, when it is tied to its object, which is the sovereign good; and never shall a soul act any thing great, if it contain not some fire in the veins. The Philosopher Hegesippus said, That all the great and goodliest natures are known by three things, Light, Heat, & Love. The more light pretious stones have, the more lustre they reflect. Heat raiseth Eagles above Serpents: yea, among Palms, those are the noblest, which have the most love and inclination to their fellows. These three qualities were eminent in our Augustine. His understanding was lightning, his will fire, and heart affection. If all this had happily taken the right way to God, it had been a miracle infinitely accomplished: but the Clock, which is out of frame in the first wheel, doth easily miscarry in all its motions; and he, who was already much unjoynted in the prime piece, which makes up a man, viz. judgment, and knowlege, suffered all his actions to slide into exorbitancy. As there are two sorts of love, whereof the one is most felt in the spirit, the other predominateth in the flesh, Augustine tried them both in several encounters. First, he was excessively passionate even in chast amities; witness a schole-fellow of his, whom he so passionately affected. He was a second Pylades, that had always been bred and trained up with him in a marvellous correspondence of age, humour, spirit, will, life, and condition, which had so enkindled friendship in either part, that it was transcendent: and though it were in the lists of perfect honesty, yet being as it was too sensual, God who chastiseth those that are estranged from his love, as fugitive slaves, weaned his Augustine, first touching this friend with a sharp fever, in which he received baptism, after which, he was somewhat lightened. Whereupon Augustine grew very glad, as if he were now out of danger. He visited him, and forbear not to scoff at his baptism, still pursuing the motions of his profane spirit: but the other, beholding him with an angry eie, cut off his speech with an admirable and present liberty, wishing him he would abstain from such discourse, unless he meant to renounce all correspondence. He seemed already in this change to feel the approaches of the other world: for verily his malady augmenting, quickly separated the soul from the body. Augustine was much troubled at this loss, insomuch, that all he beheld from Heaven to Earth, seemed to him filled with images of death. The country was to him a place of darkness, and giddy fancies: the house of his Father a Sepulchre, the memory of his passed pleasures a Hell. All was distast, being deprived of him, for whom he loved all things. It seemed to him all men he beheld were unworthy of life, and that death would quickly carry away all the world, since it took him away, whom he prized above all the world. These words escaped him, which he afterwards retracted, to wit; 'That the soul of his companion, and his, were expressly but one and the 'same, surviving in two bodies, and therefore he 'abhorred life, because he was no more then half a 'man, yet would he not die, for fear the part of his 'friend, which yet lived in himself, might perish.

it

All this well declared he had great dispositions to love, and that to what side soever his affections tended, they never would be with mediocrity. It seemed now all things conspired against him to kindle a coal in his veins, which the revolution of many years could not extinguish. First, As nothing is more dangerous to foment this passion, then ill example, he lived in a place, as contagious for chastity, as the North-wind for Plants. Salvianus a great Writer, speaking of Africk, which bred S. Augustine, saith, It was the country of loves, and that it was as strange, a man should be an African, without being an African, as to be an African, and not lascivious. Secondly, These dangers so frequent, which seemed to require much retention, found liberty enough in the house. For the tears of the blessed S. Monica were not as yet sufficient to stay the course of insolent youth, since the Father little cared; for that he having one day beheld his son in the Baths, spake some free words, which served rather as a spur for sensuality, then a motive to continency. In the third place, as the eie must be open to direct occasions, so he therein used so little study, that having a soul, as it were, of sulphure, so much was it disposed to take fire, he hastened to throw himself into the midsts of flames.

Salvian. l. 7. de gubernat. Tam novum est impudicum non esse Afrum, quàm Afrum non esse Afrum.

He haunted the company of Libertines, who are the most dangerous enemies to chastity, and being of a humour very gentile and pleasing, gave love, and reciprocally received: and although he had none, needs must he counterfeit. When he came to Carthage, about the sixteenth year of his age, there was not a street, where love spread not his Nets. He as yet knew not well what it was to love, and yet desired to be beloved, and grew weary of living in innocency. He hated his liberty, and sought an hand, which captived him. He went to Theatres there to behold loves represented, where he fervently was enamoured of the passions of imaginary lovers: yea, his very eys hunted in the Church after objects of concupiscence, by glances too too dissolute; for which he confessed to have been very particularly chastised by the hand of God, since he mingled the sanctity of the place with the entertainment of the prophane actions. This ulcered soul threw it self out of its compass, and took wind and fire on every side. It seemed to him he must excel in vice, as well as in science. He made himself more vitious then he was, to appear more gentile in the eys of evil men, and there remained for him nothing more, as it were, in this point but one shame, not to have been sufficiently impudent. In the end, he fell into the snares he desired, and was involved in admirable labyrinths, where ever the end of one love was the beginning of another.

This life so carnal was a perpetual hinderance to the visitations of God. For, as Platonists say, stars cannot exercise their virtue on the sphere of fire: so all the light of good counsel had no force in the flames of such a passion. His spirit was depraved by sensuality, allured by the bait of worldly beauties, and darkened with the obscurity of his blindness, in such sort, that the light of the spirit of God in him found no place: if there be a vice in the world, which tieth the soul to flesh, and makes it stupid to the feeling of God, it is this foul sin: and although it be not wholly incompatible with science, yet never accorded in the wisdom of Heaven, which is more conversant in the taste of heavenly things, then in knowledge.

The seventh SECTION.

Dispositions towards the conversion of Saint Augustine.

BEhold the principal impediments of the conversion of S. Augustine; but God, who insensibly wove this work, and draws good even from the evil of his elect, caused him to use the remedy of the Scorpion, that stung him. For as he, pursuing his ordinary curiosity, plunged more and more into solid Sciences, he began by little and little to distaste the doctrine of the Manichees, finding it very strange, that a man should make all kinde of dreams and sottishness to pass for verities, under the false seal of the Holy Ghost. Those of his faction, who saw him waver, oft lent their helping hands, too weak to support him; and knowing their own inability, promised quickly to cause the prime man of their sect to come from Carthage, who would dis-engage his mind from so many doubts, and afford him ample satisfaction.

They failed not in their promise, for in few days the false Bishop Faustus arrived, who was as the sword and buckler of the Manichees. He was a man of a fair presence, had charms in his tongue, and many attractives in his conversation, able to ensnare the most subtile wits. He instantly set himself to frame some studied discourses upon the Maxims of his superstition, which were heard with great applause by the whole faction. For indeed he was an Eagle among Parrots. These men, supposing that Augustine was fully settled in all their apprehensions and approbations, asked him what he thought of the Bishop Faustus, and whether he were not an incomparable man? He very coldly answered, He was eloquent, and throughly able to tickle an ear. But his malady daily encreasing could not be cured by a man, who perpetually speaketh, and shuffles up the matter; and therefore besides his goodly Sermons, there was need of a particular conference, where he might fully discharge his minde. Faustus, endowed with a natural courtesie, thinking he had to do with a young spirit, whom he with words would amuse, accepts the disputation; where, instead of finding a Crane, he encountred an Eagle, who handled him roughly from the beginning of the battle. This man made him presently appear to be of base gold, and that this talent was no other, then that he was an indifferent Grammarian, had read some Orations of Tully, the memory whereof were very fresh in him, some Epistles also of Seneca, with a mixture of Poesie, but in the books of his own Sect, he had very little knowlege. All that which made him esteemed in publick consisted in a grace of language, which proceeding from a fair body was exposed with the more exteriour pomp. Behold that, which now throughout the world authorizeth an infinite number of men, who are in the opinion of ignorant, or the indifferently knowing, as flying fires in the air. When Augustine put him upon the Solstices, Equinoctials, Eclipses, the course and motion of stars, wherewith the books of Manes are replenished; this man then found himself in a new world, but yet was wily: for he was not as the sottish Manichees, who promising evidence upon this doctrine, made as many slips as steps: he roundly said, Faustus, and his qualities. Pretiosorum poculorum decentissimus ministrator. Conf. 5. & 6.

said, his curiosity had never born him so far that way, and that he better had loved to contemn such things, then study them. As for the rest, the doctrine of Manes depended not upon the knowlege of Eclipses, since never had it been eclipsed. Augustine perceived his Doctour was not wholly ignorant, since he understood at the least, how to acknowlege his own ignorance, but was otherwise absolutely distasted with the Divinity of the Manichees, seeing so little support in Faustus, who was the prime pillar of the Faction; and the snare which he would make use of to stay him, was the beginning of his liberty. It was to make a Banquet of Flowers and Songs for one almost famished, to seek with words to give him satisfaction.

Non usquequaquam imperitus erat imperitia sua. Confes. 4. c. 7.

In the end, after a long abode in Africk, he resolved to go to Rome, not so much to finde verity in its source, which as yet he proposed not to himself to be in the Church of Rome, as to dissolve the irksomness of teaching Rhetorick at Carthage, the youth whereof was extremely insolent. His friends propounded unto him for his aim a far other air, much different successes from his former labours, and another recompence for his merit; adding besides, it was a sweeter Climate, where young men held within the lists of good discipline, yielded their Masters full satisfaction. It was the strongest bait could therein be found; for the sweetness of his spirit was incompatible with the boldness of the Scholars of Carthage, which was the cause that secretly stealing away from his good mother, who could not with her tears hinder the voyage, he set sail for Italy, and came to Rome. Behold him in the chief Theatre of the world, where he began to shew himself, and entertain an Auditory in his Chamber, to be known, and forthwith appear in publick Courts, where he learned; the Students of Rome gave their Reader good words, but the time of payment being come, they inconsiderately many times forsook the Teacher to exercise elsewhere the like deceit, which infinitely displeased him; and seeing that by good fortune a Rhetorician was sought after for Milan, he handled the matter so, by the assistance of some Manichees whom he yet courted for his own ends, and by the favour of Symmachus Pretour of the City, that this charge was stayed for him.

Hidden passages of divine providence in reclaiming souls.

Behold him then at Milan, where the providence of God had marked out his lodging. Behold him in the field of battle, where he was to be assaulted. Behold him in the Amphitheater, where he should be disarmed. Behold him in the Sphere, where he must be illuminated.

As we have beheld the strong oppositions which stopped up the way in the salvation of this great soul, let us now see the means God used for his conversion. Here is an admirable spectacle, and worthy the consideration of noble spirits, since of all the works which God doth out of himself, nothing hath so much manifested his wisdom, bounty, mercy, and power, as the conversion of men. We observe in the effects and experiences of nature, that one thing draweth another in four especial manners; to wit, sympathy, motion, heat, and secret attraction. Sympathy say I, or natural conformity; so the stone tendeth downwards into the bosom of the earth, because it there finds reposes. Motions, so the hammer drives the nail, & one man leads another by the hand. Heat, so the Sun raiseth up the vapours of the earth, after it hath subtilized and heated them. Secret attractions, so amber draws the straw, and the adamant wins the iron. The Spirit of God, engenious and powerful in our conversions, makes use of these same four attractions to draw us to him. Attractions, which are able to gain the harshest, dis-arm the most savage, heat the remisest, and startle the stupid. Attraction of sympathy consisteth in good nature, and sweet inclination, which the Master-workman giveth us for virtue. Attraction of Motions is seen in the conversion of good company, where examples of piety sweetly stir a soul to that which is its good. Attraction of heat is insinuated by the word of God, which is a Sword of fire, to make strange divisions between the soul and flesh. Secret attraction, is a most particular touch from God, who taketh men by ways hidden, interiour, and extraordinary. So, many times we see conversions infinitely strange. Such was that of S. Paul, who felt a blow in the blood of S. Stephen, when he shed it by so many hands as he gave consents to the fury of his executioners. Such was that of the Jugler Genesius under Diocletian, who in a full Theatre scoffing at the Ceremonies of Christians, at the same time became a Confessour of the faith, and Martyr of Jesus Christ. Such was that of Mary, Niece of Abraham the Hermit, who was gained to God in a Supper which she had made in a Bourdel. Such likewise was that of Iraïs a poor Maid-servant of Alexandria, who as the Samaritan going to draw water, left her Pitcher, to run to Martyrdom, and joyning her self to Christians which were led to execution, bare away the first Crown. Such was that of a Thief, who forsook his wicked life, beholding a young Monk that ate wilde roots; and another converted having seen Paphnutius the Hermit drink a glass of wine, who never had drunk any before, and then only did it by a resignation of his own judgment and proper will into the hands of another who cammanded it. The Thief at that instant thus concluded; That if this holy man were so enforced by virtue, for an action so contrary to ordinary life, he himself might well by the help of resolution, undertake the same predominance over his passions, and of an ill man become a Saint, as he did. Briefly, such was the conversion of Parentius, a man of quality, who exercised a place of judicature in a City of Italy. For, having seen a young Swine-herd, who taught his companion a trick to make his hogs readily run into the Sty; which was to say to them, Enter hogs into the Sty, as wicked Judges into Hell: and then perceiving that these beasts readily obeyed this word, he laughed heartily; but presently changing all his mirth into serious actions, he set himself to ponder on the difficulties he found of salvation, in the great corruptions of justice, and was so touched, that he took the habit of Franciscans, where he so far proceeded in virtue, that he became General of the Order, and visited bare-foot all the houses of S. Francis. It must be confessed there are great privileges of Gods providence in such affairs. I am willing briefly to recite examples of these secret attractions, because they are very famous, and I set before you the four sorts of conversions, by reason they will not be unprofitable to make us discover the singular œconomy of God in that whereof we are now about to treat.

Notable conversions.

Martyrol. Rom. 16. Martii & 22. Septemb.

Joannes Ægid. de doctrina Patrum tit. Charit. num. 6.

Chronic. Minorum.

The Saviour of the world used all these pieces in the conversion of S. Augustine, as we may observe in his progression. For first, concerning attraction of sympathy, or natural conformity, it is true, that this great man was of an excellent nature, and though it were a long time smothered up in flesh and blood, yet was it as a Sun in eclipse, which should one day appear in full liberty, and illuminate the body, which then was its obstacle. In his most tender infancy, he made amorous inclinations to his Creatour appear.

The œconomy of God in the conversion of S. Augustine.

For then he had recourſe to prayer, as to a Sanctuary of his ſmall afflictions; and like a childe placing felicity in that which touched him neareſt, according to his eſteem, he ardently beſought God that he might eſcape the chaſtiſement of rods, and diſgraces of the Schole. He was of an humour free and liberal, gracious, mild, affable, obliging, and full of compaſſion toward men in want, which is a good way to repreſent great actions of virtue, and diſpoſe one to receive the ſpirit of God in abundance. Affections, with tears of ſweetneſs and devotion, were to him very familiar, which appeared on the day of his being made Prieſt, ſometime after his converſion: for he ſpared not to weep in that ceremony, where by chance a ſimple man interpreting that this happened to him through diſturbance, that he was not yet a Biſhop, who ſo well deſerved it, he came near to comfort him, ſaying, He ſhould be patient, that Prieſthood was the next degree to the dignity of a Biſhop, and that in time he ſhould enjoy the accompliſhment of his deſire. S. Auguſtine afterward related this ſpeech to his friends, as an example of the errour of judgments made upon mens actions. As for his vices, he had nothing therein black or hideous; for his loves though inordinate, were bounded in limits moſt tolerable, and his ambitions were not haughty and diſdainful, but conſiſting only in a ſleight vanity, to make ſhew of that which he had either of wit, or learning: a paſſion very natural to thoſe who feel themſelves endowed with any perfections. Otherwiſe he had no deſign, pretence, engagements, as have they, who often cover their petty intereſts with the pretext of piety, and are ever ready to imbrace the Religion wherein they finde moſt accommodation for their temporal affairs. Auguſtine was ſo free from worldly avarice, that he knew not what it was to make a fortune, or reach at wealth. Scarce would he ever learn to carry a key, poſſeſs money in a Coffer, and take accounts, as obſerveth Poſſidonius in his life. All his minde was upon books, and all his intentions aimed to the finding out of truth, that he might offer homage to her for all he had, and faithfully ſerve her all his life, after he once had well know her. Theſe diſpoſitions gave a full paſſage to ſuch as were to treat with him.

On the other part, attraction of motion, which commeth from good example, was to him very advantagious in the perſon of his good mother S. Monica. And if certain people, as the Lycians, took the name of their mothers, as of thoſe, whom they thought moſt contributed to the production of man into the world: Auguſtine had great cauſe to take the title of his nobility from S. Monica, who brought him forth more profitably for the life of grace, then that of nature.

Herod. l. 2.

The qualities of S. Monica.

This woman verily was the pearl of women, whoſe life had not great lightenings of extaſies, nor raptures; for all her virtues paſſed with little noiſe, like to great rivers that glide along with peaceful majeſty: but all was there very inward, as in her who ever was hidden within the better part of her ſelf. Much hath ſhe done in affording a S. Auguſtine to the Church; and whoſoever cannot diſcover the ſecret virtues of the Sun, let him content himſelf to meaſure it by his rays. She pretended to conſecrate her Virginity to Altars, God drew her to marriage, to gain from her a Doctour for his Church. This Saint knew not as yet what ſhe did, when in her tender years by a laudable cuſtom ſhe roſe from her bed in the deep ſilence of night, to offer her prayers to God, and when ſhe ſhortned her diet at each repaſt, to divide the moiety of her life with the poor: but the ſpirit of God, which guided her, diſpoſed her then by theſe actions to ſome matter of importance. She was married to a Pagan, and one of a humour very untractable, which ſhe ſo ſoftened by her long and diſcreet patience, that in the end he ſet aſide all his moody extravagancies, as it is ſaid, the furious Unicorn ſleeps in a Maidens boſom. It was with her a great conſolation to have married an Infidel, and after ſome years to ſee him die a Chriſtian, ſaying to God, She had received a Lion, and reſtored a Lamb. All her care aimed only at this ſon, whom ſhe firſt ſaw ingulphed in a life moſt licentious afterward, by miſhap involved in the hereſie of the Manichees. The poor mother endured nine entire years the throws of this ſpiritual childe-birth, the moſt ſenſibly that may be imagined. What grief and ſighs in her retirement? What fancies in her ſleep? What prayers in the Church? What alms in neceſſities of the poor? What prudence and diſcretion in all her proceedings? She ſought out all the paſſages into this ſpirit, which ſhe could imagine; but ſeeing it was a torrent not to be reſtrained by her forces, ſhe peaceably expected the aſſiſtance of Heaven. She deſpaired not of his malady through fear to cure him. She undertook not in the fervent acceſſes of his feaver to upbraid his diſorders. She went not about manacing him with fire and cauteries. But did as God, who acteth no ill, but ever ſo uſeth the matter, that the evil is extenuated. When ſhe could not ſpeak to her ſon, ſhe cauſed the apple of her eys to ſpeak to God, deploring all night, and watering the Altars, not with blood of Victims, but that of her ſoul, which were her tears. We may ſay, that as the waters which have pearls in them, run for the moſt part to the South; ſo this holy woman being in Africk, a Southern Region, became in the abundance of her tears the true fountain of the South, fit to bear a great pearl, which afterward brought forth for chriſtendom many millions of pearls. Never had the Angel Raphael ſo much care of young Toby, as this celeſtial intelligence of her ſon, being perpetually in Centinel, and obſerving the viſitations of God's providence. Her Paralitick was ready at the Fiſh-pool, and expected nothing but the ſtirring of the water.

Aqua defluentes ad Auſtrum generant margaritas. Tarentinus Philoſophus.

Behold ſhe came from Africk to Milan, through ſo many perils both of Sea and Land, ſuch travels and ſufferings to conclude her deliverance. She found her ſon much already ſhaken by the ſhocks which the eloquence of S. Ambroſe had given him. Soon the holy woman knew it was this great Biſhop, whom God had choſen to ſet a ſeal upon this work of the converſion of a man ſo important: and her ſon relateth, that from that time ſhe eſteemed S. Ambroſe as a very Angel of Heaven (a). She was ſtill in the Church to behold him, ever ſhe hung on his lips, as the ſources which diſtil from the Paradiſe of God.

(a) Deligebat illum virum ſicut Angelum Dei. In Ambroſii ora ſuſpendebatur ad fontem aqua ſalientis in vitam æternam. Conf. 6. in c. 1.

Here is the attraction of heat, or rather the Sun that muſt on high exhale this cold vapour, after ſo much reſiſtance it had made againſt the ſpirit of God. Auguſtine himſelf very particularly deciphereth, how being at Milan, he ſaw the Biſhop Ambroſe, known through the whole habitable world (b) as one of the beſt men upon the earth, who ceaſed not to adminiſter to his people the word of God, which in it bare corn, oyl, and the wine of ſobriety. This man of God, ſaith he, at my arrival embraced me, as a Father would his Son, and ſhewed he was much pleaſed with my coming to Milan, obliging me with many charitable Offices. Behold the cauſe why I began to affect him very much; not ſo much yet as a Doctour of truth (for I expected it neither from him, nor any other Catholick) but as a man who wiſhed wiſhed me well. I continually was preſent at his ſermons: in the beginning for curioſity, to eſpy and ſound whether his eloquence were equal to his great reputation. I was very attentive to his words, little caring for the matter, and I found he really had a ſtyle very learned and ſweet, but not the chearfulneſs and quaint attractions of Fauſtus, (c) though for ſubſtance of diſcourſe there was no compariſon; for Fauſtus recounted Fables, and this man taught moſt wholſom doctrine. Behold the firſt apprehenſions that Auguſtine had touching the ability of S. Ambroſe. In the end, he continuing to hear him for delight, truth entered through his ears, which were only opened to eloquence, and he found in the beginning, that our Religion had not thoſe abſurdities which the Manichees obtruded; and were it not true, it might at leaſt be profeſſed without impudence, which he could not hitherto be perſwaded unto. The Old Teſtament, which with the Manichees he ſo much had rejected, ſeemed to him to have a quite other face, after the learned interpretations of S. Ambroſe, The chymera's and fantaſies, which invironed his imagination, were diſſolved at the riſing of ſome petty rays from him. Notwithſtanding it was yet neither day nor night in his ſoul; Errour was below, and Religion had not yet the upper hand. His ſpirit over-toiled with ſo many queſtions by the wiles of Satan propended to neutrality, being neither hot, nor cold, as it happened to thoſe, who forſake truth, through the deſpair they have how to know it.

(b) In optimis notus orbi terræ.

(c) Sermonis erat eruditioris, minus tamen hilarisſcentis, atque mulcentis quàm Fauſti.

The eighth SECTION.

Agitations of ſpirit in S. Auguſtine upon his Converſion.

BUt God ſtill enflaming his chaſte deſires, he bent himſelf to conſider S. Ambroſe, whom he perpetually had for object: and ſeeing how this man was honoured by the chief Potentates of the earth, and how he flouriſhed in ſuch glorious actions: all appeared compleat in ſuch a life, but that it went on without a wife, he thinking at that time the want of a great burthen to be a main miſery. He, as yet proceeded but to the bark of S. Ambroſe, obſerving only what was exteriour, and not penetrating into thoſe great treaſures of lights, virtues, contentments, and heavenly conſolations, ſtored up in the bottom of the conſcience of this holy Prelate. He had vehement deſires to ſpeak to him ſomewhat more familiarly, to underſtand his opinion, to ask queſtions at large, to diſcover his heart all naked, and unfold the miſeries of his paſſed life: 'And, be-'cauſe (ſaith he) I ſtood in need of a man full of 'great leaſure to receive the ebb and flow of 'thoughts which were in my ſoul; now I found all 'in Ambroſe, except time to hear me: not that he 'was difficult of acceſs, for he was ever in his Hall 'expoſed to the ſervice of the whole world; but 'my unhappineſs was to be like the Paralitick of 'the fiſh-pool, ſtill out-gone by others more ſtrong 'then my ſelf. What diligence ſoever I uſed, I found 'Ambroſe invironed with a large troup of ſolici-'tous men, whoſe infirmities he comforted to my 'excluſion: and if any little time remained for him, 'it was employed either in repaſt, which was ex-'ceeding ſhort, or at his book. The good Prelate 'ſtudied in his Hall in ſight of all the world, where I 'oft beheld him, and ſaw, that in reading, he only 'ran over with his eie one page of a book, then ru-'minated it in his heart, not at all moving his lips, 'whether it were, that he would not engage himſelf 'to diſcourſe upon his reading to all their preſent, 'or whether it were, he did it to preſerve his voice, 'eaſily weakened with much exerciſe of ſpeech, or 'for ſome other cauſe. I thought time was very pre-'tious to him, and ſeeing him ſo ſerious, I ſuppoſed 'it a kinde of impudency to interrupt him. After ſo 'long a ſilence I went away with the reſt, not ha-'ving opportunity to ſpeak to him.

Verily this diſcourſe ſheweth a marvellous repoſe of ſpirit in S. Ambroſe; and, as it were, over-much modeſty in S. Auguſtine: for it was a wonder, that he who ordinarily lived at Milan in the reputation of a great wit, and was already known by the Biſhop to be ſuch, brake not the preſs at one time or other, to gain ſome hours of audience in affairs of ſo great importance. I ſhould think, either that he uſed a forbearance too ſhame-faced and irreſolute, or that S. Ambroſe would not enter into diſputation with a young man as yet ſo well perſwaded of his own abilities, before he had ſuffered him to ripen, and to be throughly ſeaſoned by the reſentments of piety, However, it put the mind of S. Auguſtine into great diſturbance. Behold (ſaith he) almoſt eleven years, that I have ſought the truth, and ſee I am arrived at the thirteenth year of my Age, yet ſtill perplexed. To morrow infallibly it muſt diſſolve: ſtay yet a little; perhaps Fauſtus will come to Milan, and tell thee all. But how will he tell that, which he ſhall never know? Let us hold with the Academicks, and ſay all is uncertain, for every man maintaineth what he liſt. It is the property of man to imagine, and the nature of God to know. But the Academicks (behold gallant men) do leave a ſpirit in perpetual dotage. Let us rather ſet our feet on the ſteps of Catholick Religion, where we planted them from our tender Age. It is not ſo cloudy as the Manichees ſuppoſe it, Ambroſe hath already much freed me from errours: let us purſue the reſt. I, but: Ambroſe hath not leaſure for thee. Let us read: where ſhall we finde neceſſary books, and where have ſit time? Thy Scholars buſy thee all the mornings; take at leaſt ſome hours after noon to enjoy thy ſelf. But when ſhall I admit the neceſſary viſits of Friends, that muſt be entertained? And when the preparations for my Lectures? And when my Recreations? Let all be loſt, ſo I may gain my ſelf. This life, as thou ſeeſt, Auguſtine, is moſt miſerable, and death uncertain. If it catch thee upon a ſurpriſe, in what eſtate wilt thou leave this world? And where doſt thou think to learn that, which here thou haſt neglected? But how if death alſo ſhould conclude the facultie and life of the ſoul? It is a madneſs to think only on it, ſince all the greatneſs and choice of Religion, wiſdom, and ſanctity fights for the immortality of the ſoul. We ſhould never ſo much employ the ſpirit of God in ſo great advantages as he hath given us, if we had no other life but that of Flies and Ants, Auguſtine, thy evil is ſenſuality. If thou wilt finde God, thou muſt forſake thy ſelf, and from this time forward bid a long adue to worldly pleaſures, Thou art deceived: when thou haſt felt them, thou wilt have the repentance, to have done that too ſoon, which thou oughteſt not to do; nor canſt thou any more make an honourable retreat into the world. Let us live, we have good Friends; we may in the end have an Office, a Wife, Means, and all ſort of contentments: there are too many miſerable enough through neceſſity, that conſent not to it by any act voluntary. To conclude, a Wife and the truth of the Goſpel, are not things incompatible.

Diſturbances of mind in S. Auguſtine.

Behold how this poor ſpirit turmoiled it ſelf in the retirement of his cogitations, as himſelf hath declared in his Confeſſions. He beheld the life of Saint Ambroſe and his chaſtity with an eie yet benummed and ſurcharged with terreſtrial humours, and it reflected ſome rays upon him; but he found it ſo high mounted in the Throne of its glory, that the ſole aſpect affrighted him: he meaſured continency by his own forces, not by the grace of God. Behold, why he deſpaired of a ſingle life, and thought a wife was a Chain, ſometime unhappy, but ever neceſſary. He lived at that time with Alipius and Nebridius, two noble Africans, his intimate friends, who followed him, charmed with his doctrine and ſweetneſs of his converſation; and from this time they propoſed that life to themſelves, which they afterward led. He often put them upon the intention to eſtabliſh a good manner of life, to paſs the reſt of their days in the ſtudy of wiſdom. Alipius, who was very chaſt, maintained, this could not be done in the company of women, according to an antient ſaying of Cato, who affirmed, If all the world were without a woman, it would not be exempt from the converſation of gods. Auguſtine, that was leſs chaſt then Alipius, and much more eloquent, prepared himſelf to diſpute this queſtion ſtrongly and firmly againſt him, ſo that it ſeemed (ſaith he) that the old Serpent ſpake by his mouth, ſo much he connected together reaſons and allegations to maintain his opinion. The good Alipius was much amazed to behold ſuch a great ſpirit ſo tied to fleſh; and as he attributed much to all his opinions, reſpecting him as his Maſter, it was a great chance he had not drawn him into voluptuouſneſs through a ſimple curioſity of experience. This miſerable ſnare ſtaied all his good purpoſes, and needs muſt he break them, to put this great Soul into full liberty.

Confeſ. 6. 11. Amans beatam vitam, timebam illam in ſede ſuâ.

The ninth SECTION.

Three accidents which furthered this Converſion

IT happened, either by the induſtry of holy Saint Monica, who failed not to obſerve opportunities for the ſalvation of her ſon, or by a ſecret inſpiration of God, that the woman, whom he had brought with him from Africk, and with whom he had always lived in fair correſpondence, preſerving to him inviolable faith, as if ſhe had been his lawful wife, reſolved to leave him, ſaying: That ſhe had now fulfilled the meaſure of her ſins. That it was time to think upon a retreat; that ſhe ſhould die with this onely grief, not to have tears enough to waſh the offences of her youth ſo unthriftily waſted. For the reſt, never man ſhould poſſeſs her after him, and that all her loves ſhould be from this time forward, for him who made her; onely ſhe recommended unto him a Son which ſhe left, praying he would ſhew himſelf as a Father and Mother unto him,

Auguſtine was much amazed at this ſpeech. It ſeemed his heart was pulled away from him, to ſee himſelf ſeparated from a woman he ſo faithfully had loved: and on the other ſide he was full of confuſion, to behold that ſhe ſhewed him the way which he ſought, he not yet feeling himſelf ſtrong enough to follow her example. It was not in his power to ſtay her any longer, nor to approve what ſhe did. His ſpirit was penſive and divided, not knowing upon what to reſolve. After the departure of this woman, the mother, who as yet knew not the will of God, ſpeaks to him of marriage, and he caſt his eys upon a young Virgin of a very good houſe, which much pleaſed him; who, though ſhe were two years younger then the lawful age of marriage permitteth, he reſolved to ſtay for her: but in the mean ſpace he found out new loves, taking another unlawful woman in the place of her whom he had forſaken.

Yet for all that, he deſiſted not from the enquiry of truth, feeling none of all thoſe engagements more then that of love, which made the ſharpeſt reſiſtance againſt him; and ſeeing he could not accoſt S. Ambroſe in his great multiplicity of affairs, with that facility he wiſhed, he made his addreſs to Simplicianus, Holy Simplicianus. Prieſt of the Church of Milan. He was one of the moſt venerable men that was then in Europe, endowed with infinite piety, and excellent literature. For this conſideration he was delegated by his holineſs to ſerve as a ſpiritual Father to S. Ambroſe. Otherwiſe he was ſo humble and modeſt, that to give his Biſhop the upper hand, he very often counterfeited ignorance in queſtions which he right well knew, conſulting with S. Ambroſe as an Oracle, becauſe of his dignity, and giving a perfect example to all, of the duty we owe to the Prelates of the Church.

Beſides theſe ornaments of virtue and ſcience, this holy man had ſtrong attractives in the facility of his converſation, and ſweetneſs of entertainment: ſo that a certain particular grace was ſeen to ſhine in his face, which was the cauſe every one deſired to ſpeak to him for his converſation; nor was any one weary of his company. Auguſtine having met with this Simplicianus, whom he called the Man of God, throughly openeth his heart unto him, relating all the diſturbances of his life paſſed. Simplicianus moſt tenderly embraceth him, and ſhews the Port now much nearer then he imagined. For, as he mentioning, that among other readings he had peruſed the books of Plato, tranſlated by Victorinus a Senatour, and heretofore Profeſſour of Rhetorick in the City of Rome: I like very well (ſaith this good old man) that you have read the books of Plato, rather then the impieties of other Philoſophers. I doubt not but you have obſerved many paſſages in this good Authour, which make for our Religion: but ſince you have read the Tranſlation of Victorinus, and much eſteem of it, why do you not imitate him in his converſion? You muſt underſtand that I moſt familiarly knew him, when we were at Rome: he was a very learned old man, having his hairs grown white in the long ſtudy of all ſorts of Sciences, which he taught, manned, and illuſtrated the ſpace of ſo many years, partly in declaring, partly by writing. There was not almoſt a Senatour in Rome, which acknowledged him not for his Maſter, and he arrived to ſuch a degree of reputation, that they erected a Statue to him in conſideration of his great learning. Who could ever have hoped in the decrepitneſs whereunto he was come, to ſee him born again among the little Children of the Church? Notwithſtanding, to ſhew you the force of Gods ſpirit, after the reading of almoſt all the books in the world, he ſet himſelf in the end of his Age, to peruſe the Bible and other Writings of Chriſtians, where he found himſelf ſurprized at unawares, ſaying afterward to me: Simplicianus, know I am a Chriſtian. I thinking he meant to ſcoff me: I will not, ſaid I, believe any thing, till I ſee you at Church. And imagine you (replied he) the walls of a Church make a Chriſtian? He ſpake this, much fearing to offend the Cedars of Libanus, which were his parents, eminent in qualitie, though Infidels: but he afterward was well reſolved never to bluſh more for the Goſpel. Let us go (ſaith he) to the Church, I am a Chriſtian. I was at this word ſo tranſported with joy, I could no longer contain my ſelf. I led him to the Church, and cauſed him to be inſtructed in the Articles of our Faith, and commanded a name to be given him among thoſe that required holy Baptiſm. When he came to make his profeſſion of faith, ſome one, thinking to pleaſe him, would have him pronounce in ſecret. No (ſaith the good old man) in publick: It is no longer fit to be aſhamed of ſo glorious an action. As ſoon as he was mounted into an eminent place to pronounce the Articles of his belief, all the world which knew him, began to crie Victorinus, Victorinus. The admiration was ſo great, the contentment ſo univerſal, the joy ſo ſenſible, that it ſeemed every one would ſnatch him from thence, to ſet him in his heart.

Oh God! how you honour thoſe that faithfully ſerve you? Behold him now, who inſtead of tying himſelf to thoſe dying Palms of Rhetorick, is faſtened to the tree of life, which never periſheth, and is eternized with a glorious memory in the eſtimation of Chriſtendom. Who would not think himſelf moſt happie, by following his example to participate in his Crowns? For mine own part, I will truly confeſs unto you (dear ſon) that at ſuch time as Julian the Apoſtata forbade all the Chriſtians to uſe humane learning, I was as much addicted to it as any man of mine Age, being then in the flower of youth very curious; but ſeeing matter of faith was in queſtion, I moſt freely forſooke thoſe Syrens, to arrive at the haven of ſalvation, where I ſpeedily hope to enjoy your company. For ſo excellent a nature as yours, is not made to be loſt. It were over-much to reſiſt the inſpirations of God; your age and faſhion require you to lay arms aſide.

Confeſ. l. 8. c. 5. Non erat omnino quod reſponderem veritate convictus, niſi tantum verba lenta & ſomnolenta mihi, acce mihi: ſed modis & modis non habebant medium, & fine paululum, in longum ibat.

This diſcourſe quickened with love, reaſon, wiſdom, and examples ſo ſenſible, penetrated far into the heart of S. Auguſtine, cauſing him to ſpeak theſe words, which he did afterwards couch in his Confeſſions: 'I knew not what to anſwer, convinced 'by varieties ſo palpable, but in dull and drowſie 'words, ſaying always, This ſhall ſoon, very ſoon 'be; yet had this ſoon no meaſure in it, nor did 'this delay I deſired, finde any end.

God

God recharged again, and laid a freſh battery upon Auguſtine by the mouth of a ſecular man. A certain Gentleman of Africa, called Pontianus, who following the Emperour's Court, came to viſit him in his lodging, found by chance on the table, the Epiſtles of Saint Paul. This being a man much given to devotion, and who knew Auguſtine to have a wandering wit in the curioſity of prophane books, ſmiled to ſee him now ſeeking out his entertainment with an Apoſtle. Auguſtine replied, there was no cauſe of wonder, for it was now become his principal exerciſe. The Gentleman ſeeing him in this good humour, ſets before him divers diſcourſes of piety, and among others, ſome narrations of the life of S. Anthony. Wherewith Auguſtine and his companion Alipius were raviſhed, having never before heard this great Saint ſpoken of: ſo little curious were they to know that, which could not be omitted but by ſuch as were willing to be perpetually ignorant of themſelves. The other proceeding in his diſcourſe, repreſented to them the companies of Religious then in great account, eſteemed by all the world as the Paps of the Bride, repleniſhed with celeſtial odours, which ſtreamed even as far as the deſerts, with immortal ſources of their milk; and added, that they had a Monaſtery in the ſuburbs of Milan, erected by Saint Ambroſe, wherein were many great examples of virtue. They heard this man with ſome ſmall ſhame to be ignorant of ſo large a Treaſure, even at their gate, whileſt they turned over the writings of many wits which lived in flames, tormented where they are, and applauded where they are not. This good man ſeeing they reliſhed this excellent diſcourſe, following the point, ſaid: Being one day at Trier, with three Gentlemen, my companions, as the Emperour after dinner beheld the Turneys, and race of horſes with all his Court, it came into our heads to go take the Ayr in certain Gardens near the City. Two of the four of us walking along, arrived by chance at a little Cel, where they found Hermits, and a book of the life of Saint Anthony. One takes it up, reads, and admireth it, and in reading is ſo moved, that he determined in his heart to change his courſe of life. And being no longer able to contain himſelf (ſo repleniſhed was he with the love of God, and confuſion of his own infirmities) he turned to his companion, and ſaid: and what (I pray) do we ſeek with all our travels? Whether tend all our ambitions? Why bear we theſe arms? What pretend we with ſo much toyl? To gain the favour of a man, which is more light then the wind, more frail then glaſs, more thin then ſmoak? Out alaſs! By what perils haſten we to a greater danger? By what ſteps mount we up to a promontory of Ice, where our foot is ever upon the precipice? Behold, I may from hence forward be the friend of God, if I will. He perſiſted to read this book, all on fire, and became big with a new life, which he brought forth; then again he cried out as a man rapt with an extaſie: It is done; I have broken my bands, from this ſtep, from this hour, in this place I am reſolved to ſerve God. Go (my dear friend) if you will not imitate me, at the leaſt oppoſe not my reſolution. The other replieth: I am wholly yours; God forbid I forſake you in ſo fair a way, by fruſtrating my ſelf of ſo honourable a warfare, and ſo rich a reward. Behold them from gallants in an inſtant become Hermits. I and my aſſociate enquired for them in the mean ſpace on every ſide, and about evening found our ſelves in the ſame Cell, condemning them that they muſt be ſought for, and ſaying it was now time to end our walk with the day-light, and return to the City. They ſeriouſly made anſwer: They had found their lodging, we might do well to go whither we pleaſed, but they were throughly determined never to depart from thence.

I thought in the beginning it was a counterfeit merryment, but better ſounding it, upon relation what had paſſed, I in effect ſaw they were men wholly changed. We were aſhamed to leave them, and as yet felt our ſelves much unable to follow. In concluſion, we parted with many tears, we dregging our hearts in the duſt, they by ſupereminence liſting the better part of themſelves to Heaven. We went to bear this news unto two Ladies, their betrothed wives, who, enkindled with the ſame ſpirit, afforded a free conſent thereunto, vowing their virginity to God, at the time when their marriage was almoſt on the point of conſummation

The tenth SECTION.

The admirable conteſt of S. Auguſtine.

WHile Pontianus related this, Saint Auguſtine was enchained to his diſcourſe, and already felt flaſhes of lightening and battels in the bottom of his conſcience, which he had much ado to diſſemble. It ſeemed that God took him as a Fugitive, who was hidden behind him, to ſet him in full view before himſelf. He ſaw himſelf (ſaith he) in this diſcourſe as in a mirrour, foul, crooked, diſfigured, and repleat with blemiſhes and ulcers. When he made compariſon between his own unworthineſs, and the life of thoſe brave Champions, a holy horrour of his vices ſo ſurprized him, that he ſeemed deſirous to be diſ-engaged, and to fly from himſelf. And in this conflict he was ſtill much confounded before his own eys. The reſolution of theſe two Gentlemen unveiled his memory, embroiled from his youngeſt years, when he remembered he had great inclinations to ſerve God in the ſtate of continency, and to have begged it of him, who is the Authour thereof, but with ſo much weakneſs, that he feared that God would not then take him at his word. He much wondered how theſe men in one afternoon could reſolve on an affair of ſo great importance, and that he in the ſpace of twelve years ſtuck faſt in the ſnare. In the end, he could contain himſelf no longer, but brake the air with a deep ſigh, ſaying to his faithful Alipius; 'What is this? What have we heard? 'Theſe ſimple men are raiſed, and win Heaven by a 'brave warfare, while we with our knowledge wal-'low in fleſh & blood. Do we bluſh to wait on them? Nay, rather let us be aſhamed not to follow them.

He ſpake this very ſuddenly in great agitation of ſpirit, which appeared in his forehead, in his eys, viſage, colour, and voice. Alipius very ſad, beheld him, judging there was ſome tranſportation in this act. From thence he ſtole into a Garden (which was very near the chamber where they diſcourſed) as a man diſtemper'd, knowing well what he had been, and not as yet underſtanding what God would do with him; at the leaſt, he had an intention to give free liberty to ſighs, which he could withhold no longer. Alipius thinking there ſhould be nothing concealed from him, ſtep by ſtep follows him, and both in private began a good work. Auguſtine ſaid in this retirement: My God, what hinders me that I break not my chains to day, to put my ſelf into the liberty of thy children? What monſter is this? Behold my will commandeth my eie to be opened, my hand to work, my foot to walk, this is done without reſiſtance: now this ſame will commandeth it ſelf to forſake a wicked puddle, and ſet it ſelf in the path of virtue; why ſo much reſiſtance? Doubtleſs it will and it will not, otherwiſe it would be obeyed. I am yet faſtened to the earth by ſome great root, and to day I muſt cut it off. See you not Auguſtine, two meſſengers from God, to wit, ſhame and fear, armed with whips, which are by thy ſides to wyne thee from the way of thy cuſtomarie pleaſures? Turn thy face boldly, cut off from henceforth all the knots, which have hitherto entangled thy liberty. It is done; behold me free. I deceive my ſelf; I am not as yet where I think. Then let us do it now without further promiſe. What is that? I feel, what I do, and do not; notwithſtanding I believe what is good, and recoyl not; I draw near, I mount up; the cauſe why I ſtay is but to take breath. In the end, by pure force behold I am there; I touch, and almoſt reach the good ſo oft deſired. Out alas! I ſay, almoſt. For in effect I touch not, nor as yet hold any thing. Muſt I ſo much doubt to die to death, and live for life eternal?

An admirable combate.

As I was (ſaith he) upon theſe reſolutions, near approaching my happineſs, if I did ſee behind me the image of that I left in forſaking the world, I might ſee abyſſes and horrours, which congealed my heart, and yet notwithſtanding I ſtood fair, not proceeding nor retiring, as a body hanged in the Air.

Behold in an inſtant all the ſenſual pleaſures of my youth, which I had ſo cheriſhed, were preſented to my imagination, as Nimphs and Syrens. They ſeemed to pull me by the Garment, and ſay: Auguſtine, what? Will you forſake us after we ſo ſweetly have trained up your Youth? Wherein have we diſobliged you, but in ſuffering you to enjoy conti- contentments which the law of Nature permitteth? You now become very hardie in this transportation of your thoughts. It is a Feuer which poſſeſſeth you, it will paſs away, and you will be much aſhamed to have no longer made uſe of us. You haſten to go awry, which ſhall coſt you dear, if you take not heed. When you have done, you will be aſhamed to return this way back again, and for fear to be thought a fool, you will live miſerably all the reſt of your days. What? Can you live without us? You are not ſo ignorant of that, which God hath created for you. You have affection for beauty, and will have as long as you live. To love, and not enjoy, is to looſe your wits. What? This moment of time here being ended, are we yours no longer? What? Shall neither this nor that be permitted us for ever? Is it enough when one ſaith for ever? What hell is there in the world, if it be not to be deprived for ever, of what we moſt affect?

Theſe blameleſt Syrens altered not their diſcourſe; for ſtill they batter'd me with ſuch like words; but found I had changed mine ears. Behold the cauſe, why as I then ſhewed my ſelf very reſolute, they much leſſened their boldneſs. Their ſpeech was no longer a command, but a requeſt: and when I turned my face from beholding them, it ſeemed their voice was loſt in the Air, like a languiſhing eccho, to which proximity affordeth no more reverberation. The more I fortified my ſelf with reaſons, the more they deſiſted. All they could do was but to ſpeak ſome ſlight words ſoftly in mine ear, or by ſtealth pull me by the Cloak, to cauſe me to turn my face once again towards them: but I ſtood firm as a Rock, beholding the beauty and ſweetneſs of the life, to which I felt my ſelf called by God.

It ſeemed unto me, that I ſaw before mine tys faire Chaſtity, the mother of holy loves, encompaſſed with a large troup of Virgins and Chaſte ones, all white with innocency, and reſplendent with light of glory. She ſmiled upon me, with a brow more bright ſom then the cleareſt Summers-day, and ſtretching out her arm full laden with Palms, Come confidently (ſaith ſhe) why do you any further diſpute with your thoughts? Forſake thoſe Syrens, they too much have abuſed the flower of your age. I will acquaint you with their deceits, their vanities, and infamies, if the experience of a dozen years have not taught you more then I am able to diſcover. What elſe have you done the ſpace of ſo many years, but till a barren Field, which promiſed fruits, and gave you Thorns and ill ſavours, ſprinkled with ſome ſlight bloſſoms? As for their words, were they not full of promiſes, their promiſes of oaths, and their oaths of perjuries? What illuſions and fantaſies have you experienced? And if you have in ſome ſort enjoyed them, hath it not been worſe then your own deſires, ſo much was it mingled with gall, and attended by remorſe, which made you bear Gibbets and Tortures with your Pleaſure? Muſt you purchaſe a Hell with ſo many miſchiefs, which ſeemeth wide open to receive the deſperate? Where think you to finde pleaſure out of God, from whom all pleaſures are? I am not hideous nor barren, as your thoughts, O Auguſtine, do figure me? I am the mother of holy delights, ever fruitful by the viſitations of God. My joys are Gardens, which never wither, ſince they perpetually are watered with immortal graces. Ask thoſe children, thoſe maids, thoſe men and women. Behold of all ages, and all conditions: Ask them, if they ever found any bitterneſs in my converſation. You turm il your ſelf upon the frailties of fleſh; how ſimple are you? why cannot you do what ſuch and ſuch have done, who have waxed old in Virginity? Think you they have other fleſh, blood, and other qualities then you? You equal them in all, except in a ſtrong reſolution to be a ſlave no longer. Imagine you that all this they do, is by their own power? God gives them the will, God grants the power, God affords them the accompliſhment. Child of diffidence! why do you ſtill handle your infirmities? Cleave to God as doth the Ivie to the wall, and fear not that ever he will bereave you of his ſupport, if you to him remain faithful.

He entertained his minde with ſuch cogitations, and it ſeemed unto him this conſideration at that inſtant drew all his miſery, as from an abyſs, to repreſent it before his eys. Then was it, when the ſecret attraction, which conſiſteth in the particular touch of the Holy Ghoſt, did manifeſtly appear. Behold the propheſie of David accompliſhed: Behold the God of Majeſtie who thundereth. Behold the voice of God on the waters, and on the great waters, ſince it forceth tears to iſſue out in abundance. Behold the voice of God, which cometh with a ſtrong hand, ſince it over-beareth all reſiſtance. Behold the voice of God, which cometh with magnificence, ſince it operateth ſo glorious a converſion. Behold the voice of God, which break th the Cedars of Libanus, ſince it overthroweth all the pride of the world. Behold the voice of God, which divides the flames ſince it ſcattereth the fires of concupiſcence. Behold the voice of God, which ſhaketh the Deſert, ſince it removeth from the bottom to the top the ſterilities of this deſolate ſoul. Behold the voice of God, which prepareth the Hind for her deliverance, ſince it removes all the obſtacles.

Pſal. 28. Vox Domini ſuper aquas, Deus majeſtatis intonuit: vox Domini ſuper aquas multas.

He was near his Alipius, who expected the iſſue of theſe agitations of mind, and ſuddenly behold he felt in his heart a tempeſt raiſed, which in it contained fire and water, and ſeeing the cloud began now to be divided with the ardent ſighs and fountains of tears, which he poured forth, he left Alipius the Secretary of all his thoughts, to engulf himſelf further into retirement, and give free rains to his paſſion. He threw himſelf under a Fig-tree, which Iſidorus of Peluſium holds to have been the tree of the firſt happineſs of the world, ſo, as if to wipe away this ſtain, it had then been the beginning of his happineſs. There he made rivers run from his eys, which were waſted with his heart in a noble ſacrifice of love, and ſeemed willing to waſh the Victim with the waters of Libanus, before they were burnt in the fire of Sion.

Thereupon he cried out with redoubled ſighs: "My God, how long? My God, how long? No "longer remember the ſins of my fooliſh youth, "but treat with me according to the greatneſs of "thy mercies. Shall we yet ſay, to morrow, to "morrow? And why not to day? And wherefore "is it not time to give end to a life ſo exorbitant? "I am troubleſom to my ſelf, nor can I any longer "endure my ſelf. Muſt I ever be to Heaven an "object of vengeance, and to Earth an unprofitable "burthen? My God, how long? My God, how "long? Speaking this with an abundance of briniſh tears, he heard a voice ſweet and harmonious, which ſaid theſe words as it were ſinging: Take and read, often repeating them. Admiration ſtoped the floud of tears, and he began to examine in himſelf, whether ſuch a voice could come from any neighbour-place by ſome ordinary means. All which well weighed, he found it could not be humane, but that God by this voice inſtructed him what he was to do. He went from this place thither where he left S. Pauls Epiſtles with his friend Alipius, imagining, that as S. Anthony had been converted by the reading of one word in the Goſpel, on which he caſually happened, God might likewiſe work ſomewhat in his ſoul by the words of his Apoſtle. He openeth the book with a holy horrour, and the firſt ſentence he encountered, was that which ſaid: "It was time to live no longer in good "cheer, feaſts, and the drunkenneſs of the world. "That it was time to live no longer in unchaſt "beds, quarrels, vanities, and emulations, but that "we muſt be cloathed with Jeſus Chriſt, as with a "robe of glory, no more obeying the fleſh, nor the concupiſcence of the heart.

Rom. 13. Non in commeſſationibus & ebrietatibus, non in cubilibus & impudicitiis, non in contentione & æmulatione, ſed induimini Dominum Jeſum Chriſtum & carnis providentiam ne feceritis in concupiſcentiis veſtris.

There was no need to read any further. Behold in an inſtant the ray of God, which did directly beat upon his heart, and opened to him a delicious ſerenity. Behold him throughly reſolved. He ſheweth this paſſage to his faithful Alipius, as the deciſive ſentence of a long proceſs, which he had with ſenſuality. And Alipius caſting his eys upon the ſubſequent words, found: (a) Receive him who is weak in faith. Behold me (ſaid he) If you determine to forſake the world, take me for your companion. They roſe and went both to the good S. Monica: Mother (ſaith Auguſtine) you ſhall not need to take the pains to finde me out a wife. Behold me a Catholick, and which is more, reſolved to leave the world, to live in continency. The reſolution is made, made and concluded with God, there is no means at all to retire. Had not God withheld the soul of this holy widow of Naim, it was already upon her lips to fly out for joy, beholding this dead son, this son of so many tears, to come unexpectedly out of his Tomb, and present himself before her eys with a splendour of encomparable light. She made Bonfires of joy in her heart, and triumphed with celestial alacrity, blessing God, who had stretched out the power of his arm on this conversion, and who by the bounty of a true father, had surmounted the vows of an afflicted mother.

(a) Rom. 14. Infirmum in fide recipite.

Augustine in the mean while thought sweetly to begin his retreat from the Rhetorick Lectures wherin he was engaged. There yet remained but twenty days to the time of vacation, which had the continuance of twenty years, to a man, who then entertained far other affections: notwithstanding, through great wisdom & modesty, he would not break with exteriour pomp, by publishing a change of life in the City of Milan, but suffered the time to steal away with little noise. When the term expired, he quietly discharged himself thereof, and likewise freed himself from the importunity of fathers, who passionatly sought him to be Tutour to their children for his great capacity, he alleging for his excuse, that the exercise of the Schole had brought a difficulty of breathing, and an indisposition of the breast upon him, which threatened him with a Ptyfick, if he desist not. This was very true, but yet not the principal point of his resolution. Behold how this great man avoided the occasions of ostentation, and the divers interpretations he might make to himself for a gloss of actions: and, although God (as he said) had put into his heart flaming Darts, and Juniper-coals against slanderous tongues, he chose rather to take away occasion of calumny, then to see himself put upon the necessity of defending himself: very far different therein from the nature of those, who make great flourishes, to end them in nothing.

After he was discharged from his profession of Rhetorick, he retired himself into the Grange of Verecundus, where he staied a long-time, as yet a Catachumen, leading a most Angelical life, spent wholly in prayer, and the study of holy Letters. From thence he wrote to S. Ambrose of the errours of his passed life, and the estate wherein he presently was by the grace of God, as also of the aid he had contributed to his conversion; demanding besides what book he should read, the better to prepare himself for the grace of Baptism. S. Ambrose certified him of the contentment he took in this so particular visitation of God, and advised him to read the Prophet Isaiah: but he seeing he could not yet understand it, did defer it till another time, wherein he might be better practised in holy Scriptures.

S. Ambrose baptized S. Augustine.

In the end, the day so many times desired being come, wherein he was to be born anew by Baptism, it being in the thirty fourth year of his age (as Cardinal Baronius accounteth it) he went from the Grange of Verecundus to the City of Milan, where he was christened by the hand of S. Ambrose, and had for companion of his Baptism, his faithful friend Alipius, and his only son Adeodatus, at that time about fifteen years of age: so prodigious a wit, that his father could not think upon it without astonishment. I had nothing therein (saith he) my God, but sin; the rest is from you, who so well know how to reform our deformities. But all was there admirable, for at the age between fifteen and sixteen years, he already surpassed many great and learned men. He also verified the saying of Sages, affirming, these such sparkling wits are not for any long continuance upon earth, for he died some years after his return into Africk, leaving a repose in the father, who already apprehended the course of this youth: and although he grieved to see him taken away in the flower of his age, yet on the other side he was much comforted in the innocency of his life, and hope of his immortality, knowing it was the will of the Gardener, who had gathered the fruit according to his good pleasure, to lay it up in store. After this Baptism, there were nothing but hymns, songs, lights of eternal verities, thanksgiving, and tears of joy.

Horrori mihi erat istud ingenium.

Ingenium nimis maturè magnum non est vitale.

The death of S. Monica.

This done, he must take the way of Africa, and they were now arrived to the Port of Ostia, expecting the opportunity of Navigation, when the holy and venerable mother Monica, of fifty six years of age, and worn with many labours, rendered to Nature her tribute, and Soul to its Creatour.

This admirable woman resembleth the Ark in the deluge, which after it had born the whole world in the bowels thereof, amongst so many storms and fatal convulsions of universal Nature, reposed on the Mountains of Armenia. So S. Monica, when she so long time had carried in her entrails and heart a spirit as great as this Universe, among so many tears and dolours, so soon as she was delivered of this painful burthen, went to take her rest on the Mountains of Sion. A little before her death, beholding Heaven from a high window, which opened on a Garden, she seemed there already to mark out her lodging, so much she witnessed resentment and extasie towards her son Augustine, who at that time made this admirable Coloquy with her, couched by him afterward in his Confessions. The conclusion was, that she said unto him; 'My Son, I have now 'no more obligations to the world, you have dis-'charged all the promises of Heaven to me, and I 'have consummated all the hopes I might have on 'Earth, seeing you a Catholick, and which is more, 'resolved to perfection of the life you have embra-'ced. When it shall please God to call me, I am like 'fruit ripe, and falling, that holdeth on nothing.

Soon after she betook her to her bed, being surprized with a Feaver, which she presently felt to be the messenger of her last hour. Behold the cause why she being fortified with arms and assistances necessary for this combate, took leave of Augustine and his brother there present, affectionately entreating them to remember her soul at the Altar, only meditating on Heaven, and neglecting the thought of the land of Africa, which she had seemed at other times to desire for the Sepulchre of her body.

And, as her Son said unto her: Madam, My mother, we as yet are not there, we hope to close your eys in our own Country, and bury you in the Tomb of your husband. This holy woman seeing this man would still tie her to the present life, and divert her from cogitation of death, which to her was most sweet, beheld him with a severe eie, and then turning her self towards her son Augustine, Hearken (saith she) what he saith; as if we, absent from Africa, must needs be further from God. She often cast her dying eys towards this Son, who was her pretious conquest, and who in her sickness served her with most particular assistances, affirming that Augustine had ever been a good son towards her, and though he had cost her many sorrows, he never had forgotten the respect due to a Mother.

Verily there was a great sympathy between the soul of such a mother, and such a son, which was infinitely augmented after this happy conversion, and therefore we must give to Nature that which belongs longs to it. The childe Adeodatus, seeing his Grandmother in the last agony, as possessing the affections of his father, threw out pitiful out-cries, in which he could not be pacified. And S. Augustine, who endeavoured to comfort them all upon so happy a death, withheld his tears for a time by violence, but needs must he in the end give passage to plaints so reasonable. The Saint died as a Phenix among Palms, and they having rendered the last duties to her, pursued the way begun directly for Afriek.

Behold how the conversion of S. Augustine passed, and though many co-operated therein, yet next unto God, S. Ambrose hath ever been reputed the principal Agent; and for that cause his great Disciple said of him: (b) 'Ambrose is the excellent steward of the great father of the family, whom I reverence as my true father, for he hath begotten me in Jesus Christ, by the virtue of the Gospel, and God hath been pleased to make use of his service to regenerate me by Baptism. Whilest stars and elements shall continue, it will be an immortal glory to the Bishop Ambrose, to have given the Church a S. Augustine, of whom Volusianus spake one word worth a thousand. (c) 'Augustine is a man capable of all the glory of the world. There is much difference between him and other Bishops. The ignorance of one Church-man alone, prejudiceth not Religion, but when we come to Bishop Augustine, if he be ignorant of any thing, it is not he, but the law which is defective, because this man is as knowing as the law it self.

(b) Aug. contra Julianum Pelagianum, l. 1. c. 6. Excellens Dei dispensator, quem venter pii patris, in Christo enim Jesu per Evangelium ipse me genuit, & ex Christi ministerio laboravit Regenerationem accepi.

(c) Volusian Epist. 2. Vir, cui inter ingenia gloria capax Augustinus. In aliis sanctitatibus absque detrimento cultus divini tolerantur insciti: at cum ad Antistitem Augustinum veniunt. Legi deest, quicquid ab eo contigerit ignorari.

The eleventh SECTION.

The Affairs of S. Ambrose with the Emperours Valentinian the Father, and Gratian the Son.

LEt us leave the particulars of the life of S. Ambrose, to pursue our principal design, which is to represent it in the great and couragious actions he enterprized with the Monarchs of the world. Let us not behold this Eagle beating his wings in the lower region of the air, but consider him among lightenings, tempests, and whir-winds; how he plays with thunder-claps, and ever hath his eye where the day breaketh.

The state of Christendom.

The state of Christianity stood then in need of a brave Prelate to establish it in the Court of Great-ones. The memory of Julian the Apostata, who endeavoured with all his power to restore Idols, was yet very fresh, it being not above ten years past since he died, and yet lived in the mindes of many Pagans of eminent quality, who had strong desires to pursue his purpose. On the other side, the Arians who saw themselves so mightily supported by the Emperour Constans, made a great party, and incessantly embroiled the affairs of Religion. Jovinian, a most Catholick Emperour, who succeeded Julian, passed away as a lightening, in a reign of seven months. After him, Valentinian swaied the Empire, who had in truth good relishes of Religion, but withal a war-like spirit, and, who to entertain himself in so great a diversity of humours and sects, whereon he saw this Empire to be built, much propended to petty accommodations, which for some time appeased the evil, but took not away the root. He made associate of the Empire his brother Valens, who being a very good Catholick in the beginning of his reign, suffered himself to be deceived by an Arian woman, and did afterward exercise black cruelties against the faithfull, till such time as defeated by the Goths, and wounded in an encounter, he was burnt alive by his enemies in a Shepherds Cottage, whereunto he was retired: so rendering up his soul in the blood and flames wherewith he had filled the Church of God.

The association of this wicked brother, caused much disorder in the affairs of Christendom, and often slackened the good resolutions of Valentinian, by coldnes and tollerations, which were rather esteemed the feaver of times, then men.

S. Ambrose entered into charge, as is most probably thought, about the end of the reign of this Valentinian, and had not much occasion to intermeddle with him; yet from his entrance sheweth he would become a Lion. For seeing in the State some practises in Magistrates, which turned to the prejudice of the Church, he with much freedom and generosity complained to the Emperour: and though this Prince was one of the most absolute who had swayed the Sceptre, he was no whit offended, but answered to S. Ambrose: 'It is a long time 'I have foreseen your nature, and the liberty you 'would use when a Mitre was set on your head. Yet 'notwithstanding did I never oppose your election, 'and though I might exercise the resistance which 'the laws allow me, without any other authority, 'yet I gave my consent, for the desire I have to behold a stout man in this charge. Do what the laws 'of God appoint you, the times are sick, and need a 'good Physician. Theod. lib. 4. cap. 6.

The death of Valentinian the Father.

This so favourable beginning promised good effects for the future. But this Prince lived not long after; for, having reigned about twelve years in a very harsh manner, he being haughty, and excessively cholerick; it happened that hearing one day the Deputies of a Province in Bohemia, who excused themselves upon certain incursions and roberies imputed unto them, he entered into so violent and thundering distempers, that they laid him on the bed of death, for, from the Council-table he at that instant was carried into his Chamber. The veins of his body shrunk up, his speech stopped, his members were turmoiled with horrible Convulsions, and his face spread all over with purple spots. In conclusion, he was wasted with fervours of anger more dangerous then the Dog-star, which in few hours took him hence, who under the Sword of the Roman Empire had made so many Armies of Barbarians to tremble, to teach us we have no greater enemies then our selves.

Valentinian left two Sons, the one by his first wife Severa, which was Gratian; the other by Justina, which was Valentinian the younger. Let us see how S. Ambrose treated with them both.

The holy Bishop, who had already exercised so much authority over the Father, retained it on the Sons with so much the more privilege, as their age and the necessity of the affairs of the Church required. Valentinian some years before his death, foreseeing, as it were, what would happen, declared his eldest son Gratian Successour of his Empire, and from that time associated him to his dignity. As he was a Prince very awful, and who among his sharp proceedings, spared not to mingle many sweet attractives when he undertook an affair, so he made himself appear in his latter days as a setting Sun in his Royal Throne, and having made a most specious Oration to all his Captains and Souldiers there then about him, flattering, and calling them companions by way of Court-ship, he exhibited many large demonstrations of amity to them: then taking his little son Gratian by the hand, clad in an Imperial Robe, being then of fourteen or fifteen years of age, age, he told them, that this was his Heir, whom they were one day to have for companion, and who should with them tread under foot the powers opposed against the Roman Empire; adding, he should equal his father in valour and in affection, due to their good services, but surpass him in sweetness, having been made happy with a better education then himself. This young youth (as saith his History) was beautiful as a star, for his eys sparkled like two lightening flashes; his face very amiable, and complexion mingled with white and red. When the Souldiers beheld him in this habit, they began softly to strike their Targets, and at that instant the Trumpets sounded with a thousand acclamations to salute him.

Gratian the son of Valentinian.

This action was the cause that the sudden death of his father, made him instantly Emperour with his Uncle Valens, who yet lived, when for a singular tryal of friendship, he divided his dignity with his brother, the little Valentinian, who was not yet above five or six years old, being then left an Orphan under the charge of his mother Justina. Afterward the great necessities of the Empire, made them likewise associate Theodosius to the Crown, one of their father's chiefest Captains.

The young Gratian, who was endowed with an excellent disposition, presently put himself under the wings of Saint Ambrose, to direct him in affairs of his salvation and conscience, which he esteemed the most important of all might concern him. Our great Prelate entered so far into his soul, that living and dying, nothing was so sweet nor familiar in his mouth, as the name of Bishop Ambrose. And well to discover the apprehensions of this fair soul, and the easie enterance it gave to all the forms of virtue proposed by this great Saint, you must observe even in the judgment of Pagan Historians, who never graced him above his merit, that he was the most accomplished Prince for his age, which ever bare the Diadem of Cæsars. And if a life so pretious could have been redeemed with the blood and tears of the faithful, it had replenished the Church with sanctity, the Empire with glory, and the whole world with wonders.

The beauty of body which he enjoyed, contained a spirit wholly celestial enchased therein, for it was full of generous vivacity: and as fire out of his sphere, seeketh its nourishment in the conquests thereof, so he lived by Sciences and lights, that they became tributary by his judgment and travel, as wel as men by his arms. He laboured much in the matter of eloquence, seeing it was then a study, as it were, absolutely necessary for Emperours, to reign over people, and that words were the cement, which united wills and arms for the safety of the publick. By good chance he had Ausonius for Master, esteemed even in the judgment of Symmachus, the most able man of his time; most happy Master of an excellent Scholar, who made him change the Schole of Rhetorick, for the purple of Consulship. Gratian was naturally eloquent; nor was it hard to manure so generous a nature. When he pronounced some Oration, he had early in his young years, the majesty of his father, conjoyned with an admirable modesty, and a little acrimony, which gave an edge to his actions. The ordering and inflection of his voice, were rarely proportioned: he seemed eloquent in pleasing arguments: grave, in serious; polite, in laborious, and when the subject required fervour and invective, his mouth spake tempests. This enforced no diminution upon his military exercises, wherein he was infinitely dexterous, whether he were to run, wrastle, or leap, according to the custome of the Roman souldiers, his agility made the world wonder; or whether he were to manage a horse, or handle arms, the Masters who had trained him up, confessed he had dainty passages, inimitable for any practice. The Pagans, who would blame him for diversity of Religion, have never said ought else of him, but that he was too good an Archer, and over-fervent in hunting of wilde beasts. That, notwithstanding, set him in the estimation of warlike men; and as he was singularly affable and liberal, so was there nothing to be found in the world more charming then his nature.

Excellent qualities of the Emperour Gratian.

Saint Ambrose, having understood his spirit, much affected him, and endeavoured to joyn the most solid virtues to so many fair natural parts; and above all, perceiving that among so many Pagans and Arians, who stretched out their snares on every side to surprize him, it was necessary to prevent them; he laid in his royal soul deep foundations of faith, and most chaste grounds of Religion, to which Gratian shewed himself from the beginning much inclined. There is also a Letter found, written in his proper style, and with his own hand, where when he had heard the learned instructions of his Prelate, he demands them in writing, and because it is an excellent monument of his spirit and Religion, I will here insert it.

The Emperour GRATIAN, to Ambrose the Religious Bishop of God Omnipotent.

I Have a vehement desire to see my self united to you by corporal presence, as I ever have you in my memorie, and as I cohabit with you in the better part of my self, which is the soul. I beseech you (most holy and Religious Bishop of the living God) hasten unto me, to teach me what I believe before I have sufficientlie learned. For it is not my purpose to argue upon matter of faith, better loving to lodge God in my heart, then conclude him in my words. My desire onely is to open my soul at large to the Divinitie, to receive its lights the more abundantly. God will instruct me, if it shall please him, by your words, since I confess and reverence his most Sacred Majestie, well observing not to call Jesus Christ a creature, or to measure him by the weakness which I acknowledg in mine own person: but rather I avow our Saviour to be so great, that our thoughts, which are almost infinite, can adde nothing thereunto. For if the Divinitie of the Son could increase, I would dilate my self in it for augmentation of his praises, supposing I could not better gain the gracious favour of the Celestial Father, then in glorifying the Son Eternal. But as I fear no jealousie on Gods side, so for my part I make no account to esteem my self so great an Orator, that thereby it may be in my power to adde any thing to the glory of the Divinitie by my words. I acknowledg my self to be infirm and frail, I praise God proportionably to my forces, and not answerably to the measure of his greatness. As for the rest, I beseech you to afford me the Treatise of faith, of which you heretofore gave me a tast, adding thereunto the Disputation of the Holy Ghost, in such sort, that you prove his Divinitie by the Scripture and reason. Hereupon I pray God (dear Father, and true servant of God, whom I adore) that he many years preserve you in safetie.

Apud. Ambros. in præfat. l. de fide.

Excellent faith and modestie of the Emperour.

This Letter, he that will consider it, shall finde to be full of much sense; and verily S. Ambrose was so ravished herewith, that he confesseth never to have seen nor read at that time the like. This good Emperour (saith he) wrote to him with his own hand, as Abraham, who himself prepared the dinner for his guests, not giving commission thereof to his own servants. He wrote holy words unto him, as if he had an ear in Heaven, and which is more remarkable, it was in a time when he was upon the point of a journey to resist Barbarians, and therefore he purposely took the arms of faith from this great Bishop. For observe, this young Eaglet from the second year of his Empire found business enough. For Genes. 18.

Athanaricus King of the Goths, entered into Thracia with a formidable Army: and as Gratian amaſſed together all his Eaſtern troups to make head againſt him, the Barbarians imagining with themſelves that the Weſtern Empire was unfurniſhed, fell upon the Gauls, whither the Emperour went with admirable expedition to ſuccour them, and it was at the time when he wrote this letter, and moſt particularly recommended himſelf to Saint Ambroſe, taking the ſtandard of faith from him, to bear it in the front of his flouriſhing Legions. This was not without very notable ſucceſs; for by relation of Ammianus Marcellinus, he bare himſelf moſt valiantly in this journy, although very young, undergoing toils, & ever appearing in the head of the Army to encourage the ſouldiers by his preſence, which ſo enkindled them, that they reſolved to confront the enemy, as ſoon as might be, and defeated them at Strasbourg with ſo horrible a ſlaughter, that of ſeventy thouſand Barbarians, threeſcore and five thouſand covered the field with their maſſacred bodies, leaving young Gratian to make a harveſt in the chief field of Mars, moiſtened with the palms of his own ſweats; but above all, bleſſed by the prayers of great S. Ambroſe. As the Emperour returned from this conqueſt, he received Letters from the holy Prelate, where among other things excuſing himſelf that he had not accompanied him, he ſaith:

Triumphant victory.

Affectionate words of S. Ambroſe to the young Emperour.

It is not the want of affection, Moſt Chriſtian Emperour (for what title can I give you either more true or more glorious?) It is not, I ſay, the want of affection hath abſented me from your perſon, but modeſty joyned to the decorum of my profeſſion; yet at your return I preſented my ſelf before you, if not with bodily ſteps, at the leaſt with the whole affections of my heart, and all the vows, wherewith I could charge the Altars; and in this, the duty of a Biſhop principally conſiſteth. But it is miſtaken to ſay, that I came before you, as if I had been ſeparated from you, having perpetually attended you in minde, marching along with you in your thoughts, heart, and good favour, which is the moſt noble preſence I can deſire. I meaſured your journeyes, I went along with your Armie, I was in your camp day and night, with all my cogitations, and with all my cares; I ſtood centinel with my Prayers, and thoſe of my Clergie, at your Imperial Pavillion. How much I was little in merit, ſo much the more did I raiſe my ſelf in diligence and aſſiduitie. And rendering this dutie for you, I did it for the whole Church: herein do I uſe no flatterie, for you love it not, and well know it to be far from my nature, and the place which I hold, but God is a witneſs with us both, how much you have comforted my heart by the ſinceritie of your faith, to whom he hath afforded ſuch proſperitie, and ſo much glorie. I ow this acknowledgment both to the publick and your particular amitie: for you have granted me the repoſe of my Church, you have ſtopped the mouthes of the perfidious (and by my good will I wiſh you had as well ſhut up their hearts) and this have you done with marvellous authoritie, fortitude, and faith.

The holy Emperour ceaſed not afterward to oblige the Church in all occaſions, by the favour of his Edicts, and ſhewed himſelf ſo openly zealous, that even he, firſt of all the Emperours merited the title of Moſt Chriſtian, given afterward to our Kings. His Predeceſſours who profeſſed Chriſtianity, ever ſuffered their reputation to be diſhonoured with many blemiſhes, which much weakened the worth of their actions: but Gratian was the moſt royal and ſincere of them all, for he ſo little complied with the Gentiles, that their Prieſts coming together to offer him the title and habit of Great Pontife, which all the Chriſtian Emperours had yet for ceremony and reaſon of State, retained; this good Prince confidently refuſed it by the counſel of S. Ambroſe: and although the Gentiles were ſo much moved, they could not abſtain from words of menace, he contemned all humane reſpects, where the glory of God was intereſſed. As for the reſt, to conſider further the energy of the diſcretion of this holy Biſhop, it is to be noted that the faith of Gratian, his tender plant, was not a languiſhing and idle faith, but much employed in the exerciſe of good works, which Auſonius, a worldly man, could not ſufficiently admire in his ſcholar, well ſeeing he knew much more then his Maſter.

Zeal and virtue of Gratian by the direction of holy S. Ambroſe.

Singular qualities of a young Prince.

He who obſerved the moſt particular actions of the life of this Emperour, hath left in writing, that from the time of his childhood, never did he let any day paſs, without praying to God moſt devoutly, daily rendering ſome vow to Altars: and that thoſe who knew his moſt ſecret thoughts, gave aſſurance he lived in unſpeakable purity of heart; and moreover, he was very ſober and abſtinent in his ordinary courſe of life: and foraſmuch as toucheth and concerneth chaſtity, it might well be ſaid, that the Altar of Veſtal Virgins, where perpetually burned a ſacred fire which purged all, was not more holy then the Chamber of Gratian, nor the Couches prepared in the Temple for Ceremonies, more chaſte then his Imperial bed. He had the heart of a Mother towards his poor Subjects, and the beginning of his Empire was conſecrated by the comfort of the people, for whom he much ſweetened the Taxes and Subſidies, freely cutting off what was due to his own Coffers; and to take away all cauſe of enquiry in time to come upon that which he liberally had granted, he commanded through all Cities, Papers, and obligations of publick debts to be burnt. Never Bon-fire more clearly blazed then the ſame; not a creature complained the ſmoak hurt his eys. Every one praiſeth the Emperour, beholding, that as his benefits were not frail and tranſitory, ſo the evils he took away, were never to return.

Admirable charity in an Emperour.

How could he but do well for the publick, ſeeing he was moſt liberal towards particulars? He was not contented to viſit the ſick, but himſelf led Phyſicians along with him thither, cauſing them to miniſter at his charge, and in his own preſence, that which was neceſſary for their recovery. He was ſeen after the defeat of the Barbarians which I ſpake of, to run into the Tents of his Souldiers to enquire the number of the hurt, and himſelf with his own victorious hands to touch the wounds, and cauſe them inſtantly to be dreſt, haſtening and encouraging the Chyrurgeons. And if any poor Souldier through diſtaſt refuſed to take broath, he would ſit down by him, and charm him with ſuch ſweetneſs of words, till he obtained of him that which conduced to his health. He ceaſed not to comfort the moſt afflicted, to congratulate with the moſt happy, to enquire into the neceſſities of all the world, even to the making the packs of a poor ſubject to be carried by his own Mules: and all this did he indefatigably with ſingular promptneſs and alacrity, void of oſtentation, giving all, and reproaching no man.

Behold the fruits of the good education of S. Ambroſe, which well ſheweth, that in making a good man of a great Prince, the whole world is obliged.

The twelfth SECTION.

The death of the Emperour Gratian, and the Afflictions of S. Ambroſe.

OUt alas! Eternal God, who art elder then the beginning of time, and more durable then the end of Ages, muſt great gifts be ſo freely given to the world to become ſo ſhort? My Pen abhorreth to paſs beyond the blood of this poor Prince, in whom the earth had nothing to wiſh but immortality. Behold what a wound it is for the Empire, Empire, what ſorrow in the Church, and a touch-ſtone to the virtue of S. Ambroſe.

Gratian after the death of his Father, had reigned about ſeven years, when behold a Monſter ſtarted up in England, to diſpoſſeſs its natural Prince, and caſt fire and confuſion into the Empire. It was Maximus, who according to the relation of Zoſimus, was a Spaniard by Nation, companion of the great Theodoſius, and Captain of the Roman Troops, which were then in Great Britain.

Maximus rebelleth againſt his Prince, and his wicked diſpoſition

This wicked man, vexed to the quick that the Emperour Gratian had aſſociated Theodoſius in the Empire, without ever mentioning himſelf at all, reſolved to enter into the Throne by tyranny, ſince he could not arrive thither by any merit. Never Tyrant uſed more induſtry to cover his ambition then did this man; never hath any ſought more ſupport from the diſſimulation of ſanctity and juſtice: yet I beſeech thoſe who make account by the like ways to bring their purpoſes to paſs, to learn by the ſucceſs of Maximus, that if the arm of God ſuſtain not an affair, the more exaltation it receiveth, the deeper ruines it findeth.

Maximus then, a ſon of the earth, who had nothing great in him but the deſire of reign, made himſelf ſometime an Engliſh man, otherwhile a Spaniard, ever leaning to that ſide, where he ſaw moſt ſupport for his affairs. As an Engliſh man he labour-ed to have it thought he had ſome correſpondence of affinity with Saint Helena, Mother of great Conſtantine, and he was ſo impudent as to take the very name of that family, cauſing himſelf to be proudly called Flavius Clemens Maximus. As a Spaniard, he would be reputed the Ally of Theodoſius, whom he ſaw to be powerful in the affairs, and whoſe force he more feared, then loved his advancement. As for Religion, he well diſcovered by the effect that he had no other God, but honour. Notwithſtanding, like thoſe who provide oyl to burn in the Lamps of Idols, as well as in that of the living God, he embraced all ſorts of Sects, making his Arrows of every wood, ſo to hit the white of honour.

De eſtable hypocriſie.

Verily, if there be any vice deſerving the execration of all man-kinde, it is that which diſtendeth ſnares over Altars, and which under colour of piety and zeal, entrappeth men, Cities, and Provinces with a kinde of theft, which ſeeketh to make it ſelf honourable, under pretence of Piety and Religion. This was very familiar with this bad man; for ſeeing many Pagans of quality, who bit the bridle, expecting the re-eſtabliſhment of Idols, he under-hand entertained them with very fair hopes. On the other ſide, he favoured the Synagogue of Jews in ſecret, ſuppoſing theſe men being loſt in Religion and conſcience, might one day ſerve his turn, though but to fill up ditches. But then beholding the Catholick Church in an eminent height, he openly courted it, and that with demonſtrations of reſpect and ſervice, which might ſeem to proceed from none but the moſt zealous.

(a) Periculoſè, mihi credè, divina tentantur: Inſanum, ubi error excuſabilis non eſt, ibi velle peccare. Baron. an. 387. 35.

Letters alſo of his were found written to the Emperour Valentinian the Second, where he made many declarations of the duty he owed to the Catholick Church, ſo compleat that they ſeem much fitter for the mouth of a Biſhop, then of a Tyrant. He ſpeaketh of God like a Saint, ſaying, (a) Great heed muſt be taken not to contend with ones Maſter, and that ſins committed againſt Religion, admit no excuſe. He talks of Rome (b) as a Pope, calling it in full voice, The moſt venerable, and Princeſs of Religion. He ſeemed to ſweat blood and water in defence of S. Ambroſe, whoſe virtue he infinitely feared, it being joyned to a liberty, which never accuſtomed to bow under tyranny. In another Epiſtle, where he writeth to Pope Siricius, he tells us, how going from the Font of Baptiſm, he had been tranſported to the Imperial Throne, which, being ignorant of the life of the children of God, he eſteemeth an incomparable favour from Heaven, and in recompence thereof, promiſeth all ſervice to the Church of Rome, ſatisfying himſelf only to execute that, which ſhould be commanded him, without any deſire to enter into the knowledge of the cauſe.

(b) Roma venerabilis, cujus hac parte Principatus eſt. Epiſt. ad Siricium eod. anno ſect. 65.

Moreover, if he ſaw any forlorn Hereticks, who were feeble in faction, and much out of favour, he ran upon them with all manner of violence, and then ſhewing Spider's webs, of one ſide filled with little flys, and on the other ſide all broken by creatures of a larger ſize, he raiſeth mighty Tropheys, thinking ſo to piece out his fortune by the effuſion of contemptible blood. In this manner he cauſed Priſcillian, and many other of his Sect to be put to death, who were Hereticks, poſſeſſed with a black and melancholy Devil; and ſuch, as in truth, according to the laws both divine and humane, well deſerved puniſhment, but not according to the proceedings were obſerved in their proceſs, much blamed by S. Martin, and other wiſe Biſhops, who took notice of paſſions over-bloody, even in the Eccleſiaſticks that ſought after ſpoil.

Virtutibus vitia, ἀγχίνοια. Ariſtot. Origen. Baſil. Albertus in Paradiſo animæ. Prolog.

O God! it is verily one of the greateſt unhappineſſes of humane life, to ſay, that vices keep ſhop near to virtues, and often deceive the beſt experienced Merchants with their Artifices. That is moſt true which is ſpoken by Albertus the Great, Maſter of Saint Thomas: Severity counterfeiteth juſtice, melancholy calleth it ſelf gravity; babble ſtealeth into the name of affability, as doth diſſolution paſs under colour of free mirth, The prodigal ſaith, he is an honeſt man; the covetous, provident; the ſelf-conceited, conſtant; the crafty, prudent; curioſity borroweth the title of circumſpection; vain-glory, of generoſity; preſumption, of hope; carnal love, of charity; diſſimulation, of patience; puſillanimity, of mildneſs; indiſcreet zeal, of fervour in matter of Religion: and the worſt of all is, hypocriſie puts on the mask of ſanctity. Yet if with theſe ſemblances and borrowed faces, they only deceived vulgar ſouls, it were ſomewhat tollerable; but it is a thing moſt deplorable, that the ſubtile who have no other God but their own intereſts, by ſlight complacences, and petty affectations of devotion, enſnare noble and religious ſouls, who, meaſuring all by their own innocency, daily afford more ſupport to credulity. A little outward ſhew, handſomly expreſt, raviſheth men with admiration, and cauſeth Altars to be raiſed to them, for whom God hath prepared Gibbets. There are alſo many ſilly birds, who ſeeing the Fowler with blear and running eys, role a huge pair of beads in his hands, ſay, This is a holy man, and full of compaſſion; but the more judicious, anſwer, We muſt not regard his eys, nor beads, but the blood and rapine which is in his hands.

Pretext of devotions dangerous.

A Parable of the Fowler.

Had Maximus been beheld upon this ſide, he had never deceived the world, but his plaſtered devotions ſerved his turn to amuze eaſie natures, whileſt his ambitions cleft mountains to climb to the throne of Cæſars. Pope Siricius, beguiled with the maſk of this falſe piety, gave demonſtration of much affection to him: and when he was declared Emperour, many Biſhops uſed with him at Trier ſundry complements, which too near approached to ſervitude. There was none at that time but our Saint Martin, who held a ſtrong power over this ſpirit: and the wily Maximus, who well foreſaw, there was no reſiſtance to be uſed againſt a ſtroak of thunder, ſubmitted with all pliantneſs and poſtures, to draw this great Prelate to his amity. He, who heretofore made himſelf to be petitioned unto by the Biſhops, received the commandments of S. Martin, as decrees and endeavoured to yield him all ſatisfaction.

One deſire only he fixed in his heart, which was ſome one time to invite this holy man to his Table, to wipe away all the ill reputation of which the moſt judicious could not be ignorant: but S. Martin conſtantly refuſed it, until Maximus upon a time having made a thouſand proteſtations of the ſincerity of his intentions in that point, which concerned the uſurpation of the Empire, the man of God, whether perſwaded by reaſons, or mollified by ſo many prayers, went thither, and uſed three paſſages of generoſity, which you ſhall know.

Sulpitius in vita S. Martini, cap. 23.

In this Banquet were preſent the falſe Emperour Maximus, with his brother, and his uncle, a Conſul, and two Counts. S. Martin for his honour was placed in the middle, near the perſon of Maximus, and when about the midſt of dinner, the Cup-bearer preſented a Goblet to his Maſter, he for a ſingular teſtimony of his affection, put it into the hands of the good Biſhop, ſeeming to have a holy ambition to drink therein, after it was conſecrated by the touch of his lips: but, S. Martin not uſing any other complement, when he had drunk, gave the cup to his Deacon, as eſteeming him the moſt worthy perſon of the Feaſt next himſelf. Maximus, who infinitely ſeemed to be pleaſed therewith, although he inwardly felt himſelf gauled with this liberty, did ſo outwardly diſſemble it, that he cauſed S. Martin to be applauded through all his Court, proteſting that none but he was worthy the title of a Biſhop, and that he had done at the Table of an Emperour, what the other Biſhops would never have acted in the houſe of a mean Judge. On the other ſide, the wife of Maximus, who already poſſeſſed the title of Empreſs, made her ſelf a Magdalen at the feet of S. Martin: and although never woman touched this chaſte creature, he ſuffered her to exerciſe all ſorts of Ceremonies towards him, undergoing a thouſand troubles to rid himſelf of her importunities. This ſeemed not ſtrange in the age of threeſcore and ten, and in the reputation of ſanctity wherewith he had filled the world, that a woman ſhould kiſs his feet; but it was a thing very unuſual to behold a Princeſs, humbled in the duſt of the earth, to perform this office: She regarded neither Purple, Diadem, Quality, nor Empire, ſhe had no eys but for S. Martin, being blinde to the reſt of the world.

After this firſt Banquet, Maximus and the Lady went to the Saint, and beſought him again to take a bad Dinner, which the Empreſs would in private prepare for him with her own hands: and although he in the beginning refuſed, it was impoſſible for him to eſcape from theſe Saint-like invitations. For theſe are ſnares which catch Eagles as well as Sparrows. Needs would the Queen do all offices in this ſecond Feaſt. She plaied the Cook, dreſſed the Dining-room, laid the cloath, gave to the holy man water for his hands, was his Cup-bearer, and waited on him all the time of his meal, ſtanding bolt upright as a ſervant, with her minde intentive on her office. Dinner being ended, ſhe did eat the ſcraps and remainder of the Table, which ſhe preferred before all the Imperial delicacies. Verily we may ſay, women are violent in their affections, and, when once they go the right way, their virtues have no mean. I will not ſeek to penetrate the Ladie's intentions, which I ſuppoſe were very good; but conſidering the proceedings of Maximus, there is great cauſe to think he endeavoured by his infinite courtſhip, to charm the nature of S. Martin, which to him ſeemed ſome what harſh. Yet the great man, endowed with the ſpirit of propheſie, freely told all which ſhould befal him.

Behold ſome part of the diſpoſition of Maximus, which I was willing to preſent on paper, that it might appear of what condition they ordinarily are, who bear arms againſt the obedience due to Kings, who are the lively images of God. The Tyrant began a revolt in England, and from that time determined to eſtabliſh the City of Trier in Germany, as the ſeat of his Empire, and thence to raiſe a pair of wings to fly about the clouds, which were Italy and Spain. He choſe for his Conſtable, a man very conſtant to his humour, and of great reſolution, who cauſed himſelf to be called the Good man, the better to colour the wickedneſs of his Maſter. With this bad Counſellour he endeavoured to ſtir up the ſouldiers, and on every ſide drew the warlike troups to his party. The good Emperour Gratian ſpeedily armeth to ſtiffle tyranny in the birth thereof, and in perſon goeth to encounter his Adverſary. He had then very freſhly drawn good ſouldiers from the Kingdom of Hungary to his aſſiſtance, of whom he made much account. Others ſeeing that he much eſteemed of them, were ſtung with jealouſie, and grew cold in their Maſter's behalf. The poor Prince being on the point to wage battel, found himſelf careleſly and traiterouſly abandoned by his legions, who daily ſtole away to encreaſe the Army, and ſtrength of Maximus.

This black and hideous treaſon much amazed the Emperour, who complained, as the Eagle in the Emblem, that his own feathers gave him the ſtroke of death, ſeeing his ſouldiers, who ſhould have born him on their wings, delivered him to his enemy, through a neglect, which ſhall make the Roman hiſtory to bluſh eternally. So that ſeeing there was no ſafety for his perſon, he ſought to regain Italy as ſoon as poſſible, accompanied only with a full troup of horſe, conſiſting of about three hundred men.

Maximus well diſcovered, that he would at any price whatſoever have the bloody ſpoyl of his Maſter: for he charged this Good man to purſue him with all violence, and not to deſiſt till the prey were in his clutches; which he did, taking horſes with him, who ran like a tempeſt, and could well endure any tedious travel. In the end, he met with the Emperour at Lyons, and fearing he might eſcape, bethought himſelf of a miſchievous ſtratagem. For he ſecretly cauſed the Emperour to be informed, the Empreſs his wife was in danger of her perſon, if he ſtayed not ſome while to expect her, becauſe ſhe was reſolved to follow him, thinking no place capable of ſafety or conſolation where her husband was not.

This falſe report much ſoftened the heart of Gratian, who was as good a husband as an Emperour; he therefore reſolved to haſten to the Empreſs, though not without evident danger of his life. There is an unſpeakable power in the love of neighbours, which is the cauſe that birds and fiſhes are oft-times voluntarily caught with twigs and nets, not fearing to put their life in danger, where they ſee ſome part of themſelves to be. This Prince, who in the extreameſt diſaſters of his fortune, was full of courage, and flew every where like a flaſh of lightening, to give order to his affairs, at the news that the Pitiful death of the Emperour Gratian.

Empreſs

Empreſs was on her way to follow him, was much terrified; nor was there an object of peril which he framed not in his thoughts: moments ſeemed days unto him, and days as ages. A thouſand fantaſies of affrightment ſummoned his heart in his ſolitude. There was no living for him, if he beheld not his deareſt love in his arms. She was a Princeſs of much merit, daughter of the Emperour Conſtantius, born after the death of her father, whom Gratian faithfully loved, though he as yet had no iſſue by her.

Socrat lib. 5. cap. 11. Zozom. lib. 7. cap. 13.

The Tyrant underſtanding his game ſucceeded to his wiſh, made a Litter to paſs along much like to that of the Empreſs, and diſpoſed his ambuſhes round about in the way, The Emperour perceiving it afar off, and ſuppoſing his wife Conſtantia was in it, ſpurs his horſe, and flieth with thoſe wings which love and joy gave him, being at that time followed by few of his people. The murtherers aſſailed and maſſacred him, but he ſtill ſhewing the courage of a Lion, bare himſelf bravely amongſt Swords and Halbards, leaving the mark of his hand all bloudy on a wall, as S. Hierom hath obſerved, and ever having on his lips the name of S. Ambroſe. His body, after the ſoul departed, was taken up to be preſented to Maximus, as the monument of a faithful aſſaſſinate.

Cruenta manus veſtigia, pariete tni Lugdune teſtantur. Hieron. ep. 3.

O God! who ſhall here be able to cleave a cloud, to read through ſo much darkneſs, and ſo many ſhadows, the ſecrets of your Providence? This poor Abel butchered by the hand of a Cain, with a cruelty ſo barbarous, a manner ſo perfidious, and a ſucceſs ſo deplorable! A Prince, who ſheltered the whole world under the valour of his arms, forſaken by the moſt truſty ſervants of his houſe! An Emperour moſt religious, ſeparated by death from the aſſiſtances of Altars! A Monarch moſt juſt, given as a prey to injuſtice! One of the beſt Maſters of the earth ſlain by ſervile hands, and uſed like a beaſt among the Halbards, and Courtelaxes of his own Servitours! So many rare qualities as were in him, leave nothing elſe to mortals, but the ſorrow to have loſt him.

A man, who deſerved to have lived Ages, torn from his Throne and life in his eight and twentieth year, after a reign ſo advantagious to the Church, and wiſhful to all the world. O Providence! Muſt he paſs away, as the foam glideth on the face of the water? Muſt he be hail-ſtrucken, as the Crown Imperial, the honour of a Garden, in the height of its beauty? Muſt he wither, as lightening cauſeth pearls in their growth, leaving them inſtead of a ſubſtance, nought elſe but a ſhell? O God! What bloud of Abels muſt be ſhed in all ages, to teach us a leſſon, which telleth, the reward of our children conſiſteth not in the favours and proſperities of the world, but that ſeeing in ſuch innocency they are ſo roughly handled, your juſtice hath infallibly diſpoſed them for another life, where they live covered with the purple and glory of your Son, whoſe ſufferings they have imitated.

The poor Conſtantia wife of Gratian, hearing this lamentable news, was ſeized with overwhelming ſorrow, and as ſoon as ſhe came to her ſelf again, Ah Gratian (ſaith ſhe) my Lord, and dear husband, I have then found an evil worſe then your death, which is, to have been the cauſe of the ſame. Muſt my name be ſo much abuſed? Muſt the love of a creature ſo captive as I am, engage into danger, a life ſo important as yours?

Ambroſ. in Pſal. 61. Meminit Gratiani, mors iſta magis eſt peccati fuga, quam mortis detrimentum.

I began my unhappineſs from the day of my birth, being born after the death of my father Conſtantius, nature not permitting me to ſee him, who gave me life. That little age I have, hath not ceaſed to be turmoiled with many uncertainties which enforce me to reap thorns in the fortune of Cæſars, where the world imagneth Roſes. Tea, I avow (my moſt honoured Lord) that this accident hath outgone all my apprehenſions. For although I figured you mortal as a man, I could not ſuppoſe that he in whom all my charities and hops ſurvived, ſhould be taken from me ſo ſuddenly, in a Fortune ſo eminent, in an Age ſo flouriſhing, with a death ſo unworthy of his goodneſs, not leaving me at the leaſt a ſon in my entrails to be born of me, as his mother; and which is worſe, that I inſtantly muſt (Oh my deareſt Gratian, the ſweeteſt amongſt all men living) redeem your bloody body with the price of gold, from the hands of a wretched ſlave. My God, I confeſs I have no ſtrength to bear theſe calamities ſo violent, if you afford it not.

The news of this death which flew like a fatal bird through all the world, transfixed the hearts of all good men. The little Valentinian reſented it beyond his age, ſeeing himſelf deprived of a brother, whom he ſo faithfully had loved. S. Ambroſe, though moſt couragious, felt himſelf, as it were, ſurprized with ſorrow and ſadneſs, not being able to unlooſe his tongue to pronounce any funeral Oration. All the Court was infinitely affrighted, as if Maximus had already been at the Gates of Milan to finiſh the Cataſtrophe of the Tragedy. Juſtina the Empreſs, mother of young Valentinian, taking the care of affairs for her ſon in minority, inſtantly made her addreſs to S. Ambroſe, and beſought him to undertake an Embaſſage, and preſent himſelf before Maximus, ſo to divert the ſtream of his arms, which came to pour themſelves on Italy, and to demand the body of his Pupil, humbly praying, not to neglect him dead, whom he alive had ſo faithfully ſerved.

The thirteenth SECTION.

The Embaſſage of S. Ambroſe.

OUr great Prelate couragiouſly undertook the buſineſs, fortifying his heart with aſſiſtances of Heaven, to treat with the murtherer of his ſon; for one may well ſay, the love he bare to the dead, equalled that of fathers towards their children.

The acts of his firſt Embaſſage are loſt, although the effect hath been ſufficiently publiſhed. Which was the diverſion of the arms of Maximus, ſo much feared by the Empreſs Juſtina. But as for the Emperours body, it was impoſſible to gain it from him; for Maximus ſaid, he withheld it upon a point of a State, well knowing this ſpectacle would have no other effect, but to exaſperate the memory of what was paſt, and that the ſouldiers through fury might revenge the dead body, much aſhamed they had betraied their living Emperour.

This wicked man inſatiable in his deſires, and perfidious in his promiſes, ſoon repented to have ſigned the peace, complaining that Ambroſe had with his fair words caſt him into a ſleep: he was full of impetuous paſſions, and inceſſantly threatened to paſs into Italy, nor ſhould any thing hereafter hinder his intentions, which made S. Ambroſe enterprize a ſecond Embaſſage at the ſollicitation of the Empreſs Juſtina, of whom we have a moſt faithful Narration from the Pen of the Saint himſelf, in an Epiſtle which he wrote to the Emperour Valentinian, to yield him an account of his Commiſſion. There he relateth, how being arrived in the City of Trier, where Maximus had placed his Throne, that he the next morning went to the Palace to ſpeak to him in private. The treacherous man, who with ſo many Legions could not endure the counterbuff of truth delivered by a Biſhop, thinking to ſilence him, ſent one of the Gentlemen of his Chamber to demand if he had any letters from Valentinian to deliver him, if ſo, he ſhould receive anſwer; but that he might not ſpeak to the Emperour himſelf, but in full Council. S. Ambroſe replieth, that was not the audience, which is uſually given to perſons of his quality: that he had moſt important affairs to handle, which might better be privately expreſſed preſſed in his Cabinet, then at the Council-table. He prayed the Gentleman of his Chamber, to let him know that his requeſt, which indeed was moſt civil. He did ſo, but brought back no other anſwer, but that he ſhould be heard in Council. The good Biſhop ſaid, that was ſomewhat too far from his profeſſion: but he notwithſtanding would omit nothing of his duty, preferring the memory of the dead, and the affairs of his living Prince, before all the intereſts of his own perſon.

Majeſty of S. Ambroſe.

He came then to the Council-table, where Maximus ſate on his Throne, who ſeeing S. Ambroſe, roſe up to give him the kiſs, according to the cuſtom of that Age. But the Biſhop taking place among the Counſellours, who very honourably invited him to ſit uppermoſt, freely ſaid to Maximus; 'I wonder how you offer the kiſs of peace to a man of 'whom you are ignorant, for were I well known 'in the rank I hold, you ſhould not ſee me here. Maximus amazed at this liberty, could not ſay ought elſe, but, 'Biſhop you are in choller. S. Ambroſe replyeth; I have more ſhame then anger in 'me, to ſee my ſelf in a place where I ſhould not be. 'Notwithſtanding (ſaith Maximus) you might 'have learnt the way, having been here once already. It is a double fault in you (replieth the Prelate) to have ſummoned me twice. Thereupon 'Maximus; Why came you hither? To demand 'peace of you (anſwereth S. Ambroſe) which I have 'required as of an inferiour, and you now enforce 'me to ſeek it as from an equal.

The proud man who thought himſelf leſſened, if compared to the Emperour Valentinian, was moved at theſe words, and cried out: 'How equal? By 'whoſe favour? By the favour of God (anſwereth 'S. Ambroſe) who hath preſerved that Empire in 'Valentinian, which he gave him. Maximus at this word entered into violence. 'It is you (ſaith he) 'that have deceived me, and your goodly Count 'Bauton, who under pretext to preſerve the Empire for a Childe, made other accommodations for 'himſelf, and for this cauſe is joyned with Barbarians, to invite them to paſs into the Empire. And 'who hath more credit then I, to cauſe them to 'march under my Standards when I liſt? I have 'thouſands under my pay, by whom I can be ſerved 'before all the men in the world; and had you not 'ſtopped the courſe of mine Arms with your goodly Embaſſage, no man living had been able to oppoſe me. He ſpake this with quick flaſhes of choller.

The holy Biſhop coldly anſwered: It is diſhonourable in you to reproach my Embaſſage, and put your ſelf upon theſe extravagancies. For to whom appertaineth it to defend Widows and Orphans, if not to a Biſhop? That is it, which the law of my Maſter commandeth me. Judg in favour of the Orphan, and defend the Widow, and deliver the weak from oppreſſion. Notwithſtanding, I will not give ſo much credit to my Embaſſage, as to perſwade my ſelf it hath ſtaid the courſe of your arms. What ſquadrons have I oppoſed againſt you? What walls? What rocks? Have I ſtopped up the paſſage of the Alps with mine own body? By my will could I ſo have done, I ſhould account all your objections as a glory to me. But you your ſelf ſent the Count Victor, whom I met at Mentz, to treat of peace: wherein hath Valentinian deceived you, if he have granted the peace, which you demanded of him? In what hath the Count Bauton played falſe with you, unleſs you term it deceit to be faithful to his Maſter? In what have I beguiled you? Was it then when you ſaid, that Valentinian need not put me to the trouble of this Embaſſage, but come himſelf in perſon, as a ſon to his father; and that I freely anſwered you, There was no childhood to ſee a Princeſs, widow of a great Emperour, to put her ſelf into the way with her ſon, tender of age, and feeble of body, to paſs the Alpes in extremities of Winter: and that as for the childe, whom you deſired only to ſee, the mother ſo much affected him, ſhe could in no ſort ſuffer him to be ſeparated from her. Is not this the anſwer was given to your Embaſſadour in the City of Milan, when I was then preſent with you? What deceit finde you in this proceeding? Did I ever promiſe you the coming of the Emperour, and have I failed you in my faith? Have I diverted your Troops? Have I ſtaid your Eagles? Where are thoſe Barbarians, which the Count Bauton cauſed to paſs into Italy? Verily if he who is a ſtranger ſhould have called people of his Nation to the ſuccour of his Maſter, it would be very excuſable; ſince you, who are ſo much intereſſed in the preſervation of the Romane Empire, threaten us that you have Barbarians under your pay, whom you can make to over-run us when you pleaſe.

Behold a little, the difference that is between the ſweetneſs of Valentinian, and your menaces: You are much troubled not to have fallen upon Italy with Barbarian Legions, and Valentinian hath graciouſly diverted the forreign Gauls, whom he had invited to his ſervice, whileſt you in the mean time make waſte on the Grizons, with your Barbarians; he hath bought peace for you with his own money, and you with ingratitude repay him.

Behold your brother, who is now by your ſide, and you ſhall ſee an irreproachable teſtimonie of the Emperous clemencie. He held in his Province, and hands, that which is moſt dear to you in the world. Every one thought it was reaſon to revenge the aſhes of the Emperour Gratian upon a near allie of him, who was the author of his death, and yet Valantinian upon the news of the aſſaſſinate committed upon his moſt honourable brother, and in the greateſt fervour of his moſt juſt paſſion, hath ſo moderated himſelf, as to ſend him back with honour, whom he might with juſtice have bereft you. Compare your ſelf preſently with him, and make your ſelf Judg in your proper cauſe. He hath reſtored your brother in perfect health: render him his at the leaſt thus dead as he is. Why do you denie him the aſhes of his brother, ſince he hath not refuſed your ſatisfactions, yea to his own prejudice? He hath afforded you a man in like degree of alliance, though in quality much different. He hath granted you one alive; render him one dead to yield him the laſt offices. A Tartarian covered with ſand a Pyrate, which he by chance found dead upon the Sea ſhore; and you denie us to bury with our own hands the prime Monarch of the world? You take from a Queen-mother, from a widow-Empreſs, from an orphan-Emperour, the bones of a ſon, a husband, a brother, whom you have deprived of life and Sceptre. The bodies of reprobates are taken down from the Gallouſs, to put them into the arms of their mothers; what hath the body of Gratian don to be bereaved after death, of the charities of his Allies? Why do you forbid us tears, which very Tyrants themſelves, who have torn eys out, have never denied to the afflicted? You fear (ſay you) it may exaſperate minds, that is to ſay, you fear a death, which you have cauſed, and which you have unworthily procured, even then, when you might and ought to ſave it by all ways of juſtice and humanity. And tell me not he was your enemie; you were his, but he never yours. For hoſtilitie comes from an uſurper, and defence from a lawful Prince. You do well to juſtifie your ſelf upon this attempt, but there is not a man will believe your juſtifications. Who ſees not you hated his life, whoſe burial you hinder?

Paulinus addeth, that for concluſion he dealt with him as one excommunicate, and ſeriouſly adviſeth him to expiate the blood he had ſhed, by a ſharp penance.

This liberty of our admirable Prelate amazed all the Council: and Maximus, who never thought that a Prieſt in the heart of his State, in the middeſt of his Legions, in the preſence of his Court, could have the courage to tell him, that which he would never endure to hear in his Cabinet, commanded him ſpeedily to depart from the Court. All thoſe who were friends of the holy man, adviſed him to be watchful upon the ambuſhes and treaſon of Maximus, who found himſelf much galled, but he full of confidence in God, put himſelf on the way, and wiſhed Valentinian to treat no otherwiſe with Maximus, but as with a covert enemy, which did afterward appear moſt true. But Juſtina the Empreſs, thinking S. Ambroſe had been over-violent, ſent upon a third Embaſſage Domnin, one of her Counſellours, who, deſirous to ſmooth the affairs with ſervile ſweetneſs, thruſt them upon deſpair of remedy.

The

The fourteenth SECTION.

The perſecution of S. Ambroſe raiſed by the Empreſs Juſtina.

WE may well ſay there is ſome Fury, which bewitcheth the ſpirits of men in theſe lamentable innovations of pretended Religions, ſince we behold effects to ariſe which paſs into humane paſſions, not by an ordinary way. Scarcely could Juſtina the Empreſs freely breath air, being, as ſhe thought, delivered from the Sword of Maximus, which hung over her head, tied to a ſilken thred, when forthwith ſhe diſpoyled her ſelf furiouſly, to perſecute the author of her liberty. O God, what a dangerous beaſt is the ſpirit of a woman, when it is unfurniſhed of reaſon, and armed with power! It is able to create as many monſters in eſſence, as fantaſie can form in painting. Momus deſired the ſavage Bull ſhould have eys over his horns, and not horns over his eys. But Juſtina at that time had brazen horns to gore a Prelate, having eys neither above, nor beneath, to conſider whom ſhe ſtruck. Authority ſerved as a Sergeant to her paſſion, and the Sword of Monarchs was employed to ſatisfie the deſperate humours of a woman ſurprized with errour, and inebriated with vengeance. Saint Ambroſe like a Sun darted rays on her, and ſhe as the Atlantes, who draw their bow againſt this bright Star, the heart of the world, ſhot back again Arrows of oblo-
Herod. lib. 4. Solem orientem execrantur. quy. As women well inſtructed and zealous in matter of Religion, are powerful to advance the Chriſtian cauſe, ſo when they once have ſucked in any peſtilent doctrine, they are capritious to preſerve their own chymera's. The Miſtreſſes of Solomon, after they had cauſed their beauties to be adored, made their Idols to be worſhipped: ſo Juſtina, when ſhe had gained credit as the Mother of the Emperour, and Regent in his minority, endeavoured to countenance the Arian Sect, wherein ſhe
Sect of Arians. was paſſionate, that the Sword of diviſion might paſs through the ſides of her own ſon into the heart of the Empire.

The Arians had in the Eaſtern parts been ill intreated under the Empire of Theodoſius, and many of them were fled to Milan under the conduct of a falſe Biſhop, a Scythian by Nation, and named Auxentius, as their head, but who for the hatred the people of Milan bore to this name of Auxentius, cauſed himſelf to be called Mercurinus.

He was a crafty and confident man, who having inſinuated himſelf into the opinion of the Empreſs, failed not to procure by all poſſible means, the advancement of his Sect, and did among other things, very impudently demand a Church in the City of Milan, for the exerciſe of Arianiſm.

Juſtina an Arian demandeth a Church in Milan. Juſtina, who in her own hands held the ſoul of her ſon Valentinian as a ſoft piece of wax, gave it ſuch figure as beſt pleaſed her; and being very cunning, there was not any thing ſo unreaſonable, which ſhe did not ever colour with ſome fair pretext, to dazle the eys of a childe. She declared unto him, that the place ſhe poſſeſſed near his perſon, well deſerved to have a Church in Milan, wherein ſhe might ſerve God according to the Religion which ſhe had profeſſed from her younger days, and that it was the good of his State, peacefully to entertain every one in the Religion he ſhould chooſe ſince it was the proceeding of his father Valentinian, which ſhe by experience knew had well ſucceeded with him.

To this ſhe added the blandiſhments of a Mother, which ever have much power over a young ſpirit: ſo that the Emperour perſwaded by this Syren, ſent to ſeek S. Ambroſe, and declared unto him, that for the good of his State, and peace of his people, it was in agitation to accommodate his thrice-honoured Mother, and thoſe of her Sect, with a Church in Milan.

At this word S. Ambroſe enraged like a Lion, which made it appear he never would yield to the execution of ſuch requeſts. The people of Milan, who honoured their Prelate as the lively image of the world's Saviour, when they once perceived that Valentinian had ſuddenly called him, and that ſome ill affair was in hand: they left their houſes, and came thundering from all parts to the Palace, wherat Juſtina was ſomewhat aſtoniſhed, fearing there was ſome plot in it, and ſo inſtantly commanded the Captain of the Guard to go out and diſperſe the rude multitude, which he did, and preſenting himſelf with the moſt reſolute ſouldiers, he found no armed hands to reſiſt him, but huge troops of people, which ſtretched out their necks and cried aloud, They would dye for the defence of their Faith, and Paſtour.

Theſe out-cries proceeding as from men affrighted, terrified the young Emperour, and ſeeing the Captain of his Guards could uſe no other remedy, he beſought S. Ambroſe to ſhew himſelf to the people, to mollifie them, and promiſe, that for the buſineſs now treated, which was to allow a Church to the Hereticks, never had thoſe concluſions been decreed, nor would he ever permit them. S. Ambroſe appeared, & as ſoon as he began to open his mouth, the people were appeaſed, as if they had been charmed with his words: whereupon the Empreſs grew very jealous, ſeeing with the arms of ſanctity, doctrine, and eloquence, he predominated over this multitude, as the winds over the waves of the Sea.

Strange conference pretended by the Empreſs. A while after to leſſen the great reputation of S. Ambroſe, ſhe determined to oppoſe her Auxentius againſt him in a publick diſputation: and though ſhe in her own conſcience well underſtood, that he in knowledge was much inferiour to S. Ambroſe, notwithſtanding ſhe reputed him impudent enough, and a great talker, to ſtupifie weak judgments. She perſwaded her ſelf, that of two things one would happen, either that Saint Ambroſe refuſing diſputation, would leave ſome ſuſpicion of his inability, or, accepting it, engage his authority. This powerful woman, unable to bow Heaven, reſolved to ſtir Hell. She obtained a Mandat from the Emperour her ſon, by which it was enjoyned to S. Ambroſe, to be on a day nominated at the Palace, to confer in his preſence upon points of Religion againſt Auxentius, on this condition, that Judges ſhould be appointed for both parts, to decide their difference. The Tribune Dalmatius was the bearer of this Mandat, who wiſhed S. Ambroſe by word of mouth, that he ſhould haſten to name the Judges, which he intended to chooſe for his party: and that Auxentius had already nominated his, who were all Pagans, to take away thereby the ſuſpicion which might be framed againſt thoſe of his Sect. He cauſed alſo certain words ſilently to ſlip from him by the ſubtilty of Juſtina, by the which he adviſed him handſomly to eſcape, and go whither he thought good, if he would not accept of this challenge. S. Ambroſe had a ſtrange horrour upon this Mandat, ſeeing how the cunning of a paſſionate woman, and the impudence of a ſhameleſs Heretick tyrannized over the feeble ſpirit of an Infant, inforcing him to demand this hateful Conference, which ſeemed to be permitted for nothing, nothing, but to expose the venerable Mysteries of our Religion to the scorn of Pagans. He would by no means go to the Palace to excuse himself, fearing he might seem to transfer a cause meerly Ecclesiastical, to a Prince's Court: but he made a grave answer to the Emperour, which is now extant in his works, where among other things, the Arians condemning his refusal, and taxing him of contumacy for giving occasion of jealousie to the Emperour, upon the over-great authority of S. Ambrose, he saith:

Lib. 2. ep. 13.

Resolution of S. Ambrose.

SACRED MAJESTY, He that accuseth my refusal of contumacy, accuseth the law of your father of injustice. He, who was a man most accomplished in arms and great affairs, who signed his faith with the seal of his constancy, and the wisdom of his Counsels by the happiness of his State, ever witnessed both by his words and Edicts, that it appertained to none but Bishops to judge of Bishops. You, who are tender of age, little experienced, nay, a Catechumene in faith, will judge of mysteries, which you have not yet learned. If this seem reasonable unto you, the laitie may hereafter mount into the Chair, and have those for their flock, whom they have had for their Pastours, which can never be don but by perverting the order of this Universe. God forbid I should choose Judges of the laity, to make them either Prevaricatours of faith, or Victims of the vengeance of our enemies. It sufficeth me to leave my life therein, which I so long have consecrated to the defence of the Church, and not engage others in the peril. I hold the faith of the Nicene Council, from which neither the Sword nor death shall ever separate me. I am ready to defend it at the Church, not in the Court, where never had I been, but for you; and whereof I better love not to know the customs, then learn the cunning. As concerning this which I hear, that your Majestie offereth me peaceably to retire where I shall think good; God himself knows with how much endeavour I avoided the burthen, your father himself of glorious memory, laid on my shoulders: Now I cannot with freedom discharge my self in conscience, since the Bishops, my associates, crie out aloud unto me, that it were one and the same crime in my person, either to leave or betray the Altars.

Justina, much moved with the liberty of these words, complained in her Palace, that among so many Legions, there could not be a man found so faithful, as to deliver her from the importunities of a Priest, promising offices and singular favours in Court, to any that would lead him into exile.

One named Euthymius offered himself, who having purposely hired a house near to the Church, provided a Coach well furnished to carry away S. Ambrose at his coming from Divine Service; but never was it possible for him to perform his promise, by reason of the great press of the people, which perpetually invironed their Pastour. But much otherwise: this miserable undertaker, the year circumvolving, the same day wheron he resolved to execute his design upon the holy man, after he had shamefully been disgraced, was banished, and carried away in the same Coach he had prepared for S. Ambrose; as it is said, Perillus Authour of Phalaris his Bull, was the first that handselled it: and Hugh Ambriot, who caused the Bastille to be built, was the first that went into it in the quality of a Prisoner, there to end his days. Another named Caligonius, a Groom of the Chamber to the Emperour, threatened S. Ambrose to cut off his head with his own hands; the holy man answered: If God permit thee to execute what thou sayest, thou will act but what Eunuchs do, and I shall endure that which ordinarily the Bishops suffer.

Genebrar. Chronic.

Some time after, as if Heaven had fought against the Prelate's enemies, this wicked man, although an Eunuch, being accused of some impurity by a Curtezan, passed the dint of the Sword, which he would have drawn against his Bishop. In the end, the Empress resolved to play out the rest of her Game, and exercise the whole extent of her power. She obtained bloody Edicts, which she her self made to satisfie her own passion. She armed her Auxentius, as the instrument of her fury. She caused it to be published aloud, that all Ecclesiasticks, who would not deliver the Church which was in question, should be held as criminals of treason. She caused Squadrons of insolent souldiers to run up and down the streets, and cast terrour into the minds of the most confident. That was the time, when the bruit of peril wherein S. Ambrose was, being spred through the City, universally drew all the people to the Church, each one endeavouring to make a bulwark for him of his own body, and never forsake him either day or night. Tribunes and Captains were dispatched to him, who signified the Emperours pleasure, which consisted of three Articles. The first was, he should speedily deliver the holy Vessels, & all the moveables of the Church. The second, he should leave the place questioned, in the Empresse's dispose. The third, that in all hast he must go out of Milan, and that he should have free liberty to travel whither he pleased. The Bishop made answer That those holy Vessels were the inheritance of Jesus Christ, and as the Emperour had not abandoned the state of his Ancestours to Tyrants, so Ambrose would never betray the patrimony of his Master. Were gold and silver demanded, which were his own properties, he would make no difficultie to afford them; but as for the goods of the Church, they were Sacred pledges which the Emperour had no right to require, nor he to give; Then, for the Church demanded, it was the house of God, which his Predecessours Dionysius, Eustorgius, Myrocles, and others had courageously defended and conserved, not to be profaned by Arians, but reverenced by Catholicks. Moreover, for that which concerned his banishment, it was a thing now incompatible with his life, for he more feared God, who had given him this charge, then the Emperour who would take it away; and that if Valentinian were able to do that which an exorbitant power permitted, Ambrose was bent on his part to suffer whatsoever a good Pastour ought to endure for his Flock; yea, should his bodie be torn peace-meal under the Rack of persecution, yet his spirit should remain fast fixed to the Altar.

The History of the Vine of Naboth was then read in the Church, and one part of it, which there passed in figure, was here expressed in verity. The denial of S. Ambrose being reported in the Palace, the souldiers had commandment to invade the Church on every side, like a Town besieged. Never was a spectacle beheld more intermingled with terrour and piety. The Church of Milan was then as a Tabernacle of the Lord of hosts, which marched between the Battalions, under the conduct of the burning Pillar. There was nothing without but Souldiers, Lances, Pikes, and Swords; within, but Prayers, Sermons, Hymns and Canzonets. One while this admirable Prelate offered Sacrifice at the Altar, with great effusion of tears: then he mounted into the Chair, to incourage and consolate the people; presently he introduced the symphony of Psalms, anon he gave answers to the Emperour's Deputies. He travelled indefatigably, and appeared as another Judas Machabeus, sometimes in the head, somtimes in the rear, & sometimes in the midst of the Army. He was in his Church like the Patriarch Noe in his Ark, confident in perils, peaceable in tempests, immoveable in all violences conspired to his ruine. The people by his example in the tumult of the whole City, and deluge of roaring waters, were in this Tabernacle of peace, as if they had injoyed the antipasts of Heaven. All were divided by companies to pray and watch, as in Heaven the Quires of Angels.

Strange spectacle.

The good Mother of S. Augustine was then by chance in Milan very far ingaged in the business, for she was a Mary, sister of Moses, who served as an example to all other women. At that time it was, when God more and more to comfort his faithful creatures, discovered to S. Ambrose the sacred bodies of S. Gervasius and Protasius, who heretofore had been martyr'd for the faith. When the holy Reliques were seen to be drawn out of Vaults still bloudy, every one was inflamed with an incredible zeal for defence fence of Religion, much like the Elephants in the book of Machabees, who were ſtirred up at the ſight of the juice of grapes. There was nothing but lights, muſical conſorts, exultations, and triumphs.

The miſerable Empreſs, who cauſed all things that paſſed, to be hourly related unto her, was now come to the condition of rage. Nothing was heard in the City but prohibitions, menaces, penalties, chains, and impriſonments. In the end, the Provoſt was ſent to Saint Ambroſe, to perſwade him, that he at the leaſt would allow a Church in the ſuburbs, to ſatisfie Juſtina, and appeaſe the ſedition. The people prevented his anſwer, and cried out aloud, that could not be done. S. Ambroſe ſtretched out his hands, and ſhewed his neck, ſignifying he was ready to receive Fetters and Swords, yea, to be ſacrificed on the Altar, rather then deliver up the Altar. They went to take the Church in the ſuburbs by force: the people ran thither to ſtand upon the defence thereof. The Emperial Enſigns thereon already fixed, in ſign of poſſeſſion, were abuſed, even by little children.

It is a ſtrange thing that Heaven, Earth, and all the Elements, men, and women, great, and ſmall, noble, and ignoble, ranged themſelves on S. Ambroſe ſide. Yea, the ſouldiers themſelves who were ſent to take poſſeſſion of the Church where the holy man was, entered therein, which at the beginning gave occaſion of much terrour to the moſt timorous: but they lifting up their peaceable hands, cried out aloud. They were come to pray with the Catholicks, and not exerciſe violence on any man; letting alſo the Emperour know, that the Church belonged to him, as to a Catholick Emperour, there he ſhould pray, there receive favours from above, there be in the Communion of true Chriſtians. If it appertained to Hereticks, it would no longer be a place where the Emperour ſhould feed on the Lamb, which is never eaten but in the true Church. His wicked mother ceaſed not to bewitch his minde, and breath in his ears, that Ambroſe aimed at his State: for which cauſe a Commiſſary was diſpatched to the Biſhop, who roundly told him, he only deſired to know one thing of him; Whether he would uſurp the Empire, to the end he might hereafter be treated with-all, as with a Tyrant.

S. Ambroſe made anſwer, That his tyranny was infirmity, and his arms prayers and tears, which made him powerful before God. That heretofore Prieſts had given Kingdoms, but not uſurped them. That there were ſome Emperours, who had deſired Prieſthood, but that Biſhops never had aſpired to Crowns. That Prieſts had often felt the ſword of Tyrants, but Tyrants themſelves had not at anie time ſeen the ſword of Prieſts unſheathed againſt them. Let Maximus be aſked, whether he were a Tyrant, for he was very well able to make relation of ſtrange things. His tyrannie was to ſerve the Emperour at the Altar, and to be ſacrificed, if God ſuffer, in ſerving him.

It well appeared this was to run his head againſt a rock, to think of ſuch an affair. The Emperour fearing to engage his authority any further, by the adviſe of ſome good Counſellours, gently ſtruck ſayl, leaving all matters whole and entire. S. Ambroſe, who then in the Church explicated the Hiſtory of Jonas, much wondered, how the tempeſt being ceaſed, he in an inſtant came out of the Whale's belly.

The fifthteenth SECTION.

Maximus paſſeth into Italy.

YOu need but to caſt a little earth abroad to ſcatter an army of Ants, to break their Oeconomy and ſport, making them rather to think upon flight, then the pleaſure of their pillage. So whil'ſt Juſtina with the Arians was ſtill employed in riots, and practiſes, how to be revenged on S. Ambroſe, making uſe of the innocent ſpirit of her ſon, and authority of the Empire to ſatisfy her revenge, God raiſed an accident which made her think of other matters.

Domnin, her goodly Ambaſſadour, who departed from Maximus loaden with preſents and fair words, little thinking thereof, was preſently waited on by an army of the Tyrant, who had in him as much fervour as fire, and more infidelity then ice. So ſuddenly fell he upon Italy, that it was a great chance he had not taken the mother and her young ones upon the Neſt. All which the Empreſs Juſtina could do, was ſpeedily to ſave her ſelf with her ſons and daughters, to ſet ſayl on the Sea, and paſs to Theſſalonica, a City of Greece, much renowned, were it but in S. Paul's Epiſtles.

Maximus finding no reſiſtance, flowed like a Torrent over the fair fields of Italy, and made furious havock; though to take away the blemiſh of the blood of the Emperour Gratian, and to gain the reputation of a good Prince, he ſhewed in the end ſome moderation.

It is verily a miracle of God, that he having been treated with by S. Ambroſe with ſo much liberty, as we have ſaid before, & holding ſtill the bloudy ſword in the ruines of Italy, in a time when he might have done any thing which his paſſion dictated, he ſo bridled himſelf, that he not only abſtained from wronging the holy Prelate, but for his ſake uſed the whole Territory of Milan with the more humanity. It ſeemed, the City of Milan under the influences of its Paſtour, had the virtue of thoſe ſacred Forreſts, which tamed Wolves: It tied up the throat of a ravenous Wolf, and made him court his prey. Yet though ſhe were without peril, ſhe was not void of fear, ſeeing ſo many armed troups round about her, and ſmelling the ſmoak of thoſe fires which waſted her neighbours. Then was the time, when the admirable Biſhop acted things likewiſe worthy of his perſon. For, all the Citizens wavering, & almoſt ready to leave the City deſolate, to ſave their lives, he by his eloquence and authority held them back ſo well, that he ſeemed to have enchained them. This ſcourge (ſaith he) proceedeth from our diſorders: let us ceaſe to ſin, and God will give over to afflict us. It is a folly to fly from your country. If you deſire to be ſafe, fly from your ſins. The arms of Maximus will have no power over bulwarks of ſanctity. Ambroſ. ſerm. 93. Prudence and Charity of S. Ambroſe.

Beſides, as it is ſaid, he is bad, who is good for none but himſelf, the charitable Prelate, not content to conſolate and confirm his own, but ſeeing that all Italy was filled with extreme miſeries, not only ſpent all the means which he had to comfort them, but employed therein the very gold and ſilver Veſſels of the Church, for which cauſe the Arians ſought occaſion to calumniate him, diſpoſing themſelves to condemn virtues, ſince they could finde no vice to lay hold on.

The holy man anſwered, that which he afterward couched in his offices. It is the effect of a moſt ardent charity to compaſſionate the miſeries of our neighbours, and to aid them according to our power, yea, above our power. Rather thoſe herein to be accuſed of prodigality, then inhumanity: there is no fault more pardonable, then that of bounty. It is a ſtrange thing to finde men ſo cruel, as to be troubled, when they ſee a man redeemed from death, an honeſt woman delivered from the violence of Barbarians, which is worſt then death, or poor forſaken infants, drawn from the contagion of Idols, which they are forced to adore with menaces of death. Let our enemies murmur as long as they pleaſe, but I more affect to keep ſouls for God, then to treaſure up gold. Office. lib. 1. cap. 28.

Whileſt all this paſſed in Italy, Theodoſius came to viſit Juſtina and her children at Theſſalonica, who failed not to preſent all their complaints, and ſolicite him to undertake the war againſt Maximus. But he Enterview of Theodoſius and Juſtina.

therein at first shewed himself very cold; insomuch that (not to disguise the truth partly touched in Zosimus) although Theodosius was a very great Captain, as one who arrived to the Empire by his own merit, notwithstanding seeing his fortune now at the height, he was pleased to take the repose and delights of the Court under the shadow of his own palms, and not contest again with any man, fearing the hazard of wars, and the slippery foot of felicity. Moreover Maximus, who defied the force of all the world, played the fawning dog before him, and sent expres Ambassadours to draw him to some agreement. This so wrought, that when the offended Empress sounded an alarm, Theodosius endeavoured to pacifie her with fair promises and good hopes, saying, Nothing must be precipitated, that Maximus would become dutiful; that it was better to give him some bone to gnaw on peaceably, than enkindle a war which would never be extinguished, but with rivers of humane bloud. But the Lady infinitely vexed, pursued this affair with all extremity, and was much displeased to see, that he who held all his advancement from her husband, her self, and her children, shewed some remisness in so urgent a necessity. She bethought her self of an excellent stratagem, which was, to enflame the war with the fire of love. The Emperour Theodosius had lost his wife Placilla, & was much enclined to a second marriage.

Justina, who heretofore had enjoyed the short tyranny of beauty, making two Emperours Maximus, and Valentinian the elder, tributary thereunto, was no longer in season to afford that which might easily win Theodosius: but she had a daughter, named Galla, then in the flower of her age. and a perfect image of the mother; she determined to pierce this man by the arrow of the eye of this Princess, which was most easily done, for she took her along with her, to dissolve this heart of ice; and casting her self at his feet, humbly besought him by the service he heretofore had vowed to the house of great Valentinian, by the ruine of her Orphans, and by the blood of poor deceased Gratian, whom he had associated in Empire, to take the matter in hand. In the same proportion as she uttered those words with great fervour, the daughter composed her self to weep with a good grace, and even as tears in such persons have a strong spur in them, Theodosius beholding her, felt the wound of Turnus. when he beheld Lavinia, in the like case. He quickly took the Empress and her daughter up, promising all assistance, and from that time plainly discovering that he was powerfully touched. He also failed not in few days to require Galla in marriage, which the mother promised him, as soon as she had irrevocably engaged him in the war she pretended. The marriage was hastily enough solemnized, and from the festival Hall they passed into the field of Mars. Maximus, who saw Theodosius entertained his Ambassadours with words, not giving them any absolute answer, much doubted the affair, and bent his whole force upon defence. He did all which humane prudence may, that hath not the eys of God. He set his Good man, the furtherer of all his treacheries, to Sea, commanding him to guard the Archi-pelagus with a great Fleet. On the other part, he gave commission to his brother Marcellinus to keep passage of the Alps with a strong Army. He himself with the most resolved troups descended into Sclavonia, to prevent his enemy.

Theodosius advertised of all this, after he had most particularly invoked the assistance of the God of hosts, he put himself on the way to cast the lot of the world's Empire. Never was their a more prosperous war. It seemed the Angels of Heaven led the Emperour by the hand: and that the blood of Gratian so traiterously shed, raised Furies in the Camp of Maximus. The encounter of the two Armies was at Sissia, where those of the contrary party accounted themselves strong, having the river for bulwark, which separated them from approaches, terrible to their treachery. But the brave souldiers of Theodosius, nothing amazed, although already much wearied, and all dusty with the long journey they had taken, laying hold of occasion by the forelock speedily passed the river, and furiously charged the enemy.

These wicked men were so astonished to see themselves surprized by such an action of courage, that so soon as they had taken a view of them, they turned their backs. Maximus, hardy for a black mischief, and remiss in a field of battel, shamefully abandoned his Army: instantly the earth was covered with bodies, the river filled with bloud, and good succes reserved a part to the clemency of the Victor. Theodosius pursued his fortune, and grapling with Marcellinus, who was no abler man then his brother, defeated him, returning now very fresh from the victory he bare away in the first battel. And as at the same time he had notice that Maximus was retired into Aquileia, he, who desired to cut away the root of war, went thither with his Army to besiege it. The justice of God fought powerfully against this Cain, and the time was come, in which with his bloud he must wash the spots of his crime. God, who in punishments holdeth some conformity with the sin, would, that as this miserable creature had stirred the military men against his Prince, he should be betrayed by the same souldiers, in whom he had all his hopes reposed. It is a strange thing, that these people abhorring the wickedness of this man, took, seized, and shamefully dispoyled him of the very habiliments and marks of Emperour, which he had arrogated to himself; then tying and binding him like a Galley-slave, they presented him to Theodosius.

Overthrow of Maximus.

It was the greatest extremity of unhappiness which might befal him, to say, that in stead of measuring with his dead body the place he should have defended living with his Sword in hand, he was used as a King dis-arrayed, to let him be seen by all the world as a spectacle of infamy.

Theodosius beholding him so humbled, had some pity of him, and reproaching him with his treachery, demanded, who caused him to enterprize this Tragedy? He being a Coward and a flatterer, answered in so humble terms, that he discovered to have had this belief, that his design no whit displeased his Majesty: in other things excusing him self with great submission, and making it appear, he was a true lover of life. He never had so good an opinion of his wickedness, as to hope for an ordinary death, yet seeing the Emperour changed colour, and spake to him in a sweeter tone, he was in some hope to obtain life, when the enraged souldiers haled him, and tore him in pieces: or, as others have written, delivered him to the hang-man, who cut off his head.

His death. Inter inmitias manus fertur ad mortem Pacatus.

At the same time Theodosius dispatched Count Arbogastus to seize on his son, who was a young child, as yet bred under the wing of his mother, whom Maximus caused to be called the Victorious, and had already declared him Cæsar, when suddenly he was taken and massacred, to accompany his father.

The Good man, his Admiral, understanding the general discomfiture of affairs, voluntarily drowned himself, preventing the hand of a hang-man which would not have failed him, but all the water in the Sea

Sea was not sufficient to wash away the stain of his Master's blood from his soul, since the eternal flames never can free it.

Behold the issue of Maximus, after the rapine of four or five years. Behold to what the designs of the wicked tend, who under pretext of Religion, seek the advancement of their temporal affairs. Behold to what hypocrisies and goodly humane policies, which make use of God as a mask for their wickedness, are finally reduced. Behold a stroke of thunder, which hath left nothing on earth behinde it, but noise and stench. O beastial and bewitched men, who having so good lessons of the justice of God, written with the bloud and sweat of so many miserable Sacrifices, pursue still the ranks, to be companions of the like misfortunes.

Saint Ambrose is much glorified for treating with this man, who deceived so many others, as with one excommunicate, unwilling to be so much as saluted by him, who vowed so many services at his feet; and freely fore-telling the misery should befal him, if he appeased not the celestial vengeance with a sincere repentance.

The sixteenth SECTION.

The affliction of S. Ambrose upon the death of Valentinian.

WHosoever hath said, that Scepters are made of glass, Crowns of perfumed thorns, and the ways of great men are all of Ice, bordered with precipices, hath said no less then truth. It is verily a thing most strange, that the golden seelings of Palaces tremble over crowned heads, and that in the heat of feasts, the hand of Heaven visibly on the walls figureth the sentence of their death. In the mean time we desperately love the vanities of the world: nothing is thought on, but to set our foot on men's throats, that we may the more eminently be seen, to draw the blood of this Universe out of its veins, to cement up the ruines, and tye our selves to a miserable world, which daily falleth apieces even in our own hands. The poor Valentinian was restored to the Throne by Theodosius, after the death of Maximus, and had only past three or four years in peaceful tranquility, disposing himself to good, according to the latitude of his own heart, and giving way to be wholly governed by the counsels of Saint Ambrose, whom he heretofore had persecuted. When behold him taken away at the age of one and twenty years, by a horrible treason, which did, as it were, mingle his blood with that of his brother Gratian.

Arbogastus. The good Prince passed into France, being then at Vienna near Lyons, accompanied by the Count Arbogastus, a French-man by Nation, who had lived till then, in singular good reputation, for he was a man of worth, having a wel-composed body, a quick spirit, a generous behaviour, and much practise in the exercise of arms, which had so dignified him, that he held the prime place in the Empire, to the which he had rendered good services. He was very well beloved by the souldiers; for besides his excellent parts, he bare an irreconcilable hatred to avarice and appeared so little curious to enrich himself, that being so great a Captain as he was, he would be Master of no more then an ordinary soldier. This seemed commendable in him, but he was so desperately proud and cholerick, that he would have all things carried according to his own counsels, much offended with the least contradiction, and accounting himself so necessary, that nothing could be done without him.

On the other side, the young Emperour who was jealous of his authority, seeing that through his presumption he took too much upon him, he in all occasion sought to depress him, which the other ill digested: but he, continuing in this arrogant and harsh disposition, Valentinian violently moved, did resolve to be rid of him. Behold why one day, as Arbogastus approached to his Throne to do him reverence, he looked awry on him, and gave him a Ticket, by which he declared him a man disgraced and deprived of his charge. He furious, as a Dog who biteth the stone thrown at him, after he had read the Ticket, tore it in pieces in the presence of the Emperour through extreme impudency, and cried out aloud: You gave me not the charge which I hold, nor is it in your power to take it from me. This he spake, presuming of support from the souldiers, whom he had ever esteemed. From this day forward he ceased not to make his distasts appear, and to bend his spirit to a mischievous revenge.

There was by misfortune at that time in the Court one named Eugenius, who was accounted a witty man, but cold and timerous, that heretofore had professed Rhetorick, and acquired a good talent in speaking. Arbogastus supposed his own boldness would make an excellent temper with the coldness of this man, and having a long time much confided in him, he made him an Overture to seize on the Empire, which he at first refused. But the other having promised him the death of Valentinian, and his Sword for defence, gave consent to a most enormous assassinate.

All men were amazed, that the poor Emperour in a fatal morning was found strangled by the conspiracy of Eugenius and Arbogastus, aided by the Gentils, who desired nothing but the liberty of Paganism.

This news brought a most sensible affliction upon S. Ambrose, for the Emperour was assured, that the Bishop came to Vienna, expressly to entreat his return into Italy, which having understood, he reckoned up the days, and expected his arrival with unspeakable impatience. But S. Ambrose, who would not by importunity thrust himself into unnecessary affairs, as he through charity was unwilling to be wanting in necessary, having understood that the Emperour was daily upon his return, deferred this voyage, which had been most requisite to hinder Arbogastus, over whom he had a great power. Valentinian advertised of this delay, wrote to him, and earnestly pressed him to come, adding, he meant to receive Baptism at his hands, for he was as yet but a Catechumen. The good Prelate having received the Emperour's Letters, speedily undertook the journey, using all expedition, when at his coming to the Alps, he heard the deplorable death of the poor Prince, which made him return back again, and wash (as he saith) his own steps in his proper tears, most bitterly every moment bemoaning the death of his dearest Pupil.

Manners of Valentinian. Ambrosius de obitu Valent.

The Providence of God was very manifest in his death, for Valentinian was drawn from Empires of the world in a time, when he seemed now fully ripe for Heaven. It is an admirable thing how the direction of S. Ambrose, whom in his later days he only affected, had metamorphosed him into another man. In the beginning he was thought to be over-much delighted in journeys and horse-races: he so took away this opinion of him, that he would hardly permit these sports in the great festival entertainments of the Empire. The Gentiles, who made observations on all his life, had nothing to reproach in him, but that he excessively delighted in the slaughter of savage beasts, whom he caused to be taken and fed for his pleasure, saying, it diverted him from cares of the Empire. He, to satisfie all the world, caused instantly all those creatures to be killed, and disposed himself to attend the affairs of his Council with so good judgment, and so great resolution, that he seemed a Daniel in the midst of the Assembly of Elders. These envious people having watched him so far, as to observe him at the table, objected, he anticipated the hour of his repast; yet he so addicted himself to abstinence, that he was seen in feasts rather seemingly then effectually to eat: for sometimes in entertaining others he fasted, tempering devotion and charity with a singular discretion. Finally, to give testimony of his infinite chastity, it was told him there was in Rome a female Comedian, endowed with a singular beauty, having attractives which ravished all the Nobility. This understood, he deputeth one expresly to bring her to the Court: but they being passionately in love with her, corrupted the messenger, so that he returned without doing any thing. The Emperour re-chargeth, and commandeth, that she with all expedition should be brought. It was so done, but she coming to the Court, the most chast Emperour would not so much as only see her, but instantly sent her back again, saying, That if he being a condition which gave him the means to satisfie all his pleasures, and in an Age which ordinarily useth to be very slippery in matter of vice, and which is more, not married, abstained from unlawful loves: his subjects might well do somewhat by his example. Never servant (saith S. Ambrose) was more in the power of his Master, then the body of this Prince was under command of the soul, nor ever Censor more diligently examined the actions of others, then he his own.

Though all these dispositions infinitely much comforted the holy Prelate, and namely, the desire he expressed to receive Baptism two days before his death, asking every instant, if Bishop Ambrose were come: notwithstanding his heart was transfixed to see him taken away in a time, when he went about to make himself most necessary for all the world. His death was generally bemoaned by all men, and there was not any, nay, not his enemies, which for him poured not out their tears.

It is said, that Galla his sister, wife of the Emperour Theodosius, at the news of his death, filled the Court with inconsolable lamentations, and died in Child-bed, which came by excess of grief; for which Theodosius was pitifully afflicted.

The other sisters of the Prince, who were at Milan, ceased not to dissolve into tears before the eys of S. Ambrose, who had no word more effectual to comfort them, then the assurance that his faith and zeal had purified him, and the demand he made of Baptism had consecrated him, to the end they should no longer be in pain with the ease of his soul.

The good Bishop took a most particular care of his obsequies and burial; where he made a Funeral Oration, found yet among his Works. In the end remembring his two Pupils: Go (saith he) O you most happie, gone as you are out of the desert of this world, dwell now in the everlasting delights of God, united in heaven, as you have been on earth. If my prayers have any force before God, I will not let a day pass of my life, that I remember you not: I will not make a prayer, wherein I insert not the names of my dearest Pupils, Gratian and Valentinian. In the silence of the night the apple of mine eys shall be waking and full of tears for you, and as often as I approach to Altar, my sacrifices shall mount to heaven in the odours of sweetness. By my will (dearest Children) if I could have given my life for yours, I should have found consolation for all my sorrowes. Then turning himself to his Sisters, those mournful Turtles, whom this good Prince had so passionately loved, that in consideration of them, he deferred his own marriage, fearing lest the love of a wife might diminish his charity towards them, the good Bishop thus spake unto them: My holy daughters, I will not bereave you of tears; this were to be over ignorant in the resentments of your hearts. I wish that you bewail your brother, but bemoan him not as lost, he shall live more then ever in your eys, in your breasts, in your hearts in your embracements, in your kisses, in your memorie, in your praiers; nor shall any thing draw him from your thoughts: but you ought now to consider him with a quite other visage, not as a man mortal, for whom you were ever in fear, but as, an Angel in whom you dread nothing: An Angel, who will assist, comfort, and hold you day and night in his protection.

S. Ambrose speaketh to the souls of his two pupils.

The seventeenth SECTION.

The tyranny of Eugenius, and notable liberty of S. Ambrose.

IN the mean while Eugenius, drawn from the Schole to the Throne of Monarchs, to serve as a specious Game for the fortune of the times, changeth his Ferula into a Scepter, and makes himself an Emperour, like the ice of one night. The faithless man, who had been a Christian, shutting up his eys then from all consideration of piety, and only opening them to the lustre of this unexpected greatness, made himself an arm of Tow, forsaking the direction of God, to support in humane policy. He put all his hope in the sword of Arbogastus, and counsel of Flavianus, a Gentleman of prime quality, and much versed in judicial Astrology, who promised him a golden fortune, if he would leave Christian Religion, to re-advance the worship of false gods, towards which Eugenius, blinded with his presumption, discovered great inclinations.

He chose the City of Milan, to begin the web of his wicked purposes, where S. Ambrose did not desire him, not through fear of his arms, but for the horrour he had conceived of his Sacriledges. The false Emperour failed not to write to the holy Bishop to require his friendship, which he would make use of to support his authority: but holy Ambrose shewed so generous a contempt of his Letters, that he deigned not so much as to make answer, until such time, that being informed how Eugenius under-hand favoured the Sect of Pagans, having already allowed them this Altar of Victory, for which so many battels had been fought, he wrote to him a most couragious Letter; where, not touching his election, nor affairs of State, as then not well known, he reprehended him for his impiety, and said among other things:

Epist. Ambros. ad Eugenium.

I saw the retreat, which I made from Milan, not attending you, to the fear of God, which shall perpetually be the rule of my actions. The grace of our Saviour shall ever be more precious with me, then that of Cæsars, nor will I at any time flatter a man to betray my conscience. I wrong no person, if I render to God that which is due to him; and I profit all men, when I conceal not a truth from great-ones. I understand you have granted to Pagans that which constantly hath been denied by Catholick Emperours. God knoweth all the secrets of your heart. It is a very ill busines, if you unwilling to be beguiled by men, think to deceive God, who seeth all that is to be done, even to nothing. The Gentiles, who so much have importuned you to satisfie their passion, taught you to be urgent to make a good refusal if that which you cannot give, but with committing Sacriledge. I am no Controller of your liberalities, but an interpreter of your faith. Give of your treasures what ever you think good; I envie no man: but you shall not give any thing of the rights of God which I will not resist with the utmost extent of my power. You make a good matter to present offerings to Jesus Christ; you will finde few that make account of these dissimulations; every man hereafter will regard not what you do, but what you have a will to do. As for my part, I enter not now into consideration of your estate, but if you be true Emperour, you will begin with the service of the divine Majestie: This must which I cannot hide from you, because my life and flatterie are two things incompatible.

As

As for the reſt, the Emperour Theodoſius ſeeing the tyranny of Eugenius in a readineſs, well foreſaw, neceſſity muſt needs put arms into his hands to be managed with piety. Whileſt the infamous Eugenius made ſlaughter of beaſts, amuſing himſelf on the conſideration of their entrails from thence to judge the events of war, the brave Theodoſius proſtrated himſelf before the Altars of the living God, covered with hair-cloath, imploring the aſſiſtance of Saints for his ſuccour, and all the prayers of ſouls the moſt purified, which at that time lived within Monaſteries. He departed from Conſtantinople with theſe aids, cauſing the Standard of the Croſs to march before him. Eugenius was already encamped on the Alps to hinder the paſſage of his adverſary, and had in a manner covered them with Statues of falſe gods, as of Jupiter and Hercules, ſo beaſtial was this man.

Theodoſius maketh the Court holy.

The Emperour ſeeing he needs muſt fight, commanded Gaynes, Colonel of the Goths, who led the Van-guard, to break the trenches of his enemies, which he quickly did: but they being yet very freſh, and having a notable advantage of place taken by them, ſuſtained the firſt aſſault with much reſolution, and infinite loſs on the Emperour's part; for it is thought that Gaynes, who was a valiant Captain in his own perſon, yet too wilfully opinionative to force this paſſage of the Alps, loſt there about ten thouſand men, which were killed like flies: ſo that needs a retreat muſt be made, very ſhamefull for Theodoſius his Army.

Eugenius, whoſe head was not made for a Diadem, thinking the whole buſineſs ended after ſo great a ſlaughter of his enemies, was ſo puffed up with this ſucceſs, that he rather thought how to glorifie his victory, then foreſee his defence. The ſage Emperour on the other ſide, ſeeing his Army grown very thin, and the courage of his ſouldiers wavering, more ſtedfaſtly made his addreſs to God. He was ſeen upon the top of a Rock proſtrate on the earth, and crying aloud, My God, you know that I in the name of your Son enterprized this war and have oppoſed the arms of the Croſs againſt Infidelitie. If in me there reſt any blame, I beſeech you to revenge my ſins on my culpable head, and not abandon the cauſe of Religion, leſt we become a reproach to Infidels.

Remarkable piety of Theodoſius.

The ſame night God for his aſſurance ſhewed him a viſion of two Apoſtles, S. John and S. Philip, who ſhould be, as indeed they were, the Conductours of his Legions. The next morning about break of day, he ranged his forces in battel-array, and charged Eugenius, not as yet throughly freed from his drunken proſperity: and when he ſaw that thoſe who had the Van-guard proceeded therein ſomewhat fearfully, remembring themſelves of the uſage of their companions, he did an act of admirable confidence, for he alighted from his horſe, and marching on foot in the head of his Army, cryed out; Where is the God of Theodoſius? At this word, the aid of Heaven was ſo propitious, that a furious whirlwind was raiſed, which perſecuted the enemies of Theodoſius, caſting a huge cloud of duſt into their eys, and returning all their own darts back to their proper faces, in ſuch ſort, that as it is confeſſed by Claudian, a very obſtinate Pagan, it ſeemed the good Emperour that day had the winds and tempeſts at command, and that he had nothing to do, but to give the word to make them obedient to his Standards. Heaven fought for its beloved Theodoſius, and all the powers of the air were in arms to favour his victory. The ſouldiers at this inſtant were all changed, ſo much hope had they in their hearts, and fire in their Courages.

Victory of Theodoſius over Eugenius. Ambroſ. in orationi funebri Theodoſii.

Bacurius, one of the Emperour's greateſt Captains, with his inflamed Legions brake through the ranks, penetrated the ſtrongeſt reſiſtances, and gained the Alps. Eugenius his people dejected as men fallen from the clouds, could not ſufficiently admire this alteration. The diſcreeteſt amongſt them diſpoſed themſelves to treat of peace, crying aloud, that never would they bear arms againſt a man, who had the air and winds in his pay.

Theodoſius fortified them with his clemency: all diſpoſitions by a moſt remarkable miracle of God, who exerciſeth his power as well over hearts as winds, were changed in an inſtant, and that which is admirable, the moſt faithful to Eugenius promiſed the Emperour to put him into his hands, which they performed; for they went to take this miſerable man, who ſate in his Throne entertaining his goodly imaginations, and crying; Bring him alive, (ſpeaking of Theodoſius) when they laying hold of his collar, and moſt ſhamefully binding his hands: It is you (ſaid they) we muſt bring alive to Theodoſius, and that inſtantly. They truſſed him up like a beaſt aſtoniſhed, and preſented him to the Emperour, who having reproached him in preſence of all the world for his impiety and treachery, cauſed him preſently to be put to death, to make an end of his imaginary Empire.

The wicked Arbogaſtus who had at other times been ſo happy, when he followed the counſels of S. Ambroſe, ſeeing the ill ſucceſs of his deſigns, became ſo enraged, that himſelf thruſt two Swords through his own body, being not able to endure life nor light, which ſeemed to upbraid him with his crimes.

Some hold that Flavianus died in the throng, that he might not ſurvive his own ſhame: others think he eſcaped, and that Theodoſius extended his ordinary clemency to him.

Briefly behold the courſe of the tyranny of Eugenius, ſtill more and more to verifie the Oracles of S. Ambroſe. The Emperour came to Milan, where he caſt himſelf at the feet of the holy Biſhop, attributing theſe victories to his wiſdom, counſels, and virtue of his prayers.

The eighteenth SECTION.

The differences of S. Ambroſe with the Emperour Theodoſius, and his death.

PHiloſophers ſay, there are four things which divert thunder; to wit, wind, rain, noiſe, and the light of the Sun. And behold a thunder-clap arreſted by S. Ambroſe, with the wind of his mouth, the holy rain of his eloquence, the noiſe of his voice, and reſplendent light of his moſt unſpotted life.

Theodoſius verily was a great Prince, but as it is ſo difficult to be on earth, and not participate of earth, as that the Moon being diſtant by ſo many thouſand leagues, yet ſeemeth to bear the marks thereof on the forehead; ſo it is very hard to be in Court, and not to reſent the manners of the Court, and ſouls eſteemed the moſt temperate, not to have ſome blemiſhes appear on the face. This brave Emperour was naturally enclined to choler, which was enkindled by the breath of thoſe who converſed with him, nouriſhing himſelf with the food of over-much credulity. For this cauſe he had two great conteſtations with S. Ambroſe, which eminently manifeſted the authority of the holy Biſhop.

The one was for a Synagogue of Jews, the other for the murder committed at Theſſalonica. The matter for the Jews was, for that one of their Synagogues was burnt in the Eaſt at the ſolicitation of a Biſhop, with which Theodoſius was offended, as if it had imported much prejudice to his Edicts, cauſed a careful Inquiſition to be made, and adjudged the good Biſhop, who was ſaid to be the Author of this fire, Synagogue burned.

fire, to rebuild the Synagogue, now turned to cinders. Saint Ambroſe, although he had a peaceable ſpirit, and that he in his Dioceſs had never undertaken the like, avoiding popular commotions as much as he might, which ever tranſport affairs into ſome exceſs; yet could he not tolerate the rigours uſed againſt Chriſtians, on this pretended injury, but he very ſharply wrote thereof to Theodoſius, as it appeareth by the letter which is yet found among his Works; ſome words whereof behold:

Ambroſ. Epiſt. 17. lib. 2.

My life paſſeth away in many cares, wherein I am engaged by obligation of my charge: but I muſt avow that I never reſented any thing more lively, then to ſee my ſelf as it were accuſed of Sacriledge before your Majeſtie. I beſeech you patiently to hearken to me; for if I be unworthie to be heard by you, I cannot be heard of God for you. You do wrong to commit your praiers and vows to me, to be carried to Altars: if you denie me the audience of your ears, you declare me by the ſame ſentence unworthie to bear your complaints to the ears of the living God. It is not a thing to be done by a good Emperour to take away the liberty of ſpeech, nor for a good Biſhop to conceal a veritie contrary to his conſcience. All that which Monarchs have in them moſt amiable, is, to love libertie, even in the tongues of the Souldiers; but by a much ſtronger reaſon, ought they to cheriſh it in the mouths of Biſhops. There hath ever been a notable difference between good and evil Princes, which cauſeth that the one deſires the libertie of their ſubjects, and the other love nothing ſo much in them as ſlaverie. God commandeth us to bear his word to the face of Kings and not to be aſhamed of juſtice. I do not intrude through importunitie, but preſent my ſelf of dutie. That which I do, I do for your good, and in conſideration of your ſafetie. If I derive not the effect which I pretend, yet even will I better love to be by your Majeſtie eſteemed troubleſom, then unprofitable or infamous. You have commanded enquiries ſhould be made of thoſe who have burnt the Synagogue of the Jews, to inflict puniſhment, and that the Biſhop by whoſe ſolicitation this fire hath been kindled, ſhould be condemned to re-edifie the waſted buildings. What have you done (O Emperour) in impoſing ſuch a command, which by neceſſitie will make of a Biſhop, either a Prevaricatour or a Martyr; although neither the one, nor other be proper for your time? I deſire a Biſhop may be found ſo fervent as to burn a Synagogue of the Jews; and for that cauſe you have deputed for him a Commiſſarie, to the end, that if he obey your commands, he ſhould betray his own law; and if he reſiſt, make you to do that which the Neroes and Domitians have acted. Behold to what this affair will come, if you take not heed. For my part, I propoſe to my ſelf, that the Biſhop will rather encline to matter of Martyrdom, then of treaſon: he will ſay that he hath ſtirred up the people, ſounded the alarm, taken the flaming fire-brands in hand, and that he will expoſe himſelf for his whole flock. O happie lie, which ſhall ſerve others for abſolution, and him for a Crown! But what need is there to enquire into the abſent? Behold me preſent, behold me avowing the act. I publiſh, and proteſt, if needs you will have it ſo, I my ſelf burned this Synagogue now in queſtion, that there might no longer be a place where Jeſus Chriſt ſhould be denied. And do not tell me, that I have not burned any in mine own Dioceſs; Heaven hath done it for me, Heaven hath prevented the negligence, which I then thought to be reaſonable. And if men have in it ſeconded the will of Heaven, would you ſend one of your Counts to puniſh them, and re-build the Synagogue of the Jews at my charge, that ſo the hand of a Captain which carrieth the Standard of the Croſs, may not henceforth bear them, untill he hath been defiled with a Sacriledge intended againſt the Croſs of Chriſt?

We have heretofore ſeen on the front of the Temple of Idols, how they have been built of the ſpoils of Cimbrians, but we ſhall hereafter read over the Portal of Synagogues, that they were made with the blood of Chriſtians by the commandment of a Chriſtian Emperour. The Jews paſſionately deſire to ſee Chriſtians at the Chain, and they ſhall finde a Chriſtian Emperour, miniſter of their furies. You will make them triumph over the Church of God, you will cauſe them to put our tears and afflictions among their days of Feſtivals, and the victories they will gain upon us, with thoſe they have had from the Amorrheans and Cananeans.

Grave words of S. Ambroſe.

He purſued this ſubject with great vigour of ſtrong reaſons, and good words, and ſeeing the Emperour made no reckoning of this adviſe given him in particular, he failed not, according to promiſe, to ſpeak of it in publick, in a Sermon he made of the waking-rod of Jeremie; where deſcending upon the hiſtory of Nathan, who reproach'd David for his ſin, by conſideration of the benefits he had received from God, he made a long apoſtrophe to the Emperour Theodoſius, to him applying the word of God: I have then made the Emperour of a private man, I have ſubjected barbarous Nations to thee, I have afforded thee iſſue to ſucceed in thy Empires, I have given the peace, I have put thine enemies fettered into thy hands, I have opened Land and Seas to thy Legions, I have ſheltered thee under the buckler of my protection, I have confounded the counſels of thy adverſaries, to make thy enterprizes proſperous, I have rendered thee dreadful to people, marking thee on the forehead with the rays of my Majeſtie, that thou mayeſt re-edifie the Synagogues of the Jews.

He ſpake many things in the like terms, with ſo much lightning, thunder, and tempeſt, that Theodoſius was wholly amazed, nor could ſay any thing elſe to him coming from the Pulpit; but: Biſhop you have preached to me to day. Sacred Majeſty (anſwereth S. Ambroſe) it is for your good. It is true (replieth the Emperour) I did ill to give this command. And for that (ſaith Saint Ambroſe) I will not go to the Altar to offer the pledge of our ſalvation for you, till you have revoked this Edict. I from this preſent revoke it, ſaith Theodoſius. On this aſſurance which you give (anſwereth the Biſhop) I will offer ſacrifices.

As for the other conteſtation of Saint Ambroſe with Theodoſius, which was concerning the murther of the Theſſalonians, of one part the matter is ſo notorious, that it needeth no declaration, but on the other it is ſo important, that it were a crime to let it paſs under ſilence.

The Theſſalonians in a popular commotion, ſlew one of the Emperour's Captains, who had cauſed a Coach-man to be impriſoned. The news reported at Court, incenſed all men of arms, who think wearing Swords, they have right over the blood of people. Theodoſius could do no otherwiſe but ſhew himſelf offended with this death: For the Emperours then thought the Souldiers were as neceſſary for their fortunes, as feathers for Birds. As the thunder already roared in the cloud, and the thunder-ſtroke of the Imperial Eagle menaced the miſerable City, tainted with this murther, S. Ambroſe came thither very fitly, who much ſweetened the affairs, and wholly diſpoſed the Emperour to clemency. But as it is the wind which worketh all the miſchief on the Sea, this element being of its own nature very peaceful, ſo they are ill officers, who often cauſe thoſe diſturbances which happen in the lives of Great men, their good natures very frequently affording them inclinations to ſweetneſs. Theſe Captains which poſſeſſed the ears of the Emperour, ceaſed not to breath and murmur ſo ſtrongly, that after the departure of S. Ambroſe, they raiſed fire and tempeſt. Theodoſius giveth freedom to the ſouldiers, for the revenge they were to exerciſe upon the City of Theſſalonica: they who were willing to drown all their paſſion in blood, bethought themſelves of a wicked and barbarous invention, putting the poor people into a large publick place encloſed with rails, commonly called the Circus, where ordinarily games were preſented, divulging they had an admirable ſpectacle to ſhew, for entertainment of the Burgeſſes of the City. Curioſity of its nature is ever credulous, and he that hath the image of pleaſure in his head, regardeth the bayt, not conſidering the hook. Theſe unfortunate men ran by heaps to take place in the morning very early; they were entertained in the beginning with certain fopperies, which they beheld with much ſatisfaction, clapping their hands at every word, and crying, Vivat Rex, when behold from the rayls where tournaments were expected, horſ-men covered with ſteel were ſeen to iſſue out, with Sword in hand, who ſet upon this multitude encloſed as in a pit-fall, and made a lamentable ſlaughter of theſe ſilly ſheep.

Maſſacre of Theſſalonica.

The

The bloud ſtreaming among ſo many out-cries and horrible images of death, was a hideous ſpectacle, even to thoſe who were out of danger. As a coal enkindled, ever gaineth more and more, eating out his way, it was not known whether any reſiſtance redoubled this fury, but going out of the compaſs of the Circus, they ran all the City over, in ſuch ſort, that in the ſpace of three hours, there were numbred about 7000 bodies ſlain in the Market-place.

O you Great-ones, whom God hath ſet over the heads of men the higher, to behold the images of your own miſery, and not to cruſh and rent them in pieces: what Ocean will ſuffice to waſh your mouths when to content a vanity of ſpirit, you let words fall, which carry along with them the maſſacre of mortals? The Sea is leſs furious, a Thunder-clap leſs dreadful, the gall of Dragons, and poyſon which ſwelleth up the neck of Aſpicks, is much more tollerable then an inconſiderate word proceeding from the mouth of a Great-man, which unloſeth the hands to violence, and ſhuts them up to juſtice. In three hours, behold a poor City deveſted of Citizens, and peopled with dead bodies, become a deſert Iſland encompaſſed with a river of bloud: ſo many women calling upon their husbands, and ſo many little children crying for their fathers among the dead, who had voice no longer to anſwer.

Theodoſius never to himſelf propoſed this miſchief, but his word falling into the hands of men of war fleſhed in revenge, could by no means be recalled.

When S. Ambroſe, being in the company of other Biſhops, heard the news of this pitiful Tragedy, it drew ſobs from his heart, and tears from his eys. The Emperour tormented in his conſcience, cauſed ſecretly the opinion of the good Biſhop to be ſounded, and inſtantly knew that he, who in matters of much lighter importance had not ſpared him, would handle him in this action according to his demerit. Whereupon he immediately by letter denounced him excommunicate, and that if he came to Milan, he could not otherwiſe entertain him, but as one excommunicate: his ſin having reduced him to that ſtate, that the very ſight of Altars would be a crime, unleſs he reſolved upon a perfect penance.

Theodoſius in this matter well diſcovered his mind was good. Some other, beholding himſelf in condition of a power to diſturb the Church, would have reſiſted the Rod with moody extravagancies, and imperious menaces; or admit he would have taken more temperate ways, had ſought the means of diſpenſation from the ordinary rigours of a publick penance, for reverence due to his perſon: but this good Emperour, knowing his malady, ſtood in need of a good Phyſician, made choice of the moſt ſevere, and never had any reſt in his ſoul till he ſaw Saint Ambroſe; much better loving to be reprehended by him, then flattered by another. He came to Milan, and taking the ready way to the Church, the holy Biſhop cauſed ſpeedily all the Gates to be ſhut, and went out of the circuit of the ſacred place to encounter him, and at the firſt meeting, ſpake to him in this manner:

Brave words of S. Ambroſe to Theodoſius.

It is not credible, Oh Emperour, that you as yet know the enormity of the murther you have committed. As choller at that time blinded you, ſo now the opinion of your greatneſs and rays of your Diadem dazel your eys; yet ought you not to reflect on the earth from whence you were extracted, and to which you muſt return? It is fit you think the purple which covers your body cannot defend you from putrifiaction and wormes. The ſtate wherein you then ſhall be, ought to ſerve for a counterpoiſe to the elevation of that, which at this time tranſporteth you out of your ſelf. You command over men, who are of the like nature with your ſelf, who are derived from the ſame Elements, who have equalled you in birth, and ſhall alſo Parall. ll you in a Tomb. God hath made you man, and Emperour, to uſe them as men and ſubjects; and they by your commandment are worſe treated then the moſt ſavage Beaſts.

With what eys pretended you to behold the Church of the living God, who is your ſovereign Maſter? Have you any other then thoſe, which are poiſoned with the gall of your anger? With what feet will you touch theſe Marbles, which are not made but for the feet of the faithful? Shall it be with them, which go upon ſlaughters? What hands will you extend to Altars? Have you any other then thoſe, which yet diſtil the blood of thoſe unfortunate Victimes? Dare you with thoſe hands to take the body of the Son of God? Dare you to lift his blood to that mouth, which hath denounced the ſentence of this Maſſacre? Retire, retire, add not crime to crime. Take about your neck the yoak of penance, which is the only remedy of your evils.

Theodoſius amazed at this liberty, made no other anſwer, but that David had been a great ſinner as well as he; but ſo ſoon as he opened his mouth, the Biſhop replieth: Well then, ſince you ſpeak of David, imitate him in his penance, as you have in his ſin.

Thereupon the Emperour departed, and went to his Palace, touched with an amazed grief, where he endeavoured punctually to perform the works of penance impoſed upon him by the holy Prelate. He already had paſſed out eight months in this eſtate: when the feaſt of Chriſtmas being come, he fetched many deep ſighs, & ſhed abundance of tears, bitterly deploring his condition, for which cauſe Ruffinus, who was at that time the chief favourite of Theodoſius, & after that cut in pieces under the reign of his children, perceiving it, asked him the cauſe of this unmeaſurable ſorrow. Then Theodoſius redoubling his ſobs: Ah Ruffinus, you are merry (ſaith he) and ſee not where the evil woundeth me. Have I not cauſe to bemoan my miſhap with bitter tears, ſeeing the Altars, made even for Slaves and Beggars, cannot endure me, and needs muſt I be cut off, as a rotten member, from the ſociety of men and Angels? For I am not ignorant, that what is bound on earth by the mouth of Prieſts, ſhall be bound in Heaven.

Ruffinus, who then thought himſelf as ſtrong as Heaven, ſaid; If there were nothing elſe but that, which afflicted the Emperour's mind, he would quickly afford a remedy. Theodoſius replieth: You know not Biſhop Ambroſe: but I know, neither thy credit nor induſtry can ought avail me. Ruffinus notwithſtanding inſiſted, proteſting he would inſtantly perſwade the Biſhop what ever he pleaſed. He failed not to finde out the Biſhop, but the Saint gave him a very ſharp reprehenſion, adviſing him rather to dreſs his own wounds, then intercede for others; for he partly underſtood, that he had a hand in this fatal counſel. Ruffinus notwithſtanding plyed it all he could, and endeavoured to charm this man with fair words, ſaying finally for concluſion, he would immediately accompany the Emperour to the Church. S. Ambroſe who was ever very ſerious, anſwered; If he come thither as a Tyrant, I will ſtretch out my neck: but if in quality of a Chriſtian Emperour, I am reſolved to forbid him entrance. Ruffinus well ſaw the Biſhop was inflexible, and went in haſt to adviſe the Emperour, not yet on this day, to hazard his approach to the Church. He found him on his way, as a man diſtracted, that had the Arrow in his heart, and haſtened for remedy: and he ſaying, he had dealt with the Biſhop; It is no matter (ſaith Theodoſius) let him do with me what he pleaſe, but I am reſolved to reconcile my ſelf to the Church.

S. Ambroſe adverti ſed that Theodoſius came, went out, and expected him at the door of a little Cell, ſeparated from the body of the Church, where ordinarily ſalutations were made. Then perceiving him environed with his Captains, Come you, oh Emperour, (ſaith he) to force us? No (ſaith Theodoſius I come in the qualitie of a moſt humble ſervant, and beſeech you, that imitating the mercy of the Maſter whom you ſerve, you would unlooſe my fetters; otherwiſe my life will fail. What penance (replieth the holy man) man) have you done for the expiation of so great a sin? It is (answereth Theodosius) for you to appoint it, and me to perform it.

Ædicula jaculatoria.

Then was the time, when to correct the precipitation of the Edict made against the Thessalonians, he commanded him to suspend the execution of the sentence of death for the space of thirty days: after which, having brought him into the Church, the faithful Emperour prayed, not standing on his feet, nor kneeling, but prostrated all along on the pavement, which he watered with his tears, tearing his hair, and pitifully pronouncing this Versicle of David: My soul is fastened to the pavement, quicken me according to thy word.

Psal. 118. Adhæsit pavimento anima mea, vivifica me secundum verbum tuum.

When the time of Oblation was come, he modestly lifted up himself, having his eys still bathed with tears, and so went to present his Offering, then stayed within those rayls, which separated the Priests from the Laity, attending in the same place to hear the rest of Mass. S. Ambrose asked him, who set him there, and whether he wanted any thing? The Emperour answered, He attended the holy Communion: of which the sage Prelate being advertised, he sent one of his chief Deacons which served at the Altar, to let him understand that the Quire was the place of Priests, and not of the Laicks: that he instantly should go out to rank himself in his order, adding, the Purple might well make Emperours, not Priests. Theodosius obeyed, and answered, that what he had done, was not on purpose, but that such was the custom of the Church of Constantinople. Yea, it is also remarkable, that returning afterward into the East, and hearing Mass at Constantinople, on a very solemn festival day, after he had presented his offering, he went out of the Quire, whereat the Patriarch Nectarius amazed, asked him, why his Majesty retired in that manner? He sighing, answered: 'I in the end have learned to my cost, the difference 'between an Emperour, and a Bishop? To conclude, 'I have found a Master of truth, and to tell you 'mine opinion, I do acknowledge amongst Bishops, 'but one Ambrose worthy of that title.

Behold an incomparable authority, which was as the rays of his great virtue and sanctity, from whence distilled all that force and vigour, which he had in treating with all men.

I imagine I hitherto have exposed the principal actions of S. Ambrose to the bright splendour of the day, and so to have ordered them, that all sorts of conditions may therein finde matter of instruction. It hath not been my intention to distend them by way of Annals, but historical discourses, proper to perswade virtue. So likewise have I not been willing to charge this paper with other particular narrations, which may be read in Paulinus, Sozomen, Ruffinus, and which have exactly been sought out by Cardinal Baronius, suitable to this purpose. I conclude, after I have told you what Paulinus his Secretary witnesseth, he writing by him a little before his death, saw a globe of fire, which encompassed his head, and in the end entered into his mouth, making an admirable brightness reflect on his face, which held him so rapt, that whilest this vision continued, it was impossible for him to write one word of those which S. Ambrose dictated.

Death of S. Ambrose.

As for the rest, having attained the threescore and fourth year of his age, he was accounted as the Oracle of the world; for they came from the utmost bounds of the earth to hear his wisdom, as unto Solomon, and after the death of Theodosius, Stilicon, who governed all, held the presence of S. Ambrose so necessary, that he esteemed all the glory of the Roman Empire was tied to the life of this holy Prelate. In effect, when on the day of holy Saturday, after his receiving the Communion he had sweetly rendered up his soul, as Moses by the mouth of God: a huge deluge of evils over-flowed Italy, which seemed not to be stayed but by the prayers of this Saint. Let us (I beseech you) pass over his death in the manner of the Scripture, which speaketh but one word of the end of so many great personages: and let us never talk of death in a subject, wholly replenished with immortality.

Oh what a life, what a death, to have born Bees in his first birth on his lips, and at his death globes of light in his mouth! What a life, to be framed from his tender age, as a Samuel for the Tabernacle, not knowing he was designed for the Tabernacle! What a life, to preserve himself in the corruption of the world, in a most undefiled chastity, as a fountain of fresh water in midst of the Sea! What a life, to arrive to honours and dignities in flying them, and to have enobled all his charges by the integrity of his manners! What a life, not to have taught any virtue before he practised it, and to become first learned in examples, before he shewed himself eloquent in words! What a life, so to have governed a Church, that it seemed a copy of Heaven, and an eternal pattern of virtues! What a life to have born on his shoulders the glory of Christendom, and all the moveables of the house of God! What a life, to have so many times trampled the head of Dragons under foot, and rendered himself the Oracle of the world, and the Doctour of Monarchs! And what a death, to dye as in a field, with Palms planted by his hand, manured by his industry, and watched his sweats!

What a death, to have built himself before his death, a Tomb stuffed with precious stones of so many goodly virtues! What a death, which hath made it known that S. Ambrose was born for all the world and could not die without the tears of all the world; since as every one had his interests in the life of this Prelate, so he found in his death the subject of his sorrow! What a death, to dye with these words in his mouth: I am neither ashamed to have lived, nor fear to dye, because we have a good Master! What a death, to return to Heaven as the Dove of the Deluge to his Ark, bearing words of peace, as an Olive-branch in his mouth! What a death, to see vice trodden under his feet, Heaven all in Crowns over his head, men in admiration, the Angels in joy, the Arms of God laden with recompences for his merits.

Prelates, who please your selves with Miters and Croziers, would to God this incomparable man, as he is the Ornament of your Order, might be ever the model of your actions. And if your dignities make you be as Mountains of Sinai, wholly in lights, flames, and thunder-strokes; let the innocency of your life, render you (by his imitation) Mountains of Libanus, to bear the whiteness of Snow in the purity of your conversation, the odour of Incense in your Sacrifices and Devotions, and Fountains in the Doctrines and Charities you shall distribute to the whole world.

THE

THE SOULDIER.

TO SOULDIERS.

O Brave and couragious Nobility, whose Anceſtours have fixed the Standards of the Croſs upon the Land of Infidels, and cemented Monarchies with their blood; to you it is I addreſs theſe Lines, for you it is my Pen laboureth, excited with a generous deſign it hath to honour your Profeſſion. Here it is, where I preſent the true figures of Valour: Here I diſplay the Palms and Crowns, which environed the Head of your Fathers. Here I do reſtore the value of fair and glorious Actions, reſerved for your imitation. Enter with a firm footing and a confident courage into this Temple of Glory; perſwading your ſelves that there is nothing ſo great in the world, as to tread falſe greatneſs under foot, and deifie Virtues. Worldly honour is the Feaſt of gods, ſaid an Ancient, where the ambitious are not invited, but in quality of IXIONS and TANTALUSSES, to ſerve there as Buffons: but that which conſiſteth in Valour, joyned to integrity of Manners, ought to be the Object of your Affections, the Recompence of your Labours, and Trophey of your Memory. Reflect only with a favourable eye on this poor Endeavour which I conſecrate to your benefit, and afford by your Virtues effect to my Prayers, and accompliſhment to my Writings.

THE SOULDIER.

The firſt SECTION.

The excellency of Warlike Virtue.

IF the profeſſion of Arms were as well managed, as it is excellent and neceſſary in civil life, we could not have eys enough to behold it, nor tongues ſufficient to praiſe it: and although our ſpirit ſhould arrive to the higheſt top of admiration, it would ever finde wonders in this ſubject, not to be attained.

God of Hoſts. We ſeem to hear the Scripture ſpeak, that God himſelf affecteth the glory of Arms, when he cauſeth himſelf to be ſurnamed the God of Hoſts, and when the Prophets repreſent him unto us in a fiery Chariot, all invironed with burning Legions, at which time the pillars of Heaven tremble under his feet, the Rocks are rent, Abyſſes frown, and all the Creatures of the Univerſe ſhake under the inſupportable ſplendour of his Majeſty. In effect, this great Monarch of Heaven and Earth ceaſeth not to make war; and if we will conſider his proceedings, we ſhall finde it is more then fifty Ages, ſince he hath laid ſiege to a rebellious City, which hath for Ditches, Abyſſes of Iniquity; for Walls and Rampires, obſtinacy: for Towers and Bulwarks, Mountains of pride; for Arms, reſiſtance againſt Divine Inſpirations: for Artillery, tumult and inſolency: for Houſes, Dens of hypocriſie: for Palaces, labyrinths of diſſimulation: for Tribunal, and Bar, Impiety: for Temple, proper will: for Idol, ſelf-love; for Captain, blindneſs: for Souldiers, exorbitant paſſions; for counſel, folly: and for conſtancy, perverſe opinion.

Town beſieged by God.

The hurt of man. This City in a word, is the heart of man, againſt which God daily wageth war, to give us liberty by our captivity, advancement by our fall, greatneſs by our abaſing, and life by death, which maketh us dye to all dead things, to live for immortality. God would that we fight by his example, not only with ſpiritual arms, but ſometimes with material: and it is a thing very conſiderable, that Abraham the firſt Father of all the faithful, was a Warriour; ſince S. Ambroſe reckoning up all his titles, according to the Scripture, ſheweth, he was a good Religious man, a good Juſtice, a good Captain, a good Hoaſt, and a good Husband. Yea, alſo it is a paſſage much more admirable to ſay, what Clemens Alexandrinus hath obſerved, that the firſt Army of the Faithful which ever was, marched, not thinking thereon, under the figure of the Croſs, and the name of Saviour, although it were about two thouſand years before the birth of the Meſſias.

Ambroſe Offic. lib. 1. cap. 24. Fide primus, juſtitiâ præcipuus, in prælio ſtrenuus, in victoriâ non avarus, domi hoſpitalis, uxori fœdulus.

The fourteen Capter of Geneſis teacheth us, that nine Kings came into the field with their troups, to fight, four againſt five. Thoſe of Sodom and Gomorrha were there in perſon, who like effeminate Princes turned their back at the firſt encounter, and in flying fell into pits of ſulphure. Their defeat gave leiſure to the Enemy to pillage all the Country: where poor Lot, the Nephew of Abraham was taken, having by miſhap, choſen his habitation in a Territory, fertile in wealth and iniquities.

The news coming to the ears of Abraham, he ſpeedily armed his houſhold-ſervants, who were to the number of three hundred and eighteen, and with Shepherds aſſaulted Kings, whom he valorouſly vanquiſhed, bringing back his kinſman, and all the booty which his enemies had taken. Behold the first battel renowned in Scripture, where this brave Doctour of Alexandria, before alledged, very well subtilizeth, and saith, that the number of Abrahams souldiers is represented by three Greek letters T. J. H. whereof the first signifieth the Cross, and the other two the name of Saviour, God being desirous so to consecrate the first arms of believers by the Mysteries of his Greatness, to declare, that the warfare which is well managed, is his work and glory.

Warriours suns.

Likewise we do not finde that the name of Sun hath been given in holy Writ to a living man with so much lustre and applause, as to a souldier, and the best of souldiers: I speak of Sampson, which is so much as to say, Sun in our language; where it seemeth the Scripture leadeth us by the hand, to make us acknowledg, that military profession, which is under good direction, so much excelleth the ordinary vocations of men, as doth the Sun the Stars. For letters, yea, eloquence and arts, which are set out with so much lustre in the estimation of men, are covered under the wings of military virtue, as very well the Roman Oratour hath acknowledged. We do not read that ever the Sun stood still to hear the graceful words of an eloquent tongue, nor to behold the Theatres and Amphitheatres of the Romans, nor the Olympick games of Grecians nor all the other objects of admiration, which are in the industrie of men: but we do well know from the oracle of truth, that this great Star, admired by all the world, immoveably stayed, as charmed by the voice of a souldier, the illustrious Josuah, at that time, when he acted so many brave feats of arms; as if it would admire his prowess, and enlighten his conquests.

The greatness and excellency of a brave Captain.

And what is there also more admirable in the world, then to see a man covered with steel, who curvetteth on a generous horse, and hasteth, his head bowed, to throw himself through the battallions, all bristled with launces and swords, through so many musket-shots, so many hail-showers of iron and so many dreadful images of death, which he as freely defieth, as if he were immortal, and as little spareth life, as if he had a hundred to loose? What a spectacle to behold him in a furious conflict, like a thunder-bolt in the cloud, which forceth his prison, and breaks all resistance, flying upon wings of fire, and the whirling roar of thunder, to shake the height of rocks? What an affrightment to see him in another posture, scaling a wal, all beset with arms and terrours, and hastening into danger with the same pace and visage, as another to a feast? What support and what consolation for poor people (whom injustice and hostility would butcher, as sheep ordained to slaughter) to perceive a brave captain, with a flying squadron, dissevering the malignity of those forces, conspired to the ruine of innocents, and by the splendour of his arms changing all the storms into calms?

O what a beauty is it to receive wounds in those combates, from whence floweth more glory then blood! O what greatness to reap palms in midst of so many thorns! O what a felicity to behold his battels attended by so many laurels, congratulations, and applauses of the people, preserved by this military virtue! How can all be in this profession but glorious, seeing death it self, the terrible of terribles, sheweth a face all smiling to those, who are buried in their valour, as in the true tomb of honour?

The delight of history to praise Captains.

(a) 1 Mac. 13.

It seemeth holy Histories do likewise describe these great Captains with some delight, when they make them march in the war. So they tell us (a) of Judas Machabæus, who having put on his arms appeared like a Gyant, and that he in the battel was seen like a roaring Lion, seeking out his prey. So they describe in the second of Kings (b) the prowess of David, and other valiant men, who flourished in this time with most particular Elogies. So they depaint unto us in a very admirable manner the strength and stratagems of Gedeon against the Midianites.

Induis se lorica sicut Gigas, similis fastus est leoni in operibus suis, & sicut catulus leonis rugientis in venatione.

(b) 2 Reg. 23.

Valour is matter of astonishment, which transporteth all men both great and small, wittie and dull, to honour its qualities. Aristotle, the politest judgement which hath been in former Ages, so much wondereth at this warlick force, though far distant from his profession, that he composed an excellent Hymn in praise of it, which is yet to be found in Diogenes Laertius: Where he calleth it a virtue most painful for mortals, but the fairest ornament of Civil life: A virtue, which hath such attractive beauty, that the most generous hearts seek for death with strife to enjoy the lustre of its glory. If then this valour have such attraction, considered onely within the limits of nature, how will it be, if once advanced by the assistance of grace and virtues, which take all that is harsh from it, to make it shine with rays of a true and happy majesty? Is there any thing more lovely in the whole world, then to see a valorous souldier furnished with qualities of piety, prudence, justice, liberality, goodness, honesty, and with all other graces, which are in a sweet disposition, as stars sown in the azure of celestial globes?

Oh Nobility, if you knew your own excellency, and could conform your life to your dignity, what lustre and support would you afford to Christendom? It was the faith of a souldier, and of a souldier issued from Paganism, which the mouth of the living God hath exalted above all the piety of the Israelites, when he so highly commended the Centurion of the Gospel, for acknowledging the Saviour had as much power over maladies and things insensible, as an absolute Captain over his souldiers. It was a souldier, whom Saint Peter by the revelation of the Angel did first of all consecrate to faith, as the first fruits of Gentilism. They are warriours which so often repleniſh our Martyrologies with their names, our memories with their veneration, and mouths with prayers offered up to them. These hearts have at all times been capable to receive seeds of most noble virtues, and now adays they are suffered to putrifie in neglect, ordure, and bruitishness. Oh Nobility, deceive not your selves in the acknowledgment of the badges of your profession, nor flatter your selves under a false mask of valour. I will here represent to you the Palace of military virtue, and shew the way you must walk in, to arrive thither, not suffering your selves to be seduced by chimerical fantasies and illusions of greatness, onely big-swoln with smoak, and which when they have promised to make mountains, produce nothing but rats and vermine.

The second SECTION.

The enterance into the Palace of valour, and the illusions of Salmoneans and Rodomonts.

THe ingenious Delben, who hath composed all Aristotles moral Philosophie in excellent Tables, figureth unto us at the entry into the Palace of valour, an enraged Mistress, called Audacious-ness, which seduceth an infinit number of Salmoneans or Rodomonts, under colour of virtue. It is true, true, ſhe is dumb in this piece of painting, but I reſolve to ſhew her full of life in this Treatiſe, and diſcover to you the ſlie practiſes and damnable maxims, which ſhe makes uſe of to deceive the ſpirits of this Age; to the end, that the knowledge of the evil may with more facility furniſh us for application of remedies.

S. Iſidorus de conflictu vitiorum & virtutum.

Suffer me here, O Reader, to imitate the great S. Iſidore, who the more natively to repreſent the horrour of vices, makes them diſpute againſt virtues, putting into their mouthes all their lewd maxims. Afford me the liberty, that I may manifeſt the diſorders, which are at this day in the corrupt Nobility, by the mouth of a Rabſaces, the wicked Souldier, who undertaketh to give precepts to youth, and dictate moſt pernicious counſels, which ſhall afterward be refuted by the Chriſtian ſouldier.

Note and behold the damnable precepts of Rabſaces, the falſe Souldier, which contain a true Satyre of the manners of the depraved Nobilitie.

IMagine to your ſelf, that this dangerous Maſter goes before the Nobility, which ſeeketh after the glory of Arms, and that he taketh by the hand a young man, whom he ſees apt for his impreſſions, & ſheweth him, in ſtead of the true manſion of fortitude, a Palace all of winde, built upon quick-ſilver, where Palms and Laurels grow like the fruits of Sodom, which flie into aſhes when we think to touch them. Thereupon he thus diſcourſeth with him, wherein you ſhall too well know the manners and inclinations predominant in the petty Salmoneans of this Age.

Sir, behold you are in the Palace of valour, and I am he whom you ſearch for, I purpoſely preſent my ſelf before you, to receive you with open arms, and dictate precepts from my lips, which ſhall make you to equal the glory of Caſars and Alexanders.

I affirm the time hath been when brave ſouldiers took the ſword from the Altar, to employ it for the honour of Altars, and lived in the exerciſe of Arms, as in the Temple of the God of hoſts: but theſe kind of actions are more found in antient Hiſtories, then in the manners of men that live at this preſent. If thou wilt be a ſouldier of the time, I wiſh the to become a petty Cyclop, and know very little what God or Religion is, but to ſwear by the one, and profane the other. I ſhould fear leaſt this devotion may not ſoften thy courage, which is eſteemed at this day not to be of temper good enough, if it have not much impiety. Thy oaths ſhall be thy Sacraments; thy myſteries, the cabal of the wicked; the table, thy Altar; the diſhes, thy Sacrifices; and thou ſhalt account thy ſword, as a Deity, which thou ſhalt bear hanging at thy girdle, without further ſearch. If needs thou muſt for ceremonie go to Church, paſs along as if thou went'ſt to a dancing, free from apprehenſion of the Divine Majeſty, for that may make thee melancholy: and when thou art there, without any diſtinction of profane or ſacred, diſpoſe thy ſelf to laugh and jeer upon all occaſions which are preſented: for indeed we muſt pleaſantly paſs away this little ill time. Thou ſhalt ſet thy ſelf into divers poſtures which ſhall favour much of a jugler, to keep the decorum of men of thy condition, and if there be nothing to be talked on nor jeſt to be broken, at leaſt thou ſhalt turn thy head one every ſide, and make thy eys and thoughts hunt after objects which may pleaſe the ſenſe. I well know, that all this (taken according to the model of antient piety) is held for a great ſacriledge: but thou art very capable of it; and if thy countenance deceive me not, thou wilt never be one of thoſe ſcrupulous ones, who think the Churches are made for nothing but prayer.

First diſorder of the Nobility. Great impiety.

Life bruitiſh and infamous.

Thou ſhalt learn in good time to lie, ſwear, forſwear, ſlander, and blaſpheme: for it is very ordinary Rhetorick in the mouth of our Salmoneans. Go not about to ſearch into old Hiſtories, as Charles the Eight, who hewed through the Alps, conquered the Kingdom of Naples, and made Conſtantinople with its Ottomans to tremble with the onely ſhadow of his name, yet durſt not ſo much as ſwear by his faith. We are no longer in ſuch kind of times; men now are ſo accuſtomed to lie, that needs muſt oaths mount by degrees up to the clouds to aſſure a truth, although with extream ſwearing it is taken for a lie. And were there no other reaſon of ſwearing but to make an able man, ſince thou canſt not be valiant with thy arm, cut through confidently with thy tongue.

2. Diſorder, The tongue of blaſphemy and calumny.

Let brags and Rodomontadoes never drie in thy mouth, no more then water in huge rivers. If thou wilt have one of the greateſt virtues of the times, thou muſt be froward and peeviſh, and ſpeak of nothing but duels, of challenges, and aſſignments of the place; and as ſoon as thou ſhalt hear ſome ſpeech of any man of valour, thou muſt ſay, thou much deſireſt one day to ſee him with ſword in hand, and that thou haſt heretofore ſeen others, over whom thou hadſt great advantage. Swear in good earneſt, that ſuch a one hath done the wrong: but that thou wilt evict reparation from him, ſealed with his blood: diſpute, ſwagger, tell tales, make quarrels ariſe about a pins point, preſs to be a ſecond to this man, and that man, but ever engage others, and as nimbly as thou canſt draw thy pin back again from the game. Believe me, the whol myſtery conſiſteth onely in ſetting a good face on't. If thou canſt counterfeit wounds, as Hereticks falſe miracles, thou ſhalt not do much amiſs. For all valour now adays bendeth that way. It ſufficeth, it be ſaid, thou art a man to kill or be killed bravely. It is true, that antiently ſome duels were permitted in time of war, enemy againſt enemy, and executed in the view and preſence of Captains of both parts, who beheld them with much ſolemnity. So the brave Chevalier Bayard, the eie and arm of French warfare, ſlew Alphonſus de Sotomayor, a Spaniard, in the field of battel, before the eys of both Armies, who beheld this ſpectacle. This made the ſouldier very confident to enter into liſts with military laws in preſence of his Captain, againſt an adverſary of another Nation. Where ſhall we now adays find the like valour? Of neceſſity night, private places, and ugly corners muſt be ſought out, to fight a duel: yea, I leave thee to conſider what a goodly ſpectacle it would be, if one from a Theatre might behold the countenance of theſe Rodomonts, moſt violent in words, you ſhould ſee them tremble, wax pale, quake, be amazed, trouble, and in the end be ſlain, like wretched ſwine; but this is not honeſt, we therefore muſt find out ſome ſcarff to cover the cowardiſe of theſe clandeſtine combats.

3. Diſorder, The abomination of duels.

The more a man is ignoble, cowardous, or unhappy, ſo much the more ought he ſeek out ſuch kind of duels: I ſay ignoble, though I am not ignorant it hath heretofore been the trade of ſlaves, but opinion hath made it now a way for Gentlemen. Behold why thoſe, who find themſelves to be of baſe extraction, do the more fervently ſeek out ſuch occaſions, as if they ſhould thereby blot out their ignominie. I ſay cowardous, for it is to become confident in a baſe buſineſs, where Lackies and Butchers may be Maſters. I ſay unhappy, for it is the means to conſummate his miſery, without having many witneſſes: needs muſt the deſperate finde ſome gate to eſcape from life, as would enraged beaſts from a liſt, by leaping over the rails. In the end, when thou ſhalt die in this combat, thou haſt nothing to looſe, but a wicked ſoul. And though thou art moſt wretchedly ſlain, our Salmoneans will ſay, thou diedſt in the bed of honour, and that ſufficeth to be valiant to the world.

4. Diſorder, Tyranny in war.

When thou art in the war, thou ſhalt be a kind of Barbarian, in ſuch ſort, that the Peaſants ſhall take thee to be more then an Army of Hunnes or Tartars. If thou haſte any command, thou ſhalt march all puffed up with vain-glory, and make thy ſelf known by the diſaſters of the poor. If thou be called on, to put thy hand to thy purſe, thou ſhalt pay thy hoſteſs with threats, and thy ſouldiers with impunity of crimes. Thou ſhalt endeavour to lengthen out the war as long as thou canſt, and if thou couldeſt kill peace it ſelf it ſhould ſuffer, tranſfixed through the body with thy ſword, as the greateſt enemy of worthy actions. Thou ſhalt not hazard thy ſelf to go much among muſket-ſhots, unleſs thoſe muskets be charged with powder of Cypreſs, as an Authour of this time hath told us, where piſtolets were ſhot in ſtead of bullets.

5. Diſorder, Impunitie moſt diſſolute.

Trouble not thy ſelf to number up thy wounds; thou ſhalt ever more eaſily reckon them then thy crimes. As for that which concerneth the vice of impurity, I ordain no more limits to thy luſt, then health to thy reaſon. Heretofore men affected to become better, and a young Cavalier, who made love to a Ladie by the lawful ways of an honeſt marriage, ſhewed himſelf virtuous to be beloved, ſuch correſpondence was there then between love and virtue: men always endeavoured to lodge their affections in a good place, to become honeſt by the imitation of their loves, which is the moſt pleaſing way that may be found to innocency. All was treated with ſo much honour, that the leaſt ſpot of blame was apprehended much more then death: at this day matters go not ſo. If thou wilt follow the courſe of times, and the proceedings of Salmoneans, thy pleaſures ſhall be without order, as thy concupiſcence without meaſure: thou ſhalt make a Trophey of diſhonour, nor ſhalt thou have other ſcope in thy love, then vice; nor other means, but thoſe which thy bruitiſhneſs ſhall provide thee. Thou ſhalt make no difference between the bed of married, and that of virgins and women proſtitute; and when thou haſt ſeduced an unhappy maid, thou ſhalt vaunt it, as if thou hadſt gained a Citie.

6. Diſorder, Perpetual wickneſs.

For this purpoſe it is fit thou entertaineſt bravery, thy belly, and game, for theſe will be the furies moſt familiar to thy humour: thou ſhalt take the moſt coſtly ſtuffs out of the ſhops of Merchants, to cover the ſtench with gold and ſcarlet, and thou ſhalt hold all the beſt Artiſans in breath to ſerve thee. When thou muſt pay thy debts, thou ſhalt revenge benefits by force of injuries, and cloſe up thy infidelity with all ſorts of ingratitude. If thou haſt ſubjects, thou ſhalt uſe them like ſlaves, and govern them with all rigour, exerciſing violence on their bodies, and rapine on their goods: one ſhall feed thy dogs, the other thy horſes, the other thy ſervants, which ordinarily are petty Tartarians, whoſe inſolency foſtered by the Maſters and Lords, doth all which may be expected from a ſervil ſoul, that hath authority in its hands; yea, thou ſhalt endeavour to make good men believe, that what thou haſt done, is for their preſervation; as was ſaid to the poor ſhep-heard, from whom the ſacrifices of Hercules had more ſheep then would have ſerved an Army of wolves. Thy table, notwithſtanding the tears and neceſſities of the publick, ſhall ever be abundant in delicacies, and for thy recreation, thou ſhalt play thy gold with a ful hand, although it be the blood of ſo many men, to whom thou art beholden. Thou ſhalt be the chicken of the white hen; and needs muſt the riches of the wealthy, the induſtry of trades-men, the virtues of innocent, even hunger it ſelf, and the miſeries of the moſt wretched, be tributaries to thy riots.

7. Diſorder, Barbarouſneſs in government of thoſe under you.

1. Diſorder, Perfidiouſneſs.

Abominable manners.

I wiſh, that exteriourly thou appear with an open viſage, a ſmiling countenance, a very honeſt deportment; but be thou inwardly full of cauteries, and be thy heart always repleniſhed with more ſtains, then the moſt ſpotted skin of a Panther. Thou ſhalt ſell thy ſoul to ambition, and to advance thy fortune, ſhalt neither hearken to God, Angel, conſcience, nor virtue: thou ſhalt have no regard to the perſon either of father, mother, brother or ſiſter, but the meaſure of all thy amities ſhall be thy own intereſts. Thou muſt not think any thing unjuſt, when it ſhall be for thy own accommodation, nor be thou ſcrupulous in matter of conſcience; of what ſide ſoever profit accrew, it hath ever a good ſaviour. Thou ſhalt, to ſuit with the time, bear a minde more black then the abyſs; and to ruin an innocent, ſhalt not ſpare ſuch treacheries and treaſons as have heretofore been accounted moſt horrible: but the cuſtom of the age, which is ſo naturalized in vice, cauſeth that we now grow familiar with monſters. Thou ſhalt raiſe again out of all, if thou canſt; and let there not be a vice, that yields thee not tribute. Thy words ſhall be full of cunning, thy cunning of promiſes, and thy promiſes of winde. Finally, thou ſhalt live in Chriſtianity, as a Janizary at the Porta of the great Turk; and for recompence, when thou ſhalt end thy days, which cannot laſt very long, thou ſhalt directly go to the Paradiſe of Mahomet, with thoſe great lights, Sardanapalus, Epicurus, Bajazet, and Selymus.

Behold the infamous and pernicious diſcourſe, which this wicked Maſter held with this young man: wherein you may obſerve a true Satyre of the lives of many, who entitle themſelves Noble, although their manners are far worſe then theſe my words, and that the imagination of a writer cannot ſo much feign, but they in their profane actions will expreſs much more. Let us now behold the Palace of true Valour, and take an antidote againſt the poiſons of the times.

The third SECTION.

The Temple of Valour, and ſage Precepts, given by the Chriſtian Souldier, to refute the manners of theſe times. And firſt, that Piety helpeth Valour.

THe Souldier perſuing his way, entereth into the Temple of Valour, where, according to the excellent conceits of the painter before mentioned, he beholdeth on the frontiſpiece of the Palace a goodly tower of Chriſtal, adorned with lights, as the Globe of glaſs, in which the Perſians heretofore bare the image of the Sun: or elſe by the imitation of that huge Pharos of Alexandria, which enlightened the ſea on all ſides, to guide veſſels to a ſafe haven. This was expreſly ſet downe to ſignifie the great and divine lights of wiſdom, which are in a true Christian valour. This Palace seemed wholly built of Rocks, of the colour of Iron, streamed with little veins of bloud, which well shewed it was purposely done, to represent the invincible courage of the Pupils of this virtue. The Halls were all hanged with prowess and victories: and instead of columnes, it had great Statues of the most valorous men of the world, who flourished in the revolution of so many Ages. Valour bare sway within it, sitting, not on Gilly-flowers, or Roses, but encompassed with thorns and sufferings, ever armed, and still with Sword in hand, with which it cut off an infinite number of monsters, and chased away all Salmoneans from its house.

in

In this Palace was the brave Eleazar, who, as soon as he from far perceived this young Souldier, he caused him to draw near, and speak to him in these terms:

Son, I doubt not but you found at the entrance into my lodging a wicked Sorcerer, who hath by the ear empoysoned you: It is necessary you cleanse it, to make your self capable of the singular precepts of valour and wisdom, which I am now presently to afford you, seeing you for this cause are come hither into my Palace. It hath been told you, that to be a good souldier, you must become a little Cyclop, without any feeling of God, or Religion: for devotion were but to weaken your warlike humours. Those who have said this unto you, have told nothing new. It is an old song, which they have drawn out of Machiavel, who thinking to make a Prince, have made a wilde beast, and yet would perswade us it was a man: but those that believe it, are such only as bear their eys on their heels. Let us not serve our selves with this Philosophy of flesh, which maketh valour and devotion, as two things incompatible. Verily I go not about to require of you an affected, enforced, and ceremonious piety, that is out of the limits of your profession. I would have you a Souldier, and not a Monk: but assure you the prime virtue of art military, is to have good thoughts, and pure beliefs touching the Divinity; then to practice suitableness thereto by offices and exteriour actions of piety.

Refutation of the first disorder.

Piety the first virtue of a Souldier.

When I speak this, I am so strong in reasons, that I dare take our enemies themselves for Judges. Behold the subtile Machiavel, who upon the Decades of Titus Livius, sheweth Religion is an admirable instrument of all great actions, and that the Romans made use thereof to establish their City, pursue their enterprizes, and pacifie tumults and seditions, which rose in the revolution of State. Because it was (said he) more conscience to offend God then men, believing his power surpassed all humane things. So we see, that all those who would form, cherish, or advance a State, although they had no true Religion in their souls, have taken pretexts, as Lycurgus, Numa, Sertorius, Ismael the Persian, and Mahomet. I demand of you thereupon (my souldier) if by the testimony of this man, who hath made himself our adversary, false beliefs have had so much power upon minds, that they have rendred them more docible to virtue, more obedient to Sovereignty, more adventrous to undertake things difficult, more patient to tollerate matters displeasing, more couragious to surmount those which make opposition: if, I say, the sole imagination of a false Divinity, accounted to punish misdeeds and recompence valour with a temporal salary, was powerful enough to make Legions fly, all covered with iron, through so many perils; must we not say by the confession of our very enemy, that a true Religion, as ours is, which promiseth so many rewards to virtue, and punishments for crime, not for a time, but for all eternity, if it be once well engraven in hearts, shall produce so many worthy effects beyond those of other Sects, as truth is above lying, reality above nothing, and the sun above the shadows?

Reasons which shew, that true Piety is the soul of Military virtue. (Cap. 13, 11.

From whence think you do so many neglects grow, but from coldness in Religion? For how can a souldier but be valiant, when he is confidently perswaded, it is the will of the living God that he obey his Prince, as if he beheld a Divinity upon earth; and that burying himself in the duty of this obedience being well purified from his sins, he takes a most assured way to beatitude? How can he be but the more couragious, having received absolution of his sins by the virtue of the Sacrament, since by the Confession of all Sages, there is nothing so perplexed, so timorous, so inconstant, as a conscience troubled with the image of its own crimes? How should it spare a transitory life, having a firm belief of immortality, since the wisest have judged, that the valour of ancient Gauls, which was admired by the Romans, proceeded from no other source, but from a strong perswasion which the Druides had given them, touching the immortality of our souls? How could he be but most confident, if he stedfastly beheld the eye of the Divine Providence of God, perpetually vigilant for his protection? How could he be but most fervent, if he did but figure the Saviour of the world at the gates of Heaven with his hands full of rewards? See you not that all reasons combat for us, as well as experience?

I will not flatter Christians, under pretext that I call my self the Christian Knight, nor ought I to betray my cause under the shadow of modesty. Let all the ancient and modern Histories be read, let military acts be examined, and courages poized in a just ballance: I challenge the ablest Chronicler to present me any valour out of Greek or Roman History, where the most admirable prowesses are to be seen, that I do not shew them perpetually parallel'd, yea, surpassed by the courage of Christians. When I read those Histories of elder times, I behold Grecians that triumphed, for having quanquished Xerxes; who, to say the truth, was a Stag leading an army of Sheep: never was any thing seen so perplexed. And although there had been no opposition, yet was this great body composed of a lazy stupified army, only strong to ruine it self. I see a young Alexander, who, to speak truth, was of an excellent nature, though the most judicious observe great errour in his carriage, he oft-times being rash, & many times insolent: but it was well for him he had to do with such gross Novices, whose eys were dazled with the simple glimmer of a sword, for had he come to encounter the arms of Europe, his Laurels doubtless would have been seen to wax hoary in the Northern snows. I see the Roman Cæsars, who invade, or those which are already effeminated by their proper vice, or such as are wanderers, and dis-united, not to have an assured state to resist their enemies. My ears are perpetually filled with the acts of Cynogirus, who having both his hands cut off, bit the arms and ships of his enemies with his teeth; of one Otryades, who wrote his victory with his own blood; of one Sergius, who fought four times with the left hand, which Pliny observeth in his History, as a prodigy: of the one-eyed Horatius, who defended a bridge against the army of his enemies; of a Maid named Clelia, who passed over Tyber an horse-back; of one Sicinnius, that had been in fixscore combates, and bare away thirty six spoyls of his enemies, with five and fourty wounds at divers times. I will not extenuate their proweſs, nor take away from them the honour they deſerved: for to ſay there was no valour nor vigour in theſe ancient courages, were to proceed againſt common opinion. But we now adays ſee many Ariſtarchuſes in the world, who have ſpirits ſo retrograde, that when we ſpeak of bruit beaſts, they highly glorifie them above men, as if they were of the race of Ulyſſes his ſouldiers, who, as Fables tell us, were turned into Hogs: ſo when we come to compare the valour of Chriſtians with that of Infidels, they finde nothing, which on our part may give them content, ſo much have they either of malice, or ſtupidity.

The Acts of Pagans.

and

Proweſs of Chriſtians.

Let me dye, if in the ſole life of Captain Bayard, Warlike atchievements may not be obſerved, which in manage and valour ſurpaſs thoſe of Alexander's and Pompey's: and he that would number all the heroick actions which have been performed in our wars, ſometimes by ſilly Souldiers, ſometimes alſo by Chriſtian women, might as ſoon reckon the ſtars in the firmament. And had I now undertaken to make a ſimple enumeration of great Captains, which have flouriſhed in Chriſtendom, it would weary pens, fill books, and confound readers.

I would willingly know whether Conſtantine, going out of an Oratory where he prayed with the Biſhops, before he had ſo many battels, was leſs valiant againſt Maxentius, Maximianus, and Licinius? If Theodoſius in recommending himſelf ſo particularly to the prayers of Monks, have the leſs done his devoir againſt Maximus, and Eugenius? Whether Heraclius were the more remiſs for carrying the Image of our Bleſſed Lady in his hands, when he ſubdued Coſroes King of Perſia in three pitched battels? Whether Clodoveus did the leſs good, when he cauſed his ſtandards to march under the conduct of the prayers of S. Martin? Whether Charls Martel were weakened in his devotions, when at the only battel of Towers he cut in pieces three hundred threeſcore and fifteen thouſand Saracens, with the moſt hideous ſlaughter that ever was ſeen? Whether Charlemaign in being ſo firmly tyed to Altars, felt his arms to fail againſt the Lombards, Saxons, and Moors? Whether the Sword of Godfrey of Bevillon, after ſo many actions of piety, were the leſs keen, when it cleft the Barbarians at a blow, from the crown of the head to the girdle-ſtead, and gliſtered in azure all covered with rays of Palms and Laurels? Whether Beliſarius in being a good Catholick, did the leſs charge the Goths? And whether Simon Monfort in taking his Sword from the Altar, were the leſs dreadful to the Albigean Hereticks?

Aſſuredly there is nothing ſo ſtrong, nothing ſo invincible, nor triumphant, as a valour which marcheth under the laws of Chriſtian Religion. The Turkiſh Nation, which ſeemeth to be born to brandiſh the Sword, and to have ample tranſcendency in matters of Arms, feareth not ſo much the Perſian and Tartarian Standards, as the Banners of Chriſtians. And Baronius in an Epiſtle Dedicatory of his Annals, which he wrote to the Great Henry the Fourth of famous memory, obſerveth, That they hold it as a fatal Propheſie among them, that their Empire ſhall never be deſtroyed, unleſs it be by the hands of French-men. If they have obtained victories againſt Chriſtians in ſo many wars, it hath ever been our diviſions that have diſarmed us, our ambitions that have devoured us, our Apoſtata-brothers who have betrayed us, our Infidels who have acquainted them with our inventions, our induſtries, and arms, our mutual quarrels which have waſted us, our ſins that have chaſtiſed us, the hatred of a powerful God which hath excited the Saracens to purifie, under ſome colour of temperance and juſtice, thoſe lands which ours had defiled by ſo many ordures and ſacriledges, for otherwiſe there could not be any force in the world able to reſiſt Chriſtian Princes, were they well united.

We know it by the ſucceſs of the battel of Lepanto, and the proweſs of George Caſtriot, called Scanderbeg, who with a flying camp defeated ſeven Generals of the Turkiſh Army in ſeven great battels, wherein he ſlew two thouſand men with his own hand, and in the end made Amurath ſtark mad to ſee himſelf defied, beaten, and maimed by a petty Lord, and with ſo ſmall numbers. What could this brave courage have done, had it been aſſiſted with men, gold, and arms, anſwerable to his merits?

Are you not then very ridiculous, O Souldier, when to be accounted valiant, you play the Cyclop, and fear leſt devotion might weaken your courage? Accuſe not your Religion, for it is holy: accuſe not Devotion, for it is innocent. Rather accuſe your own impiety, your own neglect, your own unworthineſs of ſpirit, and your own baſeneſs: that is it which enfeebleth you, and cauſeth that you are only valiant to play the beaſt. No man loſeth courage, but he that never had it, and no man hath it, if he beg it not of the true God of hoſts. Where ſhould we ſeek for light but of the Sun; for waters, but in rivers; and heat, but in fire? And where think you to finde true ſtrength, but with the God of the ſtrong? The more you ſhall be united to him, the more able you ſhall be; not that he will ever give you ſtrength of body, as to Milo, that you may bear an Oxe; but in ſerving him, you ſhall have from him the courage of a man, who hath his root in reaſon, his encreaſe in piety, and his crown in true glory.

The fourth SECTION.

Manifeſt proofs which declare, that Piety and Valour are not things incompatible.

IT is an intollerable thing to ſee certain young Roarers, who think to make themſelves eſteemed valiant by profeſſion of impiety, and have, as it were, but one ſhame, which is, not to be ſhameleſs at all, as if we had never ſeen, nor as yet was ever heard in the world, of Souldiers furniſhed before God and men with great and divine virtues, who fail not to be as couragious as Lions. Let us not ſearch out Saints of the Martyrologe, let us only behold among a thouſand, one man, whoſe life was very lately printed, written in a low ſtyle, I mean the Marſhal Boucicaut, who flouriſhed in France under Charles the Sixth. Theſe petty Rodomonts, who make boaſt of Duels, meer cowardiſe covered with an opinion of courage, durſt not behold this Captain, without doing that which heretofore was done to the ſtatues of the Sun, that is, to put finger on the mouth and admire. For, not to ſpeak of his other acts of proweſs, it is he who was preſent at that furious battel, wherein Bajazet the Turkiſh Emperour, waged war againſt the King of Hungary; where there were many French men, the Duke of Burgundy, then called the Count of Nevers, being there in perſon.

Monſieur Godfrey hath publiſhed this written by an ancient Author.

The Marſhal Boucicaut.

The hiſtory ſaith, that the Turk coming to fight with dreadful forces, began ſo furious a charge, the air being thickened with a black cloud of Arrows, that the Hungarians, who were reputed good Souldiers, much trembled at this aſſault, and fled away away. The French, who ever had learned in all battels to vanquish, or die, unwilling so much as to hear any speech of the name of flight, pressed into the Turkish Army, notwithstanding the stakes and piles fixed in the earth to serve as hindrances, and attended by some other troups, brake the Vanguard of the Turks by the counsel and example of the brave Marshal, whereat Bajazet much amazed, was ready to retire, at which time it was told him, there was but a very little handful of French-men, who made the greatest resistance, and that it were best to assault them. He, who kept his Battalions very fresh, returneth and came to fall upon these poor souldiers, now extremely tired. Never did angry Lion exercise such violent force amongst the javelins of hunters, as was then the proweſs which shined in this generous Captain. For, he having no further purpose but to sel his own life, and those of his companions, as dear as he could, so neglegently betrayed, he with the French Cavalry, and some few other people who stuck to him, did such feats of arms, that it was thought twenty thousand Turks were slain in the place. In the end, this prodigious multitude, able to weary out the most hardy, although it had been but to cut them to pieces, did so nearly encompass our French, that the Count Nevers, with Marshal Boucicaut, and the most worthy personages, were taken prisoners.

Piety and Valour of a French Souldier.

Horrible spectacle.

The next day after this dismal battel, Bajazet sitting under a Pavillion spred for him in the field, caused the prisoners to be brought before him, to drench himself in bloud and vengeance, which he so passionately loved.

Never was spectacle seen more worthy of compassion: the poor Lords, who had done wonders in arms able to move Tigers, were led, as it were, half naked, straitly bound with coards and fetters: no regard being had neither to their bloud, which was noble, nor youth, which was pitiful, nor their behaviour, most ravishing; these Saracens, ugly and horrible as divels, set them before the face of the Tyrant; who in the wink of an eye, caused their throats to be cut at his feet, as if he meant to carrouse their bloud.

The Count Nevers, with two other Counts of Ewe and Marche, had now their heads under the symitar, and their lives hung, but, as it were, at a thread, when Bajazet having heard by his interpreters, that they were near kinsmen to the King of France, caused them to be reserved, commanding they should sit on the ground at his feet, where they were enforced to behold the lamentable butchery of their Nobility.

The valiant Marshal Boucicaut in his turn was produced, covered with a little linnen cloth, to massacre him over the bodies of so many valiant men. He, who was wise, and particularly inspired by God in this extremity, made a sign with his fingers before Bajazet, who understood not his language, as if he would declare himself the kinsman of the Count of Nervers, who beheld him with an eye so pitiful, that it was of power to rent rocky hearts. Bajazet being perswaded by this sign, that he was of the bloud-royal, caused him to be set apart to remain a prisoner; where he afterward by his great prudence, endeavoured the liberty of those noble Gentlemen, and his own. I cannot think these petty Novices of war will compare themselves to the valour of this man, accomplished with such heroick proweſs.

Piety of a Souldier.

Let us come, if it please you, to consider him at leisure, whether he were of the number of those who profess themselves wicked, that they may seem valiant. He was a man, who in time of peace, whilest he governed the City of Genoa, daily heard two Masses, with so exemplar devotion, that he never suffered any man to speak to him in the Church, where he said the Office with singular attention, for which he so accommodated his company, that you should never see the least action of uncomelineſs in Divine Service, which he did not severely punish. But the Historian addeth, that who had beheld his people at Mass, would rather think he saw religious men, then Souldiers. Noblemen are of power to bend their families to what they please, were it not that through softness of spirit, they many times give way to the Torrent, and contenting themselves to be good, make all the rest nought by the easineſs of their natures. I speak not hear to you of a Canonical Saint, a Hermit, a Religious man, a Priest; I speak of a Marshal of France, of a most ardent Warriour.

Notable devotion of a Souldier.

Behold, I pray, whether piety be incompatible with arms. This brave Captain happily made his Will, disposing of all his devotions, his affairs, and charge: each day he executed some part hereof, doing all the good he could during his life, not expecting the casual portions of others piety, as those, who cause the torch to be carried behind, to light them when they have lost their eys, and indeed never do well, but when they are in a condition to be able to do no more. The charitable Lord informed himself very particularly of the necessities of the bashful poor, set their names down in his Regisiters, as the rarest pieces of his Cabinet, appointed on every side his alms to poor Religious, to Widows, to Orphans, to needy Souldiers, namely those, who through inability of old age and sickneſs, could labour no more. He visited Hospitals, giving according to his means, round summs of money to furnish and accommodate them: if he walked in the streets, he ever had charity in his hands, that himself might give all he could, for he therein took a singular contentment, and never was seen to be so merry, as when he had distributed good store of money; this was his hunting, his game, his delight.

He bare a singular devotion towards the Friday, in memory of the passion of our Saviour; and whileſt he was able, did eat nothing on that day but fruits & pulse, abstaining from all which participated of the life of beasts; and cloathed himself likewise with a most simple habit, desirous to shew exteriourly some tast of the reverence we owe to the bloud of the Son of God. Besides abstinences commanded, he ordinarily fasted the Saturday, which is dedicated to the memory of the Blesſed Virgin. He never fed at his repast but on one dish, and though he had great quantity of silver vessels, he caused himself to be served in Pewter, and earth, being glorious in publick, and in his particular, an enemy of worldly pomps and vanities.

I leave you to think, how much this kinde of life is alienated from the curious Nobility, to whom we must daily give so many priviledges and dispensations, that it seems, it is for their sakes needful to create another Christendom, besides that which hath been established by the Son of God. A man would say, to see how they pamper their bodies, they were descended from Heaven, and that thither they should return, not passing through the sepulcher, for they deifie it, and to satten and gild a dung-hil covered with Snow, sport with the bloud and sweat of men.

Sage government of a family.

Superfluity of tast being so well represſed, all went in true measure in the house of this good Marshal: his Retinue was very well entertained according to his quality, and he had a very solemn custom by him religiously observed, which was speedily to pay his debts,

To pay his debts.

debts, and as much as he might possible to be engaged to none. It is no small virtue, nor of sleight importance, if we consider the Nobility at this time, so easily ingulphed in great labyrinths of debts, which daily encrease like huge balls of Snow that fall from Mountains, and which require Ages and golden Mines to discharge them.

Is it not a most inexcusable cruelty before God and men, to see a busie Merchant, a needy Artificer, every day to multiply his journeys and steps before the Gate of a Lord, or a Lady, who bear his sweat and bloud in the pleyts of their Garments? And in stead of giving some satisfaction upon his most just requests, it is told him he is an importunate fellow, and he many times menaced with bastonadoes, if he desist not to demand his own. Is not this to live like a Tartarian? Is not this to degrade one's self from Nobility, Christianity, and Reason? Is not this to thrust the knife into the throat of houses and entire families? Alledge not unto me, that it is impossible for you to pay at that time what is demanded. Why, well foreseeing your own impotency, have you heaped up debts, which cannot be discharged? Why do you not rather admit the lessening of your Port? Why cut you not off so many superfluous things? Are not your sins odious enough before God, but you must encrease them with the marrow of the poor? From hence ariseth the contempt of your persons, the hatred of your name, the breaches and ruines of your houses.

A singular discretion.

This man in well paying his debts, was served and respected of Officers, like a little Deity; there was no need to doubt, nor to make a false step into his house. Never would he suffer a vice, or a bad servant, were it to gain an Empire. Blasphemies, oaths, lyes, slanders, games, quarrels, and such like ordures, were banished from his Palace, as Monsters; and if he found any of his family in fault, he dismissed them, lest they should infect the other: yet not scandalizing them, nor divulging their offences. At the table he spake little, and did voluntarily entertain himself with examples of virtues in the lives of Noblemen, not opening his mouth to discourse of his own proper acts, but with singular sobriety.

In his marriage he demeaned himself most chastly, and had such a horrour against impurity, that he would not so much as keep a servant who had a lustful eye. Behold the cause, why passing one day on horse-back through the streets of the City of Genoa, as a Lady presented her self at her window to comb her hair, and one of the Gentlewomen of the Marshals train, seeing her tresses very bright and beautiful, cried out, Oh what a goodly head of hair! Staying to behold her, the Lord looked back on him with a severe eye, saying; It is not well done, it is not fit, that from the house of a Governour, a wanton eye should be seen to glance.

In this point and all the rest which concerned the commerce and repose of Citizens, he rendered so prompt and exact justice, that it was a Proverb amongst those of Genoa, when any one was offended, to say to him who had wronged him: If you will not right me, my Lord Marshal will. The other understanding it, oft-times rather chose to submit himself to right, then expect a condemnation which was inevitable. He so by this means gained the good opinion of the people, that the inhabitants of the City sent to the King, beseeching he might continue the government to the end of his days: which having obtained, it seemed to them, they had drawn an Angel from Heaven, to fix him at the stern of their Common-wealth.

At the time that the Emperour of Constantinople, then dispossessed of one part of his Empire by the great Turk, came into France to demand succour, and had obtained of the King twelve hundred men, defrayed for a year: many Widow-Ladies were seen at the Court, who complained of injustices and oppressions by them endured after the death of their husbands; whereby this good Marshal was so moved with compassion, that with much freedom he instituted an Order of Knights for the defence of afflicted Ladies, which he surnamed The Order of the white Lady, because they who made profession of it bare a scutchion of gold enamelled with green, and thereon the figure of a Lady in colour white: thus fought he by all occasions to do good, and shewed himself a great enemy of idleness, the very moth of minds.

He ordinarily rose early in the morning, and spent about three hours in Prayer and Divine Service: at the end whereof he went to Council, which lasted till Dinner-time. After his repast, he gave audience to all those, who would speak with him upon their affairs, not failing to behold his Hall daily full of people, whom he speedily dispatched, contenting every one with answers sweet and reasonable: from thence he retired to write Letters, and to give that order to his Officers, which his pleasure was should be observed in every affair: and if he had no other employment, he went to Vespers. At his return he took some pains, then finishing the rest of his office, ended the day. The Sundays and Holy-days either he went on foot in some pilgrimage of devotion, or caused the life of Saints, or other victories to be read, daily more and more to dispose his manners unto virtue. When he marched in the field, he had an admirable way, not to oppress any of his company; nor would he permit, even in the land of an enemy, that the least disturbance should be given to Ecclesiasticks.

Behold you not here a life worthy of a French Cavalier? Oh Nobility, this man was not a petty Royster, who makes boast to fight in a Meadow: but a souldier, who during the wars with the English, kept the field of battel three times, thirty days together, against those brave souldiers who would oppose him, from whence he went out all sparkling with glory and wonders.

I would here willingly add a Bertrand of Gueselin, Count of Longuevil, and Constable of France, whose life Monsieur Menard hath given us, written by a Pen of that ancient Age, in old language: you shall see a man, who after he had solemnly dedicated in the offertory of a Mass, his soul, body, and arms at the Altars, fought six or seven times hand to hand, exercised strange feats of battel and arms; stood in the midst of combates, bold, and confident as in his chamber, being otherwise furious, strong, and stout in the press. You should see a man sage in counsels, prompt in execution, whom an enemy found near at hand when he thought him thirty leagues of. A man in all things else free from fraud or dissimulation, chearful, courteous, obliging, and liberal of his own, imploying his moveables and the jewels of his wife for relief of poor souldiers. Then you may judge, whether to be valiant, you may live in the Court of a Christian Prince like a little Turk. Where is your judgment? and where your reason?

The fifth SECTION.

Against Duels.

A condemnation of Rodomontades and Duels.

I Do assure my self some will not forget to tell you, that to be valiant men of the times, you must be outragious in slanders, in blaspemies, in audacious words, in duels, challenges, which are the mighty valours of this age. Well then, my souldier, following this course, you will learn to swear and blaspheme. I speak not how great this crime is, nor how much you render your tongue punishable in disposing it to this language of Devils. But I will say one thing, which is very certain, those which seek for glory out of vice, have not always been made eminently prosperous. All you may do in purchasing Hell by these execrable oaths, will be to acquire the goodly qualities of a base Clown.

Authours of Duels.

And as concerning Duels, I undoubtedly hold, that if this infamous souldier, who hath abused you, were willing to speak the truth, which his conscience will dictate to him, he rather gives it you for an honest coverture of cowardice, then for true valour. The world is not so doltish as to measure courage by the model of Moors, slaves, and horse-boys, who were the first executours of these butcheries. How can you perswade us that a confused mass of these petty Mutiniers, who have nothing else in their mouths but these duels, may be valiant men? We are not so ignorant, but that we well know courage never makes good alliance with servitude and effeminacy. But the most part of this kinde of men, are servile spirits, who submit to an infinite number of shameful and tyrannical laws, for a little smoak.

Lazines.

They are bodies withered with lazines, who are many times entangled in their garters, and stand in need to have rings for winter and summer, to change according to the seasons. They fear the Lancet of the Chyrurgeon, they cry out aloud for a sleight Fever, and will needs be tended like women in Child-bed: Imagine with your self, what valour can be herein. Were they beaten and stampt into powder in a Morter, a hundred of such like Rodomonts would not make up one half ounce of warlike fortitude. But there is a little despair and rage, which boileth in a passionate heart, to counterfeit virtue. God forbid, we should take chaff for gold, hemlock for parsley, or an ape for a man. We know valour, by report of great Captains, resteth in mature deliberation and coolnes, as in its true element. When I behold one of these silly braggards, who hasteneth to the field for a base fear of some shame, or upon some liver-heat which tormenteth him, I make as much reckoning of it, as if I saw an angry Hen. Do you think Sichem was a couragious man for enduring to be circumcised for the love of Dinah? My opinion is, it was an act of much cowardice to permit himself to be cut with a Razor in the most shameful part of his body, to please a silly female Jew, who when it was done, had great cause to turn this painful Sacrifice into scorn and laughter. This poor Courtier to satisfie a wily wench, for a fooliish imagination of point of honour, hasteneth to be cut in pieces in the field: unhappy man, he thinketh to marry Dinah, and findes Proserpina; he proposeth to himself a worldly glory, that may rank him in the number of the valiant, and meeteth a bloudy death, which at one blow killeth body and soul. Let me dye, if it be not the poorest thing to behold them in such adventures. For if one did see them, they would make those burst with laughing at their idleness, who were willing to bemoan their misery. I have drawn from this massacre, such as were more amazed then a bridled Goose, and more ghastly then a dead man four days after his Funeral, taken from his Sepulcher. These silly creatures endured all this to make a wretched bruit run up and down in Paris, that they were in the end beaten, and had with so many cold sweats of deaths done that, which their Lackeys, who are somewhat more stupid, would a hundred times with more willingness of heart have undertaken. Behold you not who is worthy either of compassion, or contempt? Yet you flatter them with a pretext of courage, which you enforce them to purchase at a costly rate. When you applaud such actions, and tell how brave a combate was performed behind the Charter-house, and that both of them came thither with much resolution, you are men guilty of blood: it should suffice you to have your judgments so dull in the estimation which ought to be made upon valour, without rendering your tongues so tragical. Their trembling swords would become very lazy to consummate the mysteries of furies, if your words armed not despair to play out the rest of the Game.

Juvenal. 1. h 1. Satyr.

Perhaps you will say, you know those who have fought duels; who, notwithstanding were valiant in Armies, I deny not this I affirm not that a valiant man cannot fight a duel; but I deny that he is valiant for fighting a duel. David had been an Adulterer, and became a Saint; but it is not for having been an adulterer, that he was a Saint; nor shall any one have the reputation of valour among understanding men, for committing a crime. For if this Duel were ever an infallible mark of courage, I demand wherefore have we seen those, who have shewed themselves most importunate to provoke others to combat, most fiery to hasten thither, most factious to be herein opinionative, and in the mean time, when they came to bear arms, where they must witness true valour for the service of their Prince, such encounters have happened, that they so despairingly ran off, that they have passed through Forrests two leagues over, and not seen a tree, so much affrighted they were. It is not necessary to name them, happily they are already too much renowned in the Histories of the times. And yet you will make much account of these goodly swash-bucklers.

Courage of Duellers like to that of the possessed.

Assure your self the most part of those, who shew such boyling fury in these barbarous acts, are as Lunaticks possessed with an evil spirit. You would be amazed to see a little girle so strong, that there must be twenty men to hold her. From whence, I pray, hath she this force, but that she hath the Devil in her body? And tell me, a young gentleman, who many times hath father, mother, wife, children, honours, riches, pleasures in his life, would he go upon cold bloud to deprive himself of all this? Would he contemn the sacred Edicts of his Prince, now very lately renewed by the zeal of our great Monarch? Would he descend with open eys into Hell, if he had not some black spirit of the Abyss, which dreggeth him to the last mischief? He doth that for a cold countenance, an extravagant word, and a caprich of spirit, which he would not either for God, the King, or the whole world. We may well say, this is the malady of inferiour houses, and you take it for valour? A poor cocks-comb forsooth, called a second, who putteth into compromise at the discretion of a crack't brain, all that which is most dear unto him in this world, and what he hopeth in the other going to be the Victim of death, or the murderer of a man, whom he never saw, nor knew, or by he have seen or known him, so far as to love or honour him, would he play all this goodly prize, if he were not possessed with an evil spirit? Yet you admire this. Why do you not rather wonder at the countenances, the twinges, and distorted mowings of the possessed?

I begin to perswade you to reason (say you my Gallant:) you are an enemy of this race of Cadmus, derived from the teeth of serpents, and think not these petty wranglers of the times, with all their letters and challenges have any valour: but if a brave spirit be urged to fight by such kinde of men, should he refuse it? Verily there are main differences in duels, in the causes which make them, and the proceedings of such as execute them. If you must needs go to duel, pass thereunto, as David, in sight of an Army, with permission of your Prince or your Captain, against some Goliah, who hath defied you. Go thither with intention to defend the honour of your Nation, and to weaken the contrary faction. Behold who is worthy. If you must go to duel, go thither when your King or Lord shall command you to accept the combat, to end some notable war, and stay a great effusion of blood, but by the hazard of two Champions. Behold who is glorious. But if you hasten thither upon some chimera of spirit, which you call by the name of honour, upon some ambiguous word, to which you frame an interpretation against your self, for a cold countenance, a surly brow, for a desire which you have to become pledge of the sollies of some fellow, witless, and a slave to his own passions; if you hasten thither for the love of some unchaste woman, to whome you sacrifice humane blood, how can you be excusable? For if you tell me your honour is more precious unto you then your wealth and life, and therefore, that as the law of nature permitteth you to defend both your riches and body at the point of your sword, against a robber and a homicide, from whom you cannot otherwise dis-engage your self, you have the same right for the defence of your reputation, which is in man as the apple in the eie. I answer, that being so surprized upon the sudden by some assailant, who provoketh you, threatneth you, and thrusteth his sword into your sides, if you use not a lawful defence, it is not then said that you are bound to flie, with some kind of ignominy. Nay, I will say besides, that if true honour were interessed in refusal of a challenge, he that should accept it, might likewise according to the laws of conscience seem somewhat tollerable: but from whom ought we to derive this estimation, and judgement of true honour? It is from certain sleight braggards, and witless people, who have sold themselves to passion, eternally to renounce prudence? Behold goodly Judges of honour: behold who well deserveth to prescribe unto us the rule & price of the most precious thing in the world.

If we desired sincerely to establish the judgement to be made of the point of honour, we ought to search into the resolutions of the Church and Civilians: but these kinde of people are suspected by you, as being alienated from the profession of arms. Let us enquire it in the mouthes of warriours. Was there ever a braver souldier then the late King of most famous memory? And hath there likewise ever been a Prince more dexterous in arms, and more fortunate then he that now reigneth? Since their Edicts condemn duels, both in those who challenge, and such as are challenged, although much different in their proceedings, what do we need any other judgement to decide the point of honour? But Kings and Princes sovereign (say you) notwithstanding their Edicts, approve those by word of mouth, who shew courage in such like actions. Who dare reproach them with this? Who dare tell them to their faces, that they bely their Edicts by their particular judgements? Who sees not such words are purposely invented by those men, who seek for pretexts to their false liberties? Why these Edicts, dictated by reason, agreed unto with judgement, supported by justice, provoked by piety; to the writing of which, Jesus Christ would contribute his own blood, to spare the blood, and with it the souls of so many, as are lost, and whom to save, he gave up his own life? Where shall we learn the rule of honour, the judgement, and will of the Prince, but in Oracles and virtues, which he hath consigned to the memory of all Ages? I intreat you, trouble my head no more with these dastardly combats and detestable massacres; let this be no longer, but for the infamous and melancholy blood-thirsters. One Bachet, understanding that a Turkish Captain had called his companion into a duel, What, saith he, are there no more Christians? And have not we cause to say, Are there no Saracens nor Moors, and other Infidels, to turn the edge of the sword against our entrails?

The sixth SECTION.

Against the ill mannage of Arms.

FRom hence it is likewise, that you are taught in time of war to play the little Cannibal in arms, and to cast nothing but fire and blood from your throat, that menaces may march before you, and havock and desolation after. Barbarous as you are, do you think because you have a sword by your side, you are therefore a Master over the life and blood of mortals? Never was Iron drawn out of the entrails of the earth, but either against wilde beasts, or men who are worse then beasts, and you employ it to torment innocent people, whom you ought to protect under your wings. It is a strange thing, that men who are made for the support of men, and who are not strong but for defence of the feeble, are now adays more pernicious then wolves, hail, serpents, inundations, fire, plagues, and famins. Behold that which maketh warfare odious, behold that which disgraceth an honourable profession, behold that which powreth upon the heads of Great ones, who countenance such actions, the cups of Gods anger, mingled with gaul, worm-wood, and poison of Dragons.

The tears of poor labourers, widdows, and orphans, which are enforced by those who entitle themselves friends, with cruelties that would justifie the Saracens and Moors, cease not to mount to the Throne of God, to ask vengeance on those, who, to satisfie their ambitions, glut their appetites, and fish in troubled waters, enkindling wars intestine, temerarious, and unjust, not regarding the disorders, which ordinarily arise from these wicked counsels. Oh God! it is a very great matter, that a man can make a hundred thousand swords to be unsheathed in an instant, which have no eys to see where they strick, nor hands to pul them back, when they once have received motion. That a man, who hath but one life, should expiate so many deaths, so many violences, so many outrages, as are committed by the unbridled souldiers! Much courage must be necessarily used, to make military discipline be observed, and if these furious corruptions cannot be hindred, it were better to abandon the charges and commands, then to cement them up with the blood charges and commands, then to cement them up with the bloud and tears of so many miserable Sacrifices.

Justice of Belisarius and Aurelianus.

The brave Belisarius, who was one of the most excellent Captains in the world, having caused two Souldiers to be empaled for some crime, seeing others to murmure at it: 'Know (saith he) I am 'come to fight with the Arms of Religion and Justice, without which we can expect neither Victory, nor happiness. I desire my Souldiers should 'have their hands clean to kill an enemy. Never 'will I suffer any man in mine Army, that hath fingers crooked, or bloudy, were he in Arms as terrible as lightening. Force is of no worth, if it Procop. l. 1. de bello Vandal. 'have not equity for companion. Hear a Souldier speak. He might perhaps have learned the same lesson from the Emperour Aurelian, who wrote to Vopisc. in Aurel. one of his Leiutenants: 'My friend, If thou wilt 'be a Captain, nay, if thou wilt live, contain thy 'Souldiers in their duty. I would not that a Peasant 'should so much as complain that he hath been 'wronged in the value of a chicken, nor that any 'hath taken a grape from his Vine without his permission. I will make him give an account even to 'a grain of Salt, or a drop of Oyl unjustly exacted. 'I desire my Souldiers should be rich with spoyls of 'enemies, and not the tears of my subjects. I would 'have them carry their riches upon their Swords, 'not into their Cabins. I would have them chast in 'the houses of their Hosts, and that there be no 'speech of any quarrels.

Excellent discipline.

And is not that strange which Marcus Scaurus writeth, that there have been seen Regiments encamped round about a great Tree laden with fruit, and the Souldiers to depart the next morning, not doing so much wrong, as to take one Apple from the Master of the Place? And who would not be amazed at that which Lampridius speaketh of Alexander Severus, that his Souldiers marched to the Persian war, like Senatours, and that the Country-peasants loved them as their brothers, and honoured their Emperour as a God? Is it not a shameful thing, that Infidels must teach us a lesson of modesty, and that this Alexander, who had learned a lesson from Christians, which was, not to do that to another, which we would not have done to our selves, observed it so exactly even in the liberty of Arms, that he thereby became, as it were, adored by his subjects? And in the mean time we behold Gentlemen, who never having wanted good precepts, exercise tyrannies on their subjects, both in peace, and war, such as Scythians and Arabians would abhor to do. War cannot now adays be made, but that it seems Attila with his Army is raised up, once more to pillage France. It is not enemies they seek to surprize, but purses; and they are ever criminal enough, who have some, though but small wealth to lose. I know not where to seek for his unhappiness, to finde it in its source. The Souldier excuseth himself upon necessity, the Captain complaineth of payment, the one filcheth, and the other quarrelleth, whilest the disorder is immortal.

O brave and valorous Cavaliers, ought not you herein to second the good intentions of our great King, and banish such infamies, not only from France, but even from the memory of men? If you desire to see how you are to bear your self in war: I will not go about to seek out a Saint Martin for you; Behold a man, whose life not long since hath been published, to serve as a model for the Nobility: we yet touch him, as it were, with a finger; for he died under the reign of Francis the First, having served three Kings in their Armies the space of two and thirty years, It is the valiant Terrail, otherwise called Chevalier Bayard, born in Daulphine. I willingly make use of his example, both because one of our most warlike Kings, the son of Francis the First, would needs be knighted by his hand, to witness the honour he bare to his valour, as also, for that I see therein many noble passages, which tast of the virtue of a true French Souldier. He was a Military virtues of a brave French Souldier. couragious Captain, of excellent direction, valiant, and magnanimous, of whom was said, that he had the assault of a wilde Bull, the defence of the Bore, and flight of the Wolf. I set aside his warlike deeds, I take some of his virtues, which I here will make use of. This Royal courage had no other aim in arms, but the glory of God, the service of his Prince, the honour of his profession; whereof we have an ample testimony in a short Elogy, which his Secretary made upon him, saying; That after these two and thirty years service, he died almost as poor as he was born. Much is spoken herein, and I think Bayard more glorious under this title, then if he had born the Dutchy of Milan on his back. He had the true piety of a good Souldier: for every morning he prayed to God most devoutly, and would not permit any man should enter into his Chamber during the time of his devotions: he was so obedient to those who commanded in the Army, that he never refused any Commission imposed upon him. Yea, well fore seeing that the last charge enjoyned him by the Admiral Bonnivet, was most dangerous, and, as it were impossible; yet he went thither, sacrificing his life to the commandments of the Lieutenant of his Prince, that he might not digress from his ordinary custom. There was he slain by the most generous manner of death that might happen to any Captain of his quality. He was a Lion in arms, who with a choice company of men, selected by him, and trained to this profession, wrought such admirable effects, that there was not any battel won, of which he was not ever the principal cause. Never was any man more terrible to an enemy in the conflict, but out of it, it was said, he was one of the most affable and courteous men of the earth. He was so ill a flatterer of great men, that to gain a Kingdom he would not be drawn to speak any thing but reason. His practice was to honour the virtuous, speak little of the vitious, less also of his own deeds of arms, never to swear, do favours to all who required, as willingly as if himself were to receive the benefit, to give secret alms according to his ability, in such sort, that it is written, that he, besides his other acts of piety, married at the least a hundred young Maids. Behold, of what elements his soul was inwardly composed.

As for the manner of his carriage in the war, he Marvellous contempt of money. as little cared for money as the dirt of the earth, and desired not to have any, but to give. Witness an act of great liberality, which is related of him. He by fair law of arms, took a Spanish Treasurer, who carried with him fifteen thousand Duckets; one of his Captains named Tardieu, swore, enraged with choller, that he would have part of the booty, because he was in the expedition. This good Captain smiling, sayd to him: 'It is true, you were of the enter-'prize, but are not to share in the booty: and, were 'it so, you are under my charge, I therefore will 'give what I think good. This man entered into a more violent fury, and went to complain to the General, who, having well considered the business, adjudged it wholly to Bayard. He caused his Duckets to be carried to a place of safety, and commanded them to be spred on a table, in presence of all his people, saying to them: Companions what think you? Do you not here behold fine Duckets? Poor Tardieu, who had been put by his pretensions, by expres sentence of his Captains, looked on this money with a jealous eye, and sayd: 'If he had the half of it, he 'would all his life be an honest man. Doth that de- 'pend on this? (saith this brave Spirit) Hold, I wil- 'lingly give that, which you by force could never 'obtain: And so caused at the same instant seven thousand five hundred Duckets to be told out to him. The other, who in the beginning, thought it was but a meer mockery, when he saw it to be in good earnest, and himself in possession of that he desired, he cast himself on both his knees at the feet of Bayard, having abundant tears of joy in his eys, and cried out: 'Alas! my Master, my friend, you 'have surpassed the liberality of Alexander, how 'shall I ever be able to acknowledge the benefit, 'which I at this time do receive at your hands: 'Hold your peace (said this incomparable man) if 'I had power I would do much more. And thereup- on causing all the Souldiers of the Garrison to be called, he distributed the rest of the Duckets, not keeping one sole Denier for his own use.

I ask of you whether this were not a heart of pearl, wherein there could not one least blemish of avarice be found? Yea, also when he passed through the Country, even in a land of conquest, he paid his expence, And one saying unto him; 'Sir, 'This money is lost; for at your departure from 'hence, they will set this place on fire. He answered, 'Sirs, I do what I ought, God hath not put me into 'the world, to live by rapine.

An excellent act of Chevalier Bayard.

Pursuing this discourse, he did an act at the taking of Bressia, a City of Italy, for ever memorable, which I will here deduce, as it were, in the same terms as it is couched in his History. Which is, that being set in the head of the Perdues, he first entered and pas- sed the Rampire, where he was grievously hurt in the top of his thigh with the thrust of a Pike, so that the iron stuck in the wound: he nothing terrified, said to Captain Molard; 'I am slain, but it is no 'matter, let your men march confidently, the Town 'is won.' Hereupon two Souldiers bare him out of the throng, and seeing the wound streamed forth much blood, they pulled off their shirts, and rent them, to binde up his thigh: then in the first house they hit upon, they took a little door off the hinges, and laid their poor Captain upon it, to bear him the more easily. From thence they went directly to a great house, which they supposed to be very conve- nient for his accommodation. It belonged to an ho- nest Gentleman, who was retired into a Monastery to avoid the fury of Souldiers: for the sackage of this City was so dreadful, that they were reckoned, as well of Venetians who defended it, as Burgesses, to the number of twenty thousand slain. The Lady stayed in this house with two fair daughters; who had hidden themselves in a Barn under hay. As they knocked at the gate, the mother arming her self with resolution, openeth it, and beholdeth a Captain all bloody, born upon this plank, who presently set Guards about his lodging, and demanded a place to retire unto. The Lady leadeth him into the faires chamber, where she cast her self at his feet, and said: 'Sir, I offer this house unto you, and all within it, 'for I well know it is yours by the law of arms. I 'only beg of you, you will be pleased to save me, 'and mine honour; as also of two poor Maids rea- 'dy to marry, which my husband and I have had 'between us. The Captain answered: Madam, I do 'not know whether I shall escape this wound, or 'no; but I faithfully promise you whilest I live, 'there shall be no injury done to you, nor your 'daughters, no more then to mine own person. On- 'ly keep them in your chamber, and let them not 'be seen: send for your husband, and assure your 'self you have a guest, who will do you all courtesie 'possible. The Lady much comforted to hear him speak in that manner, obeyed, and employed all her care to give him good entertainment. She pre- sently perceived she had lodged an honest man, when she saw the Duke of Namurs, the brave Gas- ton de Foix, Genetal of the Army, come daily to visit him, and that these men in a City of conquest, spake of paying for all they had taken. The good Hostess waited on him, as on an Angel of Heaven, so much honour and virtue saw she to shine in him. When he was cured, and that he spake of dis-lodg- ing, to be present at the battel of Ravenna, where his General passionately desired him, the Lady, who accounted her self as his prisoner, with her husband and children, considering if her guest would rigo- rously use her, he might draw ten or twelve thou- sand crowns from her, resolved to give him a pre- sent, and coming into his chamber with a servant of hers, who carried a little steel box, she presently threw her self at his feet, but he readily raised her up again, not suffering she should speak one word, till she was seated by him: at which time she made this speech, wel observed by the Secretary of Bayard.

SIR, The favour which God ha's afforded me in the taking of this City, by sending you into this house, which is wholly yours, hath not been less, then the preservation of the life of my husband, mine own, and that of my daughters, with their ho- nour, which they ought to esteem more precious then life. Besides, your people have lived with such temper here in my house, that being not able to complain of any injurie, I have cause for ever to commend their modesty. Sir, I am not so ignorant of the con- dition, whereunto the misery of war hath reduced us, as not ve- ry well to see, that my husband, my self, and children, are your Prisoners, and that all the goods in the house are at your di- scretion, to be disposed of to your liking. But knowing the no- blenes of your heart, which is incomparable, I am come most humbly to beseech you, to take pitty on your poor captives, and to use us according to your accustomed liberality. Behold a poor present which we offer, entreating it may be acceptable. In speaking this, she took the box out of the hands of her ser- vant, and opened it before the good Captaine, who saw it to be full of fair Duckets, at which he smiled, replying: Madame how many Duckets are there in this box? The poor woman, who thought this smile proceeded from some dis- contentment, answered: There is in it but two thousand five hundred, but if you be not satisfied, we will finde more. Nay Madame, replied the Captaine, I can well assure you, that should you give me an hundred thousand crowns, you could not do me so much good, as you have done in the courteous enter- tainment I have here received. In what place so ever I shall remaine, while God gives me life, you shall have a Gentleman ready at your command. As for your Duckets, I will none, I render you thanks, take them up again. I have ever more e- steemed people of honour then crowns, and think not, but I go as well satisfied from you, as if this Citie were at your dispo- sition, and you thereof have made me a present.

She again prostrated her self on her knees, and the Captain lifting her up, answered: 'No Sir, I should 'think my self for ever the most unhappy woman of 'the world, if you accept not this Present, which is 'nothing in comparison of the infinite obligations I 'owe to your worth. Well, saith he, since you give 'it with so good a will, I accept it for your sake: but 'cause your daughters to come hither, for I will bid 'them farewel. These good creatures had charitably assisted him, during the time of his infirmity, in the presence of their mother, many times touching the Lute, whereon they played very well, for his recre- ation. They fell at his feet, and the eldest made a short speech in her mother-language, to thank him for the preservation of their honour. The Captain heard, heard it, as it were, weeping, for the sweetness and humility he therein observed, then said: 'Ladies 'you do that which I ought to do, which is to give 'you thanks for the many good helps you have af- 'forded me, for which I finde my self infinitely ob- 'liged. You know men of my profession are not 'readily furnished with handsom tokens, to present 'fair Maidens withal: But behold your good Lady 'mother hath given me two thousand five hundred 'Duckets; take each of you a thousand, as my gift, 'for so I am resolved it shall be. Then turning to his 'Hostess: Madam, faith he, I will take those five 'hundred to my self, to distribute them among poor 'religious women, who have been ransacked: and I 'recommend the charge thereof to you; for you 'better then any other understand, where there is a 'necessity. At this time, the Lady touched to the quick with so great a piety, spake these words, couched in the History in ancient language: 'O 'flower of Chivalry, to whom no other may be 'compared! our blessed Saviour & Redeemer Jesus 'Christ, who for sinners suffered death and passion, 'both here in this world, and in the other, reward 'you. The Gentleman of the house, who at that time heard the courtesie of his guest, came to thank him with bended knee, making offer of his person and his whole estate. The young Gentlewomen, who were skilful at the Needle, made him a present of two Bracelets, woven with thred of gold and silver, and a purse of crimson Sattin, very richly wrought. He very graciously receiving them; Behold, saith he, I have more then ten thousand crowns: and instantly he put the bracelets on his arms, and the purse in his pocket, assuring them whilest these gifts lasted, he would wear them for their sakes. Thereupon he mounted on horse-back, accompanied with his true friend, the Lord D' Aubigny, and about two or three thousand men; the Lady of the house, the daughters, and the whole family, as bitterly deploring his departure, as if they should have been put to the sword. I demand of you, if the Stars were to descend from heaven, whether they might finde more love and respect? Where be these silly Fencers, who are as commets of fire and bloud, to bear murther, pestilence, and poyson into houses, who make the pillars of buildings to tremble with the force of blasphemies, who load whole families with injuries, wounds, and scars, who pill and ravage like Harpies, fed with humane bloud? Should they do nothing else all their life, but heap up mountains of gold and silver, they could not arrive to the least part of the contentment which this good Captain enjoyed, who sought no other recompence from his great actions, but the satisfaction of his conscience, and the glory to have done well. Thus is it, O noblemen, that hearts are gained to make a crown of immortality. Thus is Heaven obliged, and Earth tributary to Virtues.

The seventh SECTION.

Against sensual love, and impurity

I May well say, that among all the qualities of a Nobleman, there is not any hath a sweeter odour then temperance, which represseth the voluptuous pleasures of the body. Let no man flatter you in the passion of love, as if it were a prime virtue of your profession. Believe me, it is the worm which gnaweth all great actions, the moth which eateth all the vigour of spirit, the stain which defileth all the fairest ornaments of life, the labyrinth which hindereth all generous designs, the rock which wracketh all Vessels, the gulph which devoureth bodies and souls.

Divers kindes of love.

The wise Secretaries of nature have observed, that all creatures which have the breath of fire, have the tail of a Dragon. Nor likewise do we ever see carnal love vehemently enflamed, but that it produceth some serpentine, hideous, and disastrous issue. I affirm, fire penetrateth into the marrow of the total nature of the Universe, but hath effects very different, according to the subjects wherein it resideth. It otherwise scorcheth in Heaven, otherwise in Hell, otherwise in the bodies of beasts, otherwise in sulphur and gun-powder, and such like bodies able to receive its action. It filleth the stars in Heaven with a flame full of luster and honour: it tormenteth the damned in Hell, it entertaineth the life of creatures, it wasteth all bodies dry, or oyly, to reduce them either into ashes, or smoak. Take my comparison, and say with me, there are lovers who burn as Heaven, others as Hell, others as bodies well composed, others as oyl and wood.

The first lovers have the ardours of Heaven, who entertain chast and spiritual love for things Divine. These are pleasures, which the jealous eye cannot espy, the slanderous tongue cannot bite, bad report is not accustomed to defame: which equals have no cause to envy, nor can Tyrants armed with horrour of so many torments, finde the means how to take it from Martyrs. When we love God, we finde him every where, we speak to him every where, we serve him every where, and every where we feel the services done to him, have their recompence. We talk to him as well in the Whales belly, as in the flaming Furnace: witness Jonas and the three children, who found Chappels wholly built in the entrails of fishes and flames; because the love of God, the wisest Architect of the world, had framed such for them.

The second Lovers burn as Hell, who live perpetually in stinking, wicked, and infamous concupiscences, in dark, extraordinary, and desperate passions, who are in sensuality as in an Abyss, fettered with a long chain of servitude, never having any part of the air, or light of the children of God.

The third are as bodies mixed, who entertain conjugal, honest, and moderate amities; such as are found in good marriages, which are used according to God, in all honour and sanctity.

Those of the fourth order enkindle one another, as so many little bodies that daily minister fuel to the fire, wasting spirit, flesh, and means, in certain frivolous and giddy loves, which after much use, make men of vapour, ashes and smoak. You now adays shall finde, that affections purely conjugal are very rare, and celestial loves much more, but every where there are many men, who burn like hell, or pitch.

Four sorts of love.

There are four sorts of love, which have been great enemies and still are, to the reputation of a good Souldier: the one is the love of sensuality, the other of fantasie, the third of servitude, and the fourth of fury. On what side soever you turn your face, assure your self, Sir, you shall finde nothing beautiful in this ugly beast.

Love of sensuality.

Love of sensuality, which subsisteth only in voluptuousnes of body, is a bruitish, base, and wandering love, which is ever employed to spy out and trade for flesh, having no other design, but to satiate an unworthy concupiscence, more unsatisfied then fire, the Abyss, and Hell. If Nature had created you some Mustapha to grow fat in a Seraglio, and that you had never heard speech of good, or honour, it were tolerable: but to see a brave Souldier, well born & bred up, to pass his life in laying snares for chastity, to search out of both Sexes such as make traffick of the sins of others, to train up a wicked servant to be the messenger messenger of your passions, to promise, swear, forswear, to seduce poor forsaken maids, to cast them from necessity into disgrace, and from disgrace into despair, how can it be but abominable.

Think you the earth is made to be replenished with your sins, and charities to be instituted to support your crimes? It is idleness that serves as a storehouse for your passions, and it is your remisness, which doth not so much as vouchsafe to seek out a remedy. If you be resolved to lead such a life, give up your sword, for you dishonour it. It is no reason that it alone should retain the virginity, which all your other members have lost. You cannot well serve two mistresses, Venus and Bellona, since they are so different. And go not about to propose to your self that Sampson, David, and Cæsar, made them well accord together: believe me, when they came to be lascivious they ceased to be valiant.

It was neither with the looking-glass nor comb of Dalila, that Sampson slew a thousand Philistines, but with the jaw-bone of an Ass. Whilest he preserved himself from women, he was a sun, and a thunderbolt; a sun to enlighten his Nation, a thunderbolt to destroy the Philistines. So soon as a woman had shaved him, he of a sun became a coal, of a thunder-bolt a vapour, and of a man a lame jade, who from the field of battel, was sent to mill, no longer having eys, but to deplore the disaster of his loves with tears of blood. When David in the list overthrew the Gyant, he had not then received the wound from Bathsheba's eie. But after he had seen her at the fountain, his eys ceased not to cast forth flouds, and love dried up all his Laurels, that they had very much ado to wax green again in the water of so many tears. Hold it also for undoubted, that Cæsar being in the snows of the Gauls, thought not of committing adulteries at Rome; the business or war took from him all the taste of love, and never did he submit to the imaginations of a beast, till he retained no more designs worthy of a man. Voluptuousness never acted any thing great, but hath destroyed all that is great. And when God is pleased to overthrow Empires, he chooseth souldiers who have chaste hands, to chastise the effeminate. So Arbaces vanquished Sardanapalus: so Alexander, who would not look upon Queens, his prisoners, but with an eie of chastity, defeated the Persians, bondslaves to luxury: so the Gothes gained the Empire of Rome, as saith Salvianus, God being willing to purge the earth, which the Romans had defiled, by the arms of a Nation more chaste then themselves, it being reasonable, that those should enjoy their goods, who would have no share in their vices.

Love of fantasie.

The love of fantasie is more sottish then malicious or sordid. There be Cavaliers, who perswade themselves they are the bravest men of their Age, and that all Ladies, who sometimes love vapour where it is not beloved, must of necessity have love in store for them. They enter into so great vanities, as they cast their affections upon none but Princesses, or eminent beauties, esteeming the rest of the world too base for the entertainment of their affections. They resemble those birds of Egipt, who will not build their nests but upon Palms; nor will they love but in an high place. Of this quality were Endimion and the Emperour Caligula, who in the end distasting all the women in the world, transferred the ambition of their loves above the sphere of fire, supposing they were hardy enough to take the Moon in marriage. One would not believe the frenzie of this passion, if we had not by experience seen men of most base extraction, with much content to entertain their thoughts upon the loves of the Queens of Antioch and Sicilie, transporting themselves with joy, whensoever it was told them they were entered far into their gracious favours. This is it which maketh me say, that we in two things know the greatness of our soul, to wit, that it can frame a world to its knowledge, as God hath created one in nature; and can lodge the thoughts in so high a place, that the poorest begger of the world can entertain affection for the most eminent person of the earth. The rich, who do as it were forbid the use of elements, cannot deny love, but it is a gross infirmity to love out of the sphere of your power, that which you can no more enjoy then the Moon in the Heavens. If we will love aloft, let us love him who hath made us. When once we have passed far into his heart, we shall finde all the greatness of the world much lower then our feet.

If you, my souldier, entertain these fantastick loves, I from this present will send you to the Strophad Islands, with those who search for the hand of glory, the Philosophers stone, and quadratura circuli, and who oft-times distil the money out of their purses, with that little brain which is left them, through the same limbeck.

Love of bondage.

I fear you rather have the love of servitude, and make a Goddess of a piece of flesh, to which it is your glory to sacrifice your liberty, being so blind, as to kiss the fetters of your slavery, in stead of breaking them. Verily it is a pittiful thing to see a man burn in Ice, and congeal in Fire, having the colour wan, the visage meagre, the eys hollow, the cheeks sunk, the spirit giddy, the reason uncollected, and the heart wholly feaverish, for the love of a creature who flouteth him. To see a man who walketh in his solitude, and creeping like a spectre, not knowing whether he be of the number of the living or dead, who speaketh, writeth, who prieth, who hopeth, who feareth, laugheth, sigheth, waxeth pale, blusheth, desireth, detesteth, dieth, riseth again, sinketh into an abyss, and then toucheth Heaven with a finger, who playeth a Comedy of a dozen Personages in one hour, and passeth through more Metamorphoses in a day, then Ovid in three years.

Oh what a miserable thing is it, saith the golden mouth of Constantinople, to seek to be rosted in ashes, and so desperately love a beauty, which is onely fair in the fantasie of a feaverish brain, and of which in a short time the most licorous worms would scorn to make their dung-hill! O my souldier, let such a frenzie never enter into your heart; you were better serve a Turk or an Arabian, then such a love. It is the punais-worm, which bites while she liveth, and after death maketh her infection to be felt. Why go you about to idolatrize a woman? Have you not slavery enough at home, but you must needs seek it abroad? Withdraw your self in good time from this captivity, gain the haven before the storm surprise you; for if you once be engaged, there is neither arm nor oar can serve to bring you back again. Is it not a comely thing, think you to behold a souldier, who hath a sword by his side, able to hew monsters, to seek to play the cocks-comb in quest of a wily wench, that exerciseth the most infamous tyranny over him that ever was heard of? It is said Omphale took the Diadem from a King named Hercules, and set her slippers on his head: that Dionysius the Tyrant wrote the expeditions of his Kingdom with his hand, and that Mirrha cancelled or signed them at her pleasure: that King Athanaricus tied the strings of Pincia's shoes: that Themistocles caused himself to be purged and let blood with

with his captive Mistress. He that should see all the follies of the entranced Lovers, might observe an infinite number of matters much more strange.

In serving a scornful piece, who makes you dye a thousand times a day, you can oft-times hope for no other thing but ever to serve, and if you come to the end of your pretensions, brag not so much; you perhaps have nothing, but that which servants, or persons more unworthy, have obtained before you. This well deserveth indeed to betray your honour, and to commit such silly actions: but if you open your eys to see the end of this goodly Stage-play, you shall do as those, who caused themselves to be shaved when they escaped a Ship-wrack: you would not let so much as a hair remain upon that young head, which suffered it self to run at liberty after such sottish loves.

Love of fury.

If you plunge your self further into this passion, you shall finde fury which tyeth cords, which mingleth poysons, which sharpeneth swords, which openeth black caverns, which erecteth Gibbets, which kindleth coals, which prepareth racks, which produceth all that may discover the proceedings of an engaged love, and which maketh an Arrow of all crimes, to hit the mark it aimed at.

Were I in your place, I would tear from my heart the sleightest cogitations which occur by this folly, as Cankers, Vermine, and Serpents: and I would ride on post, if it were possible, beyond the elements, with purpose to avoid such encounters. All the bravest Souldiers have made boast of chastity. It was the Trophey of Cyrus, to whom God for this cause gave all the treasures of Asia. It was the triumph of Alexander, who in recompence had the conquest of the Persians: and the Emperour Julian, who made profession to imitate him, although he had renounced all the Sacraments, would never forsake chastity, which he had learned amongst Christians: saying, This virtue made beautiful lives, as Painters fair faces. But not to search any further into the ruines of antiquity; look what your Bayard did upon this point: behold an admirable passage, which I will relate in the same words, as it is expressed in his History.

Julianus apud Ammianum.

A Royal act of Military chastity.

They had caused a yound Maid to be conveyed into his chamber, which was one of the fairest creatures of the world, and indeed she was endowed with an Angelical grace, but that her eys were swoln with extremity of tears. When the Captain saw her, 'How now, fair Maid, saith he unto her, 'what say you? How come you hither? The poor 'creature fell on her knees, and said: Alas, Sir, my 'mother hath commanded me I should do what you 'would have me; yet I am a Virgin, and never had 'I any disposition to do ill, were it not necessity enforced me thereunto; for my mother and my self 'are so poor, that we perish for hunger; and I wish 'to God I were dead, before I commit this act, or 'at least, that I were not in the number of unhappy 'Maids. The noble Lord touched to the quick with the words of this creature, answered her, having tears in his eys: 'Verily, pretty soul, I will not be so 'wicked, as to take that from you, which you so 'faithfully have kept for God. Thereupon he caused her to be veiled, covering her with a mantle, lest she might be known; he lighted a Torch, and not recommending her to any other, conducted her himself to rest in the house of his kinswoman. The next day he sent for the mother, and said to her: 'Are not you a wicked woman to betray the ho-'nour of your daughter, which ought to be more 'dear unto you then life? You deserve a punish-'ment so much the more rigorous, as that I under-'stand you are a Lady: for in doing this, you wrong 'Nobility. The poor woman wholly confounded, knew not what else to answer, but that they were as poor as might be. 'Is there no man, saith he, who 'requires her in marriage? Yes, truly, saith she, 'an honest man, a neighbour of mine; but he de-'mandeth six hundred Florens, and I am not worth 'the one half of it.

Then the brave Bayard drew out his Purse, and said: Hold, here are two hundred crowns, which 'are of more value then six hundred Florens of this 'Country, to marry your daughter withal. I add 'also thereunto an hundred more to cloth her, and 'an hundred to relieve your poverty; but my will 'is, you dispatch it in three days. All which was accordingly done with an unspeakable joy of the mother and daughter, which made them live thenceforth very honourably.

O Nobility, I present not here unto you an Hermit, it is a Captain, a French Souldier, who was composed of no other flesh, bones, nor bloud, then you, while he in the mean time performeth an act of a Religious man the most mortified: he exerciseth the liberality of a King, he equalleth therein, and as it were, surmounteth the heroical deeds of the greatest Saints. It is true, that S. Nicholas saved the honour of Virgins, contributing thereunto his gold and silver: it is true, that in doing it he generously triumphed over the covetousness of temporal goods but he served not in this action, as a triumph to himself, which is verily the choicest piece of eminent virtues. Behold a Cavalier, who vanquisheth both avarice and love, the two most dangerous Rocks of the world. Bayard commandeth his Purse in a Fortune not the best accommodated, which meriteth not the least applause; but Bayard commandeth himself in a flourishing age, in a vigorous body, in presence of an object so amiable. I beseech you let us no longer say, that chastity is only found in Cloysters, it is every where, where the fear of God is, where generosity, or real virtue is. What can so many wretches answer to this, who fill the world with sins, the Nobility with disgraces, their bodies with diseases, their name with infamy, and load so many poor abused creatures with miseries and dispair? What can so many spruce Gallants answer, who brave it through the streets, and make ostents in borrowed feathers, and in habits, standing indebted to the Mercer for the stuff, and to the poor Taylor for the fashion, paying neither the one, nor other? True Jack-daws of Esope, who deserve that all other birds should assemble to pull their plumes off, which they have stolen to entertain their vanity. What will here so many gluttons and gamesters answer, who eat, and rent up the entrails of men by their bloody riots? Is it possible, that this Souldier should have four hundred crown, which was then a huge summ, to give in one only alms, and those who in bravery talk of nothing else but pistolets, the belly, and game, have not a Denier to throw to a poor body?

I will also shew you an essential virtue of your profession, which is a certain mixture of honesty, justice, and loyalty due to the King, the Weal publick, your conscience, even towards your enemies themselves, in the examples of this admirable man, justly called The Captain without fault.

The

The eighth SECTION.

Against the perfidiousnes of Interests.

THere is given to you for the accomplishment of these goodly precepts, a great virtue of the time, which is to betray Faith, Altars, and all that which is pretious in nature, or magnificent in Religion, to advance your fortune, without any fear at all to trample on the throats of your most faithful friends, that you may go directly to the Temple of Honour, or the riches of the world. Poor Janizary, think you, that to be the shortest way? Have you never learned, that if you take fidelity out of the world, you pull down the principal Altar of the Temple, the sanctity of humane hearts, the commerce of men, the repose of life, the knot and band of all felicities? Perjury, saith an Oracle, hath a son without name, feet, or hands, and who wandereth up and down throughout the world, and crusheth in pieces the heads of the perfidious, even to the fourth generation. You in the subsequent discourses shall behold the goodly successes of such proceedings: I for this present tell you, to strengthen these precepts, that, were faith and integrity banished from the rest of the world, they might be found in the heart of a French Souldier.

Oraculum Epicklidi redditum, apud Nicetam.

Our excellent Bayard, from whom I more affect still to derive this model, then from any other, made it well appear in an affair, where the life of the most eminent man of the Church was interessed. He was at that time in Italy, sent by the King to assist the Duke of Ferrara against the Army of Pope Julius, then much opposite to France, although so many other worthy Popes heartily loved our Nation. See the cause, why he sent to the Duke one Monsieur Augustine Gerlo, a Gentleman of Milan, a Traitour, and factious, to perswade him to forsake the French alliance, with intention to destroy them, and that in recompence he would give him his Niece in marriage, and make him Captain General of the Church. This Prince would not in any wise understand him, but he handled the matter so by his policy and advantageous promises, that he gained this Augustine, who gave him his hand, that he in few days would destroy the Pope, by the help of a mischievous morsel, which he could easily give him. The Duke of Ferrara understanding these propositions, went to finde out the noble Bayard in his lodging, and made a long discourse to him of the evil disposition of Pope Julius, and the enterprises he had both on his life, and of the French-men, of purpose to enkindle him for revenge. Then he pursued his opportunity, and made overture to him of the treason of this wicked Gerlo. Bayard beheld him, and said; 'How, Sir? I could never have imagined that a 'Prince so generous as you, would consent to such 'a mischief: and had you done it, I swear by my 'soul, before night I would have given the Pope no-'tice of it. How? answered the Duke, He would 'have done as much either to you, or me. It is no 'matter, replieth Bayard, this treachery displeaseth 'me. The Duke shrugged up his shoulders, and 'spitting on the ground, Monsieur Bayard, saith he; 'I would I had killed all mine enemies in this sort: 'but since you dislike it, the matter shall rest, and 'you and I both may have cause to repent it. We 'shall not, if it please God, replieth the good soul-'dier, but I pray you put this gallant into my hands, 'that would do this goodly piece of service: and if 'I do not cause him to be hanged in an hour, let me 'supply his place. The other excused it, saying, 'He had given him assurance of his person.

Behold you not a brave spirit? See you not a man of a royal conscience, and of an honesty in all things like to it self? Where are these petty spirits of the Abyss, more black then Specters, and infernal furies, who have neither loyalty for their Prince nor Common-wealth, but as it may concern their own interests, who swallow treasons as big as Cammels, to gain a fly? They would make truth it self to lye, were not their issues ever tragical, abominable, and hideous.

The ninth SECTION.

Short and notable Instructions.

MY Souldier, follow the precepts, which the great S. Augustine gave to Captain Boniface. Observe Faith and Virtue in Arms, which never will be prosperous on earth, if they be not fortified with blessings from heaven. Beg of God with David, to deliver you from your necessities, which are your passions; he doth nothing to overcome visible enemies, that have power over bodies, who surmounteth not the invisible, bandied against the health of our souls. Make use of the world, as a thing borrowed: do good with its goods, and become not bad. They are goods, since they come from God, who extendeth his power over all things, both celestial and temporal. They are goods, since God gives them to good men; but they are not also great goods, since he affords them to the wicked. He takes them away from the virtuous, to try their virtue, and from the perverse, to chastise their crimes. It is true, strength, health, victory, honour, wealth, are indifferently the portion of all men: but conquest over passions, virtues, salvation of soul, immortality of body, glory, honour, beatitude, are the proper inheritance of Saints. Love these goods, desire them, seek them with all your endeavour, do alms-deeds to get them, fast as much as your forces will permit: all here below passeth away, but good works. Augustep. 10.

Think when you go to the wars, that the strength of your body is a gift of God, and that it is not fit to arm against your sovereign Master's proper benefits. Keep promise even with your enemies, make peace with all the world voluntarily, and war for necessity to acquire the good of peace. Be peaceful even in Arms, for such men are called the children of God. If it be necessary to kill an enemy in fight, let mercy be always exercised in the latter end of the combate, principally when there is no further fear of rebellion. Adorn your manners with conjugal chastity, sobriety, and modesty. It is a ridiculous thing to conquer men, and be vanquished by vices; to escape the sword, and be overthrown by wine. If you want means, seek it not on earth by wicked practises, but secure rather in Heaven that little you have, by the exercise of good works.

Flee these rocks of Nobility, which we have hitherto spoken against, and above all, bridle presumption, choler, the tongue, and sensuality.

They are slaves, who cannot keep in the mean, between servitude, and Empire, where either chains must be had to master them, or a Throne erected to honour them. Presumption, if you afford it entrance, will make you of a man, a Baloon filled with wind, a scare-crow of honour, a temerarious thing void of courage, an undertaker without succes, a phantastick without shame, which in the end shall become burthensom to it self, and odious to all the world. Choler and folly are two sisters, which have in in all things the ſame qualities, or if there be any difference, it is, that the one with more furie maketh havock in an inſtant, and the other produceth her effects with more leiſure and cheerfulneſs: whileſt you are ſubject to this paſſion, no part can conſide in you in matter of judgment, no more than to weather-cocks in the point of ſtability: you will have all other vices in feed, and perpetually diſcern the ſorrow of time paſt, the ſtance of the preſent, and uncertainty of the future. As for the tongue, it is that which contains all the good or evil of man: it is the needle of the great dial of the ſoul, that muſt ſhew all the houre. It is the trothe-man of our thoughts, the image of our actions, the interpreter of our wills, and the principal key of converſation. He that will well live in the world, ſaith the famous S. Nazianzen, muſt have a veil over his eye, a key on his ear, a compaſs on his lips. A veil over his eye, not to ſee, or in ſeeing to diſſemble many things; a key on his ear, to ſhut them up againſt ſo many follies and ordures, which proceed from bad mouthes: and a compaſs on the lips, to meaſure and ſquare out all his words with diſcretion. So many ſecrets unneceſſarily diſcovered, ſo many infamous ſlanders, ſo many inconſiderate tales, ſo many frivolous promiſes, ſo many impudent lyes, ſuch perjuries and execrable blaſphemies, ſo many diſaſters which oft happen for a ſleight ſpeech, daily teach us, that words have no handles to hold them by, and better it is to trip with the foot then the tongue.

Nazianzen in Jam.

Senſuality, if you powerfully reſiſt it not from the firſt reflections, which reaſon may preſent, will make you a thing of nothing. The three ſpirits, wine, love, and game, will fetter you with a prodigious ſlavery. You will become a living Sepulcher, a tomb of ſurfets and ſlaughters, a gulf of calumnies, a meer hobgoblin without repoſe, which ſhall continually handle cards and dice, to bereave you of your purſe and underſtanding, ſo to make a ſpoile of your goods, a frenzie of your reaſon, and a perpetual feaver of your life.

Your condition ought not to make you pretend power over men, if you ſeaſonably enterpriſe it not over your own paſſions. Beware how you enter into the liſt among ſo many noble ſpirits, there to diſcover your weakneſs, and to add nothing to the luſtre of the honour of ſo many worthy Anceſtours, but to render your own crimes the more remarkable. Shew your ſelf herein a reaſonable man, and endeavour that all your actions may be as lines, which grow from the center of wiſdom, to be produced with all felicitie. Remember things paſt, rectifie the preſent, foreſee thoſe to come. Above all, learn to ſet a true eſtimation upon every thing in the world, and ſuffer not your ſelf to be ſurpriſed by the illuſions of ſo many objects, which when they have charmed the eys, and overthrown reaſon, leave nothing behind them, but ſorrow to have don ill, and impotencie of doing well.

In converſation take the meaſure of your ſelf, and the like of thoſe with whom you deal, to husband and accommodate your ſelf reaſonably to all the world, yielding to every one the reſpect which his merit ſeems to require. The exerciſe of devotion will not hinder you from the endeavour how to become an able man in your profeſſion, from being honeſt, civil, diſcreet, affable, liberal, obliging, ſtout, couragious, patient, which are the principal qualities of a Courtier.

It is not deſired, that to be devout, you ſhould have a ſpirit drowzie, ſimple, overwhelmed, nor that through overmuch ſimplicity you make profuſion of your ſelf, in an age, where bounty ſeemeth to be the prey of inſolent ſpirits. Wiſdom will teach you neither to intrude nor power out your ſelf, to diſſemble through virtue that which ought to be concealed, to adapt your ſelf to companies and affairs, to believe nothing lightly, nor to promiſe nor decide any thing without conſideration, to perſevere in certain things not ill, becauſe you have begun them, not to be harſh, nor too much complying, ſince the one taſteth of bruſhneſs, the other inclines to flatterie. To propoſe to your ſelf good and evil, which may ariſe from an affair, to moderate the one, and tollerate the other. Above all, honour the King next after God, as the ſource of all greatneſs, the fountaine of the moſt noble lights, which reflect on Nobility. Honour him with profound reſpect, as the lively Image of God. Love him ſincerely, ſerve him with all fidelity. If you be employed in affairs and governments, endeavour to perſiſt therein, with conſtience and honour, which are the two manſions of a great ſoul. If you have merit without employment and recompence, ſay not therefore that all is loſt. It is a good buſineſs to be well at reſt, to manure your ſpirit, to enable your ſelf with reading and peaceable converſation to govern your houſe. Learn nothing, but what you ought to know. Search that onely which you may profitably finde; deſire nothing, but what you may honourably wiſh for. And be not conceited to run after a ſpecter of imaginary favour, nor to mount to a place, where you cannot ſtay without fear, nor fall without ruin.

So many great Monarchs, ſo many Princes, Lords, and valorous men, who are come from Courts and the profeſſion of arms, to enter into the Temple of piety, aſſure us, this life is capable of Saints, and that no man ought to deſpare of virtue, but he who renounceth it. If the brevity of this Treatiſe would permit, I would willingly ſet before you, a David, a Joſias, an Ezechias, a Charlemaign, a S. Lewis, a Hermingildes, a Henry, a Stephen, a Caſimire, a Godfrey of Bovillon, a Wenceſlaus, an Edward, an Elzear, an Amideus: I would make you ſee flouriſhing Squadrons of Martyrs, drawn from warfare, amongſt which you would admire a Maurice, an Exuperius, a Sebaſtian, a Marius, a Mennas, an Olympiades, a Meliton, a Leontius, a Maximus, a Julian, an Abdon, a Sennen, a Valens, a Priſcus, a Marcellus, a Marcellinus, a Severinus, a Philoromus, a Philoctemon, and ſo many ſuch like. Finally, I would ſhew in the latter Ages men worthy of all honour, eminent in arms and enobled with ſingular Piety; but I now content my ſelf to draw from Euſebius, Theodoret, Nicephorus, Zoſimus, Socrates, Sozomenus, Cedrenus, and above all, Cardinal Baronius, the life of Great Conſtantine, who hath been the very prime man amongſt Chriſtian Princes, and hath witneſſed, eſpecially after his Baptiſm, a maſculine piety, and a great example of ſanctity.

CONSTANTINE.

The first SECTION.

The Providence of God over Constantine.

I Will shew to Christian Nobility its source in the life of the prime Gentleman of Christianity. If we respect Antiquity, Greatness, and Dignity, we shall not finde a Prince either more anciently noble then he, who first of all among Emperours deserved the title of Christian, or more truly great then he, who so happily engrafted the Empire of the Universe on the Tree of the Cross, or more justly honourable then he, who cemented his honour with the blood of the Lamb. It is the admirable Constantine, who so perfectly allied Valour to Piety, Monarchy to Humility, the wisdom of the Cross, to the government of the world, the nails and thorns of the Passion, to the Diadem of Kings, and delights of the Court, that he hath left matter of meditation for the wise, of profit for Religious, of imitation for Monarchs, and of wonder for those who admire nothing vulgar.

Greatness of Constantine.

Behold a marvellous Theater of the Providence of God, whereunto I would willingly invite all those spirits, repleat with humane policy, and devested of heavenly Maxims, who are only great by the greatness of their ruine, to see how the breath of God demolisheth the Towers of Babel, to raise the walls of Sion, how the subtile are surprized in their subtilty, how the science of men becometh blinde in its proper lights, how the vigour of the world is slain by its own hands, how stability is over-turned by the supports it chooseth, how the spirit of flesh at unawares contributeth to plant the Cross on the top of Capitols and heads of Monarchs, by the same ways wherewith it promised to over-cloud them with darkness and Abysses.

Theater of Divine Providence.

Here produce a Constantine, bred up very young in the Court of Diocletian, who had an intention to become a scourge to Christianity: but God surprized him therein, as Moses in the Court of Pharaoh, to stop the stream of persecution, to calm the tempests of the time, confound Idols, and raise the Church on the ruines of Gentilism.

Reader, stay a little on the Frontispiece of this history, and behold how the Eternal Providence led this young Constantine by the hand, like another Cyrus, to humble the Great-ones of the earth before his face, and to give him hidden treasures; to take from him so many bars and impediments, to open for him so many gates of iron, and to cause so many Kings to turn their faces, and afford him their place. Isaiah 45.

There was at that time twelve heads, which already either wore the Diadem, or thought themselves capable of it. Diocletian and Maximian held the highest place: they had chosen for Successours Galerius and Constantius Clorus, father of our Constantine. Galerius had made two other Cæsars, Severus, and Maximinus. Maxentius son of Maximian, violently violently drew upon himself the Purple by main force; Licinius furiously opposed him to gain it. Constantius, Dalmatius, Hannibal, brothers of Constantine by the father's side, beheld this good game, and might well hope to have some part therein, as being legitimate sons of Theodora, whom Constantius Clorus had espoused when he rejected S. Helena. Constantine saw himself the furthest off, through the disgrace of his mother; yet did the anointment of God make choice of him, dispersing all the rest by such and so divers ways, as we shall afterward behold, to place him in the Throne, only absolute and independent, and to establish him with a long continuance of years, and a large posterity, had it pursued the way which he traced.

The state of the Church under Diocletian.

Consider what then was the state of the Church, and view the wonders of the powerful hand of God. Diocletian had undertaken to raze from the memory of men the name of Christianity; and being an imperious man, who would, as it were, that the Heavens and elements should observe no other course but according to his will, and engaged very far in this affair, bare himself with such excess of cruelty, that for about three hundred years, that the Christians were persecuted, there had nothing been like the persecution raised under his Empire.

Then was the time, when in full assembly of publick Games, which ordinarily were presented at Rome, the cries of an innumerable multitude were heard, who to flatter the design of the Prince, loudly proclaimed two and twenty times, Christiani tollantur, Auguste, Christiani tollantur: Let the Christians be taken away, O Emperour, let the Christians be rooted out. Then was the time that dreadful Edicts of persecution were fixed on every place, that the earth was covered with blood and massacres, and slaughters dispersed, as it were, in all the parts of the habitable world. Christians were accounted as the dregs of mankind, the scorn of the earth, and object of all cruelties. Some were shut up in Caves, not daring to appear in publick, excluded from commerce and society of men, deprived of necessities, which Nature would have to be common to all the world, they not being permitted to draw water from Wells, or to buy a handful of herbs in the Market, unless they presented Incense to Idols, purposely fixed in publick places. Others crept up and down in the Deserts, among wilde beasts, and sometimes roasted with heat of Summer, and sometimes congealed with cold of Winter, tearing up with their nails the grass, which they mingled with their tears before they ate it. Others were led into Theaters, Amphitheaters, and Tribunals of Judges, where old men of fourscore, and an hundred years of age, were seen. Ladies very honourable, most tender Maidens, and little Children, brought into the slaying house there to dye, before they knew what it was to live.

All the tortures which the Busiris and Mezentiuses knew not, were then invented, and exercised on the bodies of Christians: there was no speech but of Racks, Combs of Iron, molten Lead, boyling Cauldrons: but how to crush men under Presses, as in the time of Vintage, but of shutting bodies up in vessels, armed within with counterpointed nails, and rouling them in this moving prison down the descent of hills: but of annointing them with Oyl and Honey, and exposing them to Wasps, in the boyling ardures of the Sun, but of hanging women by the feet in their nakedness, to serve as a spectacle for lustful eys.

It is not credible such horrours could enter into the hearts of men, without some particular impression of malign spirits, yet Diocletian thought it was a great point of state, and the true means irrecoverably to banish Christianity.

Behold the cause why he spared none, yea, not pardoning even his Niece Susanna, nor his wife Serena, whom he caused to feel the edge of the sword for professing Christianity. It was desired the Martyrs should be numbred, but this was impossible, for when it appeared that one month reckoned up seventeen thousand, and the rest carried the like proportion, the Christians prepared themselves rather to dye then to keep any further record of them. The Emperour also caused all holy books to be exactly sought out, to commit them to the flames, thinking it was a singular policy to suppress our Religion: but it is a thing extremely prodigious, and an invincible argument of the Divinity of our faith, that notwithstanding all these endeavours, the Church was like the burning bush, which derived glory from its proper flames. She encreased under the sword of persecution, borrowing her Ornaments from ignominy, her riches from losses, and life from her tomb. It seemed that every drop of blood which distilled from the bodies of Martyrs, was a grain of seed to make others spring, which in the end wearied executioners, blunted the edge of swords, wore out all the instruments of torture: yet was Diocletian for all this nothing mollified.

Conditions of Diocletian.

A man would wonder from whence he should conceive such hatred against Christianity, but he that will consider his nature and ordinary proceedings, shall finde, that besides the suggestions of Hell, he had inclinations disposed to such cruelties. He was born of very base birth, nursed up in blood, addicted to the Religion of the Gentiles, so far as to make himself the most superstitious. Whilest he abode in France, as yet a young soldier, a Druid who much intermeddled with divination, foretold him he should arrive at the Empire, when he had killed the fatal Bore. He being of a spirit ambitious and credulous, went purposely a hunting, and ordinarily chased Bores, to see if a Crown would spring from their blood. But that was not it which the evil spirit pretended. There was at the Court a Lord, named Aper, as much as to say the Bore, father-in-law to the Emperour Numerianus, a man powerful & factious, who after some years possessed himself of the Roman Empire by crime and treachery. Diocletian adventured to kill him, not so much for hatred, as he said, as for desire to fulfil the prophesie of the Druid, and he having thrust his sword through his body, being already arrived to the highest degrees of warfare, and well beloved of the souldiers, was proclaimed Emperour. This election made him greatly esteem the false Religion of Pagans, and to take deep roots in his superstition, which was much augmented by the Priests of Idols, mortal enemies of Christians, who perswaded him, the gods that had given the Empire, demanded of him in requital the extirpation of Christianity, and that his hand was fatal to cut and burn the heads of the Hydra, which his Predecessours could never destroy. This afforded him matter of vanity, which he very easily apprehended, and it being also softly whispered in his ears, that the Christians had a plot upon his state, and promised themselves in their prophesies an everlasting Empire, he grew moody even to rage, employing all manner of Engines to give counterpoize to their exaltations. Besides, he being ever desirous to appear exactly absolute in his commands, and effectual in his enterprizes, thought he must never give over persecution, perſecution, till he had buried the memory of the Chriſtian name; and he voluntarily ſuffered himſelf ſo to be flattered upon this ſubject, that no man could do a thing more acceptable then to tell him he had extinguiſhed the wicked Sect, and eſtabliſhed the honour of the Gods immortal. Columnes alſo and Monuments were dedicated to him with this inſcription, SUPERSTITIONE CHRISTI UBIQUE DELETA, which witneſſed, theſe honours were yielded him, for having throughly purged the world from the ſuperſtition of Chriſt: but his conſcience ſuggeſted the contrary, wherewith his ſpirit, fierce, and cruel, was horribly amazed.

O God! we may well ſay, there is neither force nor counſel can oppoſe your deſigns: your divine Providence, ſhut up in a cloud, roareth over crowned heads, in a moment overthroweth the mountains of winds, which the Tyrants raiſed one upon another, and makes the ſilly wiſdom of the greateſt politicians, appear like an owl unfeathered, and aſhamed at the rays of the mid day.

He leaveth the Empire.

Diocletian, who was reputed the ſubtileſt, and moſt couragious man of the world, upon a ſuddain reſolved to forſake the Empire, and to hide himſelf in ſome grot, like a beaſt, timorous and wretched. He abandoneth the Scepter and Purple, to retire himſelf into a little country-houſe, and with his own hands to manure a garden.

Reaſons.

This gave matter enough of ſurmiſe to all the world, which could not penetrate his intentions. It was believed by no man, that he did it for humility, for theſe apprehenſions found no place in the heart of a man, who cauſed himſelf to be adored, and preſented his ſhoes, embroidered with precious ſtones, to be kiſſed by them, who came to ſalute him. He notwithſtanding publickly profeſſed, that he addicted himſelf to this life through a generous contempt of the vanities of the world, being fully ſatiated with honours of the earth, and having accompliſhed all the hopes of the moſt ambitious; ſo that he knew what the fortune of the Cæſars was, & that Diadems were charged with more Thorns then Pearls; that there was but one way to contentment of life, which was to deſpiſe what others adored: and purſuing this; he wrote a letter to a friend of his, who perſwaded him to re-aſſume the Empire: If you ſaw the lettice which grow in my Garden, planted with mine own hands, you would think me too good a Gardener, to become a miſerable Emperour.

This man would needs play the Philoſopher, which he had never learned, and endeavour to colour this change which he had made, with apparences of virtue; but the moſt underſtanding judged, it was the diſeaſe of Virtus, and a melancholy enraged, that had tranſported him into this retirement. He was extreamly confounded, to have drawn blood out of all the veins of the earth, to ſtifle a Religion which flouriſhed in its proper ruins. It ſeemed unto him, that a million of ſpirits of the dead, encompaſſed him bed, to require from him, an account of their lives: he began to apprehend ſomething divine in this Religion, which he had ſo outragiouſly perſecuted, and withall to fear a horrible puniſhment in the revolution of the affairs of his eſtate. Behold the cauſe why deſpare, anxiety, and eminent peril, made him voluntarily to deſpoile himſelf, as a man ready to be drowned, believing ſtill, that he ſhould have a better penny-worth of the puniſhments of Heaven, in the perſon of a Gardener, then in that of an Emperour. He anticipated his puniſhment, ſerving for executioner to himſelf, and leaving an Empire, which ſeemed as it were as faſt tyed to him as his ſoul, to make, being yet alive, an honourable recompence to the truth, which he had ſo unworthily offended. He perſwaded Maximianus partaker of all his crimes, to be alſo the companion of his fortune and both of them retired, leaving in their places Galerius and Conſtantius, the father of our Conſtantine; ignorantly giving the Empire to him, who had already brought forth a ſon, who ſhould ruin all that which theſe two had built.

Let us now behold his extraction and qualities, beginning from the eminencies of his birth; and let us find in his time the wicked Hermit in the bottom of his cave.

The ſecond SECTION.

The Nobility of Conſtantine.

Plinius Campanilla. Rudimentum naturæ, lilia facere diſcretis.

IT is ſaid when nature made the wild Lillie, ſhe alſo taught how to make Lillies: and I may ſay, when ſhe created the Grand-fathers and parents of great Conſtantine, ſhe then began the work of a perfect Emperour, which ſhe afterward finiſhed in the perſon of this Monarch, whoſe life we write.

Nobility of Conſtantine.

Nazarius obſerveth, that he was deſcended from the Emperour Flavius Claudius, a Prince ſo renowned, that it was ſaid, the moderation of Auguſtus Cæſar, the virtue of Trajan, and piety of Antoninus were aſſembled together, to harbour in his heart. He ſuſtained one of the moſt furious incurſions of the Barbarians, which ever was upon the Roman Empire, for he in one ſole battel defeated three hundred and twenty thouſand, and deſerved a Statue of gold, which was erected for him in the Capitol, having reigned onely two years.

Conſtantius Clorus the father of our great Conſtantine, was as the Roſe amongſt Thorns; for he lived among thoſe Barbarous Emperours, who made the world ſhed tears of blood, with ſo great ſweetneſs, temper, and continencie, that France and England, where he ordinarily reſided, loved him as their father. That which gained him the good will of people, was, that he rendered himſelf affable to all the world, and thought no treaſure greater then the love and affection of his ſubjects. He was a capital enemy of extortions, and levies of unjuſt monies, even to the leſſening rather the train of his houſe, then to over-charge thoſe, which other Governours had oft times ſo ill entreated.

Notable moderation in Conſtantius.

Euſebius.

He, being as yet but nominated for the Empire, Diocletian underſtanding his deportments, whether he would teach him frugalitie, or that he feared leſt the bright luſtre of the integrity of Conſtantius might eclipſe him, one day reproached him with his poverty, and ſent Embaſſadours to him expreſſly to ſee his husbandrie, and exhort him to heap up treaſures, as well as other Cæſars. He deſirous to appear magnificent at this meeting, ſpake but one word, which was to give the people notice that he wanted money. It was a pleaſing ſpectacle to behold, how all the world ran to him with ful hands, every one offering him what he had, with a love ſo cordial, and ſo prompt alacritie, that nothing might be ſaid to be more affectionate. He in few hours amaſſed together, great treaſures, which he ſhewed to theſe Embaſſadours of Diocletian, who were much amazed thereat. But the brave Prince after their departure, reſtored all had been preſented unto him, ſaying, he loved better to ſee riches in the coffers of his ſubjects, and to retain their loves for himſelf, then then to have all the treasures of the Indies in his house, without friendship.

Excellent paſſage.

A judicious experiment.

It was verily a fair and generous lesson, which he taught the Great-ones of the earth, who through excess of avarice heap together all that, which they must forsake, and in great abundance of wealth have a main want of two things which ought to be eternal, to wit, Love and Truth.

Constantius did all this by ways of moral virtues: for although he had very good inclinations to Christianity, he was no Christian by profession, being as yet straitly associated to the great persecutours thereof: yet because the accidents of time and place might permit it, he freely made use of Christian Officers, judging those would be most loyal in his service, who were most constant in piety. And to this purpose Eusebius addeth, that he being one day desirous to make trial of the faith of Christians which were of his train, commanded them to sacrifice to Idols; which the most faithful constantly refused, resolving rather to forsake Court and life, then to be traitours to the character of their Religion. Others yielding to the stream of the times, and hope of worldly favours, shewed themselves somewhat more pliant to his will; which he having perceived, dismissed them all, supposing they might well be perfidious to their Prince, since they had been disloyal to their God. And as for the rest having highly commended them, he afforded them extraordinary preferment.

To be faithful to the King one must be loyal to God.

Helena.

One would wonder from whence such sincere affections should arise, in so ill education as he found among Persecutours of the faith. But for my part, I think we ought to impute this change, next after God, to the holy and couragious Helena, whom he espoused in his first marriage, and who was mother of our admirable Constantine. This incomparable Lady, that sought the Cross with more industry, then others do Empires, hath engraven her praises with an adamantine pen in the memory of all Ages. It is strange why certain modern Grecians, as Nicephorus and others, have been so desirous to attribute to Greece this creature, so that striving to make her a Grecian, they have made her an out-cast. I have not so much leisure in this treatise, as to amuse my self in recounting and refuting their fabulous narrations, being naturally an enemy of men affectedly eloquent, who have no other profession but to lye in good terms. I speak that which is the more probable, agreeing with what is written by Cardinal Baronius, whose opinions are ordinarily most sincere. Helena was an English woman by Nation, daughter of one of the best qualified men of this great Island, who lodged in his house the Lieutenant of the Roman Empire. Zosimus the historian, who could neither love Constantine nor his mother, morally hating Christianity, reproacheth her, that she was no Lady, and speaketh as of a woman of base extraction: but we may well say, that his history, when he speaketh of faithful Princes, hath mingled much gall with his ink. Certain it is, that Helena being a stranger, could not be in the Roman Empire of reputation equal to so many Princesses of the Court, from whome Constantius might at that time expect alliance, yet was very honourable in her own Country, not so much by Nobility of blood, as that of faith, wherein in my opinion she already was instructed, there being many Christians in England under the Empire of Diocletian. For I hold with S. Paulinus, that she was the first Mistres of her Son in the faith, and that we should not have had a Constantine, if God had not given us an Helena, Principes

It is the opinion of Polidorus lib. 1e. Of Radulph in his Polychron. l. 4. cap. 19. Of Hunting l. 1. Of Onuf. in the Treatise of Roman Emperours, Of Harpsfeldius in his histor. Eccles. of England. Lipsius is of another opinion.

Principibus Christianis esse mernis, non tam suâ quàm Helenæ matris fide, saith this great Bishop.

Constantius at that time, Governour in great Britain for the Roman Emperour, being lodged in the house of her father, did cast his eie upon Helena, who was endowed with an absolute beauty; by reason whereof, as we may conjecture, she was afterward called Helena in the Empire, this name being not otherwise familiar with the English. With this eminent comlines of body she had modesty, and a singular grace, which was a ray imprinted by God upon her forehead; as he did heretofore to the virtuous Hester, to make her amiable to all the world. It is true, which Eustatius a Greek Bishop said, that beauty which hath no grace, is a bait floating on the water without a hook, to be taken, and to catch nothing: but when these two things do meet, they exercise much power over hearts.

Beauty and grace of S. Helena.

And at that time Constantius felt the eys of Helena, had made more impression upon his soul, then could the sword upon his body: and being a Prince of a singular continency, so highly praised by the Pagans themselves, he would not require the daughter of his host by any other means then those of a lawful marriage, which Zosimus hath not wholly denied in this point, more respective, then some Grecians, of Christianity. The father seeing the honour done him by his host, made no difficulty to resolve upon it, and the prudent Helena with as much ease condescended to the will of those, to whom she owed her being. She entred into marriage for the universal good of the Church, to which she should bring forth a Constantine. Her first care was to soften the warlick humour of her husband, by the temper of sweetnes and goodnes, which she gave him in such sort, that in so great a rage of shedding of Christian blood which then reigned, he kept his hands the rest of his days most innocent.

His marriage.

This marriage was as the sacrifice of Juno, where the gall of the offering was never presented. There was so much love on both sides, that the spirit of Constantius lived onely in that of Helena, and Helena as the flower of the Sun perpetually followed the motions of this bright star, together with all the good dispositions of her husband. The young Constantine, born in the same Britain, seemed also more firmly to knit the knot of these chast loves, when behold an obstacle which interposeth.

Constantius is sent to succeed in the Empire, and is declared Cæsar by the Emperour Maximianus, on this condition, that he should forsake Helena his wife and marry Theodora, the daughter-in-law of the same Emperour. An Empire is a marvellous flash of lightning in the eys, it dazleth and shuts them up from all other consideration. This good husband, who had so much affection for his dear spouse, suffers himself to be won by the ambition and easines of his nature, which bowed much to the wills of those who seemed to wish him well, and by the lustre of the purple presented to him. Maximianus would needs play the Tyrant as well over loves, as men, and plotting marriages, placeth his daughter in the conjugal bed of Constantius, to plant him in the Throne of Cæsars.

Inconstancy of men.

S. Helena, of more worth then an Empire, understanding the news, bear this alteration with great constancy, not complayning, either of the chance, force, or disloyalty of Constantius, but accounted it an honour, that to refuse her no other cause was found, but the good fortune of her husband. She more feared then envied Sceptres, and was hidden in her little solitude as the mother of pearl under the waves, virtue of S. Helena.

waves, breeding up her young Constantine in such sort, as God should direct her, Constantius touched with this admirable virtue, lived in body with Theodora, and in heart with his Helena. He gave contentment in the East to a man imperious, and served the times, to have his will another day. But he was in the West, in the better part of himself. Besides, when he was absolute, and that he must needs divide the Empire with Galerius his Colleague, he voluntarily resigned the rest of the world unto him, to have France, Spain, and his Isle of England, where the moiety of his heart remained.

Love of Constantius and S. Helena.

It is a very hard matter long to restrain an honest and lawful love. It is said, when Sicily was torn from Italy by an arm of the Sea, which interposed it self athwart, Palm-trees were found by the violence of waters rent asunder, which in sign of love still bowed the one to the other, as protesting against the element, which had separated their loves. The like happened to Constantius and Helena; the torrent of ambitions, and affairs of the world having parted their bodies, could not hinder the inclinations of their hearts. Constantius returned into Great Britain, there to live and make his Tomb: for he in the end died in the City of York. And as he being on his death-bed was asked which of his children he would have succeed him, since besides Constantine he had three sons by Theodora; at that time forgetting his second wife and her Off spring, he answered aloud, CONSTANTINUM PIUM, I will have no other Successour but the PIOUS CONSTANTINE, which was approved by all the Army.

Thus God, the Master of Scepters and Empires, willing to reward the modesty of the virtuous Helena, laid hold of her bloud to give it the Empire of the world, in the end, leaving the sons of Theodora, to whom Maximian promised all the Greatness of the World.

The third SECTION.

His Education and Quality.

Gregor. epist. l. 5. ad Childeberrum Quanto cæteros homines regia dignitas antecellit, tanto cæteras gentium regna regni prosperitas vestri culmen excellit.

A Great Orator hath heretofore said, speaking of Constantine, that he appeared as much above Kings, as Kings above all other men. It is the Elogy, which afterward S. Gregory gave to our Kings. Verily he was accomplished with a spirit and body in so high a degree of perfection, that there needed no more but to see him, to judge him worthy of an Empire. Nature sometimes encloseth great souls in little bodies ill composed, as fortune hath likewise placed Kings in Shepherds Cottages. It is an unhappiness deserving some compassion, when a great Captain is of so ill a presence, as to be taken for one of his servants, and be made to cleave wood, and set the pot over the fire, to prepare his own dinner, as it heretofore happened to Philopœmen.

Beauty of Constantine.

Constantine took no care for falling into such accidents. It seemed, as Eumenius saith, that Nature from above had been dispatched as a brave Harbinger, to score out a lodging for this great soul, and to give him a body suitable to the vigour of his spirit, so well was it composed. He was of a stature streight as a Palm, of an aspect such, that the Orators of that time called it divine; of a port full of Majesty; his eys sparkled like two little stars, and his speech was naturally pithy, sweet, and eloquent, his body so able for Military exercises, that he amazed the strongest, and so sound, that he had no disease. In these members so well proportioned, reigned a vigorous spirit, very capable of learning, if the glory of Arms had not wholly transported him into actions of his profession. His father well enformed of his fair qualities, caused him to come into the East, where he took a tincture of good letters, at the least so much as was needful for a warlike Emperour, and applied himself seriously to the exercise of Arms, wherein he appeared with so much admiration, that he was already beheld with the same eye, one would an Achilles, or an Alexander, were they alive again.

He was bred in the Court of Diocletian.

Diocletian, who had not as yet forsaken the Empire, would have him at his Court, to work him from apprehension of Christianity, to which he might be already much disposed, and draw him to the hatred of our Religion. It was a most dangerous School for this young Prince: for Education ordinarily createth manners, and we are all, as it were, that which we have learned to be in our younger days. Constantine notwithstanding gathered flowers in this Garden-bed, not taking the breath of the Serpent which was hidden there-under. He soon learned from Diocletian Military virtue, prudence to govern Souldiers, good husbandry in Revenews, authority to become awful: but he took nothing either of his impiety or malice. This barbarous man in the beginning passionately loved him, and would perpetually have him by his sides; but when he saw that passing through Palestine and other parts of his Kingdom, the young Constantine was more respected then himself (so much his carriage, especially compared to the harsh countenance of the Emperour, had eminence in it) he began to grow into suspicion; and, as it is said, desired secretly to be rid of him. But Constantine prevented the blow, retiring under an honourable pretext to the Court of Galerius, the associate of his father Constantius, who most willingly left this son with him in pledge, thereby to hold some good correspondence with him.

Constantine at Court of Galerius.

This Galerius was a creature of Diocletian's, who had heretofore declared him Cæsar, yet still retained such power over him, that when he had displeased him, he made him run on foot after his Coach, not deigning so much as to look upon him. He in the beginning very courteously entertained the son of his faithful friend, affording him all manner of favours; but in process of time he conceived a strong jealousie, beholding in this young Mars more excellent parts, then he had done in all the Courts of the world besides.

Excess of virtues stand in the account of crimes with malign eys, so as to be culpable one must be an able man. Galerius resolved to overthrow Constantine, for those qualities which made him amiable to all the world; and not thinking it safe to take him away by main force, he made war against him, like a Fox, persecuting him in that manner, as sometimes Saul did the invincible David. He found by chance, that a King of the Sarmatians made an incursion on the territories of the Roman Empire, and shewed himself so furious, that none durst any more encounter him, then an enraged beast. Galerius gave commission to Constantine to bid him battel, thinking it was a most honourable pretext to be freed from him, and that he had a reasonable excuse with Constantius the father, when he should shew him his son dead in the bed of honour. The young man, who shut up his eys to danger, and only opened them to glory, went thither readily, and all succeeded so prosperously, that he not only brake the troops of the Sarmatians, but also led this King along enchained to Galerius. This man who received received not so much joy to see an enemy at his feet, as sorrow for the prosperity of a friend, very coldly commended this encounter, and determined with himself to involve the virtue of Constantine in other battels, still seeking in his valour the matter of his ruine.

ved

It was at that time a thing very ordinary, to make condemned men to fight with savage beasts in an Amphitheater, thereby to give contentment to those who are delighted to behold such spectacles. Galerius called for a combate of Lions, and beheld it with Constantine, who was very impatient to see, that such as undertook the assault of those beasts, performed it, in his opinion, so coldly. He therefore had a desire to adventure himself therein. Galerius, who observed him over-strong for men, thought he might finde his Tomb in the belly of Lions. Note, how under colour of withholding him, he thrust this young virtue further on, already much enkindled with his proper flames. The valiant Prince descendeth in person into the list, and assaileth the Lion, whom he slew with an incomparable strength, whereupon so loud acclamations, and such extraordinary applauses were raised through all the Amphitheater, to the honour of brave Constantine, that it alone was sufficient to make the treacherous Cæsar burst with anger.

Envy. Envy is a mischievous vice, it resembleth those Mountains which throw their burning entrails against flowers, that blossom on their tops, as the envious dart gall, and flames against those men, who bravely bloom over their heads.

Galerius made the son of his friend reign in hearts, by the same ways wherewith he endeavoured to deprive him of life and Scepter. In the end, he still persisting in his wickedness, and not ceasing to prepare new ambushes, some men of good understanding advised Constantine to withdraw himself from the malignity of this wicked man, which he did, forsaking his Court, without leave taken, and speedily returning into England, where at that time his father expected him with much impatience. Zosimus saith, That in this voyage he took the post-horses which best fitted him, and maimed all the other, to take from his enemies the means of pursuit.

The fourth SECTION.

His entry into the Empire.

IT was in this revolution of times that Diocletian and Maximian having dispossessed themselves of the Empire, and Constantius having swayed certain years with a most prosperous and peaceable government, died at York, a City of England, to the great grief of the West, which he had so prudently governed. Constantine by good chance was there, and nominated by his father for the Empire, a little before his death; which judgment was approved with such consent of the souldiers and all the people, that he had scarcely as yet wiped away his tears, when the Purple was cast on his shoulders, and he saluted Emperour. The good son, who thought on nothing, but to render the last duties of his piety to the memory of his father, found this honour unseasonable, and would have declined it by all means: but a grave Oratour hath said in his Panegyrick, there is no horse so swift, which can steal from mortal eys a man, whom the Providence of God pursueth with Empire in hand. He is constrained to yield, though through modesty he would not be absolutely pronounced Emperour, but contented himself with the title of Cæsar, well fore-seeing he was to have many great affairs upon his hand, before he could be peaceably established in his Throne.

Quis te Cylarus, aut Arion post sit eripere, quem sequatur Imperium? Eumenius.

The first shock he had, came from two Kings of Germany, to wit, Assacar, and Gaisus, who passing the Rhene with huge troops, endeavoured to overwhelm the Gauls, thinking to surprize a young Emperour, as yet uncollected in the uncertainty of his affairs. But he nothing amazed, speedily encounters, defeats, and takes them, leading them enchained in a triumph, whereupon succeeded an accident, which I should rather attribute to the humour of Diocletian then of Constantine. For, after he had taken his pleasure upon these two Kings, he delivered them over to wilde beasts in a combate, which he caused to be presented, for the entertainment of the people. And although the Oratours of his time much applauded this in him, as an act of justice, for the great havock they both had made, notwithstanding having regard to the quality of the persons, this proceeding cannot be excused from cruelty, never made familiar to the manners of Christians. Constant. an. 2.

A wonderful spectacle of the affairs of the world. This forraign war drew along with it civil wars, wherein the powers of the earth encountred together with incredible fervours, and terrible events. Behold a marvellous game, and a great spectacle of the vanities of the world: you shall see seven Princes, who aspired to the Monarchy, haling each one to himself a piece of the Purple, which they rent in pulling, and despoiled themselves of it, in seeking to put it on. The most fiery of them all, who would swallow the whole earth, could not have so much as five foot to cover his body.

Maxentius, the son of Maximian, companion of Diocletian, a man lost in conscience and reputation, condemned by the judgment of his own father, who thought him unworthy to succeed in the Empire, understanding that Constantius was dead, and that they had chosen his son the young Constantine, born of an English mother, entereth into desperate furies, and being then at Rome, ready for the purpose, caused himself to be declared Emperour, by the souldiers whom he had gained, alluring them by the means of large promises. Galerius, who after the death of Constantius, and the retirement of Diocletian and Maximian, thought himself the nearest to the Monarchy, laboureth speedily to hinder the tyranny of Maxentius; and having already made two Cæsars to succeed, to wit, Severus and Maximinus, he dispatcheth Severus with all diligence, to suppress Maxentius: and as this Severus was now gone out of Milan, bending towards Rome, with Legions of African souldiers, Maxentius prevented him, defeats him, as well by treason as force, takes him, and causeth him to be unworthily strangled. Galerius desperately incensed with this outrage, would needs fall upon the West, all full of lightenings and flames; but the distrusts of the safety of his territories staied him, and made him create another Cæsar, named Licinius: after whose nomination he survived not long, for he died of an incurable Ulcer, Heaven revenging his mis-deeds by a horrible malady and an enraged death. After his decease, these two Cæsars, who were both of his faction, Licinius and Maximinus beheld one another with a jealous eye, and made shew of contestation; but Maximinus dying at Tharsus, of a very sudden death, decideth the difference by an irrevocable resignation.

Maximian the ancient companion of Diocletian would needs return to the Empire, and his Oration upon that subject.

In the mean time Maximian, who despoiled of the Empire, before he had a will to resign it, as yet retained blood sparkling in the veins, like a young man: and seeing they had lifted his son to the the Throne, whom he had ever reputed a man of no worth, burnt with jealousie, and burst with anger. He therefore hastened to finde out his old Hermit Diocletian in his grot, (a) and endeavoured to perswade him by all means possible to reassume the Empire.

(a) At Constantina a little village of Sclavonia, which Zosimus maketh to pass for the City of Charters by a notable equivocation, reading Carnuti, for Carnuti.

Shall we endure (saith he) Great Augustus, this youngster so proudly to insult over the patrimonie of the universe, and make sport with the majestie of the Roman Empire? Your authoritie transported me to a resolution, to which, that I may speak freely, I never had any great inclination: But I patiently bare it whilest I saw Galerius and Constantius in the government of the Empire, who seemed two heads very fit for a Crown. But now behold my Maxentius, to whose trust I would not have committed the house of a silly Burgess of Rome, to govern it; behold a young Britan, and another I know not who, true mushromes sprung up in a night, that would divide between them Europe, Asia, and Africa. God knoweth, what I speak, is not through ambition, but seeing the house of our fathers, and our own all on fire; it is very good reason we bring water to quench it. What do you here in this miserable grot? You are not made for it: the Eternal Providence, which should have fixed you on the government of the world, so necessarie are you for it, is ashamed to see you among beasts and peasants. To speak freely, you do amiss, and it is very ill interpreted; your great courage hath ever better hitherto loved to erre, then avow a fault: and I still was of your opinion, while time permitted; but at this present, when the world runs all into confusion, expecting no reparation but from your hands, with what water can you wash the stains of the blood, not of one man nor of two, but of a whole world, which shall stick upon your forehead, and of all posterity, if to obey a fantasie of spirit you suffer the Empire to be lost? Think you when these young men shall be Masters, you shall enjoy this grot in safety? You have too much courage, and Tyrannie hath too much distrust, to leave you so much as life, when it can uncontrollably take it from you. Let us go presently and reassume the Diadem; we shall no sooner stamp with a foot, but we shall make all the world follow us in arms, for our service. If you still affect this kind of retirement, you shall thither return again, when we have pacified all: but believe me an Empire is a shirt, never to be put off but with life.

These perswasions were very moving: notwithstanding Diocletian, who concluded all his wisdom in the obstinacie of his resolutions, replyeth:

A brave reply of Diocletian

Maximian, I absolutely renounce all the friendship which is between us, if ever you speak to me of such affairs. what levitie have you observed in my proceedings, to perswade me to this change? I protest before the Gods immortal, I will never return to the government of the Empire, no more then into my mothers womb. Miserable man that you are, have you yet so little experience of the vanities of worldly things, as to prefer a rag of Purple before your liberty? I do not know what contentment you may take in government, but for my part, I protest I then slept on thorns, and fed on gall. I neither enjoyed day nor night, either rest or travel, nay not sleep; ambition depriving me of things which criminals finde under fetters, and which Nature is pleased, should be common to all the world. I must live by exteriour shews, countenances, and smoaks; and if others once did what I would have them, they made me a thousand times do what I would not. It is said, a Planet which hath its exaltation in one sign, finds ever its counterpoize in another. If I had any good successe on the one side, I was ever paid on the other with some discontent. My desires were infinite, and though I seemed very potent, I never had the hundreth part of what I wished; and verily I knew not my self what I would have, so many things desired I, which daily taught me mine own impotencie. What a goodly delight have we to cover the earth with Arms, and the Sea with Vessels, and fetch a great circuit to seek out a felicity, which we never finde? What libertie, to live a slave of the world, to possess the world? What riches, to beg even from the sweat of a peasant, to entertain riot? What tranquillitie, to live perpetually in torment.

Your conscience knows this to be true, which I say: When you and I would intermeddle with affairs, according to the obligation of our charges, what care must there be for revenews? What travel for military matters? What watching for justice? What noise upon the complaints of so many Provinces poured out at our feet? What fear of surprizes? What distrust of friends? What deadly sweats for treason? What anxieties, and what apprehensions of so many lamentable events, which would happen to others before our eys? If we resigned the care of affairs to two or three men of our cabinet, they disturbed one another, and sold us to their ambition under colour of service. In the end they caused us to carry the seeming Scepter of all their folly, and made us accountable for all the havock, injustices, and miseries of humane kind. Is not here cause enough to desire such slaverie? If you and I had bodies of whales to cloath, and stomacks to be fed with huge sums of gold every hour in the day, I would say, that needs we must return to these kind of spoils to content us. But we have to do with few things, and for a little space. I swear unto you, that from the time I betook me to this retirement, it hath seemed that all the elements were for me, and that I never was more powerful, more rich, or contented. I have found all that, which I sought for, health, repose, truth, wisdom, arts, and the Gods. Go not now about to colour your specious oration with pretexts of the publick good. I well know where your ambition itcheth: believe me, he is nearest to heaven, who least careth in whose hands the earth is. What importeth it, that young Constantine, Maxentius, and Lycinius divide the world? I shall see them strive together, like ants about a grain of earth. If the world must be lost, as it is very likely, I had rather it were in their hands then mine. I very well see the Empire is sick to the death; I have forsaken it, like an old Phisician, and will bease no more speech of it, then of a bodie in the coffin. Believe me, neither you nor I can do any thing for its health but to witness our inabilitie. All those who have admired our resolution in forsaking the Diadem, will be the first that will cast the stone against our inconstancy, if we weakly go about to require again that which we so generously have abandoned. God forbid I should enter into a fantasie to despoile my self of a glory, that never any one Monarch had before me, which is the contempt of a world, when I had it in mine hands. If you be resolved to loose your self, do it without company; your friendship ought to pretend nothing upon me to the prejudice of mine honour and conscience. And whereas you propose unto me the danger of my person, I do not think that envy will extend it self over the Coleworts and Lettice of this little Garden, planted by mine own hands: and should they come thither, I have already lived long enough, according to the course of nature, enough to satisfie the desire, which I had of glory, and too much to see the miseries of the world. I will not think much to render up this life, which I have upon my lips, to him who gave it me.

We must needs say this man had a great understanding, and goodly Maxims: for had not mischief given him the spirit of an hangman against Christianity, he might be accounted in the number of the greatest Emperours. Maximian was much amazed at the constancy of his resolution. Notwithstanding, the desire he had to return to his former honour being insatiable, he spared not to take the purple again, and bear himself as Emperour, protesting it was the desire of publick good, which put the Scepter into his hands.

Maximian the baloon of fortune.

It is an admirable thing, how his ambition was discountenanced. He, who promised himself much respect, was hissed at by the souldiers, as a man vain, unconstant, and shallow, was chased out of Italie, and Sclavonia, and other places, which he sought to possess, and reduced as it were to such terms, as to see himself at the mercy of his son, which he apprehended as the last of his afflictions: although some have thought there was collusion between the father and the son, for the accommodation of their affairs. He wished now to be in the bottom of a cave with his Diocletian: but since he had begun the play, he must finish his act. The subtile man, who well foresaw that Maxentius, a brain-sick Prince, was upon ruin, resolved to league himself firmly to the fortune of Constantine. Behold why being retired in haste towards him, having engaged his house in the Empire, it was not difficult for him to finde access there, as also for that the new Emperour in this great concourse of arms and affairs, was very willing to make use of the counsel of a man refined in policie.

Maximian entreth so far into the heart and judgment of Constantine, that to tie him the more to himself, and wholly cement up his own affairs, he gave his daughter Fausta in marriage to him; whom the young Prince espoused in his second wedlock, having first of all been married to Minervina, by whom he had two children, Crispus, and Helena. This marriage of Fausta was solemnized with much magnimagnificence, and the son rendred so much honour to his father-in-law, that he seemed to retain nothing of the Empire, but the name and habit, dividing with him the rest of his power.

3. Disposition.

We may well say, the spirit of Maximian was turbulent and insupportable; for not satisfying himself with all this excellent entertainment, he thought he was nothing, if he wore not upon his forehead the Diadem which he had forsaken. He began to set things in order at the Court, and to prepare factions in such sort, that he seemed to have no other purpose but to set his son, and his son-in-law together by the ears, to enjoy both their spoils. In the end, he put his design very far upon the fortune and life of Constantine, and being as he was vain to talk of his enterprizes namely to his daughter Fausta, whom he esteemed to be of a good disposition, he opened himself so much to her, that he made, as saith the Wise-man, Of his lips, the snare of his soul. For the young married wife, having more affection in store for her husband, then her father, and who having already the tast of Empire, would not yield it up to him, to whom she had owed her birth, hastened to tell all to Constantine, advising he should take heed of his father-in-law, and that he was a wicked man, who would, if it were possible, deceive all the gods of Olympus for the desire he had to reign. Maximian well perceiving that his daughter had discovered the plot, and that there was no further safety for him at the Court of his son-in-law, secretly stole away, and endeavoured to regain the East: but was taken tardy at Marsellis, and there strangled, to give an end to his life and all his designs. Some have written that he hanged himself through despair of his affairs, others, that it was by the commandment of Constantine: others have said, that his son-in-law was willing to save him, but the publick hatred born against Maximian prevented clemency, which I think the more probable. Verily I would not disguise the exorbitances practised by Constantine, before his entrance into Christianity, for he cannot be justified upon some disorders. But since Zosimus the Historian, who pardoneth him in nothing, chargeth him not with this death, I see no cause why we should accuse him.

Eusebius.

Behold the desperate end of Maximian, after he had persecuted the Church, embroiled Empires, all armed the whole world by the extravagances of his ambition, an infamous halter taketh a little air from him, which he thought he could not freely enough breath, whilest any man stood more eminent then himself. Let us now see the good government of his son.

Victor. Nazarius. Non omnia potes, Dii te vindicant & invitum.

The fifth SECTION.

His Prowess against Maxentius.

Constant. 7.

Maxentius had reduced the City of Rome into such a condition, that there was no Forrest of Thieves wherein the lives of Citizens were not more safe then in their houses. He who held his advancement from souldiers, for recompence gave them the priviledge of all crimes: so that in the brave Orations which he made to them, no words were more frequent in his mouth, then these, Fruimini, dissipate, prodigite: Enjoy, riot, spend; and what he said in words, he first of all taught by example. What ever avarice could do in rapines, prodigality in profusions, cruelty in massacres, luxury in adulteries, a barbarous life in all kind of brutishness, returned upon the great Theater of the world, in the person of Maxentius. When he had caused houses to be rifled, and unworthily massacred the best qualified Senatours, he betook himself to the honour of Ladies, which he endeavoured to taint with all sorts of Artifices. Among other things it is recounted, that having cast his eys upon a Lady, a Christian by profession, and wife of a Senatour of an honourable rank, he dispatched villains, who served him in such like ordures, to attach her, with sword and violence in their hands. The timerous husband said to the Emperours Guard, he would refer this matter to be treated at the will of his wife. She understanding what was practised, went presently out, and shewed to these wicked messengers, that she was not now in a fit state to be presented before the Emperours eys, and prayed, they would give her a little time to put on her attires; which they most willingly condescended unto. The couragious woman, inspired as it was thought, with a particular instinct from God, cast her self at the feet of our Saviour, holding a Poniard in her hands, and thereupon began to say: What shall we do, O holy chastity, which I with so much loyalty have preserved in the Conjugal bed, never having admitted a forraign love to enter into my heart? Shall we now abandon thee to the pollutions of a Tyrant, forsaken both by God and men? Let us rather dye. Dye? It is one of my great desires, but to dye by mine own hands, is a sin. Yet the inspiration of God dictates to me, he will not be offended with the remedy, which is only left me to decline my happiness. I will follow the spirit, and leave nothing to the flesh, wherewith to displease God. If there be a fault in it, my hope shall smother it, and my blood shall wash it away. Upon these words, interrupted with sighs, she thrust the Poniard into her bosom, giving end to her life, to eternize her honour.

Strange Tragedy.

Simil. S. Ambros. l. 3. de virginibus.

The Bauds who expected her at the gate, wondering much at the length of time she bestowed in dressing, entred into the chamber, and found her drenched in her own blood, wherewith they were so amazed, that fear gave them wings to fly, and make relation to the Emperour of what had passed: but the wretched Pharaoh, was not for all this any thing mollified, still continuing his Sacrileges with magick and horrible witchcrafts, until such time that Constantine came to awaken him.

Behold one of the noblest acts of valour, which hath ever been among all the Emperours, that either have preceeded, or succeeded the great Constantine. For having sought peace by all manner of reasonable ways, and seeing Maxentius would by no means hearken unto it, but that he caused his images and statues to be broken and dragged over Dunghils, he resolved to assault him with a just war, in which he began, although not publickly, to abandon the false gods, and resign himself into the hands of the Saviour of the world, thereunto invited by that excellent vision of the Cross, and other circumstances, which I reserve for subsequent Sections, where I intend to speak of his calling to Christianity.

It was from this time he took the fatal Banner, called the Labarum, wherein the name of our Saviour was written in certain cyphers.

The Army of Maxentius was composed, by the report of Zosimus, of an hundred threescore and ten thousand foot-men, with eighteen thousand horse; forces so terrible, that they were able to stop the most adventurous.

Constantine amassed together Gauls, and from England and France it self, in the name of Inhabitants upon Rhein, all the forces he could get, and put into the field about ninety thousand foot-men, with many horses of service, which onely amounted to eight thousand. It is the supputation of Zosimus; although others sufficiently declare the troops were far less. He, who by relation of Eusebius was then about thirty years of age, although others make him younger, shewed in the manage of this Army, all the qualities which might be desired in the most accomplished Captain. For he marched from the Rhein unto the wals of Rome, with singular order, and unparalelled dexterity.

When he entred into Italy he found many resistances both of men and Cities, who endeavoured to stop his passage, in such sort, that needs he must give two or three battels, which he most couragiously won, forcing the rebellious Cities, and very courteously using those who rendered themselves into his hands. In the end he resolved to besiege the City of Rome. Maxentius, who might have tyred him out with long delays, resolved to oppose, and with all expedition joyn battel, confideing in the vast multitude of his forces, which were very fresh to set upon an Army, already wearied with so great a journey.

Besides, he had many notable works over Tyber, on the bridge Milvius, which the Romans now call Ponte-mole. His engineers promised him, that with certain buckles of Iron they would build and demolish the bridge as he should think good: so that when his Army was to pass, it should go upon firm ground, and when Constantine with his troups set foot upon it, they were but to let a certain engin loose to drown the bridge and cast it into the river. It seemed to Maxentius he had two strings to his bow, either to overthrow Constantine in the field with an huge Army, or entrap him with the stratagem of this bridge, when he was engaged in the battel, and that he had given him a taste of pursuit.

Upon this resolution he passed the Tyber with his Army. Constantine, most glad to have drawn him out of the wals of Rome, arrangeth his battalions with marvellous dexterity, and disposed his souldiers to the fight. Behold two dreadful Armies, which looked one upon another like to huge clouds full of storms, ready to pour down upon the heads of many mortals. The lot is cast, and the quarrel of the Empire of the world must be determined in few hours. The brave Constantine resolved with that small proportion of horse he had, yet men most daring, to assail the Cavalrie of Maxentius, and for a singular testimony of his valour, and the trust he had in God, he first of all appeared in the head of his Army, and with many paces set forward before the rest, making his horse curvet in a martial manner. It was an easie matter to know him, for his Arms shined all with gold, and his Helmet was set with precious stones. His enemies began to fall roundly upon him; but the Captains of Constantine, seeing their Emperour so generously to out-brave danger, followed him with such fervour, as if every one of them expected an Empire for recompence. They fell like lightning upon their enemies, who were much amazed at this first charge; yet they notwithstanding made good resistance, but maugre all their endeavours, those of Constantine brake through, and defeated them.

Maxentius defeated.

Maxentius beholding his Cavalry, in which he reposed all his hope, to be so ill handled, resolved upon a retreat, to make use of his bridge, and drown Constantine engaged in the pursuit of those that fled. But oh the justice of God! The wicked man, as saith the Royal Prophet, falleth into the ditch which he himself had digged. It is not known whether those besotted engineers failed in their design, or whether the great numbers of those that fled caused this ruin: but the bridge brake under Maxentius his feet, and threw him into Tyber all bloody, like another Pharaoh in the red Sea, with all the principal of his Empire, who environed his person. He amazed at so violent a fall, hoped yet to recover the other shore, being excellently mounted, where he was seen to wrestle a certain time with the waves, which in the end swallowed him up. There was in the beginning a great slaughter of those, who made resistance: but in the end seeing their Emperour drowned, they yielded all to the mercy of Constantine, who stayed the victorious sword in the hands of souldiers, to consecrate it to clemency.

He did well to search for the body of Maxentius in Tyber to take off his head, which was fixed on the point of a Lance, and borne to Rome and Africk, to satisfie justice for the enormous forfeits he had committed when he was alive. From thence this brave Conquerour is received in the City of Rome, as an Angel descended from heaven, for the deliverance of the world. Never was triumph so highly valued as his, because in the tropheys of other Emperours, they triumphed for the gaining of some far-distant province; but in this, lost Rome recovered it-self. The Queen of Nations ceased to be the prey of Nations, and breathed now a sweeter ayr of antient liberty. If ever prince saw a glorious day in all his life, this was it, which shined then over the head of Constantine. They came from all parts of Italy to behold him, and those who had seen him thought they had lived long enough, supposing it unfit to behold any other humane thing. Amongst so many notable spectacles at that time in the City, none was looked upon, but he; his face was the object of all their admirations, and his valour the matter of all discourses.

The Senate, to witness the joy they conceived for this victory, prepared him a triumphal Arch, all of marble, one of the stateliest monuments that ever had been raised to the honour of a Conquerour, wherein this Inscription was engraven.

IMP. CÆS. FL.
CONSTANTINO
MAXIMO. P.F. AUGUSTO.
S. P. Q. R.

QUOD INSTINCTU DIVINITATIS, MENTIS MAGNITUDINE, CUM EXERCITU SUO, TAM DE TYRANNO, QUAM DE EJUS OMNI FACTIONE, UNO TEMPORE, JUSTIS REMPUBLICAM ULTUS EST ARMIS, ARCUM TRIUMPHIS INSIGNEM DICAVIT.

This said that the Senate and people of Rome dedicated this triumphal Arch to Constantine Emperour and Great Pontifice, happy Prince, and Augustus: because by an instinct of Divinity, and an admirable greatness of courage, he had with his Army freed the Common-wealth from a Tyrant and all his faction, by the justice of his arms: where, in the Arch on the right hand were read these words, Liberatori Urbis; on the left hand, Fundatori Quietis; which clearly declared him, the Freer of the City, and Founder of Repose. There was likewise inscribed on it the number of years, in which they desired to render vows for this glorious victory. Observe, as you pass along, that the Senate was as yet Pagan, yet knowing the devotion which Constantine bare to the Saviour of the world, though he were not then a declared Christian, they abstained from the mention of Gods, and spake only of one Divinity.

it

The sixth SECTION.

The death of Diocletian, and feats of Arms, performed by Constantine against Lycinius.

SInce I have undertaken to represent the famous warlike Acts of Constantine to shew his arrival to Monarchy, I will here insert the end of Diocletian and Lycinius. When Constantine caused his Standards to march against Maxentius, there remained no more of so many Cæsars, but Lycinius, who was created a little before the death of Galerius. The brothers of Constantine would alter nothing. Diocletian remained in his retirement. There was none but this Lycinius, who was an old Souldier, a man raised from nothing, but advanced by Arms, and who had done so good services to Galerius, the creature of Diocletian, in the war which he had against the Persians, that out of meer respect of his valour he was chosen Emperour.

In all other things he was of a rude and gross spirit, as derived from Peasants, and who all his life had done nothing else but handle iron, either for tillage, or war, not having acquired any neatness of a civil life. Behold the cause, why being ignorant and proud, he extremely hated learning, which he called the poyson of the Empire; and had it been in his power, he would have banished all knowing men, that there might be none able to reproach his ignorance. Constantine, as wise as he was warlike, saw well, he must manage this spirit, who might much trouble him in his design against Maxentius, for which cause following this counsel, he promised him a share in the Empire, and his sister Constantia in marriage. It is held, this marriage was solemnized at Milan, a little after the defeat of Maxentius, where many treaties passed between Constantine and Lycinius touching their principalities, and from that time a most favourable Edict was made for the re-establishment of Christians, and the honour of Christianity; which Lycinius, although a Pagan, refused not to sign.

Victor addeth, that Diocletian was sent for to the Wedding of Lycinius. For it was much desired to hear him speak, and see what he had upon his heart, his spirit being very able to give cause of distrust to two Princes, who were desirous to establish themselves in all security.

The subtile Hermit on the other side, who feared to be overtaken, made an answer, in which he besought their Majesties to give him leave to live in his Hermitage, and afford him that for delight, which others commonly took for punishment. That he had not for the time to come, any minde upon marriages, and that as his age dispensed him from voyages, so retirement freed him from the vain pleasures of the world. That his presence contributed nothing to this action: that the uneasines of ways would much prejudice his health. In the end, since the resolution he had made never to enter into the manage of any affairs, had left him no other share but vows and prayers, he would employ them for their prosperities.

These fair words satisfied not the Emperours, who had a desire to draw the Wolf out of the wood, which gave them occasion to write back again to Diocletian Letters very sharp, as if they would willingly involve him in the business of Maxentius. At this time the miserable man plainly saw, the vengeance of God sought him out in the place which he so obstinately chose for his repose.

When that notable Edict was read unto him, which was made in favour of Christians, and that he understood Churches were already built for them every where, that they assembled to celebrate their Feast with all liberty, that Constantine had caused the Cross to be set even in his Banners, and that on every side the praises of Jesus of Nazareth were preached; on the contrary, that the Temples of false Gods were shut up, their Statues broken, their Altars overturned, and that all Paganism went to confusion; this direful Persecutour then felt an infinite number of Vipers to tear his entrails. And Victor. seeing besides, that he with so much sharpnes was sent for, he imagined the Christians victorious over persecution, would rent him in a thousand pieces. Thereupon, having his soul extremely perplexed, and his body burthened with diseases, languishing and incurable, he perpetually invoked death, the most amiable of all his Goddesses, to deliver him from the ignominies and toyls of life. In the end, she too slowly answering his desire, as the most probable opinion speaks, he hastened her pace, taking poyson, as a man who could not dye by a worse hand then his own.

Behold the desperate end of the greatest Persecutour, which the Church hath ever had: who endeavouring to extirpate our Religion, hath filled our Martyrlogies with the names of Martyrs, our Altars with veneration, Christianity with Crowns, and the World with Virtues, and buried himself in the tomb of despair and infamy; to teach all Great ones, that a worse blindnes cannot fall upon them, then the persecution of Innocents, whose blood hath a voice in it, which crieth out to the memory of all Ages.

Lycinius being alienated from the friendship of Constantine, failed not to put Diocletian into the number of the gods, although himself were shortly after to be razed from the number of men. This creature, who by report of Heathens of his own faction, was covetous, cholerick, and lascivious, could not long comply with the humours of Constantine: for he ceased not to torment the Christians which were in his Empire, with excessive cruelties, though himself, as we have said, had signed Edicts in their favour. Condition of Lycinius.

Constantine, who suffered as much as he thought reasonable, seeing his spirit became untractable, armed against him. The first encounter was at Cibales, a City of Sclavonia, where Constantine was encamped upon a Hill, and Lycinius in the Valley. The battel was very sharp on both sides, it lasted a whole day, from morning till night, they scarcely breathing; and therein Constantine was in much danger, had it not been that the spur of honour that pricked him on, made him do admirable things, which in the end discomfited Lycinius, and put him to flight. He went creeping away like an old Serpent, who had received many blows, but yet retained strength and poyson. For having gained Thrace, where he thought himself strongest, he rallied his troops and disposed himself for another war. First battel against him.

Constantine stoutly follows him, finding means to pass the Rivers, whereof these flying enemies had broken the Bridges to cut off their way, and he so 2. Battel.

speeded, that he suddenly was in Thrace, near to the Army of Lycinius. From that very evening he ranged his forces for fight, resolving to give them battel at the break of day. Lycinius seeing they followed him so hard at heels, made him a virtue of necessity, and animated himself to sustain the shock, having no want of men able to do bravely. This second battel was also very rough, both parties bearing themselves manfully: and the ballance of victory seeming not yet to incline either to one side or other, behold five thousand Legionaries of Constantine, that had very long chased Lycinius, not being able to overtake him, arrived in the heat of this battel, and fell upon his Army to enclose it; but he, who was, to say truly, valiant in the art Military, defended himself very well, and in the end freeth himself from this fight, with composition to leave Sclavonia to Constantine, contenting himself to reign in Thrace, and the Eastern parts.

This accord was signed with the blood of Valens, whom Lycinius had before created Cæsar, and whose punishment Constantine demanded in this treaty of peace, as he who was authour of all those Civil dissentions. This peace so plaistered up, lasted not long. Lycinius, still upon alteration, could not contain himself within the limits of reason. He gathered together a great multitude of Ships from the Coast of Cyprus, Egypt, Venetia, Africa, Bithynia, and other places, and set a great Armado to Sea. On the other part, he had an hundred and fifty thousand Foot in the field, with fifteen thousand horse. Constantine well perceived that he aimed at Monarchy, and had set up his rest. This was the cause why he prepared forces to confront him, making a Naval Army of about two hundred great Ships of war, with two thousand of burthen, a Foot-force of an hundred and twenty thousand men, ten thousand as well Cavaliers, as brave Sea-men.

Great victory of Constantine.

Now was the time the affair of Empires must peremptorily be decided. Constantine armed with the confidence which he had in the Saviour of the world, whose banner was then advanced in all his Armies, knowing that Lycinius was at that time encamped at Adrianople, overtook him passing the river Ister, at this present called Mariza, so suddenly, that at the first encounter he routed all his Army, killing thirty four thousand of his men, and taking a very great many other prisoners, who yielded to his obedience. Lycinius was so amazed with this blow, that he speedily retired to Byzantium, which afterwards was Constantinople, where Constantine pursued, and hardly pressed him. In the mean time Ablantus, who had the charge of the Sea-forces of Lycinius, resolving to give battel, put to Sea a great quantity of vessels in a streight, which could not bear such a number. The Admiral of Constantine determined to assault him, with only fourscore light ships, who at advantage assailed him, finding him much plunged in his Fleet. Night having broken off this first encounter, they began a fresh in the open Sea, where the tempest handled the vessels of Lycinius so ill, that an hundred and thirty were lost, and the rest put to flight.

Whilest these things were in doing, Constantine very streightly besieged the City of Byzantium, having raised plat-forms that were like huge mountains, which at the least equalled in height the walls of the City, from whence he battered it, and endammaged it with much facility. Lycinius seeing it was not the securest way for him, gaineth Bithynia, where he trieth his utmost endeavour, making arrows of all wood: but all succeeded so ill with him, that of an Army which exceeded an hundred thousand men, there scarce remained thirty thousand. He, who could not yet finde in his heart to give over, shuts himself up in the City of Nicomedia, where Constantine furiously assaulteth him; so that seeing himself upon the extreme despair of his affairs, he went out of the City, and cast himself at the feet of Constantine, laying aside the Purple Robe, and Diadem, and only demanding a place of safety, where he might pass the rest of his days, which could not much longer continue, for he was fully threescore years of age.

End of Lycinius.

A certain Priest of Nicomedia, who lived at that time there, and who set hand to this History, saith, That Constantine sent him into France, to bewail his sins; but the more probable opinion is, that he put him to death, being weary of his disturbances, and having much distrust of his spirit, notwithstanding that Constantia still lived, and begged of her brother the life of her husband. Constantine cannot be excused to have used most severe punishments even against his neareſt kindred, having still in his head the fire of war and ambition, and not being reconciled but very late to the mildness of Christianity.

Behold how so many Emperours being removed, he remained sole Master of the world, making afterwards divisions to his brothers, the sons of Theodora, as he thought good. He that would attentively consider this arrival of Constantine to Monarchy, and the reign of more then thirty years, which God gave him, shall see more clear then day, that all these favours came not to him, but by the virtue of true Religion, whose Altars he the first of all Emperours exalted.

The seventh SECTION.

The Vices and Passions of Constantine before Baptism; with the death of Crispus and Fausta.

I Will not here present unto you a Constantine in outward lineament, as Eusebius hath done, to cover his faults, and only expose beauties to view. It is no wonder that he had vices before Baptism, but it is the miracle of Christianity, to change Lions into Lambs, Sinks into Fountains, and Thorns into Roses and Tulipans. The ice of winter makes the beauty of the spring, darkness contributes to the luster of light, nor ever is the Sun more bright, then after an Eclipse. So grace, which is the splendour of eternal light, makes it self to be seen with more triumphs in arms, where it hath subdued most iniquities. It is certain, that this warlike humour of Constantine, transported him into vanities, ambitions, jealousies, and in some sort into a bloody disposition, which was greatly fomented by the education he received in the Palace of Diocletian.

Behold a prodigious accident, which happened in his house, by a precipitation ill ordered, the death of his poor son Crispus, poysoned by the commandment of his father, upon a wicked and sinister calumny raised upon him by his step-mother. Verily my Pen shaketh with humour, being to touch upon this History, and I know many Grecian flatterers either have passed it over in silence, or been willing to disguise it in favour of Constantine: but the holy Martyr Artemius freely avoweth before Julian the Apostata who reproached him with it, for bearing to deny a fact, which was very notorious, yet desirous to sweeten it by intervening circumstances. Cardinal Baronius is much displeased with Eusebius, who hath spoken nothing of it, as if it were a thing very ſtrange, that a man, who wrote to the ſon the life of his father, in form of a Panegyrick, ſhould not charge his writings with crimes and furies, which men then endeavoured to ſuppreſs by all means. Great men may have their judgments too tender for ſuch like Hiſtories, and ordinarily reſemble that creature, which bears his gall in his ear. They cannot hear a true Hiſtory in any thing which toucheth them, without offence; they muſt ſometimes underſtand their own lives in the rumours of people: where the one unlimittedly takes the liberty of ſpeaking all, ſince the other takes licence of doing all.

Constant. 19. Bar.

it

Alban. animal. Albertus.

The vices of Conſtantine about theſe times cannot be concealed. But he having cauſed his ſon Criſpus to be put to death, and thereunto added the death of his wife Fauſta, who had raiſed the calumny againſt the innocent, this Diſtick was affixed to the gates of his Palace, attributed afterward to Conſtil Ablavius.

Saturni aurea ſæcla quis requirat?
Sunt hæc gemmea, ſed Neroniana.

It was an alluſion to the humour of Conſtantine, who much loved pearls and pretious ſtones; as alſo to that, which paſſed in the matter of Criſpus and Fauſta, the ſubſtance whereof is this: Let us not ſeek any more for the golden Age of Saturn: Behold one all of pearl, but the Age of Nero.

Let us ſpeak what we think moſt probably to have happened in this affair. We have already mentioned, how Conſtantine in the prime of his youth was eſpouſed in his firſt Wedlock to Minervina, upon which the Writers of his time have much praiſed him, as a Prince very chaſt, who to avoid wandering and unlawful pleaſures, willingly tyed himſelf to a legitimate marriage, and from that time took upon him the ſpirit of a husband. It is an eaſie matter to believe, that this Minervina, whom he married, had taken the name of Minerva, becauſe of the wiſdom, grace, and beauties, reſplendent in her perſon. It ſeemeth theſe great perfections of minde and body, ever draw along with them a certain fate, which affordeth them no long continuance, but rather the lives of Roſes, that in the evening make a tomb of the ſcarlet, whereof in the morning they made a Cradle. The poor Princeſs quickly died, after ſhe had brought forth to Conſtantine at one birth, which was her firſt and laſt, two Twins, to wit, a ſon named Criſpus, and a daughter, who from the name of her Grand-mother, was called Helena, and afterward married to Julian the Apoſtata.

The firſt marriage of Conſtantine.

Minervina.

Criſpus and his qualities.

This Criſpus was verily the moſt accompliſhed Prince of that Age, for he at the very firſt ſucked in piety with his milk, having the moſt glorious S. Helena for his firſt Miſtreſs in Chriſtianity. From thence being initiated in the ſtudy of good Letters, he had for Tutor that famous man Lactantius Firmianus, one of the moſt eloquent and ancienteſt Authours of Chriſtianity: who being the inſtructer of Cæſars, notwithſtanding lived in ſuch poverty, that he with much ſtraitneſs enjoyed the neceſſities of life. Criſpus having manured his ſpirit with learning, very courageouſly addicted himſelf to the exerciſe of arms; wherein he very well expreſſed the Genius and dexterity of his father, but with much more grace and ſweetneſs. For Hiſtories aſſure us, he was of viſage moſt amiable, full of attractives and admiration, which made upon the mindes of men ſo much the more impreſſion, as they were ingrafted in a ſingular modeſty, and a goodneſs ſo natural, that no man could near hand behold it without affection.

O God, what fury is there in diſhoneſt love, and how much did it diſturb the houſe of Conſtantine! If Lords and Ladies who give admittance to affections and thoughts unlawful, did well conſider the acerbities which attend this paſſion, they would rather rear their hearts out with their nails, then pollute them with ſuch ordures. It is not without cauſe, what the wiſe Ariſtophanes hath ſaid, that love was baniſhed from Heaven, as a trouble-feaſt and diſturber of the repoſe of Divinities. The truth is, where this paſſion ſetteth foot, it exileth from thence innocency, and tranquility, two the moſt pretious pearls of life; and were there wicked loves in Heaven, there would no longer be felicities. Happy is that life, which hath no eys for thoſe carnal beauties, and is all eys to preſerve it ſelf, eſpecially in the beginning, from ſuch ſurprizals.

So Simon the Magician ſaid, That the ſoul of Helena had put fire, trouble and jealouſie among the Angels, but that taking from them this object of concupiſcence he had accorded them. Philaſtrius de hæreſ.

The miſerable Fauſta wife of Conſtantine, daughter of Maximian, who had received good education in the houſe of her father, and was of a very ſenſual humour, even ſo far as to controle the devotions of her husband, and pick quarrels againſt Religion, which ſhe would never embrace, had in this diſorder vehement diſpoſitions, ſiniſterly to admit the love which the beauty of Criſpus might eaſily afford her. This divine feature ſtanding alwaies as an object for the wanton eys of the Empreſs, enkindled ſo much fire in her veins, that another flame muſt be found to quench it. The children which ſhe had by her husband were nothing to her, in compariſon of Criſpus: Criſpus was in her heart, Criſpus in her thought, Criſpus in her diſcourſe, wherein ſhe yet had ſome temper, fearing to diſcover her paſſion. Yet could ſhe not forbear but ſay, Criſpus was the Idæa of perfect men, and the incomparable ſon, whoſe worth and virtue would ſurvive with the world. It was much wondered, how a ſtep-mother ſhould entertain ſo much good opinion of the ſon of her husband; yet ſhe having hitherto lived within the limits of honour, it was interpreted, all theſe affections were ſincere and innocent. Criſpus, who then thought not upon his own defence, in a combat that was nothing but courteſie, took all theſe favours as witneſſes of a moſt unſpotted amity, reciprocally rendering to her much reſpect, wherewith ſhe ſhewed her ſelf not a little troubled, deſiring he would treat with her in a more free faſhion: for love had already deſpoiled her of majeſty.

Saint Auguſtine hath very well ſaid, that he who will puniſh an exorbitant ſpirit, muſt leave it in its own hands, to ſerve both as a ſcaffold and executioner to it ſelf. The unfortunate Fauſta, who had already given over-free paſſage to ſin, felt acceſſes of ice and fire, of deſires, of affrightments, of confidence, and remorſe. Her conſcience accuſed her in the bottom of her heart, and ceaſed not to ſhew her the enormity of this fault, when by the help of impudency, ſhe thought to have quenched theſe little ſparkles of goodneſs which God ſoweth in the moſt forſaken hearts. She knew not how or where to begin this pernicious deſign. Criſpus ſeemed to be too chaſt, his Chriſtian Religion made him in her opinion too auſtere, his ſpirit was as yet too tender, and not capable of a moſt powerful wickedneſs; and although he ſhould conſent, where may faithful complices be found, fit occaſions and liberty, to content an infamous deſire? The pain which ordinarily attendeth crimes, the rigour of a Conſtantine jealous of his bed, the infamy, and apprehenſions of puniſhments, coming to fall upon her thoughts, made her well to ſee both the abyſs and horrour: but paſſion tranſported her hood-winked, beyond all conſiderations; ſo that one day taking her opportunity, ſhe accoſted the young Prince with words, which ſufficiently tiently teſtified her a loſt woman. But he, who would not at the firſt put her into confuſion, with modeſty declined what ſhe had ſaid, and interpreted it far from her thought. She, who would no longer appear a Lucrece, being much troubled he ſhould underſtand in a chaſt ſenſe, what ſhe had ſpoken to an ill purpoſe, unfolds her ſelf ſo freely, that the wiſe Criſpus, no further able to ſuffer this bluſhleſs ſpirit, ſpake a word to her rough and hopeleſs: That if ſhe perſiſted in this infamous deſire, he would give the Emperour notice; And thereupon flew from her like a lightening, and withdrew, leaving her in a deſpair and rage, not ſufficiently to be expreſſed. All her love then turned into a diabolical hatred, which ſuggeſted furies and black thoughts, reſolving with her ſelf to uſe him as the wife of Potiphar did Joſeph. She ſerved her ſelf with all the arms of grief, which were at that time very natural to her, ceaſing not to weep and ſigh before her husband as if ſhe had afflicted her ſelf for anothers ſin: yet had ſhe ſo much cunning, that ſhe feigned to hide her tears, and ſmother her ſighs, to render the diſguiſe more dangerous, by a pretext of modeſty.

Love turned into rage.

A wicked calumny.

The Emperour ſeeing her in this plight, asked the cauſe of her ſadneſs. She anſwered, It was fit for his Majeſty not to know it. He the more perſiſted to underſtand what ſhe feigned to conceal, preſſing and interrogating her to draw her calumny from her, with as much earneſtneſs as one would a truth. In the end ſhe declared with many counterfeit horrours and words cruelly modeſt; That his ſon Criſpus would have enterpriſed upon the honour of his bed: but God be thanked, her faith inviolable put her under ſafety, free from ſuch dangers: And that ſhe demanded no other ſatisfaction from this miſerable man, who was fled, but the remorſe of his wicked conſcience. Conſtantine recommending ſilence unto her, entered into a black and deep anger, propoſing unto himſelf, that the retreat of his ſon, was a note of his crime; he determined therefore to put him ſpeedily to death: and for this purpoſe calling one of his ſervants, the moſt truſty and beſt reſolved for executions, having under great oathes and execrations obliged him to ſecreſie, gives him expreſs commandment to meet with his ſon Criſpus as ſoon as he could, to treat warily with him, not affrighting, nor giving him the leaſt ſuſpicion, and withal to fail not to ſerve him at his firſt repaſt with poyſon well prepared, ſo to ſend him into the other world. This man amazed at ſuch a dreadful command, asked of the Emperour, If he had ſo well reſolved on this affair, as to uſe a ſon of ſo great merit in this manner. Yea, ſaith he, I have thought upon it, and it is neceſſary he dye: for I muſt tell you, it not being needful to inform you further, that beſides the practice conceived by him, his life is incompatible with mine. The other ſuppoſed he had plotted ſome conſpiracy upon the life and Scepter of his father, behold the cauſe why he haſtened the blow, and being already very familiar with poor Criſpus, he accoſted him with great complements of honour and courteſie, feigning to make him merry, becauſe indeed he then ſaw him in a very ſad humour, upon that which had paſſed between him and Fauſta, covering his thoughts as much as he might, to preſerve the honour of his wicked ſtep-mother. Hereupon an unhappy Banquet was prepared for the innocent, which was the laſt of his life, poyſon being traiterouſly given him, there where he leaſt expected it.

Death of Criſpus.

Verily this death, which way ſoever we look, is moſt lamentable. The Tragedies which bemoan it with ſo much ornament, as that of our Stephonius, have much ſpirit in them: but taking only the thing in the ſimple nakedneſs of the fact, it miniſtreth matter of compaſſion to hearts moſt obdurate. A young Prince, at that time the moſt abſolute in the world, beautiful as an Abſalom, valiant as an Alexander, innocent as a Joſeph, and at that time taken away, when he was at the gates of the Empire which expected him, and taken away by a death ſo hideous and treacherous, and by the commandment of his father, who cauſed him to dye as one inceſtuous, not admitting him to ſpeak, nor permitting him to juſtifie himſelf, nor affording leiſure to know himſelf, nor one ſmall moment of time to prepare himſelf for death, which is allowed to the moſt criminal He was ſilently involved in the extremity of unhappineſs, to ſhut up the mouth of innocency, and open that of calumny, to rail againſt his very aſhes.

The generous ſoul, ever prepared for this paſſage by the laws of Chriſtianity, which it had ſo devoutly embraced, iſſued out of his chaſt body, to haſten to the crown of the Elect, leaving incomparable ſorrows behind it. Alas! what doth not a wicked affection, a calumny, a ſuſpicion, an unbridled anger, an inconſiderate word? O you Great ones, will you never learn wiſdom by the evils of others:

As ſoon as this news came to the Court, the wicked Fauſta well ſaw it was an effect of her treachery, and lively repreſentiug before her own eys this poor Prince, whom ſhe before had ſo much affected, at that time ſo unworthily maſſacred, in a beauty, in an age, wherein ſuch as dye are moſt pitied, and in a goodneſs, which would have given matter of compaſſion to Tigers and Lions; all her paſſion and hatred was turned into an enraged ſorrow, which made her cry out, and lament at the feet of her huſband, confeſſing ſhe had ſlain the chaſt Criſpus by her deteſtable caluminy, that it was ſhe who had ſollicited him to evil, but had found him a Joſeph, endowed with an invincible chaſtity, and had deteſted her ſin, as it well deſerved: whereupon excited with choler, and fearing to be prevented, ſhe had proceeded to this dreadful accuſation, and therefore was unworthy to live, ſince ſhe had ſlain the moſt innocent Prince of the world, and ſtained his own father with his proper blood.

The rage of Fauſta turned into pity.

Calumny diſcovered.

Conſtantine amazed beyond deſcription at ſo prodigious an accident, had neither reply, nor ſenſe of a man, ſo much wonder had rapt him from himſelf: but when he ſaw his holy mother Helena, who had ſo tenderly bred up the poor Criſpus, bewailing him with unconſolable tears, and begging of the father, at the leaſt the body of her Grand-childe, to waſh it with the waters of her eys, and buried it with her hands, ſaying, the wicked beaſt had ſlain her Joſeph: he was pierced to the quick with compaſſion, mingled with fury. Then the poor ſiſter of the deceaſed, who ſeemed nought elſe but the ſhadow of her brother, coming alſo to diſſolve her ſelf wholly into tears, near to her Grand-mother; this ſpectacle the more enkindled the paſſion of the Emperour. And thinking that Fauſta well deſerved death, being convinced of ſuch a miſchief by her own confeſſion, he cauſed her to enter into the Bath, and ſo in an inſtant to be ſmothered with the vapour, which was a puniſhment wherewith many times they put perſons of quality to death.

Death of Fauſta.

Behold the iſſue of the hideous loves of Fauſta, to teach all Ladies, that thoſe paſſions, which begin by complacencies, ſoothings, and curioſities, very often end in horrible Tragedies. In the mean time the houſe of Conſtantine remained long drenched in a dead ſilence, and all was very ſecretly carried, ſo that that none knowing what publickly to think of the death of Crispus and Fausta, it gave occasion to many to affirm they died for some conspiracy.

We cannot here excuse Constantine, of a violent anger, a precipitation, and a proceeding too bloudy. Howsoever, he caused Crispus to dye, under a false belief of impurity, which he thought was to be revenged, and Fausta punished by way of justice. Behold why this sin, though it hath much mischief in it, yet it hath not the determinate wickedness of the sin of David in the death of Uriah, because the one wrought with a manifest knowledge of his crime, and the other proceeded therein with much ignorance and sense of justice. Yet Constantine after these exorbitances was touched with great remorse, which in the end put him actually on the profession of Christianity.

The eighth SECTION.

The calling of Constantine to Christianity. The progress of his Conversion, and Baptism.

Constant. 19. I Have always esteemed the saying of S. Paulinus, which we before alledged, very probable, that the faith of S. Helena did not only make Constantine a Christian, but the first of Christian Princes. This good mother without doubt gave him the first tincture of Christianity: but being of an ambitious and warlike spirit, who went along with the main stream of the world, he was not so soon confirmed in the faith and integrity of Religion. Notwithstanding, he began to have most lively apprehensions for his conversion about the seventh year of his Empire, which was the year of the defeat of Maxentius: whilest he had this great war upon his hands, his temporal necessities opening his eys, that he might have recourse to spiritual forces. He then endeavoured, as he afterward relateth, to meditate seriously within himself, that there was some Divine Providence from Heaven, which gave concussions to Victories and Empires, whithout which the counsels of men were cloudy, their Armies weak, and labours vain. Afterward remembring what had passed in the Roman Empire, he saw that those Emperours, who had shewed themselves most fervent in the superstition of false gods, and were the greatest persecutours of Christians, had been infamous and unhappy, not beloved of the people, without name, not honoured, issueless, and for the most part odious and execrable to posterity. He then imagined that this Religion, which professed so much sanctity, and was grown up in the tempests of three hundred years, had something divine in it, and that perhaps it would not be amiss to invoke in this great labyrinth of affairs, the God of his mother.

Beginning of the conversion of the Emperour.

As he then went up and down revolving these discourses in the bottom of his thoughts, casting his eys up to Heaven, he perceived about the evening, the figure of a great Cross, all composed of most resplendent light, which seemed unto him to bear these Characters, IN HOC VINCE, Vanquish in this sign. This was much more important then the bow in Heaven, which Augustus Cæsar saw about the Sun, when he entred into Rome to take possession of the Empire. Notwithstanding, Constantine and the Captains, who observed this sign in Heaven, had some distrust, because of the figure of the Cross, which till then was ever accounted of an ill presage. Now, as the Emperour slept in the night, in great perplexity of cogitations, it seemed that the God of the Christians appeared unto him, with the same sign which he had seen the day before, commanding him expresly to carry it hereafter in his Ensigns.

Following this Vision, he caused a Banner to be made, in the manner as Eusebius describeth it, who had seen it. It was a Launce all of gold, which had a piece of wood athwart in form of a Cross; from whence hung a rich Imbroidery, in which was the Image of the Emperour, & about it a Crown of gold and pearl, which bare in the middle the two first letters of the name of our Saviour. This was from that time forward his prime Banner, which the Romans called the Labarum. It was no otherwise different from the Standards of the Roman Bands, but that it carried the sacred cypher of this venerable Title, which was not understood by all the world, but held by the Pagans as some devise of the phantasie of spirit. The war against Maxentius having so prosperously succeeded, as we have said, under this propitious Standard, Constantine held the Saviour of the world in great veneration, and made the Edicts, which we know, in favour of Christians. Notwithstanding, he for a long time deferred his publick and solemn profession thereof, whether it were that the course of great warlike enterprizes and affairs diverted his minde, or whether he feared to distast the prime men of the Empire by this change. It is likewise thought, that his wife Fausta, whom he in the beginning much affected, greatly weakened his love to Christianity, in such sort, that the Christians ceased not to be still ill entreated in this remisness of the Emperour. In the end, after the calamity of the death of his son and wife, so tragically happened in his own house, he seriously opened his eys, about the nineteenth year of his Empire, to seek remedy for his evils.

Absolute conversion of the Emperour.

Zosimus, a Pagan, leadeth us, as it were, not thinking of it, to the knowledge of the time, and manner of his Baptism. For he saith, that Constantine, after the death of Crispus and Fausta, had great remorse of conscience: and that not wholly having abjured Paganism, he sought from Southsayers, and Pagan Philosophers, as others add, the means to purifie himself from the blood, which he so unfortunately had shed. It is said, that one Sopater, the wisest of the Platonists, who had sometime lived in his Court, told him these stains of blood would stick on souls, and never be washed out, and that if they departed this life without punishment, they would re-enter into other bodies to expiate in the end those crimes which they had committed, and that there was no other remedy. The Emperour found this Philosophy very harsh, and his spirit being much tormented with very strange disturbances; behold, saith Zosimus, an Egyptian newly come from Spain to Rome: (note that he meaneth the great Bishop Hosius, who was sent at the same time into Egypt by Pope Sylvester.) This Egyptian, saith he, having insinuated himself into the favour of some Ladies of the Court, found by their means access to the Emperour, who failed not to propose unto him the difficulties and troubles of his conscience. This man answered him, that his Majesty should not need to disquiet himself hereupon, and that there was no crime so enormous, which might not be expiated by the remedies which are practised in Christian Religion. To this the Emperour very willingly hearkened, and resolved, all delaies laid apart, to become a Christian.

Discourse of Sopater.

His Baptism.

See here the beginning of the Baptism of Constantine. As for the sequel, it is a question much perplexed: for some would have him to be baptized in the suburbs

ſuburbs of Nicomedia, upon the point of death, and others at Rome by S. Silveſter, about the 19th. year of his Empire. I ſay briefly, to decide this difficulty, that it is a moſt unreaſonable belief, to think that Conſtantine the Great, called by the general voice of the holy Fathers, The holy and Religious Emperour Conſtantine, recorded in memorials and publick regiſters of the Church, which are recited before Altars, as the chief of Orthodox Princes; Conſtantine, whom the Arians, yea, the moſt refractory, which have been after him, never durſt declare of their faction, to have been chriſtened at his death, by the hand of an Arian Biſhop, out of the communion of the Catholick Church. There is not one to be found who favoureth this opinion, but Euſebius, who hath been an Enſign bearer of the Arians, and who no more ought to be credited in this article, then a Pagan Hiſtorian, it being moſt unequal to take him for a Judge, who had made himſelf a party in this affair. And if ſome paſſages be found ſomewhat doubtful in the Chronicle of S. Hierom, which ſeem to ſupport this errour, it is eaſie to conſider, that this Doctour, who was a Merchant enriched with infinite variety of learning, hath made many pieces, which he rather tranſlated and compiled from others, then compoſed upon his own invention: and the learned are not ignorant, that his Chronicle is accounted in this kind of books, as a work formed from obſervations and opinions of Euſebius, which ſhould not at all alter the eſtimation we have of Conſtantine, acknowledged and averred by ſo many other paſſages of the ſame Doctour. And if S. Ambroſe in the funeral Oration of Theodoſius, ſaid, that Conſtantine received Baptiſm being in extremity, we muſt not therefore infer, that he was baptized by an Arian in the laſt inſtant of his life; otherwiſe he would not call him in the ſame paſſage a Monarch of great merit, who left faith as an inheritance for Princes of his poſteritie. This extremity then is an extremity either of troubleſom affairs, in which Conſtantine ſaw himſelf involved, for having ſo long time deferred his Baptiſm or as others ſay, an extremity of ſickneſs, wherewith he was ſurprized in the City of Rome, and cured by Baptiſm.

In ultimis conſtitutus.

The opinion of Euſebius being rejected, I ask, whether it be not much more probable, to take that of a Council entire, and very antient, held under Pope Silveſter about the year of our Lord, three hundred twenty four, which is ſaid expreſly to have been aſſembled at the ſame time that the Emperour Conſtantine, was baptiſed by Silveſter Biſhop of Rome, then to adhere to inventions of a paſſionate adverſary? As for other circumſtances of this Baptiſm, which are drawn from the acts attributed to S. Silveſter, we muſt affirm, there are divers things very hard to believe, if we proceed according to humane reaſon: for we cannot ſo eaſily imagine what is expreſſed in thoſe writings, that Silveſter was hidden in the caverns of the mountain, which afterward bare his name, flying the perſecution of Conſtantine: of which other Authours make no mention, as being contrary to the humour and Edicts of this Prince, who after the victory gained againſt Maxentius, ever favoured Chriſtianity. Beſides it is there ſaid, that Conſtantine demanded, what Gods were S. Peter and Paul, who had appeared to him in his ſleep: which was not very likely in an Emperour, that ſo many years before was inſtructed in the myſteries of Chriſtian Religion. Add alſo the leproſie of Conſtantine whereof no authour hath ſpoken before thoſe acts, and wherewith it is held, that Conſtantius the ſon of this great Emperour was much offended, complaining they attributed to his father counterfeit maladies, to cure him in picture. If we muſt purſue opinions humanely reaſonable, I would ſay, that Conſtantine could no more be leprous, then our King Clodoveus of moſt glorious memory; of whom S. Gregory of Towers hath ſaid, then on the day of his Baptiſm he was cured of an old leproſie, intending by that ſpeech, from ſin. It is true that Cardinal Baronius doth all which an able man may, to clear theſe difficulties: but there are certain things, which it is more comely to believe piouſly, then eaſily to eſtabliſh by reaſon. And therefore if the Reader here deſire to know my conceit, I hold, it is a temerarious thing to go about to tax & turmoil old beliefs, which though they paſs not for articles of faith, are notwithſtanding received with edification in common opinions. Varro ſaith, that to deſire to be wiſe contrary to common underſtanding, is to rank ones ſelf in the number of fools: and the great S. Hilary hath ſaid very worthily, that the firſt verity of wiſdom is ſometime to believe what one would not, ſubmitting our judgment to men of the beſt underſtanding: which if it were well conceived, ſo many young heads would be aſhamed to account themſelves able men, eſpecially in matter of faith, thereby inordinately taxing all the monuments of antiquity.

Gregor. Turon. Hiſt. l. 2. cap. 31. Prodit novus Conſtantius ad lavacrū, daturus lepra veterū morbum.

Contra multos ſapere, deſipere eſt. Sapientia prima hæc verſus eſt. interdum ſapere quod nolit Hilar. l. 8. de Trinitate.

I ſay then, for theſe acts, which are accounted to be S. Silveſters, and namely for thoſe reported by Pope Adrian, as it is not my intention to engage my ſelf upon the proof of them by a way of ſleight human reaſons, ſo would I not in any ſort impugn but rather believe thē, with a religious ſimplicity, which is the ſcience of Saints, and ever the moſt aſſured.

History of Baptiſm according to the acts of S. Silveſter.

Theſe acts tell us, that Conſtantine ſtill deferring his Baptiſm, and living in much liberty, was ſtrucken with a leproſie, which was a manifeſt wound from Heaven, wherewith greatly afflicted, he conſulted with Magicians to apply ſome remedie. They gave him deadly counſel, whereof the Kings of Egypt had heretofore made uſe in the like maladie, which was to make a bath of humane blood. This at the beginning ſeemed to him, very ſtrange, but the infirmity which preſſed him, had no ears to hear reaſon: little children were taken of the meaneſt condition in the City, to cut their throats like ſheep, and conſecrate their blood to the health of the Emperour. The mothers diſhevel'd and deſperate, ran after their tender infants, even to the gates of the Palace, and howled ſo dreadfully, that Conſtantine hearing their cries, & withall the cauſe of their ſorrow, commanded the infants to be reſtored to their mournful mothers, eſteeming it more reaſonable to tolerate his evil, then to be cured with ſo cruel a remedy.

The night following, S. Peter and S. Paul appeared to him in a dream, and adviſed him to forſake all theſe Pagan ſuperſtitions, to re-edifie the Churches of Chriſtians, and ſend for Pope Silveſter, who was at that time hidden in the grots of Mount Soracte, that would diſcover unto him a fiſh-pool, which ſhould heale his leproſie. As ſoon as he awakened, he recounted his dream to the Lords of his Court, and ſent to ſeek out the Pope, who ſeeing theſe Gentlemen come, diſpoſed himſelf to Martyrdom, thinking they came to lead him forth to ſlaughter: but underſtanding from their own mouthes much other news, he ſet forward towards the Emperour, who moſt courteouſly received him: and having made a long diſcourſe of matters which had happened unto him concerning his calling to Chriſtianity, he demandeth of him what Gods were Peter and Paul, who had appeared unto him in ſleep, and made overture of the fiſh-pool, wherein he ſhould be waſhed washed. The Pope answered they were no Gods, but Apostles, and servants of God. Thereupon he required to see their images, which Silvester sent for by a Deacon: and having found them like to the faces he saw in sleep, he cryed out aloud, that he no longer must deser the fish-pool.

The hiſtory of the Baptiſm of Conſtantine drawn frō the acts attributed to S. Sylveſter, is more eaſie piouſly to be believed, then affectually proved.

Silvester seeing him resolved to be baptized, commandeth a publick fast, accompanied with ordinary prayers, catechizeth the Emperour, and counselleth him to take seven days of retirement, to prepare himself for Baptism, and which is more, to lay aside for those days the Purple and Imperial Diadem, that he might be cloathed with the habit of penance; which he couragiously performed. And the day of Baptism being come, as soon as he was washed with these life-giving waters, he was miraculously cured of his leprosie, beholding a light from heaven, and a hand stretched over him. See what is in these antient monuments, and which Cardinal Baronius rendereth probable, with reasons very consonant.

The ninth SECTION.

The acts of Constantine after his Baptism.

CONSTANTINE after his Baptism began a quite other course of life: for laying aside all humane respects, which had hitherto tyed him to Gentilism for considerations of his State, he caused a Throne to be prepared in the Palace of Trajan, where having sent for the Senate, he declared with the eloquence of a Monarch, the reasons which had moved him to this alteration of Religion, and said:

Notable Oration of Constantine, partly drawn out of his acts and Edicts.

SIRS, I doubt not, but the change of Religion, which I have made, will appear strang to many, who blame all that which they cannot understand, and will understand nothing, but what flatters their presumption. All novelties is odious to those, who love the old Age of errour: Yet I can tell you, this is no new Religion which I have imbraced, but that which was begun in the purified souls of the golden Age, happily finished in our days. The first men of the world had verity in bloom, we now see the fruit, which we may and shall enjoy, if we be not ungrateful to our happiness, and traiterous to our own conscience. Believe me, Sirs, the world is almost grown out of it's non-age, for God hath taken pitie of the ignorance thereof, and made it see, it was not time any longer to place Dragons and Owls upon Altars, nor other Gods, accounted as monsters, if they would return into the life of men. If our Ancestours, blinded by mishap, have made to be esteemed for Divinities so many criminals, for whom our laws do now ordain punishments, we are not bound to participate with the crimes of the one, nor the errours of the other, under pretext of antiquitie. I must confess, that I from my infancie have had great distrust upon the follies which I saw in the superstition of Gentiles, and that which further confirmed me in this opinion, was, that one day I heard the answer of an Oracle, which had long time stood mute, and being demanded the cause of this silence, answered, The Just hindered it from speaking, and we found those Just were the Christian, who then had power to stop the mouthes of devils.

Afterward I began to consider those men, whom I saw so persecuted, and that there was not a corner of the earth that was not ruddie with their blood, yet were they notwithstanding so patient in their persecutions, that they had prayers on their lips for those, who rent their hearts out of their bodies. This then gave me then matter of amazement; but when I came to think on their Church, which flourished among so many storms, and encreased under the swords of persecution, this seemed to me more then humane; yet transported with the torrent of common opinions, I still resisted the voice of God, which spake in my heart, when it opened my eys, and made me once lively apprehend the dreadful ends of Emperours, who had persecuted Christianitie, comparing them to the felicitie of my father Constantius, of most glorious memorie, who had preserved his hands innocent even to death, free from any stain of Christian blood. This was sufficiently potent to move a soul, which would easily yield to reason: but God redoubling his inspirations, made me one day behold in the Heavens a prodigie, which many saw with me, to wit, the figure of the Cross, composed of most resplendent light, which appeared just at that time I was to wage battel against Maxentius. I call the living God to witness, that I therein read distinctly these words, written as with the rays of the Sun, IN HOC VINCE. And it is a wonder that I deferred still to yield my self up, till such time, that the Saviour of the world advertised me in a vision, to take into my Standards the sign which I had seen in Heaven the day before. I instantly obeyed, and have seen so prodigious effects succeed in the defeat of Maxentius, which you have admired, attributing to man that which was a work of the Divinitie.

I thought then to have discovered what I was, but considerations of state, which had too much force upon my soul, stayed me, and have made me walk along hitherto, in a life more licentious then I intended. I now protest before the face of Heaven and Earth, that I am a Christian both in heart and profession; nor shall any motives ever alter that, which I have so constantly resolved on. Yet for all this I purpose not to force any man in his Religion, leaving for this time belief as free as elements: Yet for the charitie I bear towards my good subjects, I cannot but wish them as much good as my self. Now all my greatest happiness, and which I esteem more then my Purple and Diadem, is to entertain the knowledg of a living God which hath been revealed to us by his onely Son Jesus Christ, the Doctour and Saviour of the world. His person is full of miracles, his life of wisdom and goodness, his doctrine of puritie; and if to conquer our pride, and expiate our demerits, he hath humbled himself to the punishment of the Cross, so much therefore the more ought it to be honourable, since he hath done for us all that, which an incomparable love can do, and endured all that which an invincible patience may suffer.

I can do no other but love and singularly honour those who are enrolled under his Standard, as my brothers in Religion: and let it not seem strange to any, if heretofore shewing my self very liberal to beautifie and enrich the Temples of Gentilism, I now apply my self to build and adorn the Churches. I will render what I ow to God and my own conscience, nor shall my subjects, who are of a Religion different from mine, be any way interessed therein, desiring to preserve them, as persons whom I hope one day to have companions in faith, and coheirs in glorie, if they add never so little consent to the light, wherewith the wisdom of God Incarnate hath replenished the world. I only beseech thee, O great God, on whom all Scepters and Crowns depend, since you have united the East and west under my hands, you would arrange them under the yoak of your Law, which is the knot of Empires, and source of felicitie. I offer unto you my person, mine Arms, my Scepter, and all mine abilities, humbly begging of you to accept my slender service, and to give me the assisting wisdom of your Throne, to govern in all honour, all justice, all peace, and amitie, the people which you have committed to my charge.

This Oration was heard by all the world, with very great applause, in such sort, that for the space of two hours, the cries of an infinite number were heard, who made many acclamations in favour of Christian Religion. Fourty times was repeated, UNUS DEUS CHRISTIANORUM, There is but one God, which is the God of the Christians: and thirty times, was proclaimed, LET THOSE WHO DENY CHRIST, COME TO NOUGHT: and ten times, LET THE TEMPLES BE SHUT UP, LET THE CHURCHES BE OPENED: And fourteen times, THOSE WHO ARE ENEMIES TO JESUS CHRIST, ARE ENEMIES TO THE EMPEROURS: And ten times, THOSE WHO ARE ENEMIES TO JESUS CHRIST, ARE ENEMIES TO THE ROMANS: And fourty times, THERE IS NO OTHER GOD, BUT HE WHO HATH SAVED US. AUGUSTUS CONSTANTINE: And fifty times, HE EVER SHALL VANQUISH WHO ADORETH THE SAVIOUR OF THE WORLD: And thirty times, LET THE PRIESTS OF IDOLS BE BANISHED OUT OF THE CITY: Thirteen times, LET THOSE ALSO BE EXILED OUT OF ROME, WHO WILL SACRIFICE TO IDOLS: And fourty times, COMMAND THEY BE PRESENTLY THRUST OUT OF OUR WALS.

Admirable change of the world by the Oration and example of the Emperour.

Upon these last cries, the Emperour rose up, and making a sign with his hand, required silence which instantly made all this great multitude to hold their peace; and thereupon: No, saith he, I intend not any man should be forced in the matter of his Religion; the services of the world are oft-times constrained: but those we render to God, ought ever to be voluntary. We have no greater proofe of the Divinity, then mercy. God sheweth what he is, in so long time, and with such patience, suffering the impieties and ingratitudes of men. I would have all the World know, that I intend not to make Christians by necessity, but by discretion. As it is a crime to deny true Religion to those who require it, so it is an importunity to seek now to impose it by force on such as demand it not. They that will not follow my example, shall not therefore be separated from my friendship. I am the common Father of all in generall, and no man ought to be frustrated of the preservation which I owe him.

These words stayed the out-cries of those, who already transported the affairs into disorder, by an indiscreet zeal, and gave good assurance to the Pagans, so that the Emperour going out of the Palace, they lighted at mid-day many lamps and torches, to conduct him to his house, with a thousand testimonies of joy and alacrity.

Edicts and conversions.

He at the same time caused certain laws to be published, by which he left the Gentiles at liberty in the exercise of their ancient superstition, on such condition, that they should abstain to speak in any sort against the honour of the Saviour of the world; nor should at all disturb the Christians: adding, that he intended the sons and daughters of the family, yea the very servants, should not be kept by force in the Pagan superstition, but have all liberty to be baptized when they had a will thereunto.

O God, what incompa able charms have the examples of Great-ones in them, to dispose men to virtue! Nicephorus saith, that in a very short time there were numbered twelve thousand men, besides women and children baptized at Rome. Yet was it observed, there were few Senatours, nor of other politick spirits; so much the wisdome of the flesh is contrary to that of the Cross. Faith is the inheritance of the humble, and all those souls puffed up with presumption of their own ability, stick so fast to the earth, that they loose the sight of Heaven.

Piety of Constantine.

The holy Emperour, who was desirous to render himself as profitable by works and examples, as he became comfortable in his discourses, employed himself with an incredible fervour in all that which concern the service of God, and namely in the building of Churches.

Where among other things, he did an act worthy of immortality: for the eighth day after his Baptism, passing to the place which was already dedicated to S. Peter, and where he had a purpose to build a fair Church, there in presence of all the world, he pulled off the purple Robe and Diadem, took a spade in hand, and began to dig the earth, to lay the foundation, then throwing the scuttle upon his royal shoulders, he carried twelve burdens of earth in honour of the twelve Apostles.

It was a spectacle full of admiration, and which gave an unspeakable joy to the Pope and Bishops there present. Notwithstanding the spirits of the times said, it was to abase the purple too much, and vilifie the dignity of Cæsars: not considering that the Emperour Vespasian, from whom Constantine was descended, had done the like in honour of Idols; and were withall desirous, that this man should have less zeal for the living God, then others had used in the service of devils.

But the devout Constantine danced before the Ark, whilest Michol murmured at the window. He had a desire to adorn the place where he was baptized, as the Cradle of his Christianity: and made the most admirable Font that was ever beheld, whereof we yet see some signs remaining, which our holy Father, Pope Urban the Eighth, hath lately adorned, and embelished with notable endowments: For, among other magnificences, he caused it to be all covered both within and without with plates of silver, and commanded to set up in embossed work the statues of our Saviour and S. John Baptist, with seven figures of Hearts, which poured out water; all which was also in very fine silver, so that it appeared with a marvellous lustre. He commanded for curiosity, to burn balm in stead of oyl in the lamps there hanging, desirous to apply the use of this precious liquor to the services of the Church, since Heliogabalus, the most prodigal of the Emperours, had used it in the lamps of his house.

He was not content to erect two Churches, the one to S. Peter, and the other to S. Paul, which he enriched with innumerable gifts; but he also changed his proper Palace of Lateran, into a Church of our Saviour, which our Kings have afterward done in imitation of him, oftentimes giving their houses to make houses of God. He likewise there established a good quantity of Revenues for the poor, which should become Christians, leaving the managing thereof to the discretion of the Pope.

It would be a prodigious thing, yea very troublesome, to reckon up particularly all the presents he gave, and rents he setled in favour of Churches. It sufficeth to tell you that the Pagans became so jealous, that from that time forward, they began to call him the PUPIL, saying, that the first ten years of his Empire, he had been a good Emperour; the second ten, a robber, despoiling Lycinius and others: But as for the third ten, he had put himselfe into Tutelage, resigning to the Church the whole manage of his estate. See the ordinary hyperboles of passionate spirits, who behold with an envenomed eye the wealth which is taken from riots and vanities, to be bestowed on the Church. Yet notwithstanding this great Emperour so intermingled magnificence with the husbandry of his Revenues, that the people were not neglected, nor did his greatness loose any thing of its lustre.

It is a strange thing, that with all those celestiall qualities which God hath conferred upon his person, he could never tame the stubborn spirits of the Roman Senate, so much infidelity joyned to presumption, admitteth obstacles to the lights of verity. This affront made him undergo another resolution, to build a City else-where, which he would equal to the majesty of Rome, and fashion to his best liking, as he afterward did, changing the City of Byzantium into the Royall Constantinople, an eternal monument of his greatness.

The tenth SECTION.

The endeavour of good works, with the virtues and Lawes of Constantine.

THis Monarch changed into another man, lived not but by the fire of charity, cleaving to the earth by very slender roots of the necessities of nature: he began seriously to manure the practise of prayer, discoursing familiarly with God, with a taste so sensible, that it surpassed all delights imaginable in nature and wit; a diligence so great, that being in Arms and under Pavilions, he ever had his little little oratory of retirement, where like another Moses he consulted with the Divinity. He hearkened to discourses of God with incomparable pleasure; and when he spake of the mysteries of our faith, which he as it were perpetually did, it was with so great exercise, that his heart seemed to melt with his words. His zeal so transported him, that of the prime Captain of the world, he became a Doctour and Preacher, to procure the conversion of his subjects. He who so many times had carried in his hand the sword of the Empire, to cut off rebellious powers, bare then in his mouth the sword of the word, to fill the world with wonders. What he spake with his lips, he taught by examples, carrying under the purple a body worn out with abstinence and mortification.

His devotion.

Humility. He so trampled vanity under-foot, to which he formerly had some inclination, that among a great number of Churches and edifices of piety, which he caused to be built, he would not have his name thereon engraven, reputing himselfe unworthy, that God should accept such offerings at his hands. And as one day, a Bishop, a flatterer, and an Arian, put himselfe forward to tell him, that after he had governed the world upon earth, he should do the like in Heaven with the Son of God; he felt himselfe so confounded with this word, that he who ever treated with Ecclesiasticks with very much reverence, could not contain himselfe, but say: Bishop, let it not fall out, you any more use such words concerning me, for they are unto me most hatefull: you shall do much better, and more suitable to your profession, to pray the living God, I may be both in earth and heaven the least of his servants, then to propose to your self Scepters and Empires for me.

His patiance. His patience was equall to his humility, whereof S. Chrysostom hath observed an excellent passage in the oration of Bishop Flavianus to the Emperour Theodosius, where he saith, that as one day in a popular commotion, they stoned the statues of Constantine, there wanted not many about him who endeavoured to enflame him to the revenge of those outrages: to which he smiling, answered, they had strucken a man of stone, but the model remained entire. Now being not ignorant, that the vigour of Christianity consisted in works of charity, he applied himselfe thereunto with so much fervour, that it seemed his hands were that, which the Hebrew Text speaketh of in the Canticles, Hands of the spouse, vessels of gold, repleniſhed with a sea of bounty.

Before his Baptism, great calamities had reduced miserable fathers to such necessity, that being not able to maintain their children, they sought to be discharged of them by ways most lamentable; of which the good Prince being advertised, he wrote to Ablavius his Lieutenant of the whole Politick Government of the Empire, to publish a Law through all the Cities of Italie, in which was intimated to all necessitous fathers, who were unable for the education of their children, that they should present them at a place appointed, there to receive apparel and convenient sustentation: adding, he intended that not onely publick moneys should be employed to supply such wants, but that he would despoil himselfe willingly of that which was proper and peculiar to himself, for their comfort.

If he found any beggars in the streets, he delighted to cloath them, and to behold them in this new plight, making of his Palace a mount Thabor, where men were transfigured, changing their miseries into felicities. He most particularly enquired after the shamefac'd poor, who had heretofore been wealthy, and learned from them their fortunes, birth, and want, and as he found their qualities and merits, he gave sometimes Lands, and entire possessions to those, who were in very pressing necessities. A poor widow, who sighed in a corner of her house, forsaken of all the world, was much amazed, that this Monarch of the world, came as an Angell from Heaven, to wipe away her tears, and provide for her poor orphans. A forlorne maid, and even upon the brink of the precipice, by the unhappiness of poverty, found the Emperour had given order for her marriage, and had himselfe taken the pain to know her future husband, and recommend good husbandry unto him on his part.

This man was as the Intelligence, tyed to the Government of the Primum mobile, which is never weary, among so many concussions and motions afforded to total nature. He was a sun, who drew up, and digested all the vapours of the lower world, not intermitting any thing of its course or lights. He was an Ocean, who received drops of water as well as huge rivers: and as there was nothing so high in the world as to be above his greatness, so was there nothing so low, which could withdraw it self from his charitable knowledge.

He ever had his eye open upon the necessities of mankinde, and not contenting himselfe to provide for them by the ordinary wayes of charity, he thereunto added the hand of justice, making most wholesome Lawes for the tranquility of the whole world. This good Father of the Universe sought out poor banished men, who had been unjustly despoiled by the rigours of injustice, and restored them to their professions. He proposed to himself in his own repose, the affliction of those who had wrongfully been transported into desart Islands, where they still lived, made slaves under the tyranny of men, and in a worse condition then beasts. He thought upon the miseries they endured, who were condemned by unrighteous sentences to labour in mynes. He reflected on the long services of military men, who were absolute in armes, yet oftentimes gained nothing but poverty and ignominy. His edicts But above all these considerations, as occasions required, he made most worthy Edicts, for the comfort of so many persons as lived in the acerbities of the world. And for as much as concerned justice, which consisteth in the punishment of crimes and abuses, he was a Hercules, who had perpetually his club lifted up to quell monsters.

Duels. There was a custome in those times of Duels and gladiatours, which were much more tollerable then now-adays, for then none were employed therein, but slaves, criminals, and men of the sack and halter, who were already condemned to death. And now-adays is found a frantick Nobility, who degrading themselves from the honour of generous spirits, and bearing the sentence of an ignoble action against themselves, make tropheys of that which is put upon Moorish slaves for punishment. Yet the great Constantine saw this manner of punishing the base and abject creatures of the world, was too brutish and butcherly, and that it would do well to change these duels into Gallies, or some such like thing; for he wrote to Maximus the Superintendent of justice, in these terms:

"These bloody spectacles in the civil repose and "domestick peace wherein we live, please me not "at all. Behold the cause why I will wholly take "away these combats of Gladiatours. For if there "be such graceless wretches, who for the punish- "ment of their crimes deserve such a sentence and "such condition, I ordain that you rather cause L. 1. de gladiat. Cod. Theod.

"them to labour in the Mines, to the end, that "without effusion of blond, they may feel the pain "due to their demerits. Given at Berytus, the first "day of October, under the Consulship of Paulinus "and Julianus.

Apostrophe to King Lewis the thirteenth.

I leave you to think what this Monarch would have said of Duels of this time, where they hasten to pour out willingly upon publick passages that blood, which ought rather to be shed upon the walls of Infidels, to cement up the glory of the French.

O Lewis, our great Monarch, it seemeth the God of peace hath permitted the heads of this Hydra to have hitherto budded forth, that they might be made to fall under the innocency of your hands, divinely destinated to so many good works. You have again very lately renewed your Edicts against this pestilence, assuring unto fathers and mothers the blond of their children for the service of your Crown, and taking away a stain which stuck so many years upon the brow of your Empire. Heaven and earth have participated in the contentment which hath succeeded from these good ordinances, as they do in the preservation of the lives of your subjects, and tranquility of your whole Realm. Let your Majesty so handle the matter, that this Law may hold with nails of Adamant, and not lose a glory, which Constantine would have bought at the price of two Empires.

His chastity.

This brave Prince, who ever had been most chast, made also sharp war against the infamous ordures of lust; for he expelled from the Court, as vermine, certain effeminate men, who had made sale of their souls to dishonour, and at other times made a lamentable traffick of their bodies, insinuating themselves by this means, into the Palaces of Great-ones, and sometimes into honourable rank. He degraded them all from Nobility, and forbad them to bear even the marks of men of Arms, tying them to services the most contemptible. Besides, he caused to be taken from publick infamies, many poor Christian maids, that had been abandoned to evil by the form of punishment, making expres inhibitions to those villains, who live upon others sins, never to undertake the like practises. Briefly, he so abolished the crimes which had been tolerated under the other Emperours, that Saint Hierom writing upon Isaiah, hath given the title to Constantine, that his Empire had vanquished two monsters, the most dreadful that were ever seen by destroying the infidelity and impurity of the earth.

His prudence. God. Theod. L. de pœnit. Quæ facit, quæ ad similitudinem pudicitiæ cruciatus est figurata, minime maculatur. Sozom. l. 1. c. 8.

His prudence descended even to the moderating and changing the punishments of offenders, which had some disproportion, and among other things, he decreed, that Characters should no more be imprinted upon the forehead of the miserable, for the respect that is due to the face of man, on the which God hath engraven his Image. And moreover, for the honour he bare to the Cross, he forbad it should ever again be defiled with the punishments and executions of malefactours; thinking it unreasonable, that that which was matter of glory to Emperours, should likewise serve as an instrument for the pains of the unhappy. He suffered not any image to be made unto him, either in Tables, Statues, or Coins, whereon the Cross was not ever set: such honour bare he to this venerable sign, which Hereticks have ever rejected, with as much malice as stupidity.

Honour of the Cross.

It were an infinite thing for him that would particularly decipher so many noble actions of our Constantine. I content my self to have here set down that in brief, which might have been distended into many Chapters, and to make many dishes of it, endeavouring to furnish out more substance for my Reader, then unprofitable amplifications.

The eleventh SECTION.

The zeal of Constantine in the proceedings of the Council of Nice.

THE Emperour Constantine had great cause to say, what he spake in Eusebius, That he was as the common Bishop of the Church outwardly; so much vigilance and zeal he exercised, to procure all which concerned the maintenance thereof. Behold an accident happening under his reign, which more troubled Christendom, then ever did the torturing Racks, the Combs of Iron, or boyling Cauldrons of Diocletian.

Original of the Arians.

Theology had been for a long time taught in the City of Alexandria, at which time a Priest named Arius, held the Regency; who had the reputation to be subtile in seeking out questions, which never had faln into the thought of man: but otherwise was malicious and of an evil life. Out alas! that these extravagant curiosities should bring, and daily also introduce prejudice into the Church and repose of the people! It were to be wished that those, who through long idleness, and itch of vanity, amuse themselves to find out novelties in matter of belief, might rather handle the Coulter in Tillage, or the Oar in Gallies, then turn over books, and contaminate the honour of Divinity. Satan never found a spirit more fit to perplex holy letters, and embroil Empires, then this wretched man of whom we speak.

Arius and his qualities.

Saint Epiphanius, who might often have seen him, saith, He was of a large body, of a sad countenance, covering under a mask of austerity, hideous monsters. He had an extreme ambition to hold the highest place, and seeing that Alexander, a holy man, was preferred before him in the Episcopal Chair of Alexandria, he entred into desperate jealousies, searching out all possible means to cry down this Bishop, and raise calumnies against him, to dispossess him of his charge. And the life of this Alexander being so unspotted, that no least stain of reproach might be seen therein, he resolved to involve him in some captious disputations, thereby to accuse him to hold opinions not consonant to the Doctrine of the Church. It happened that the Bishop in preaching and speaking of the Son of God, put him, as he ought, in equality of power and honour with his Celestial Father, calling him by the Greek word ὁμοούσιον; whereupon this man sought to reprehend him, alledging some passages of Scripture maliciously interpreted, of which he made use to establish the unhappy Heresie, which denied that the Son was the same essence of God his Father, and took away from Jesus Christ the Diadem of the Eternal Divinity, by making him a meer creature.

Alexander, who was not a man of mean account, but such an one, as to his sanctity of life, added solid Doctrine, defended himself couragiously against the impostures of this malign spirit, very well justifying his belief touching the Divinity of our Saviour: which having been throughly proved in the Assembly of an hundred Bishops, who were first of all called together for this purpose under Hosius, Legat of Pope Silvester, he pronounced the sentence of excommunication against Arius and his complices. This wicked man, who burst with anger to see this condemnation passed against him by those whom he reputed to be infinitely under him in ability, put himself himself into the field with very much ostent; the differences he lately had with these Prelates, making him understand his Divinity was odious, if he therein used not some colour to disguise the malice thereof. He also practised so many wiles, that he dazeled the eys even of those, who were men very capable: for after he had deduced his reasons with a great facility of words, and large quantity of specious passages, and that he thereunto added a cold countenance, counterfeiting himself a modest man, persecuted for the truth, he trained spirits not vulgar to the love of his novelties. All the very same proceedings have been seen with the Hereticks of this time, and if so many corrupt souls had not wholly enchined to their own ruine, God gave them sufficient examples in elder evils to avoid the new. We may well say, when we behold these Schisms and Heresies to arise, that there is some comet of the kingdom of darkness, which insensibly throweth plague and poyson into hearts. It is a strange thing that a little sparkle let fall in Alexandria, caused instantly so many fires, that having invaded Egypt, Libya, Thebais, and Palestine, they in the end involved almost the whole world. No man at that time cared how to live, but every one was ready to dispute. Bishops bandying against Bishops, drew the people distracted with opinions: the Churches, houses, and Theaters, ecchoed in the sharpnes of contentious disputations, and the Cities forgetting all other miseries, rent one another for the interpretation of a word. Arius to gain support, instantly seeketh for favour from the Court. And knowing that Eusebius Bishop of Nicomedia was of great credit, he used all the flatteries, of which this man was capable enough, to gain him to his side. This Eusebius was eminently furnished with all those dispositions and industries, which the most subtile Hereticks have at any time exercised to trouble the Church of God. He was verily one of the worst men then in the Empire, since he had sold his soul to ambition, so much the more pernicious as it was covered with a veil of Religion. It is true which the Hebrews say, that Vineger is an ill son of a good father, for it is commonly made of the best wine: so there is nothing more sincere then an Ecclesiastick, who liveth in the duty of his profession; but when corruption falleth thereinto, and that he hath once degenerated, there is not a worse sharpnes, nor a more dangerous malice. Religion served this wicked man as a buskin for all feet, for it had no other bounds, but that of his own interests: and he ever, like weather-cocks on the top of Steeples, turned his face on what side soever the wind blew.

Proceeding of Arians.

In the persecutions of Christendom he made himself an Idolater: in the garboils of Lycinius he leaned much to his side, and when he saw Constantine absolute in the Empire, never was man more plyable to flatter him. Doubtless he had all the qualities we have seen in Luther, Calvin, and so many other new Sects, who have still sought favour from Great-ones by wiles and most perilous charms. So wanted he not excellent parts, and great eminencies: for he had a spirit very subtile, speech cunning, a face which spake before his tongue, and for his extraction, he soared so high, as to make himself the kinsman of Cæsar's. The air he desired to breath was the Court, and his Bishoprick when he was absent, seemed to him a banishment. Behold the cause, why he drew near to the center of the Empire as much as he could, in such sort, that being first Bishop of Berytus, he put himself forward to the Chair of Nicomedia, afterward took the heart of the Kingdom, and in the end, setled himself in the Royal Constantinople.

This alteration of Chairs had in this time a very ill savour, and this life of Court so passionately affected by an Ecclesiastick not called thereunto, could not in any sort finde approbation among good men. Great personages are sometimes very lawfully in Court for the service of Kings and publick necessities, but they are there as the birds of Baruch upon white thorns, as the Giants of holy Job, which mourned under the waters, as those sweet Fountains sound in the salt Sea. An ambitious man, who heweth down mountains to arrive thither, and liveth not exemplary, deserveth to be regarded therein as a fish out of his element, or the py'd bird whereof Jeremiah speaketh, whom all the rest assailed with Beak and Talon.

Baruch 6. 70. Job. 28. Jer. 12. 9.

Eusebius notwithstanding little regarded the reputation of a good Prelate, so that he might arrive to the height of his enterprizes. To insinuate himself the more in the good liking of the Emperour, he gained Constantia sister of Constantine, and widow of Lycinius, as Calvin did afterward the sister of Francis the first. The good Lady, who being despoiled of Empire by the death of her husband, and had no longer so much employment to number the pearls of her Diadem, would needs then intermeddle with curious devotion, and dispute on the mysteries of the Holy Trinity. Constantine after the death of S. Helena his mother, held her at his Court with much respect, that she might the more easily digest the acerbities she had conceived in the loss of her husband, and much easier was it to entertain her in the affairs of the Church, then in those of Empire. Besides, he found it not amiss that she might busie her self in the doubtful questions of Bishops. So pursuing the Genious of her curious spirit, she passed so far, that she became an Arian by the practises of this Eusebius, who having already gotten credit with her, spake to her of Arius, as of a worthy man persecuted by his own side for his great abilities; and explicating to her his doctrine in popular terms, which said, there was no apparance how a son could be made as old as his father, & that poor Arius had bin banished from Alexandria, for that he would not sign this proposition, this drew compassion from her.

The spirit of Constantia tainted with this doctrine, began already to cast an evil odour upon the Emperour her brother; and Eusebius coming thereupon to make recital of that which passed in Alexandria, between Alexander and Arius, set such a face upon the whole business, that he made, as it is said, the Sun with a coal, figuring out the good Prelate Alexander as a passionate man, who could not endure an excellent spirit in his Bishoprick.

'Tis a pitiful thing that great men see not the truth but through the passions of those that serve them. This poor Alexander, who was a holy old man, and grown white in the exercises of Religion, was then presented to the Emperour by the information of Eusebius, as a fool, who under a grizled head had extravagancies of youth, in such sort, that Constantine vouchsafeing to write unto him, taxed him as the authour of this tumult, in that he put a frivolous question into consultation, and gave occasion of dispute, which could never have proceeded but from abundance of idleness And as for Arius, he said of him, that he gave too much scope to his spirit upon a subject, which might much better have been concealed. And for the rest, they should be both reconciled, mutually pardoning each other, and hereafter hindering all manner of disputations upon the like occasion.

Constantine deceived.

Alexander, who had done nothing but by the counsel of an hundred Bishops, seeing himself treated ed in a worse condition then Arius was, in the Emperours Letters, and considering the blasphemy, which this Heretick had vomited against the Divinity of the Word, was reputed as a trifle, thought verily they had endeavoured to envenom the spirit of Constantine, to the prejudice of the truth. For this cause he informed the other Bishops, and namely Pope Silvester, of the justice of his cause, answering very pertinently to the calumnies objected against him. On the other side Eusibius, who beheld the integrity of this holy Bishop with an ill eye, and who had very far engaged himself to maintain Arius, embroiled the affairs at Court, as much as his credit might permit. In the end, the disputation was so enkindled through the Christian world, that needs must a general Council be held to determine it.

Eusibius a true Patron of Hereticks.

Council of Nice.

Three hundred and eighteen Bishops are assembled at Nice, a City of Bythinia, by the approbation of Pope Silvester, at the request of the Emperour Constantine, who invited the most eminent by expres letters, and gave very singular direction, as wel for their journey, as their reception. Never was there seen a goodlier company. It was a Crown, not of pearls nor diamonds, but of the rarest men of the world, who came from all parts like Bees, bearing (as saith S. Augustine) honey in their mouths, and wax in their hands. There you might behold Venetians, Arabians, Egyptians, Scythians, Thracians, Africans, Persians, not speaking of Western Bishops, who were there already in no smal number. It was a most magnificent spectacle to behold on one side venerable old men, white as Swans, who still bare upon their bodies the scars of iron and persecution, which were invincible testimonies of their constancy: on the other, men who had the gift of miracles, so much as to force the power of death, and tear from him the dead out of their tombs. On the other part, men accomplished in Theology and eloquence, who in opening their mouths seemed to unfold the gate of a Temple, full of wonders and beauties. There was to be found that great S. James of Nisibis, Paphnutius, and Potamion. There was Hosius, S. Nicholas the first, Gregory the father of our Nazianzen, Spiridion, and so many other worthy men. The good Pope S. Silvester could not be present thereat, by reason of the decrepitness of his age, but sent thither three Legates, Hosius, vitus, and Vincentius. The Emperour received them all most lovingly, kissing the scars of some, and admiring the sanctity of others, never satisfying himself with the modesty and good discourse of all, both in particular and general. Among these children of God, were likewise some Satans, adherents to Arius, who discovered in their eys and countenances, the passions of their hearts.

These turbulent spirits fearing the aspect of this awful assemby, softly suggested divers calumnies to surprize the spirit of the Emperour, which very naturally retained much goodness. And for this purpose they presented to him many requests, and many papers charged with complaints and accusations upon pretended homages. Verily these proceedings were sufficient to divert this Prince from the love he bare to our Religion, were it not that through the grace of God, he had already taken very deep root in the faith.

In the end, to do an act worthy of his Majesty, beholding himself to be daily burthened with writings, wherein these passionate Bishops spake of nothing but their own interests, he advised them to set down all their grievances, and all the satisfactions which they pretended to draw from those who had offended them, and present them on a day designed. They failed not to confound him with Libels and supplications: but this grave Monarch putting them into his bosom, said openly, Behold a large proportion of Accusations, all which must be transferred to the judgment of God, who will judge them in the latter day. As for my self, I am a man, nor is it my profession to take notice of such causes, where those that accuse, and such as be accused, are Bishops. Let us, I pray you, for this time, leave these affairs, and treat with the points, for which this Council is here assembled; only let every one, following therein the Divine clemency, pardon all that is past, and make an absolute reconciliation for the time to come. When he had spoken this, he took all the civil requests presented unto him, and caused them to be cast into the fire; which was much applauded by all those who had their judgments discharged from partialities.

Soz. l. 1. cap. 16.

In the mean space, the Bishops before they entred into the Council, took time to examine the propositions that were to be handled, and leisurably to inform themselves of the pretensions of Arius, who was there present, and who already felt the vehemency of the vigour of S. Athanasius, though he was yet but a Deacon in the Church of Alexandria.

The day of the Council being come, the Bishops assembled in the great Hall of the Palace, where many benches were set, both on the one side and other. Every one taketh his place according to his rank. Baronius thinketh the Legates of the Pope were seated on the left hand, as in the most honourable seats which he very pertinently proveth. In the first place on the right hand, sat the venerable Bishop Eustatius, who was to begin the prayer, and carry relations to the Emperour. The Bishops remained silent for a while, expecting his coming; and suddenly he appeared, not accompanied with any Guard, or Souldiers, but with a small number of friends. Eusebius, who was there present, saith in his History, that never was any thing seen more admirable then the person of this Monarch, at the meeting of this Council. For besides that, he was of a most gallant stature, and a singular presence, he was delighted to hold it as it were enchased in rich attire. The purple wherewith he then was clothed, mingling the luster thereof with the rays of pretious stones, which sparkled on his head, made reflections of grace and majesty arise in the eyes of all the beholders. He passed through the middle of the Assembly, and all the Prelates rose up to do him reverence. Then being come unto his place, he stood upright, expecting from the Bishops a sign given him to sit, which being done, and prayer ended, he sate down upon a golden chair very low, which was placed in the middle, to the end he might be encompassed with so great a number of Saints, as a Palm with a row of Cedars. The others also being seated near him, Eustatius, selected out to open the Council, stood up, and made an Oration, whereof we finde some pieces in Gregory a Priest of Cæsarea, which import thus much: We have very much obligation, O sacred Majestie, to render immortal thanks to the living God, in that he hath made choice of your person to put the Empire of the world into your hands, and that by your means destroying idolatrie, he hath exalted the glorie of his Altars, and established Christianitie in that tranquilitie which we presently enjoy.

Constantius in the Assembly of Bishops.

Oration of Eustatius at the opening of the Council.

It is an act from the right hand of the Omnipotent, which we durst not hope for in our days, if God had not made you to be born for the good of the universal world. It is a prodigie to have seen you in a short time to calm so many tempests, dispose so many smoaks of sacrifices to devils, extirpate so many horrible superstitions, and enlighten such cloudie darknes with the rays of the knowledge of the true God.

The world, which was before polluted with ordures, is purified, the name of Saviour is known to Nations the most barbarous, The Father is glorified, the Son adored, the Holy Ghost declared, a Trinitie consubstantial, that is to say, one same Divinitie in three Persons, is acknowledged by all the faithful.

declared

That is it, O sacred Majestie, which supporteth the greatness of your Empire with those three fingers of power, wherewith it holdeth the mass of the earth, poized as it were to serve as a basis. As your felicitie is inseparably tyed to its honour, so ought you to reverence, defend, and invincibly protect all that, which concerneth the glorie thereof.

Behold a strange accident, and which is to us more sensible then the persecution of Diocletian. They go about to dis-member the Trinitie, and thrust the knife of division into its throne. One Arius, who hath taken his name from furie, a wolf bred among us in a sheeps skin, a Priest of Alexandria, an enemie of the doctrine of Apostles and Prophets, hath proclaimed war against the Son of God, endeavouring to deprive him of the essence, honour, and power, which he holdeth equal from all eternitie with his heavenly Father.

This is it which hath assembled us here to condemn his errour, and most humbly to beseech your Majestie, that when you have heard the opinions of all these great men here present, you will hold a steadie hand upon the preservation of Apostolical doctrine, and command all those to be cut from our body, who will persevere in their damnable opinions, to the end we may breath the Christian air in all liberty, which the world beginneth already so sweetly to tast under the happiness of your reign.

Then was the time, saith S. Hierom, when the first trumpet began to sound against Arius. After the good Bishop of Antioch had ended, the Emperour beholding all the assembly with a very gracious aspect, spak in Latin, to retain the majestie of the Romane Empire, and in a moderate tone, those words which are couched in Eusebius, the sense whereof we render:

Oration of Constantine.

Venerable Fathers, I must needs affirm, that I never desired any thing more passionately, then to enjoy your sweet presences; and infinitely am I bound to God, that he hath accomplished my desires, granting me a blessing that I prefer before all the happiness in the world, which is, to see you all here assembled, and united in will for the glory of God, and peace of the Church. I pray you, suffer not the storm to surprize us in the haven, thereby to snatch from us the comfort, which we already have in our hands; and if God hath given us victory against Tyrants, let us not turn our arms against our selves, to tear out our proper entrails. It is most certain, these domestick troubles are much more to be feared then all the hostilities in the world. The sword of persecution can dissever nothing but members; but those divisions tend to the subversion of souls; which maketh them so much the more dangerous beyond common wars, as the spirit is above the body.

God having afforded me so many victories, and so manie prosperities, I proposed to my self, there remained nothing from me to ask of him, but an humble acknowledgement of his benefits, and leisure to rejoyce with those whom I saw through his favour in repose, sheltred under the good success of mine arms, and the authoritie of my Laws. It hath been a grief very sensible unto me to understand of those revolutions, which have passed in our Citie of Alexandria, and which have afterward dispersed themselves through the rest of Christendom. I have don all that possibly I might in the beginning to stop them, but seeing the evil increased with so much danger, I have called you hither to apply the last remedie. I beseech you, O venerable Priests of the living God, to preserve among your selves that concord, which I think I may read in your countenances, and not to suffer your selves to be deprived of the benefit of peace, since the Divine providence hath selected you to establish it upon Altars, by your prayers for all the rest of the world. Cut off speedily the root of evil, and sweetly pacifie these troubles of the Church: you shall do a thing most acceptable to God; and as for my self, who am your fellow servant, I shall hold me obliged as for a singular benefit.

The Interpreter explicated the Oration of the Emperour in the Greek tongue: then the propositions of Arius were read. At the reading whereof the most part of the Bishops stopped their ears for horrour, as afterward S. Athanasius observed. From thence they proceeded to opinons, where the disputation was enkindled on both sides. Constantine afforded a singular attention to all that was said, peaceably entertained sentences, encouraged all the world sweetned acerbities which might slide into the heat of contention, and guided all the affairs to peace. In the end, Arius is condemned, and a form of faith conceived for the equality of the Word with the Father, whereat many Arians much amazed, failed not to strike sail, and yield themselves to the plurality of voices, fearing least their contestation might ruin their reputation with the Emperour. It is thought Eusebius the Historiographer was of this number; a man of the time, who knew how to comply readily with the humour of those who had authority and force in their hands. As for the other Eusebius, Bishop of Nicomedia, who had maintained the faction of Arius with much passion, he saw himself shamefully fallen from the opinion of his great credit, and durst not refuse to sign the doctrine of the Council. Greatly was he streightned in another Session, to pronounce excommunication upon Arius his creature, saying he was consenting to the decision of the Council, under shadow of som perplexed words, which he made use of to cover his opinion. The fathers shutting up their eys to all human reasons, and fortifying their arms against favour, surprized this Eusebius, and Theognis Bishop of Nice, in the condemnation of Arius which they would not sign, declaring them upon this refusal, deprived of their Bishopricks. They interposed the authority of the Emperour, who suspended the execution, on such condition, that they gave satisfaction to the Council.

Condemnation of Arius.

Never were men more humbled, namely Eusebius; who thought himself the all-predominant; for he was constrained speedily to retire, and address his request to the Bishops, in terms most suppliant, in which he protested wholly to submit himself to the decrees of the Council; yet notwithstanding he spared not to embroil matters with an infinity of wiles and malice, which made the Emperour open his eyes to confirm their sentence who had condemned him, and send him into banishment, with subrogation of another in his place, though he afterward by ordinary submission was repealed. At that time happened a marvellous labyrinth of affairs, in which began the combats of great S. Athanasius, which are to take up another Historie besides this, it extending much further beyond the years of Constantine. As for the success of Arius, after the banishment of ten years, he still intermedling with factions, found means to be heard in an other Council of Jerusalem, where feigning a penitence artificially counterfeited, he handled the matter so by the practises of Eusebius, who was then in favour, that he was absolved, with commandment given to the good Alexander, Bishop of Constantinople, to receive him into the communion of the Church.

S. Athanasius.

The holy Prelate stoutly refused it, knowing well it was an hypocrisie, which tended to annul the decrees of the Council of Nice, and bring confusion into the Church. But Eusebius of Nicomedia ceased not to make armed inhibitions, threatning that in case of refusal, he would deprive him of his Bishoprick. He, who cared not so much for the loss of his dignity, as the safety of the Church, forsook all these subtilities of Theologie, and exhorting his people to a fast of seven days, by the Counsel of S. James of Nisibis who was then present, spared not to macerate his body with austerities, and present to God day and night his humble supplications to divert this scourge. In the end, the affair being very shortly to be determined, he prostrated his face against the earth before the Altar, and said: My God, if it be true, that Arius ought to morrow to be received into the communion of the faithful, I beseech you let your poor servant Alexander go in peace, and not loose the faithful people with the wicked. But if you be resolved to preserve your Church, and I may be assured you will do it, look on the threats of Eusebius, and deliver not your inheritance to the scorn of the wicked: but rather take Arius out of this world, lest we receiving him, may seem to introduce heresie and impiety into your house.

The End of Arius.

The next day Arius went early in the morning from the Emperours Palace, very well accompanied with Eusebius, and walked in pomp through the streets of Constantinople. He was a man more subtile then confident, and it is thought the apprehensions he had of the issue of this combat, put terrour in him, and this terrour caused him to step out of the way. Behold the cause, why being by chance in the market-place of Constantinople, he retired into a publick place of ease, to satisfie the necessities of nature. Socrates holdeth, he cast forth a great quantity blood, and thereupon falling into a swoon, not being able to be holpen, he yielded up his wicked soul by a just punishment from Heaven, leaving to posterity a perpetual detestation of his life, with a horrour of the very place of his death.

Eusebius caused the body to be interred, Alexander breathed again, and all the Church triumphed upon the admiration of the judgments of God, seeing that he, who had raised so many bloody Tragedies, was dead in his own blood: and after he had infected the soundest parts of the world with his poyson, vomited up his contagious soul in the publick infections, drawing on his criminal head the execration of all Ages.

The twelfth SECTION.

The Government of Constantine.

Constant. is Constantinople erected.

HAving shewed unto you the greatness of Constantine in matters of Religion, let us now behold it in his politick government. It is no sleight note of the vigour of his spirit, that he enterprized to make another Rome, and so prosperously to have perfected this his design.

There is found among the Gentiles a certain Epigram in the ruines of ancient Rome, which said, It stood in need of gods to make it, but there was but one God necessary to destroy it. What may we say of the courage, prudence, happy success of the Emperour in the establishment of Constantinople? We will not make him a God, as the Pagans, but say, he was a man singularly assisted by the providence of God, in the greatness of his undertakings.

He perceived in this new change of Religion, there were in Rome many harsh spirits, and that even among the principal, whom he could not reclaim to Christianity, as his zeal fervently desired. Behold, whether desirous to consecrate to God a place better purified from Idols, where he might be served with more consent and better judgment, or whether he were transported with the desire of honour, and the memory of posterity, he resolved to build a City, which should bear his name, and be, as it were, the master-piece of a great Monarch.

For this purpose he had some desire to build on the ruines of Troy the Great, thinking the fame of the place, renowned for its unhappiness through all the parts of the habitable world, might contribute somewhat to the glory of his name: but he having laid the foundations, God gave him notice in sleep, that this was not the place appointed him, and that he necessarily must change the Country: whereat being much amazed, yet still persisting in his design, as not throughly satisfied upon the will of God, it is held, the tools and instruments of work-men were insensibly transported over the Sea to the other shore, and that an Eagle setling upon the Level of the Master-Architect, took it up, and hastned to bear it directly to Byzantium; for that is the City, whither Constantine, forsaking the ruines of Troy, transferred his great designs. It had heretofore been a very fair City; but as Arms strike at all which is eminent, so had it been infinitely ransacked by many wars happening in the revolution of affairs and Ages. Yet it still supported it self with some manner of reputation, when this great Prince determined to amplifie, enrich, and perfect it throughly, there to fix the seat of his Empire.

Zonar and Glycas.

It is added, that himself marched round about the walls, holding in his hand a half-pike, designing the circuit of his future Constantinople: and as he still went measuring up and down by the aim of his eye, one of his favourites said to him: Emperour, how long will it be ere you make an end? I will finish, saith he, when he staies that goeth before me. Which made men think there was some heavenly intelligence, that conducted his enterprize. At the same time he thought he saw in sleep a very ancient Lady, which in an instant was turned into a most beautiful Virgin, whom he adorned and attired, setting his Diadem on her head. Observe what is said of the beginnings of Constantinople; whether such things happened with all these circumstances, or whether we naturally love to tell some strange tales in favour of antiquity; as if these fictions were able to give it the more credit. One thing is most undoubted, which Zosimus, although an enemy to Constantine, is enforced to admire, that the manage of this great design was so prosperous, that in five or six years a goodly City was seen on foot, which extended about one league in circuit beyond the walls of Byzantium.

Constantine, who had a holy desire to equal it to ancient Rome, spared nothing of all that, which the invention of men might finde out, courage undertake, and power execute. He there built Palaces, Theaters, Ampitheaters, Cirques, Galleries, and other Edifices, infinitely admirable; so that Saint Hierom had reason to say, that Constantine to attire his Constantinople despoiled all the other Provinces.

It is a Maxime among Great-ones, that to make a hugh Dragon, it is fit he first devour many little Serpents; and to raise a great City, many much less must be ruined to serve for food unto it. The greatnesses of God are good deeds, those of the world are naturally destructions; for they eat and devour their neighbours, as the tree which we call the Ivy, which insensibly draweth the juyce of Plants growing near unto it. It is not expedient there should be many greatnesses in the world, they would dry Rivers up, as did the Army of Xerxes, and would impoverish each other by their mutual contestations. Yet notwithstanding needs must there be Majesty in the civil world, to the proportion of elementary. And for this cause God made Kings, taking a pattern from himself, and commandeth we honour them as his living Images: Kings make the greatnesses of the world, which are the effects of their powers. Needs must there be a Constantinople that posterity may see Constantine on the back-side of the Medal, for I think his virtues have represented him on the other side very honourable.

At the least, it is a thing exceeding laudable, and well considered by S. Augustine, that in this infinite store of Pagans, which he must yet of necessity tolerate, the Emperour permitted not either Temples of Idols, Sacrifices, or Pagan ceremonies. Well might he be curious to cause from all parts to be brought ancient Statues of Marble, Brass, and other matter, which represented Jupiter, Cybile, Mercury, Apollo, Castor, and Pollux, and so many false Divinities, which he set up in Theaters, Amphitheaters, or Races, ces, where the courses of horses were used and in other publick places. Eusebius followed by Baronius, holdeth, it was to expose them to the scorn of the people, which is very hard to believe: for I should rather think, that these pieces being the most exquisite workmanships of the world, and that Constantine vehemently desiring the beauty of this City, could not then resolve upon such a Jewish zeal, as to break and deface them, but contented himself with the distribution of them into profane places to give lustre to his enterprizes. Yet must we say, that though we at this present are out of the danger of Idolatry, rich men of this age have no reason to set up so readily in their Halls and Cabinets, Juno's, Venus's, and Diana's, and so many Histories of the Metamorphosis with scandalous nakedness. Tertullian, an eager spirit, pursueth all this as a crime, and proveth in the book he composed of Idolatry, that all those who co-operate in such works, do worse, then if they sacrificed to Idols the blood of beasts. "For they offer (saith he) their spirit, their industry, their travel, and their estate to Satan: and "though they have no intention of sin, they minister matter to other of offending God.

Tertul l. de Idol. cap. 6.

Behold the cause, why Constantine, although he were in an age wherein Paganism being still in much request, it was very difficult to take away all these figures, notwithstanding he disguised them as much as he could: witness, that a great statue of Apollo being brought to Constantinople, one of the best pieces that ever had been seen in those elder times, he caused a Constantine to be made of this Apollo, changing it into his own Image, and commanding some parcels of the venerable Nails of our Saviour to be enchased over his head. It is in my opinion to this same Image that he added a golden Globe in the hand thereof, and over it a Cross, with this Inscription: Tibi, Christe, Urbem commendo. Besides, he made three Crosses to be erected, the most magnificent that might then be imagined, and set in the midst of a publick place the statue of the Prophet Daniel among the Lions, all covered over with plates of gold, to represent a figure of the Resurrection. And as for his Palace, he caused to be pourtraied at the very entrance thereof, the history of the Passion, in a most exquisite work, wrought and tissued with pretious stones, very much resembling Mosaick work. All of it being finished, he made the Dedication of the City on the tenth of May, and as it is very probably supposed, the five and twentieth of his Empire, consecrating it to God, in memory of the glorious Virgin Mary, and doing great acts of liberty to the people, which he commanded by his Edicts to be continued for perpetuity. Codin addeth, that he caused also sumptuous Edifices there to be built for the Christian Senatours, which he drew from the City, and made them so like their lodgings they had at Rome, that they were so ravished therewith, as it seemed their houses by miracle had been transferred from Rome to Constantinople. The two chief Churches were those of the Apostles, and of S. Sophia, to whom Constantine gave beginning, but the greatness of the work is due to the Emperour Justinian.

Our great Monarch who had his eye open over all, forgot not to establish a good Colledge in his City, whereunto he drew the choice of learned men in all professions, dignifying and adorning it with immunities and great priviledges, in such sort, that Aurelius Victor called him the nursing-father of learning; and pursuing this design, he took a particular care to erect a good Library, and above all, to furnish it with good store of holy books, well written, the superintendency whereof he gave to Eusebius of Cæsarea.

Behold the estate of his Constantinople, which he by Edict commanded to be called New Rome; and Sozomen assureth, that in multitude of people, in abundance and riches, it surpassed the antient: which is not very hard for any to believe, who will consider Rome in the absence of Emperours, being then but as a Palace dis-inhabited; yet could not Baronius endure S. Gregory Nazianzen's speech, who said Constantinople as much surmounted the other Cities, as Heaven surpasseth Earth.

This would suffice to shew the politick prudence of great Constantine; but it shineth also in other points, of which I think this to be most considerable, that he held for the space of thirty years an Empire so great, in a time wherein the Emperours had ordinarily so short a reign, that they resembled those creatures, which enjoyed but one day of life, in an age, when the people were so apt to revolt, that the Sea had not more agitations, then all Kingdoms had vicissitudes, in an establishment of Religion very new, wherein contentions are commonly most dangerous. We may well say, this Prince had something in him above all that which is humane, to retain together an Empire of so long continuance, in affairs so discordant.

It is true, that he tolerated the Sect of Pagans for meer necessity, otherwise he must have killed the whole world to make a new of it. The wise Prince well saw it was a thing impossible to annihilate superstition in an instant, which had taken such deep root for a thousand years, about which time Rome was built: but in this civil peace, which he gave to all the East, he insensibly undermined the foundations of impiety, and verily by little and little it perished in his hands. His spirits sparkling like a fire, could not rest, but seeing the Magistrates of the Empire were more over-busie, yet not discharging the duty of their places, and that by the greatness of their power they made themselves too absolute, he altered the whole government, dividing their charges, and multiplying the offices of the Empire: for which Zosimus blameth him, not considering it was the policy of Augustus Cæsar, deputed one of the most ablest Princes of the world: and that he, who will consider the state of the Empire established by Constantine, shall finde so much order in this great diversity, so much wisdom in inventions, so much courage in executions, so much stability in continuance, that he shall have more cause to admire the deep counsels of the Emperour, then finde what to blame in his government. The same Zosimus, as a Courtier and a Pagan, extremely displeased with great liberalities which Constantine exercised towards the Churches, furiously taxeth him upon the matter of tributes, saying, He invented new and exacted them with much violence.

Tributes.

And yet notwithstanding there are no tributes under Constantine, the use whereof is not observed to have been in the age of the former Emperours. For concerning the impost of a certain sum of gold and silver paid by Merchants from four years to four, which the Greeians called Chrysargyre, although the name were then new, the manner of it could not be so, since the Historiographer Lampridius, in the life of Alexander Severus, makes mention of the gold of Merchants. And as for that which was also imposed upon prostitute women, it was likewise under the reign of the same Alexander: so that he who will compare that, which is done before

Constantine, and that after him in this article, shall there find much moderation in his proceedings. For so far was it from him to surcharge the people, that he gave a relaxation of the fourth part of tributes; which is so much, as if a King after the space of four years passed, should free his people for a year from ordinary subsidies, which would be no smal liberality. Now concerning the violence whereof this man complaineth, the Edicts of Constantine testifie, that he would not have any man to be so much as imprisoned for monies due to his coffers. True it is, he had a list of the names of men of quality in the Empire, with a tax of their revenews, to enforce them to publick necessities, and by this means discharge the poor. Otherwise it was well known this Prince was so zealous for justice, that he would not suffer even the letters of favour obtained from him, should have any power to the prejudice of ancient Laws. And that if any of his favourites had a process, and would beg of him to interpose his authority for him, he would leave him to justice, willing rather to afford him coin out of his coffer, then one sole word of favour, which might dispose the Judges to bend the ballance more to one side then another. He had his eye upon his Officers, and retained them in their duties, discovering and chastising corruptions, and banishing with his whole endeavour all crimes that were against the law of God, and publick tranquility.

Cod. Theod. l. 1. de exactionibus.

Cod. Theod. l. 1. tit. 2. Victor.

He was much seconded in the administration of affairs by the diligence of Ablavius, the greatest favourite of the Prince, and Superintendent of Justice, who was verily a man of Judgment, had he not blemished the gifts of God with unsatiable avarice.

He was surnamed The Baloon of fortune, for the many changes which happened in his person. For it is held, that he was of very base extraction, born in Constantinople, then called Byzantium; and that a Mathematician arrived in this City upon the instant the mother of Ablavius was to be delivered. This man weary of his way, and very hungry, went into an Inn where he calls for dinner: his hostess was very busie to provide it for him, at which time one came to entreat her to assist a neighbour of hers in her childbirth, for she practised the office of a Midwife. This made her forsake her guest, to help the poor creature who was said to be in great danger if she gave not remedy. The business being dispatched, she returned to her guest, who was very angry, and murmured with much impatience. She to appease him excused her self upon the necessity of the accident happened: but this notable Astrologer, hearing speech of the birth of a childe, forsooke the pot and glass which he dearly loved, and endeavoured to set the Horoscope of this Ablavius, newly come into the world. and thereupon said to his hostess, Go tell your neighbour she hath brought forth a son to day, who shall be all, and have all, but the dignity of an Emperour.

I think with Eunapius, that such tales are rather made after events, to give credit to judicial Astrology, then to say they have any foundation upon truth. It is not known by what means he was advanced, but he came into so great an esteem, that he governed the whole Empire under Constantine, who freely made use of him, as of a man discreet and vigilant in affairs, though much displeased to see him too eager in his proper interests. And it is said, that walking one day with him, he took a stick in his hand, and drew the length of five or six foot on the earth, then turning towards his creature Ablavius, why so much sweat and travel? In the end of all, neither I nor thou shall have more then this, nay thou dost not know whether thou shalt have it or no.

He was the cause by his factions, that Constantine almost caused one day three innocent Captains to be punished with death, being ill-inform'd, had it not been that S. Nicholas then living, appeared in a dream the same night to Constantine and Ablavius, threatning, if they proceeded any further, God would chastise them, which made them stay execution.

Ablavius notwithstanding was so tyed to the earth, that the words and examples of his Master had small power over his soul, in such sort, that he had an unhappy end, ordinary with those who abuse the favours of God.

For after the death of Constantine, Constantius who succeeded in the Empire of his father, taking this man as it were for a Pedagogue, so much authority had he assumed unto himself, and thinking he could not free himself of his minority but by the death of Ablavius, caused him miserably to be butchered, sending two for executours of this commission, men suborned, who saluted him with great submissions, and knees bended to the earth, in manner of Emperour. He, who before had married one of the daughters of the Emperour Constans, brother of Constantius, thinking they would raise him to the dignity of Cæsar, asked where the purple was. They answered they had no commission to give it him, but that those who should present it, were at his chamber door. He commandeth them to be speedily brought in: These were armed men, who approaching near unto him, instead of the purple, inflicted a purple death, transfixing him with their swords, and renting him as a Sacrifice.

If the poor man following his Masters example, had been willing to set limits upon his fortune, and taken shelter at least in the storm, to meditate upon the affairs of his conscience, he would the less have been blamed: but naturall desires have this proper, that they are bounded by nature which made them. The fantasies of ambition, which grew from our opinions have no end, no more then opinion subsistence. For, what bounds will you give to the falsehood and lying of a miserable vanity, which filleth the spirit with illusion, and the conscience with crimes? When one goeth the right way, he findeth an end: but when he wandereth a-cross the fields, he makes steps without number, errours without measure, and miseries without remedy.

The thirteenth SECTION.

The death of Constantine.

IT seemeth great men who have lived so well, should never die, and that it were very fit they still did, what they once have done so happily. But as they entred not into life by any other way then that of birth, as men, so must they issue out from this ordinary residence of mortals, as other men.

Constantine had already reigned thirty and one years, and was in the threescore and third of his age, living otherwise in a prosperous old age, and having a body exceedingly well disposed to the functions of life; for he incessantly travelled in the duty of his charge, without any inconvenience, ordering military matters in his minde, instituting laws, hearing embassages, reading, writing, discoursing, to the admiration of all the world.

This good Prince earnestly desired the conversion of all the Great-ones of his Court. Behold why, not satisfied with giving them example of a perfect life, he inflamed them to good with powerful words, which were to souls, as thunder-claps to Hinds, not for the delivery of a beast, but the production of salvation.

A little before his death, he pronounced in his Palace to those of his Court a very elegant Oration of the immortality of the soul, of the succes of good and evill, of the providence of God in the recompence of pure souls, of the terrour of his justice upon the incredulous and reprobate. This divine man handled these discourses with so much fervour and devotion, that he seemed to have his ear already in heaven, to understand mysteries, and enjoy an antepast of Paradise.

A while after he felt some little inequality of temperature in his body, which was with him very extraordinary, so sound and well composed he was. Thereupon he was taken with a fever somewhat violent, and causing himselfe to be carried to the baths, he remained not long there: for little regarding the health of his body in comparison of the contentment of his soul, he was possessed with a great desire to go to Drepanum in Bythinia, a City which he surnamed of his good mother, where was the body of S. Lucian the Martyr, to which he had a particular devotion.

He being transported into this desired place, felt in his heart an alacrity wholly celestial, and for a long time remained in the Church, notwithstanding the indisposition of his body, fervently praying for his own salvation, and the universall repose of his Empire. From thence he went directly to a Palace which he had in the suburbs of Nicomedia, where feeling the approaches of death, he disposed himselfe for his last hour, with the marks of a piety truly Christian. His Princes and Captains who heard him speak of death, being desirous to divert his mind from this thought, said, He was become too necessary for all the world, and that the prayers of all men would prolong his life. But he, Of what do you speak to me, as if it were not true life, to die to so many dead things, to live with my Saviour? No, this here is not a death, but a passage to immortality. If you love me, hinder not my way; one cannot go too soon to God. This spoken, he disposed of his last Will with a constant judgement and couragious resolution, declaring in his Testament the estate of affairs he would establish, even in the least particulars, and very well remembring all his good servants, for whom he ordained pensions and rewards for every one according to his merit.

He divided the Empire between his three sons, at that time absent; and having distributed their several shares with great providence, he gave to Constantius the Empire of the East, leaving a Will sealed with his own signet in the hands of a certain Priest, whom he appointed to deliver it immediately to his son, which he did: and afterward Constantius so much honoured this man, that being inflexible to all other, he onely obeyed him as a God. The dispose of his temporal affairs being setled, he transferred all his thoughts to familiar discourses which he had with God, and yeilded up his most happy soul on the Feast of Pentecost, the 22. of May about mid-day, in the year of our Lord 337.

The souldiers and officers who waited next his person, not thinking his end so near at hand, upon this news were seized with a greif so outragious, that tearing their cloaths, and prostrating themselves upon the earth, they bewailed their Emperour with complaints, which rather resembled yellings then moderate sorrow, calling him, Their Sovereign Lord, their good Master, & common Father of the world.

His body was put into a coffin of gold, covered with purple, to carry it to Constantinople; where it was many days exposed in his Palace attired in Imperial habit, receiving the same duties and reverences, as if he had yet been alive, never was there observed toward any Emperour whatsoever, either such great concourse of people, or cordial affection: not so much as little children but were touched with a sensible grief, as if they had lost their father. One might have seen among the people some confounded with sad and heavy sorrow, others to break forth into complaints, the rest to pour themselves out in devotions and prayer. When ancient Rome heard the news of his death, she caused the baths and publick Places to be shut up, all mirth and solace to cease, that they might lament the loss of a most honoured father.

The Princes his children speedily arrived at Constantinople, caused his obsequies to be performed after the manner of Christians, conducting the body to the Sepulchre with the Clergy, wax lights burning, and prayers of the Church ordained for the souls of the dead. For Eusebius, who was there present, maketh express mention of the ceremonies, which new Hereticks, through great impertinency and malignity have endeavoured to deny for the comfort of the dead.

It is a marvellous thing to consider what power virtue hath over the hearts of men, and to behold how many divers sects are different in that, which is matter of beleif in Divinity, but all notwithstanding agree in the honour due to honesty. The Pagans would needs canonize Constantine in their manner, and made a God of him, representing him in a Chariot, harnessed out with four horses, as flying above the clouds, and a hand stretched from Heaven, which made shew to hold him in this most blessed mansion of immortality. The Greek Church hath honoured his memory, as of a Saint; although Constantine had so humble an opinion of himself, that it is very likely he ordained by his Testament, which was afterward seen to be executed in his funerals, that his body should be interred not in the Church of S. Peter and S. Paul, but before the porch: esteeming himselfe most happy, if after he had borne the prime Diadem of the world, he might serve as a porter to a simple fisherman.

I now aske of you, my Reader, who have considered the beginning, progress, and end of this Monarch, where may you finde one more elate in greatness of courage, more generous in his enterprizes, more prudent in his carriage, more fortunate in successes, more constant in his perseverance? Poyze a little, and put in a ballance the glory of his armes, the happiness of his conquests, the wisdom of his laws: what virtue think you had he here occasion to make use of, to set a new face upon a whole world, to oppose Armies with iron, stratagems with prudence, rebellion of untamed spirits with mildness? What arm to resist the torrents of iniquity? What stroke to counterballance the inclinations of wills, and swift motions of an universal world. Verily I must affirm Augustus Cæsar was a great Prince, for that he changed the face of the State of a mighty Common-wealth, built up a vast Empire; but not to flatter, nor raise our Princes above their merit with the interest of our own cause, we shall find this man had somthing in him much greater. I admit the other seemeth to you more subtile if you consider him in the maturity of prudence he shewed in his elder days; notwithstanding if you behold him in all the parts of his life, you shall finde great vices therein: I say not only of impurity or neglect, but of wickedness and inhumanity: which was the cause that he having one day in a banquet taken the shape of Apollo, those about him named him Apol- linem Tortorem, Apollo the Hangman. I go not about at this time to ſearch into the vices either of the one or other. I admit that Conſtantine though deſcended of the moſt noble bloud of Romans, and as fortunate as ever Auguſtus, was in his beginning ſomewhat cruel: Yet no man can deny, but that in military virtue, he in all points ſurpaſſed Auguſtus Ceſar, who was never put into the rank of the moſt warlike Princes.

Greatness of Constantine.

Let us not here overprize the ſupereminency the one had above the other in this point: Let us onely compare them in quality of founders of new Eſtates. The one made a new world civil; and the other a new world Chriſtian. The one to do what he did, found a Julius Ceſar, who before-hand cut out his work for him: the other hewed forth a way through rocks, flames, thorns, wholly involved with contrariety. The one arranged men under a civil ſubmiſsion in recovery of a Monarchy, which is an ordinary thing: The other without arms diſarmed them from the affection they bare to their ancient ſuperſtition, which every well underſtanding Judg will eſteeme a matter very difficult, becauſe ordinarily men are very obſtinate to retain the beliefs which they have held from father to ſon, through the revolution of many ages. Finally, Auguſtus ſaid he found a City of ſtone, ſpeaking of antient Rome, and had made of it a City of marble; but Conſtantine might boaſt to have raiſed a Rome wholly new in the eſtabliſhment of his Conſtantinople.

It is affirmed by the Pagans themſelves, who never attributed any thing to Conſtantine above his merit, that he was at the leaſt, ſay they before his baptiſm, comparable to all the greateſt Princes of the Empire. Eutropius, a ſouldier of Julian the Apoſtata, who little loved Chriſtian Princes, is inforced through a truth to confeſs, that he was (d) A great man, having qualities and virtues of mind and body moſt innumerable, and that his fortune being very great he had notwithſtanding equalled it by his induſtry and merit. Behold a teſtimony from the mouth of an enemy.

(d) Vir ingens. Innumera in eo animi, corporiſque virtutes claruerunt: fortuna in bello proſpera fuit: verùm ità ut non ſuperaret induſtriam.

I would here willingly demand of Machiavel, who in the Treatiſe he compoſed of a Prince, ſaid: That he which in all things would hold a ſtrict profeſsion of an honeſt man, cannot long continue in the company of ſuch others as are of no eſteeme; and that it is neceſſary for a Prince who will maintain his own power, to learn how he may ſometimes be wicked, and to practiſe it according to the neceſſity of affairs: And in his State-Diſcourſes well diſcovereth he is of opinion, a Prince ſhould cheriſh the Religion which moſt ſuiteth with his deſigns whatſoever they are.

The Prince cap. 2. and upon the 1. Decad. chap. 12. 13.

I ſhould willingly know of all thoſe that purſue the like Maxims with this corrupt ſpirit, what they would here anſwer me, upon the progreſſion of the fortune of Conſtantine. Verily behold here a State-wiſdom, whereunto the pen of this Secretary, who pretended ability in ſome petty humane tracks, cannot arrive. Behold a light, whereat all theſe eyes are dazled. Behold an abyſs, where all carnal men are loſt if we will well reckon them up, we ſhall find twelve or thirteen, who in ſeveral ways argue upon the Diadem with Conſtantine. By what degrees hath the divine providence conducted him to the Sovereignty of the Empires of the world? Is it by thoſe, which Monſieur Nicholas Machiavel hath prepared to lead his prince in? If one muſt diſpoile himſelf of innocency to be re-inveſted with the Robe Imperial, why did Conſtantine take the way of Empire by that of ſanctity? If uſe muſt be made of Religion, as of an inſtrument of State, and that taken which hath the moſt credit in the opinion of the people, why went he about to chuſe Chriſtian Religion, at that time when the moſt part of the world, was ingulfed in Gentiliſm? Behold Maxentius, who according to the ordinary cuſtom of the people of Rome, cauſed the pretended books of Sybills to be turned over, conſulted with Augures, offered ſacrifices: This gave him a reputation of piety with a people as much infidel as himſelf: Why did not Conſtantine purſue the ſame ways: Why did he ſet the ſign of the Croſs on his Standards, eſteemed fatal and of ill preſage in the minds of the moſt part of his army? What favour might he then expect from Chriſtians? Would he draw treaſures from them? They were deſpoiled of all. Pretended he to raiſe huge armies of them for his ſervice? They were ſo cut down, that one onely month ſaw ſeventeen thouſand heads upon the ground, did he perſwade himſelf there was much ſtrength in their Religion? They were all either maſſacred, maimed, or baniſhed. Did hee looke for counſel? They were men eſteemed void of learning or Policy. Did he hope for credit? They were trampled under foot like dirt in the ſtreets.

Why then did a man reputed of ſo excellent judgment, confine his intereſts to theſe miſerable creatures? He ſtood in need for the accomodation of his affairs of a Roman Senate, and it was Pagan. He wanted good Captains, and they were in a manner all Gentiles. He muſt have Forts, and they all held for ancient ſuperſtition. What doth he go about? And yet behold in a time wherein his affairs leaſt ſeemed to require it, he takes the marks of Chriſtianity, and with them haſtned to aſſail the army of Maxentius, compoſed of a hundred threeſcore and ten thouſand footmen, and eighteen thouſand horſe, he himſelf according to the relation of thoſe, who lived in the very ſame time, having in this conflict, but very ſmall troops. From whence cometh it, that he in ſo ſhort a time, and with ſo few people, defeated ſuch formidable powers? Not to bely the matter, had theſe men been but earthen ſtatues, they might make reſiſtance. Had they but been an army of ſheep they might weary the ſouldies of Conſtantine to cut their throats. From whence comes it they were ſo ſoon defeated? From whence comes it, that Maxentius ſo baſely betook himſelf to the ſtratagem of a bridge, which he prepared for his enemy? from whence comes it that a Roman Senate, which had confirmed ſo many Edicts againſt the Croſs, a people bred up in the horrour of the crucified, ſhould readily receive a man, who entred into Rome with the Croſs, and the name of the crucified upon his Standard? From whence comes it, that on the triumphal Arch dedicated to him, he would have no mention of Roman Gods? At the leaſt, according to the counſel of the Sectaries of the Florentine Secretary, he ſhould diſſemble his Religion, he ſhould give way to time, he ſhould make himſelf outwardly a Diocletian, and inwardly, if needs he would, a Conſtantine, Will any one ſay, he was at that time a man victorious, who came to give law, and not receive it? But who ſaw not, that his fortune being as yet in the bud, he was to walk towards Empires as on thorns, fearing above all things to irritate in the change of Religion the principal ſpirits, of the Eaſt and Weſt, who were paſſionately affected towards their Sect? I affirm Maxentius the Defendor of the Gods, ruinated himſelfe by his ill government. Lycinius was yet on foot; and verily Lycinius an ancient Souldier, who had waxed old in arms, and had never arrived to the Empire but by his valour, drew in the end all the party of Gentiliſm, with forces innumerable both by Sea and Land, which seemed able to swallow many worlds. He made use of the counsell of Monsieur Machiavel, he protested he took arms for the defence of the Gods and Altars of ancient Religion, against a man who sought to introduce a barbarous sect into the World. Was not this a matter very specious in the times, when the superstition of Gentiles was exalted by Edicts of Emperours to the highest degree of honour? Lycinius notwithstanding is beaten, overthrown, ruined, both by sea and land, although he were one of the most inventive in the subtleties of the art military, of the most resolute for execution, and the most stubborn, to make up again a desperate fortune.

Admirable providence of God above humane Policy.

which

O you Nobility, what shall we say hereupon? Must we not confess there is one God in Heaven, and not any other God, but that of Constantine, who giveth Kingdoms, establisheth Scepters, and cementeth Crowns? If all this proceeding had been an extravagancie of passion, we might attribute one part of it to the hazard of Wars, the other to the valour of Souldiers, and the last, to the heat of the first encounters. But to hold an Empire thirty and one years, with so great an equality, so accomplished a felicity, so secure a peace, from the time of his last conquest, what may one answer to this?

From whence is it, that Constantine having forsaken ancient Rome, of purpose to build a faire City, where God might sincerely be honoured, and adored, without any commixtion of Gods or Altars of Gentils, which he as yet through necessity must tolerate at Rome yet nothing was changed in the West? was there want of men to undertake it? The greatest of the Senate were in a manner all Pagans. Were there not people enough to make reuolts? They were as much inclined thereunto as ever. Were there not souldiers to support the enterprizes of those who had a desire to rebel? There was as many and perhaps more at that time, as at any time before. From whence then proceeded this sweet tranquility, but that the great Angel-Protectour of Constantine, given unto him by the living God, held one foot on the East, and another on the West, to protect, preserve, and honour a man, who had defended, maintained, and reverenced true Religion.

Advice to the Nobility.

Oh Nobility, let no man go about to confine your hearts to these slender and wretched policies, which ruine all generosity. Whilest your Ancestours sincerely honoured the God of Constantine, of Charlemaign, and S. Lewis, and whilest they with all sincerity manured the piety of their predecessours, without any mixture of novelties, factions, and subtleties, they flew like Eagles to the conquest of Provinces, and made their arms resplendent almost in so many places, as the sun enlightneth with his rays. Now they endeavour to perswade you, that following a petty spirit of wrangling, which submitteth Religion to interests, you shall make up to your selves golden fortunes; when indeed experience daily teacheth you, they are but of gilded ice, and are melted under the lightning of Gods justice.

Successors of Constantine.

Open your eyes to that, which I present you in this history, behold yet, if you please, as you pass along, the sequel and proceeding of the successours of Constantine. He left three sons, the one called by his own name, the other Constantius, from the name of his Grand-father, and the third Constans. Constantine and Constans lived not long: the whole Empire which was divided between three, was reunited under the power of Constantius, who verily was an enemy to the superstitions of Gentiles, for which God gave him great victories against the Tyrant Magnentius.

But this unfortunate Prince, in stead of following the same belief of his father, hastned to throw himself violently into the novelties of the Arians; whereof Ammianus the Historian, who was a Pagan souldier, very aptly reprehendeth him, saying, he had done himself great wrong, for that in stead of preserving Christian Religion in its simplicity, he had imbroiled and falsified it with novelism, using more perplexity to search out subtleties, then gravity to pacifie the Church: For he by this means, saith he, stirred up an infinite number of dissentions, which he nourished with disputes and quirks of words, so that under his reign you should never see Bishops but riding post over the fields to hold Synods, thereby to draw all Christendom to the Emperours party. This was the cause that there were almost no horses nor Courriers to be found for the affaires of the Empire, so much were they imployed in voyages which were made for these goodly Councels.

He hath excellently well expressed in few words the nature of Constantius; for he was perpetually busied in these litigious wranglings of the heresie of Arians, assembling Conventicles of his false-Bishops to condemne the Orthodox. From whence it came to pass, that hated of men, and forsaken by God, he led a life full of jealousies, suspicions, disturbances, and which is worse, defiled with blood and massacres.

In the end, having heard the news that Julian the Apostata, his cousin, whom he had before declared Cæsar, was among the Gauls, and saluted Emperour, and having passed through Italy, came to present himself in Thrace, he went speedily out to resist him, and fell into such desperate furies, that on his way he was surprised with a sharpe feaver, which so broiled his body, that they durst no more touch him then a burning fornace. This malady in few dayes bereaved him of soul and Empire, leaving the one to the judgment of God, and the other to Julian.

Behold what became of this deplorable Prince, in the one and fourtieth year of his age, for having betrayed the Religion of his father; the gravity and modesty observed in him, which was the cause he was never seen to spit, nor wipe his nose, nor turn his head in publick, nothing availing him to lengthen out his life. Julian, Nephew and son-in-law of great Constantine, for he espoused Helena sister of Crispus, took instantly the government of the whole Empire upon him, and would needs overthrow all that which his uncle had done in matter of Religion.

Julian with the qualities which Machiavel giveth a Prince, had ill success.

Let us consider a little without passion the notable extravagancies of this spirit, who contemning the piety of Constantine, sought to establish himselfe by all the ways, which the poor policy of earth suggesteth to those who have renounced heaven. To speak to the purpose, we must affirm, this man had all the qualities which Monsieur Machiavel gave to his Prince. If dissimulation may be used for a Kingdom, never was a lamb more milde than this young man at the Court of Constantius, to take all suspicions from him, which he conceived of his near allies; and although he already entertained most mischievous thoughts in the matter of Christian Religion, he so covered them by the publik profession he made of it, that the very Eunuchs who had all charge most narrowly to prie into his actions upon this point, observed nothing therein which tended to alteration in Religion. But far otherwise, about the age of sixteen, he caused his hair to be cut, and vowed himself to the Church, as a Prince most Religious, who thought little on the Empire of the world.

And after, when he was sent into France, although he used strange superstitions and witchcrafts, rising up

up in the night to pray to Mercury, to whom he dedicated much devotion; yet did he also notwithstanding celebrate the feasts with Christians: and that which besides is more considerable, when he was proclaimed Emperour, though he had an enraged desire towards it, and that all this solemnity was throughly agreed upon by his cunning; yet feigned he to have all the aversions in the world against it; & caused himself to be carried to the throne, as one would draw an unruly Sacrifice to the slaugher.

What spirit was ever more dissembled then this man's? If, as saith the Secretary, a Prince should endeavour to have virtues in appearence which may render him acceptable in publick, though he be not to take much pains to have them in effect, never did any man better put on the mask of much honesty then this. For in the fortune of Emperour, he would seem like the most mortified Stoick of all that Sect, shewing himself so chast, that never might you hear one sole mis-becoming word fall from his lips: so sober, that he gave an example to the most austere Monks; so negligent in the neatness of his body, that he much gloried to see vermine run up and down on his beard, which he wore very long, to play the Philosopher in all kindes; so patient, that he many times endured all sorts of affronts and sharp words from mean men, no more moved thereby to anger then a stone.

If it must needs be, according to the same Maximes, that a Prince to procure estimation, should perform great enterprizes, this man was no sooner seated in his Throne, but that he practised admirable policies, and hastned to make war on the Persians, to imitate Alexander the Great, to whose virtues he aspired. If needs some remarkable act must be done in the beginning, he at his entrance professing Paganism, repealeth the Bishops, which Constantius a Christian Prince had banished. If liberality must be used, this man gave all, and said his treasures were better among his friends, then with himself. If excellent Masters in every Art and Science are to be cherished, this man did it with much passion.

From whence then proceedeth it, that with all those goodly parts of Machiavel's Prince, he hath so little prospered, reigning but one year and seven months, and dying strucken with a blow from heaven, which the Pagans themselves confess to be ignorant from whence it came, and dying in a frenzy, which caused him to fill his hand with his own blood and cry, Thou, O Galilean hast overcome, and leaving in his death a memory of his name so odious to all posterity.

The poor man forsaking the way already so happily beaten by Constantine, unluckily hastneth to joyn amity with those wise Politicians, who had all Plato's Common-wealth, who esteemed themselves the most accurate in the government of the World, who promised him by these wiles he practised, the absolute extirpation of Christianity, and to make him the most awful and most glorious of all the Emperours of the world. And I beseech you, what became in the end of all these promises, but dreams, illusions, and vapours?

Constantine under the holy Philosophy of the Cross, reigned more then thirty years. Constantine waged great wars, had great victories, great triumphs, was attended by great Councils, great Cities. Constantine left a Religion, so established, that the malice of an Arian son, nor the Policy of a new Apostata could not extinguish it. Constantine never entred into any battel where he came not off victorious. And Julian in the first war he undertook upon the beginning of his Empire, confounded all his Army, led his Captains to slaughter, was himself slain as a Victim. And the sage Politicians which he ever had in his Army, instead of Priests and Bishops, drew him to death, to serve as a spectacle of confusion for the one, and matter of mirth for the other.

May we not well say, O Nobility, that these spirits who divert your hearts from the chast beliefs of your Ancestors, from the purity of faith, the candor of a good conscience, to invenom them with a doctrine of impiety, policy, and treachery, under colour of humane wisdom, are the plagues of States, the ruines of houses, and the fatal hands to annihilate greatness.

I will not infer for a necessary conclusion, that all such as live in the fear of God and in integrity, must ever have pleasing successes according to the world, in the manage of temporal affairs: this is not a thing absolutely promised to us by God. We have not sold him our fidelity and christianity upon such condition, that he should still afford us the bread of dogs, and favour us with felicities, which he imparteth to Sarazens and Mores. I know good Christian Princes may be afflicted, sometime for the punishment of certain sins, which they with too much indulgence have permitted: sometime for a trial and spectacle of their virtue; sometime to teach us there is another life for the children of God, since they in this same are ill entreated, sometime for causes which the providence of God involveth as in a cloud, replenished with obscurity and darkness. Yet shall you finde in reading Histories either divine or humane, that all those who have progressed on with true feeling of God, and with the lightnings of integrity, and touches of a good conscience, which Nature provideth for every man, have commonly been the most expected, the best beloved, the most happy, and most permanent.

And to speak with S. Augustine, would not they ever be most happy, if they had no other felicity, but to be just in their commands, moderate in their fortunes, humble among services, modest in praises, and faithful servants of God, in Empires? Wherein consisteth the happiness of man, if it be not to fear God, so to fear nothing else? If it be not to love a Kingdom, where we no longer may dread, to have companions? If it be not to pardon injuries through clemency, and not revenge crimes, but by justice? If it be not to be chast in the liberty of pleasures? If it be not rather to command over our own passions, then Cities and Provinces?

August. lib. 5. de civitate Dei. cap. 24

Behold the principal felicity of great Constantine, which you ought, O Noble Men, to take for your model. Do in your own houses what he acted in an Empire: establish there constantly the fear and love of God. Banish vices, as he from his City of Constantinople, the Temples and Victims of false Gods; that the honour of the Cross may set a seal on all your thoughts, all your counsels, all your enterprizes; that your examples may serve to God as Amber, and Adamant, to attract so many hearts of Straw and Iron, as are now in the world, to the love of virtue, that these duels of Gladiatours, condemned by Constantine, may be the horrour of your thoughts, and detestation of your hearts; that Devotion, Chastity, Humility, Patience, Charity; Virtues so familiar to this great Monarch, may make an honourable warfare, which shall possess your heart; and that all of them may there reign, each one in particular with as ample Empire, as all of them in general.

THE

THE STATES-MAN.

To STATES-MEN.

SIRS,

Since God hath put the government of People, Justice, and most important Affairs into your hands; he hath likewise raised you upon a high degree of honour, to be looked on in Offices, no otherwise then as Stars in the Firmament.

Your Dignities are Obligations of Conscience, that bind like the Chains of MEDÆA, and scorch weak Souls in Purple and Gold: but which on the other part afford to generous spirits a perfect lustre of Divinity. The more light a body enjoyeth, say the Learned, so much the more ought it to have of participation and favourable influences for objects which are in a much lower degree then it. So likewise must we necessarily say, that your qualities, which grant you nearer approaches to the source of Greatness, and embellish you with the Rays of the Majesty of a Prince, do most particularly oblige you to all the great Virtues, which concern the Weal-publick.

It oftentimes happeneth, that those who fly from charges and affairs, under pretext of tranquility of spirit, if they be not well rectified therein, finde in stead of repose a precious sluggishness; and those, who make profession of Arms, if they take not good heed, suffering all the innocency of the Golden Age to languish, make themselves virtues of the Iron Age. But your conditions, which have a certain temperance of life more sweet, accompanied with laudable employments, open the way to you, which maketh and crowneth merits. Yet is there need of a Soul very able to preserve it self sincerely in charges, among so many corruptions, and of a heart perfectly purified, to link it wholly to the interests of God, who with three fingers of his power supporteth Estates and Empires.

That is the cause, why I offer this Treatise, not so much to give Maximes of State, of which there are always enough to be found; as sometimes to awaken a good Conscience, which is a true Ray reflected from the eternal Law, to the end that among so many temptations of Honour, and such burthens of Affairs, it may lose any part of his vigour. If you deign to spend some hours of your leasure hereon, it perhaps will not be unprofitable: for at least that will let you see a States-man, as rare as a Phenix, and as pure as an Angel. But if this consideration furnish you with any good thoughts for your perfection, I shall esteem my self well recompensed for the service, which I in this work have vowed to your eminent qualities.

The STATES-MAN.

The first SECTION.

The excellency of Politick Virtues.

I Have ever made account of the division of Virtues which the Platonists use, when they call the one Purgative, the other Illuminative, the third Civil, and the last Exemplar.

Purgative virtues are those, which give to our souls the first tincture of sanctity. For they take our heart wholly possessed as it is yet with earthly passions, and discharge it from so many imperfections which ordinarily corrupt nature, to give it a tast of heavenly things. Illuminative afford us day-light, when we have vanquished the agitations of sense, and establish us in the sweetness of some repose, where we begin to behold the entrances, progresses, and issues of the world wherein we are placed, and the course of this great Comedy, called life. The Civil draw us out of our selves, to apply us to our neighbour, and to render every one his due according to his degree, in the good conversation betwixt man and man. Exemplar proceed much further in perfection, for they expose themselves in publick, to serve as models for others, and appear in charges and dignities, in the government of Kingdoms, Provinces, Cities and Commonalties. This is it which I call here the virtue of a States-man, taking the word generally, not only for those who are engaged in the manage of Monarchies, Soveraignties, and Republicks; but also for such as exercise justice, and other principal charges of civil life. We must affirm this politick virtue which maketh true States-men, is a rare piece, and, as it were, the cream and most purified part of wisdom, seeing that not contenting it self with a lazy knowledge of virtue, it laboureth to build, adorn, and establish the civil world by the maintenance of justice, without which in the amplest Kingdoms are the greatest thefts.

If the World be a Harp, as saith the eloquent Synesius, Justice windeth up the strings, stirreth the fingers, toucheth the Instrument, giveth life to the airs, and maketh all the excellent harmonies. If the world be a Musick-book, framed of days and nights as of white and black Notes, Justice directeth, and composeth. If it be a Ring, Justice is the Diamond. If it be an Eye, Justice is the Soul. If it be a Temple, Justice is the Altar. All yieldeth to this virtue, and and as it is enchased in all laudable actions, so all laudable actions are incorporated in justice. It is an engine much more powerful in effect then was that of Archimedes in Idæa: for it doth that in Kingdoms, which this man could never so much as imagine in his minde, though ambitious enough in inventions. It maketh, I say, Heaven to descend on earth, and earth to mount up to Heaven: Heaven to descend, in introducing a life wholly celestial in the uncivil conversation of men; earth to mount up, in drawing it from dregs and corruption of a covetous and bloody life, to enlighten it with rays of

